By William J. Broad

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

On a cold winter night in 1953, the Netherlands suffered a terrifying blow as old dikes and seawalls gave way during a violent storm.

Flooding killed nearly 2,000 people and forced the evacuation of 70,000 others. Icy waters turned villages and farm districts into lakes dotted with dead cows.

Ultimately, the waters destroyed more than 4,000 buildings.

Afterward, the Dutch - realizing that the disaster could have been much worse, since half the country, including Amsterdam and Rotterdam, lies below sea level - vowed never again.

After all, as Tjalle de Haan, a Dutch public works official, put it in an interview last week, "Here, if something goes wrong, 10 million people can be threatened."

So at a cost of some $8 billion over a quarter century, the nation erected a futuristic system of coastal defenses that is admired around the world today as one of the best barriers against the sea's fury - one that could withstand the kind of storm that happens only once in 10,000 years.

The Dutch case is one of many in which low-lying cities and countries with long histories of flooding have turned science, technology and raw determination into ways of forestalling disaster.

London has built floodgates on the Thames River. Venice is doing the same on the Adriatic.

Japan is erecting superlevees. Even Bangladesh has built concrete shelters on stilts as emergency havens for flood victims.

Experts in the United States say the foreign projects are worth studying for inspiration about how to rebuild New Orleans once the deadly waters of Hurricane Katrina recede into history.

"They have something to teach us," said George Z. Voyiadjis, head of civil and environmental engineering at Louisiana State University. "We should capitalize on them for building the future here."

DOJ_NMG_0002944

Innovations are happening in the United States as well. California is experimenting with "smart" levees wired with nervous systems of electronic sensors that sound alarms if a weakening levee threatens to open a breach, giving crews time to make emergency repairs.

"It's catching on," said William F. Kane, president of Kane GeoTech Inc., a company in Stockton, Calif., that wires levees and other large structures with failure sensors. "There's a lot of potential for this kind of thing."

While scientists hail the power of technology to thwart destructive forces, they note that flood control is a job for nature at least as much as for engineers. Long before anyone built levees and floodgates, barrier islands were serving to block dangerous storm surges. Of course, those islands often fall victim to coastal development.

"You'll never be able to control nature," said Rafael L. Bras, an environmental engineer at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology who consults on the Venetian project. "The best way is to understand how nature works and make it work in our favor."

In humanity's long struggle against the sea, the Dutch experience in 1953 was a grim milestone. The North Sea flood produced the kind of havoc that became all too familiar on the Gulf Coast last week. When a crippled dike threatened to give way and let floodwaters spill into Rotterdam, a boat captain - like the brave little Dutch boy with the quick finger - steered his vessel into the breach, sinking his ship and saving the city.

"We were all called upon to collect clothes and food for the disaster victims," recalled Jelle de Boer, a Dutch high school student at the time who is now an emeritus professor of geology at Wesleyan University. "Cows were swimming around. They'd stand when they could, shivering and dying. It was a terrible mess."

The reaction was intense and manifold. Linking offshore islands with dams, seawalls and other structures, the Dutch erected a kind of forward defensive shield, drastically reducing the amount of vulnerable coastline. Mr. de Haan, director of the water branch of the Road and Hydraulic Engineering Institute of the Dutch Ministry of Transport, Public Works and Water Management, said the project had the effect of shortening the coast by more than 400 miles.

For New Orleans, experts say, a similar forward defense would seal off Lake Pontchartrain from the Gulf of Mexico. That step would eliminate a major conduit by which hurricanes drive storm surges to the city's edge - or, as in the case of Katrina, through the barriers.

The Dutch also increased the height of their dikes, which now loom as much as 40 feet above the churning sea. (In New Orleans, the tallest flood walls are about half that size.) The government also erected vast complexes of floodgates that close when the weather turns violent but remain open at other times, so saltwater can flow into estuaries, preserving their ecosystems and the livelihoods that depend on them.

The Netherlands maintains large teams of inspectors and maintenance crews that safeguard the sprawling complex, which is known as Delta Works. The annual maintenance bill is about $500 million. "It's not cheap," Mr. de Haan said. "But it's not so much in relation to the gross national product. So it's a kind of insurance."

The 1953 storm also pounded Britain. Along the Thames, flooding killed more than 300 people, ruined farmland and frightened Londoners, whose central city narrowly escaped disaster.

The British responded with a plan to better regulate tidal surges sweeping up the Thames from the North Sea. Engineers designed an attractive barrier meant to minimize interference with the river's natural flow. It went into service in 1982 at Woolwich, about 10 miles east of central London.

Normally, its semicircular gates lie flush to the riverbed in concrete supporting sills, creating no obstacle to river traffic. When the need arises, the gates pivot up, rising as high as a five-story building to block rising waters. The authorities have raised the Thames barrier more than 80 times.

In Venice, the precipitating event was a 1966 flood that caused wide damage and economic loss. The upshot was an ambitious plan known as the Moses Project, named after the biblical parting of the Red Sea. Its 78 gargantuan gates would rest on the floor of the Adriatic Sea and rise when needed to block dangerous tidal surges.

Long debate over the project's merits repeatedly delayed the start of construction until May 2003. Opponents claim that the $4.5 billion effort will prove ineffective while threatening to kill the fragile lagoon in which Venice sits. In theory, the gates are to be completed by 2010.

"People fight doing things like this," said Dr. Bras, of M.I.T. "But when disaster strikes you realize how important it is to think ahead."

Planners did just that in Bangladesh after a 1991 hurricane created huge storm surges that killed more than 130,000 people. World charities helped build hundreds of concrete shelters on stilts, which in recent storms have saved thousands of lives.

DOJ_NMG_0002945

In Japan, a continuous battle against flooding in dense urban areas has produced an effort to develop superlevees. Unlike the customary mounds of earth, sand and rock that hold back threatening waters, they are broad expanses of raised land meant to resist breaks and withstand overflows.

The approach being tried in California relies on a technology known as time-domain reflectometry. It works on the same principle as radar: a pulse of energy fired down a coaxial cable bounces back when it reaches the end or a distortion, like a bend or crimp.

Careful measurement of the echoes traveling back along the cable can disclose serious distortions and danger. Dr. Kane, of Kane GeoTech, has installed such a system in the Sacramento River delta, along a levee that is threatening to fail.

Could such a system have saved New Orleans? "It would have given them more information," said Charles H. Dowding, a top expert on the technology at Northwestern University. "The failure of a levee would have been detected." But experts say it is still unclear whether such a warning would have been enough to prevent the catastrophic breaches.

Dr. Bras says sensor technologies for detecting levee failure hold much promise. But he adds that less glamorous approaches, like regular maintenance, may be even more valuable, since prevention is always the best cure.

"We have to learn that things have to be reviewed, revised, maintained and repaired as needed," he said. "To see a city like New Orleans suffer such devastation - some of that was preventable."

He added that no matter how ambitious the coastal engineering, no matter how innovative and well maintained, the systems of levees, seawalls and floodgates were likely to suffer sporadic failures.

"Nature will throw big things at us once in a while," he said. "There's always the possibility that nature will trump us."

Time For A Tough Question: Why Rebuild? (WP)

By Klaus Jacob

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

It is time to swim against the tide. The direction of public discourse in the wake of Katrina goes like this: First we save lives and provide some basic assistance to the victims. Then we clean up New Orleans. And then we rebuild the city. Most will rightly agree on the first two. But should we rebuild New Orleans, 10 feet below sea level, just so it can be wiped out again?

Some say we can raise and strengthen the levees to fully protect the city. Here is some unpleasant truth: The higher the defenses, the deeper the floods that will inevitably follow. The current political climate is not conducive to having scientific arguments heard before political decisions are made. But not doing so leads to the kind of chaos we are seeing now.

This is not a natural disaster. It is a social, political, human and -- to a lesser degree -- engineering disaster. To many experts, it is a disaster that was waiting to happen. In fact, Katrina is not even the worst-case scenario. Had the eye of the storm made landfall just west of the city (instead of to the east, as it did) the wind speeds and its associated coastal storm surge would have been higher in New Orleans (and lower in Gulfport, Miss.). The city would have flooded faster, and the loss of life would have been greater.

What scientific facts do we need before making fateful political, social and economic decisions about New Orleans's future? Here are just two:

First, all river deltas tend to subside as fresh sediment (supplied during floods) compacts and is transformed into rock. The Mississippi River delta is no exception. In the early to mid-20th century, the Army Corps of Engineers was charged with protecting New Orleans from recurring natural floods. At the same time, the Corps kept the river (and some related canals) along defined pathways. These well-intended defensive measures prevented the natural transport of fresh sediments into the geologically subsiding areas. The protected land and the growing city sank, some of it to the point that it is now 10 feet below sea level. Over time, some of the defenses were raised and strengthened to keep up with land subsidence and to protect against river floods and storm surges. But the defenses were never designed to safeguard the city against a direct hit by a Category 5 hurricane (on the Saffir-Simpson scale) or a Category 4 hurricane making landfall just west of the city.

Second, global sea levels have risen less than a foot in the past century, and will rise one to three feet by the end of this century. Yes, there is uncertainty. But there is no doubt in the scientific community that the rise in global sea levels will accelerate.

What does this mean for New Orleans's future? Government officials and academic experts have said for years that in about 100 years, New Orleans may no longer exist. Period.

It is time to face up to some geological realities and start a carefully planned deconstruction of New Orleans, assessing what can or needs to be preserved, or vertically raised and, if affordable, by how much. Some of New Orleans could be transformed into a "floating city" using platforms not unlike the oil platforms offshore, or, over the short term, into a city of boathouses, to allow floods to fill in the 'bowl' with fresh sediment.

DOJ_NMG_0002946

If realized, this "American Venice" would still need protection from the worst of storms. Restoration of mangroves and wetlands between the coast and the city would need to be carefully planned and executed. Much engineering talent would have to go into anchoring the floating assets to prevent chaos during storms. As for oil production, refining and transshipment facilities, buffer zones would have to be established to protect them from the direct onslaught of coastal storm surges.

Many ancient coastal cities of great fame have disappeared or are now shells of their former grandeur. Parts of ancient Alexandria suffered from the subsidence of the Nile delta, and earthquakes and tsunamis toppled the city's famed lighthouse, one of the "Seven Wonders of the Ancient World."

It is time that quantitative, science-based risk assessment became a cornerstone of urban and coastal land-use planning to prevent such disasters from happening again. Politicians and others must not make hollow promises for a future, safe New Orleans. Ten feet below sea level and sinking is not safe. It is time to constructively deconstruct, not destructively reconstruct.

The writer, a geophysicist, is an adjunct professor at Columbia University's School of International and Public Affairs. He teaches and does research on disaster risk management.

'Destroyed' City Clears Out (USAT)

By Patrick O'driscoll

USA Today, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — An evacuation of this city of 460,000 people was largely complete Monday, though National Guardsmen and Army troops continued searching homes for survivors of Hurricane Katrina — and for an unknown number of dead.

"We have advised people that this city has been destroyed," Deputy Police Superintendent W.J. Riley said. "There is nothing here for them and no reason for them to stay: no food, no jobs, nothing."

There were signs of progress amid the devastation. Repairs were completed on two flood walls that broke last week and allowed floodwaters to gush into New Orleans. Water levels had dropped 1 foot after a day of pumping. Electricity had been restored to some areas.

And for the first time since Katrina struck a week ago, some residents were allowed back into the flooded area to check on their homes. "It's all about salvaging what we can today," said David Jackson, an insurance agent who made it in to Metairie by canoe to retrieve clothes, documents and wedding photos.

Mayor Ray Nagin said the number of deaths in his city could reach 10,000. That would make Katrina the nation's deadliest natural disaster. No state or federal agency has issued an estimate of the death toll, however. The official count of the dead in the five states most directly affected by Katrina stood at 234.

Across the nation, more than a half-million people displaced by the hurricane were trying to restart their lives in strange surroundings. At least 240,000 were in Texas, where Gov. Rick Perry said no more could be accommodated. The American Red Cross said it was caring for 135,000 survivors in 14 states.

In Louisiana, more than 50,000 active-duty and National Guard troops in helicopters, boats and trucks joined in a house-by-house search, plucking survivors from rooftops and locating those who perished. Bodies floated in canals and lay on highways.

Nagin said it could be three months before the city is truly habitable, but that results were beginning to be seen. "We're starting to make the kind of progress that I kind of expected earlier," he said.

The coordinator of military troops in Louisiana said order had been restored to the city, and he lashed out at suggestions that troops could not get food and rescuers to people because of a lack of cooperation between federal and local officials.

"That's B.S.," said Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, commander of Joint Task Force Katrina. "There is no red tape."

President Bush returned to the Gulf Coast areas hit by the disaster for the second time in four days. At a stop in Baton Rouge, Bush said all levels of the government were doing their best.

"Where it's not going right, we're going to make it right," he said. "This is one of these disasters that will test our soul and test our spirit, but we're going to show the world once again that not only can we survive but we will be stronger … for it."

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, who has declined Bush's offer of a federal takeover of the relief operation, denied talk of a rift between officials of the governments involved in the effort. "There is no divide. We're all in this together," she said.

Meanwhile, the price of gas tied a record in the face of reduced Gulf of Mexico oil production. The national average for regular-grade gas on Monday hit $3.057 a gallon, according to AAA. Adjusted for inflation, that matches the record of $1.417 in March 1981.

2 Orleans Levees Closed (WT/AP)

By Doug Simpson, Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0002947

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

METAIRIE, La. -- Residents of this suburb were allowed to return home briefly to gather possessions as floodwaters started to recede yesterday, and New Orleans' mayor struck a note of optimism as engineers repaired the city's levees.

Almost a third of New Orleans' police force was missing in action, but a caravan of law-enforcement vehicles from across the nation poured into the city to help establish order.

Late yesterday, the Army Corps of Engineers announced that it had repaired two of the city's levees, including the 200-foot-wide breach on the 17th Street Canal. But officials warned that it might take weeks to pump floodwaters from the city.

For the first time in the week since Hurricane Katrina devastated the area, New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin sounded upbeat about the recovery effort.

"We have more troops arriving, so we're starting to make the kind of progress that I kind of expected earlier," Mr. Nagin said.

In suburban Jefferson Parish, a line of cars stretched for miles, as many of the 460,000 residents got their first look at the destruction since being ordered to leave two days before the storm. The towns of Metairie and Kenner suffered heavy flooding, and thousands of homes were damaged.

Katharine Dastugue was overjoyed to find that floodwaters had gone across her lawn but stopped just inches from her doorstep. As she stood waiting for a boat to take her in, she made a list of things she hoped to salvage before being forced to leave again tomorrow.

"If I can just get my kids' baby photos," she said. "You can't replace those."

Estimates of the human toll of the storm were not known, but Mr. Nagin warned yesterday on NBC's "Today" show that "it wouldn't be unreasonable to have 10,000" dead in New Orleans alone.

So far, Louisiana officials have counted 59 deaths from the storm. In Mississippi, officials said Katrina killed 160.

Near Baton Rouge, La., officials opened an emergency morgue with the capacity to hold 5,000 bodies. Officials told Reuters news agency that the facility, installed in a warehouse in St. Gabriel, would be able to process 144 bodies a day with a staff of 100 working in shifts around the clock.

In New Orleans, the mayor said the city had the authority to force residents to evacuate but didn't say whether it was taking that step. Mr. Nagin did, however, say that drinking water will no longer be handed out to residents who refuse to leave.

President Bush yesterday paid his second visit to Louisiana, where he was greeted by an open letter in the New Orleans Times-Picayune, the state's largest newspaper, that called on him to fire every official at the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA).

Meanwhile, the arrival of police reinforcements provided relief to New Orleans' exhausted force. As many as 500 officers on the city's 1,600-member force were unaccounted for, police officials said.

"Some simply left because they said they could not deal with the catastrophe," said Deputy Police Chief W.J. Riley. Officials said officers were being cycled off duty and given five-day vacations in Las Vegas and Atlanta, where they would receive counseling.

Police Superintendent Eddie Compass denied that officers deserted in droves, acknowledging that some officers abandoned their jobs but saying he didn't know how many. Two police officers killed themselves. Another was shot in the head.

Mr. Compass said 150 had to be rescued from 8 feet of water and others had gotten infections from walking through contaminated floodwaters in New Orleans.

"No police department in the history of the world was asked to do what we were asked," Mr. Compass said.

As law-enforcement officials and volunteers search the city for survivors, they encountered a familiar obstacle -- people who have been trapped more than a week in damaged homes yet refused to leave.

"We have advised people that this city has been destroyed," said Deputy Chief Riley, who estimated that fewer than 10,000 residents were still in New Orleans. "There is nothing here for them and no reason for them to stay, no food, no jobs, nothing."

After sheets of metal and repeated helicopter drops of 3,000-pound sandbags succeeded in plugging the gap in the 17th Street Canal, the Corps of Engineers began pumping water back into Lake Pontchartrain. Floodwaters in the city were already receding yesterday, with the low-lying 9th Ward dropping more than a foot.

In Metairie, many residents were happy that the storm spared their homes, but angry that the failure of the levee system left them swamped.

"That's what so devastating, that ... levee breaking," said Bobby Patrick, a resident of the neighborhood now living in Houston. "My home didn't lose a shingle, but it's got six feet of water in it."

DOJ_NMG_0002948

Since the storm, rumors had swirled that looters from New Orleans had begun breaking into evacuated homes in Jefferson Parish. Many were relieved to return home yesterday to find their belongings untouched -- and police checkpoints on every major street corner with ID checks for parish residents.

Along with survivors returning to survey the damage to their homes, the roads into the storm-struck region were jammed with volunteers bringing relief.

FEMA has urged Americans to contact nonprofit organizations if they want to volunteer or donate. But some volunteers insisted on independent action.

On Friday, Gary Maclaughlin of Santa Cruz, Calif., flew to Nashville, Tenn., where he bought a used school bus for $2,000. He used his credit card to buy $1,500 worth of diapers, bottled water, granola bars and peanut butter crackers. By Sunday evening, he was driving loads of evacuees from the New Orleans airport to a rescue shelter in Covington, La.

Water, Water Everywhere (WSJ)

By Ann Carrns, Kris Hudson And Dionne Searcey

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

Hurricane Katrina submerged New Orleans and quickly moved on, but draining the historic, low-lying city will be a daunting job sure to go on for weeks, or more likely, months to come.

Officials with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which is in charge of repairing the levees, are balking at putting a firm time frame -- or price tag -- on the drainage effort, saying the situation is dynamic and too many variables remain.

Over the weekend, portable pumps began arriving to supplement the city's existing network of permanent pumping stations, known as some of the most powerful in the world. An official with the Corps of Engineers' Mississippi Valley division said at a briefing Sunday in Baton Rouge that it could take between one to three months to drain the water, after all the pumps are operational.

But before the pumps could be used, engineers had to find a way to close several serious breaches in the system of levees and floodwalls meant to protect the city from massive Lake Pontchartrain to the north and the Mississippi River to the south. Otherwise, the water pumped out could flow back into the city.

A storm surge from Hurricane Katrina blew at least five big holes in the levees, inundating New Orleans and some adjoining areas with water a week ago. The levee system was designed to withstand no more than a category-three storm, and Katrina made landfall near New Orleans as a powerful category-four hurricane, overwhelming the system.

Officials said they had had plans in place to repair levees in the event of a breach but added that it's difficult to prepare for the exact conditions and location of a given rupture. The devastation also made it difficult to move repair materials into place.

Flooding nearly obscured a street sign near the 17th Street Canal breach.

"I don't know if you ever anticipate anything to be breached," Al Naomi, an official with the Corps of Engineers in New Orleans, said in a conference call with reporters on Friday. But if a storm hits that exceeds the system's design capacity, "You're going to have problems of some type, whether a breach or overtopping." In response to a question about whether anything was done to fortify levees in the days leading up to storm, Mr. Naomi said: "There's not much you can do in 24 hours, or in 48 hours, to make that situation any better."

By Monday, work was complete on repairs at the 17th Street Canal, which runs along the city's western border and drains into Lake Pontchartrain. Contractors had partially sealed off the canal's entrance to the lake by driving huge sheets of metal into the canal's base.

Work also was completed on repair of the actual breach -- located on the canal's eastern floodwall -- by dumping giant sandbags into it. Once the canal's pumps are working reliably, part of the steel sheets at the canal's entrance will be removed, so that pumped water can flow freely out of the canal into the lake.

At the same time, efforts were under way Monday to restart a major pumping station located near the canal along Interstate 10, which in normal times pumps rainwater out of the city and into the 17th Street Canal. "Now the job at hand is to get the pump station back working, so it can do its job," said Greg Breerwood, deputy district engineer for project management with the Corps of Engineers in New Orleans, in a telephone interview. But work was expected to proceed cautiously to prevent overloading the pumps and further destabilizing the damaged floodwalls. "We're taking it real slow," said Mr. Breerwood.

At 4:10 p.m. Monday, Col. Rich Wagenaar of the Corps of Engineers ordered that one of the main pumps be started at a station along the 17th Street Canal. If the pump keeps running, and the breach plug holds, the draining of New Orleans is under way. "We want to move water," Col. Wagenaar said.

At the London Avenue Canal, where two major breaches occurred, the mouth -- where the canal empties into Lake Pontchartrain -- has been closed off. But the pump on that canal can't be turned on until the breach itself is repaired, and plans for fixing that aren't finalized.

DOJ_NMG_0002949

Work has yet to begin on repairing two more breaches along the Industrial Canal, on the city's eastern border, because crews can't get there yet. Contractors have been hired to remove debris that blocks access to the canal.

The Industrial Canal breaches, believed to have occurred in the early hours of the hurricane on Monday, Aug. 29, inundated low-lying neighborhoods in the eastern part of New Orleans and adjoining areas. Water from those neighborhoods has been draining on its own, flowing back through the breach into the canal.

Farther to the east of New Orleans, in flooded St. Bernard Parish, and to the southeast, in Plaquemines Parish, the Corps of Engineers hired contractors to make new breaches in levees over the weekend, to help drain the area. Pumps were assisting the drainage in St. Bernard, but not in Plaquemines due to high water, officials at the Sunday briefing said.

By Boat Through A Water World (WP)

By Manuel Roig-franzia

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 5 -- The bad places stink. Musty. Gassy. Spoiled and rotting.

It's the smell of the swamp. And New Orleans is a swamp now, transformed in just eight days from the funkiest of gems into a wild place, a place of black waters, snakes, and spooky, echoing abandonment. Fires burn throughout the city on the surface of oil-slicked water that reaches -- with its spreading algae -- up to the streetlights in some neighborhoods.

There are entire swaths of New Orleans where no one can go without a boat, or hip waders, or foolish courage. But a few go anyway, searching for stranded pets or stranded neighbors, or both. The city -- the worst parts, at least, the deeply flooded east -- is best approached by water.

On the choppy surface of Pontchartrain, the giant lake that poured into the streets with such persisting ferocity, New Orleans looks like a walled medieval city. The huge levees built to keep water out now keep water in.

Edging along the giant lake's shore and poking through myriad canals reveal a netherworld of destruction and vigilantism in some of the city's toughest-to-reach sectors. To the west, a man with a shotgun guarded condominiums at the shredded Orleans Marina. Farther down the shore, a stockbroker slogged through waist-high water, carrying a whimpering pit bull. Way out east, a Catholic-Buddhist-transcendentalist prayed at an altar and took instructions from her long-dead father.

At a boat launch just west of the city, Mike Fitzpatrick wanted what everyone here wanted: a boat ride to get to his guns. He was lucky. He hopped into a little flatboat with a small group of reporters and pointed down the shore toward the smoldering Orleans Marina, where his cache of weapons lay hidden.

The ride took him past the Southern Yacht Club, on the city's western edge. It is charred, a blackened skeleton, overlooking a point pushing into Lake Pontchartrain where New Orleans teenagers would go to make out, using the code words that they were "off to watch the submarine races." Fitzpatrick, a riverboat pilot who people around here call a "Y'at" -- shorthand for the city's signature greeting, "Where y'at?" -- shook his head and grabbed for a ringing cell phone.

"It sunk?" he said to a fellow boat owner, floating past sailboats tossed onto decks and laid out like fallen dominoes. "Was it insured? Ah, good."

Across the marina from Fitzpatrick's place, a 30-foot yacht perched perfectly on top of pilings, 10 feet above the waterline. It was an incredible sight. A storm that treated New Orleans so roughly seemed to lift this boat into the air and then put it down with the most gentle touch -- barely harmed.

Not far away, heavy helicopters ferrying 7,000-pound duffel bags full of sand thundered down to the 17th Street Canal -- the great villain of Hurricane Katrina, with its 500 feet of broken levee that allowed thousands of homes to be engulfed before the gap was closed Monday.

Watching from a nearby bridge, Kenny Crumholt, a resident engineer with the Army Corps of Engineers, remembered the first sandbags dropped in days ago, the ones that disappeared beneath the surface, demonstrating the depth of the chasm. "We would drop them and they would sink," Crumholt said. "We were getting aggravated."

Along the canal, the fortunate -- the ones who live on the opposite side of the levee break, the ones whose houses are dry -- have built ladders out of old crates to watch the progress, or lack thereof. "If this would have broke on our side, it would have been all over for us," Sherry Blue said.

About a mile down shore, Renee Pastor -- a fast-talking redhead with a stubborn streak -- floated into the Orleans Outfall Canal on a rumbling powerboat for a rescue mission. She had to save her dogs left behind by an evacuating pet sitter, and she had to find Mr. McCobb, an elderly neighbor gone missing.

Pastor brought help -- serious help. Dale Coon, sunburned and sporting a barbed-wire tattoo on his left arm, stepped out of her boat and climbed up the canal levee, stuffing a .38 Special and .357 magnum into his pants front.

"That's one good thing about being from a family of rednecks," Pastor said. "Everybody's got guns."

DOJ_NMG_0002950

After Pastor and Coon waded through a street turned pond to collect her bulldog, Chance, and her chubby Labrador, Max, they set off to find Mr. McCobb. Pastor's neighborhood of million-dollar homes, all backing up to a private park, was covered with foul, inky water. The rotten-egg stench of broken gas mains scented their slog past the oil fire, the house burned to its foundation, the submerged park, the BMW flooded to its rooftop.

Her house -- just renovated with pricey Asian flourishes -- sits on a virtual island neighborhood called Lake Vista, bounded on three sides by Lake Pontchartrain, Bayou St. John and the Orleans Canal. Pastor carried a slip of paper with an address, but navigating streets she once knew so well became a series of stops and starts. The water contorted all perceptions, toyed with her sense of direction.

"Go left, big ol' snake there," Coon called out.

The little rescue party, wearing the post-Katrina fashion statement of plastic pants with bootees that go over their shoes and suspenders, veered quickly. Water moccasins, among the deadliest of snakes, have been spotted in the city, and no one wanted to wait around to see if this was one of them.

The snake detour took them to a little white, wooden house. Pastor made everyone stop. "He might be hiding in there with a gun," she said.

"Hellooooo! We're here to help you. Don't shoot," she said, easing toward the house.

Coon turned detective.

"He ain't gone," he said. "Look."

In the driveway lay a survivalist's arsenal: two transistor radios, a cell phone, a half-empty bottle of Napa Valley zinfandel, tobacco, a pipe and some blackberry soda.

Coon stooped and picked up four shiny cylinders: shells from a .22 magnum. "Ain't been long since this been shot," he said, drawing a deep whiff. "He ain't gone. He's hiding. Freaked out. Scared."

Pastor yelled out again: "I'm coming in. Don't shoot. Don't shoot."

Inside the house, her calls went unanswered. Two guns and a pile of knives sat on a table by the door. But no Mr. McCobb.

Thousands Return To Jefferson Parish (LAT)

By David Zucchino

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

GRETNA, La. — When she saw the ruins of her beloved garden and realized that her prized koi had died in their own pond, Helene Dinh let out a tiny sob, then fell into the arms of her son-in-law.

"Oh, my fish . . . oh, oh, oh," she said, and the tears came.

Dinh, a tiny, spare woman of 61, had forced herself to return at dawn today to her brick ranch house in sprawling Jefferson Parish on New Orleans' southern edge. She had fled just before the parish was lashed by winds and floodwaters from Hurricane Katrina. Now, she said, she wished she had never made the trip back.

"It hurts so much to see this," she said, staring at a tree that had slammed down across her frontyard.

Dinh was among tens of thousands of parish residents allowed to inspect their homes for the first time since the hurricane struck one week earlier. Thousands came supplied with coolers crammed with food and water to sustain them until Thursday, when parish sheriff's deputies will force everyone to leave again.

The parish's temporary return offer, which was criticized by some parish officials as too dangerous, began at 6 a.m. sharp, when police removed cruisers that had blocked a four-lane highway at the western edge of the parish. An estimated 20,000 to 30,000 returning residents, most of whom slept in their cars on the highway Sunday night, sped into the township in a race to their homes that resembled a 19th century land rush.

Swerving past toppled trees and downed power lines, most found their homes intact. The parish, the second largest in the state with 480,000 residents, was spared the widespread flooding that left more than 80% of adjacent New Orleans underwater. About 15% of the parish was flooded, said parish Councilman Chris Roberts.

Although some homes are underwater, Roberts said, most are intact. Thousands lost sections of roofs and siding, and many were struck by falling trees and limbs. Electricity, phones and water have been knocked out, and stores have been looted. Even so, the scale of destruction and displacement was far less than in New Orleans.

The residents' return came as parish officials were condemning the Federal Emergency Management Agency and other national and state relief organizations for failing to offer assistance. Today, a week after Katrina hit land, the parish still has not received outside help, officials said, and is relying on municipal and volunteer assistance.

For instance, outside a Best Buy store, residents who had remained in their homes lined up today for food, water and supplies provided by a Hazard, Ky., radio station and the sheriff's department.

DOJ_NMG_0002951

The parish decided to let residents return until Thursday to check their homes and retrieve belongings so that workers can move into neighborhoods for cleanup and repairs. There is a 6 p.m. curfew each night.

One of the first to arrive back home at first light today was Mike Buclalan, 29, Dinh's son-in-law. He pulled his grey Mitsubishi Montero SUV, loaded with three dachshunds and supplies, into the driveway of his one-story home on Bonnie Ann Drive.

His wife, Marie, rushed inside, searching for their cat, Harry Potter. The animal ran across her path and she scooped him up. "He looks fine," she said. "Just a little frazzled."

The house was fine, too, for the most part. Its roof and siding were intact, though the backyard fence had been blown over. A powerful stench rose up from the meat rotting in the kitchen freezer.

"Oh, man, I'm pretty happy," Mike Buclalan said, inspecting the living room. "I'd have to say I'm pleasantly surprised. It could've been a lot worse."

The damage was worse at Dinh's home a few miles away, where water had been blown into her living room and her elaborate backyard garden was a wreck.

It was Dinh's second time as a refugee. She had come to the United States in 1975 as a refugee from Vietnam.

When her husband died in 1984, gardening had become her therapy, she said. But now her lemon and persimmon trees had been crushed. Her six dead koi were belly up in her pond, smelling strongly of decay.

She couldn't find her four cats, and she broke down again and sobbed.

But later, two of her cats, Tabby and Meow-Meow, crept into the yard. Dinh let out a cry and said, "Tabby, you came home!"

Buclalan tried to console his mother-in-law, mentioning that her orchids had survived.

"All in all, we did OK," he said. "All we asked for was four walls and a ceiling. We're lucky."

Evacuees Allowed Back, For Half A Day (USAT)

By Patrick O'Driscoll

USA Today, September 6, 2005

METAIRIE, La. — Mary Salassi rocks on the porch swing at her son Henry's house as he and his brother-in-law wade a borrowed kayak into three feet of water on West Livingston Place. Dipping wooden paddles meant for stirring a crawfish-boiling pot, they row off toward Salassi's flooded town house, several blocks away.

“I'm not going to worry about it,” she says. “You can't go back and look at what happened. You have to go forward. Like I told my children and grandchildren: You have your family.”

Salassi turned 66 a week ago, the day Hurricane Katrina demolished much of southern Louisiana and Mississippi. “They all said, ‘You're never going to forget this birthday,' ” she muses. “My life's upside down, but I will come back.”

The Salassis were among the first evacuees allowed back to the western and southern suburbs of New Orleans on Monday, having driven all the way from Houston late Sunday. Through Thursday, Jefferson Parish is opening a 12-hour window — 6 a.m. to 6 p.m. CT — for hundreds of thousands to visit their storm-tossed neighborhoods, assess damage and grab a few belongings.

Then the people of Jefferson, whose 435,000 residents make it Louisiana's second-largest parish after New Orleans, must leave. Dubbed “residents-in-exile” by parish council president Aaron Broussard, they won't be allowed home again until power, water and other key services are restored. That could take weeks. Which is better than the months it may take in parts of New Orleans next door.

Most who endured several miles of bumper-to-bumper traffic to get into Jefferson Parish early Monday found that neighborhoods were wind-blown and shredded but dry or only damp; the high waters have receded.

But in Old Metairie, an enclave amid elegantly gnarled oaks on the west doorstep of New Orleans, the murky, sewage-tinged soup is still five feet deep in places.

“We're the highest point along what's called Metairie Ridge. We're where you run to in a flood,” says Newell Normand, the parish's chief deputy sheriff. That was before a now-infamous levee on the 17th Street Canal, which straddles the Jefferson-Orleans boundary, gave way hours after Katrina passed.

“I'm told that the 17th Street Canal pump will go on today, but I've been told a lot of things over the past week that didn't work out,” adds Normand, who has been set up at an emergency command post still without power.

Old Metairie borders the canal, whose breach inundated much of New Orleans and eastern Jefferson Parish. It turned a natural occurrence of extremely bad weather into the worst disaster in U.S. history.

“It's a man mistake, not the hurricane,” Salassi says.

DOJ_NMG_0002952

Whatever the blame, residents who trickle into the neighborhood bring chain saws, boats, generators and rental trucks. Those who haven't left town drift over to a relief center at the Sam's Club parking lot off Airline Highway. National Guard troops in green camouflage have been paired with sheriff's deputies to direct traffic and keep the peace at major intersections.

Despite uncounted fallen trees and thousands of downed power lines, most returnees are able to drive home. Others have to wade or paddle.

David Jackson, an Allstate insurance agent, has come from LaPlace, La., to fetch clothes, documents and wedding photos from a house swamped with two feet of water.

"I came here in a pair of flip-flops and shorts, and my son's track coach lent me a pair of boots and a boat," says Jackson, 43. He glances down at the green rubber footwear and does a double-take. "Two left boots!" he laughs. "But right now, they're the best boots in town."

After three trips in a flat-bottomed Cajun canoe called a pirogue, Jackson loads his pickup and sets out. "It's all about salvaging what we can today," he says. "My family was the most important priority. From tomorrow on, it'll be probably 10- to 12-hour days minimum for me" as he sorts out insurance claims for his clients.

Michael Norton, a computer consultant, drove in from Austin and found two feet of water, too, and a toppled tree. "I had a contract out to take down the pecan tree in my back yard," says Norton, 38. "Too late." And it missed his house. Other homes haven't been so lucky.

Slung over Norton's shoulder is a shotgun. His friend, Dan Sanders, 38, packs a pistol on his belt. "We were expecting the worst," Sanders explains, noting reports of violence spilling out of New Orleans. After half of Oakwood Shopping Mall, on the parish's West Bank, was ransacked and torched last week, tension has spiked in the suburbs. A spray-painted sign in a West Bank neighborhood warns: "U LOOT — WE SHOOT."

But the sheriff's office says the return of residents has gone fairly smoothly. "We haven't had too many problems — yet," Normand says.

As electricity has been restored sporadically, a few older homes have caught fire, probably from old or faulty wiring, he says. More ominous: reports of carbon monoxide poisoning deaths among families who rode out Katrina and fired up gas-powered generators after losing power. "The water surrounded the houses, and they brought their portable generators inside," Normand explains.

Back in Old Metairie, Maria Maginnis, 38, sits in the cab of the family SUV, eager to leave after having been carried piggy-back by her husband, David, through waist-high water to their split-level on Atherton Drive.

"I didn't want to come," she says, dread still in her voice. She laments the condition of her house, which might not be home again for months. "All the sewage," she says. "I didn't expect that."

They first had fled to Nacogdoches, Texas, then drifted closer — first to Beaumont, Texas, then Baton Rouge, the Louisiana capital about an hour west of here. On Monday, they arrived before 3 a.m. Maria stayed in the car at first while David, with flashlight and waders, slogged down the block in the dark.

"The anxiety of seeing your house is what is driving you," David says. "I wanted to do some preliminary checks so it wouldn't be such a shock when the sun came up. Regardless of what shape you find it in, it's a relief."

After sunrise, the couple surveyed a foot of water in the house. They stayed only long enough to grab a few essentials: baseballs and bats, a football, a New Orleans Saints T-shirt, a PlayStation, children's books, and Swimmy, the pet blue fighting fish for sons Cade, 8, and Connor, 4.

"The main thing for us is the kids," explains David, 39, who works for a major Louisiana fresh-tuna supplier. "They're separated from their friends, their everyday activities, their school. The waiting list for schools is incredible."

For Maria, the visit has lasted long enough. "I don't want to come back until it's livable," she says. "I am so ready to go."

At 7:45 a.m., they were gone.

Services Providing Oil, Phones And Electric Restarting (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, September 6, 2005

Gulf Coast oil production rigs and refineries shuttered by Hurricane Katrina began to ease their way back into operation over the holiday weekend in moves expected to help relieve U.S. price run-ups and fears of shortages.

Yet facilities generating 70% of the oil and more than half of the natural gas in the Gulf of Mexico remain closed down, the U.S. Minerals Management Service said.

And though several Gulf Coast refineries restarted or were poised to do so this week, four others that account for more than 5% of U.S. capacity were expected to remain shut for weeks or months.

DOJ_NMG_0002953

The halting progress was emblematic of the slow-but-steady rejuvenation of the infrastructure — utility lines, ports and oil pipelines — underpinning the hurricane-ravaged region.

Oil producers such as ExxonMobil are resuming production that was halted when they evacuated offshore workers in preparation for Katrina. The gulf's rich supply of 4,000 offshore oil-and-gas operations, linked to land by 33,000 miles of pipelines, account for more than 25% of U.S. oil production.

As much as 92% of the gulf's oil production was shut when the storm hit more than a week ago, helping push benchmark crude-oil futures to record prices.

Meanwhile, several key refineries were relaunching. Marathon Oil's 245,000-barrel-a-day refinery in Garyville, La., restarted last week and was expected to be at full capacity by today, company spokeswoman Linda Casey said. Motiva Enterprises' 235,000-barrel-a-day refinery in Convent, La., has restarted. Two Norco, La., facilities — a 225,000-barrel-a-day Motiva plant and a Valero Energy refinery — were to restart by midweek.

The Louisiana Offshore Oil Port, a critical facility for unloading and distributing imported crude oil on the gulf, said it's operating at about 75% of capacity after power was restored at its Clovelly, La., storage facility. It's expected to be at full capacity in a week.

But four refineries southeast of New Orleans and in Mississippi were hit more severely and it wasn't clear when they would restart. Those include Chevron's 325,000-barrel-a-day facility in Pascagoula, Miss., and ConocoPhillips' 255,000-barrel-day facility in Belle Chasse, La.

Key oil pipelines that closed down in advance of the storm are also ramping up, said the Association of Oil Pipe Lines. The Colonial Pipeline, which transports refined oil from Houston to New York City, is at 80% capacity.

Two crude-oil pipelines that run from the gulf to Illinois and from Texas to the Southeast are at 75% and 50% of capacity.

About 1 million customers in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama were still without power late Monday, down from 2.7 million when the hurricane struck, the Energy Department said.

Entergy has restored power to key sites in New Orleans after restarting its Market Street substation. Those include part of the French Quarter and the lights on the Crescent City Connection bridges.

“We're hoping the lighting will give people hope that the city's coming back,” company spokesman Chanel Lagarde said.

Entergy was also close to restoring power to two key water pumps so city and federal workers could begin draining the city of much of its standing water.

It will be two to four weeks before power is completely restored in outlying counties, Lagarde said. Parts of New Orleans will remain dark for months.

Gulf ports are major gateways for exports of wheat and soybeans and imports of steel, rubber and coffee, handling about 25% of U.S. cargo.

The lower Mississippi River opened during the weekend for barges or shallow-depth ships that can carry low volumes of products such as grain or coal. That means those vessels can offload materials for transfer to larger ships headed to the Midwest.

Among the reopened ports was the Port of Mobile in Alabama. But two key facilities, the Port of New Orleans and the Port of Southern Louisiana, are expected to remain closed for weeks.

About 1.1 million customers in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama are without service. That's down from 1.7 million after Katrina hit, BellSouth spokesman Jeffrey Battcher said.

About 90% of the outages are in hard-hit New Orleans and Gulfport, where it could take four to six months to restore service.

“We've got central offices completely destroyed,” Battcher said.

Meanwhile, Verizon Wireless, Cingular Wireless and Sprint Nextel say cellular phone service has largely been restored in the Baton Rouge, Biloxi and Jackson metropolitan areas.

Although progress has been made in New Orleans, with some cell towers operating, service is still spotty, the companies say.

Utility Crews Help Turn Lights Back On In Parts Of The Gulf Region (NYT)

By Barnaby J. Feder

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

JACKSON, Miss., Sept. 5 - Randall W. Helmick, the man whose job it is to get the lights back on in New Orleans and many other parts of Louisiana and southern Mississippi, had finally reached his limit.

So on Friday afternoon he ordered the televisions turned off in the temporary command center for Entergy, the power company for 1.1 million households and businesses that lost electricity in Hurricane Katrina. The news reports were not helping

Mr. Helmick's 100-plus-member team concentrate on coordinating the efforts of thousands of repair workers scattered over hundreds of square miles.

"The focus of the news coverage was on the disaster in New Orleans, and it was depressing and distracting people," Mr. Helmick said. "There was nothing we could do to get the power on in New Orleans, and I saw it draining people's energy."

This week the TV's are back on, but so are many more lights - over half of Entergy's affected customers by Monday evening, mainly in places well away from New Orleans. And even in New Orleans itself, the company had restored some power by nightfall Monday, including to the Convention Center, the warehouse district and the docks where cruise ships tie up. Electricity was also flowing to some parts of the French Quarter, Harrah's Casino and a few hotels near Canal Street. Entergy sent its first work crews into the city on Sunday to see how much could be restored using equipment that had not been flooded and the underground part of the network, made to withstand flooding.

But no one should expect electricity soon elsewhere in New Orleans, said Mr. Helmick, who works behind a plain table adorned with a makeshift sign, "Storm Boss."

"It will be extremely slow going because the rest is underwater or reliant on overhead distribution lines that were heavily damaged," he said. "Now we face some key decisions on whether to focus more resources on the city or the surrounding areas."

Working from an Entergy training center in Jackson, 180 miles north of New Orleans, Mr. Helmick does not want or expect his colleagues to ignore the plight of the company's home city, where Entergy's 22-story headquarters building near the Superdome is a prominent landmark. After all, he and about 1,600 Entergy employees, normally based in or near New Orleans, had to evacuate - leaving homes, relocating families - the weekend before Hurricane Katrina struck. Mr. Helmick's family is now in Baton Rouge, La., but some of his colleagues have moved theirs as far away as Atlanta.

The best thing Entergy could do for New Orleans, Mr. Helmick said, was to restore service as quickly as possible to cities like Jackson and Baton Rouge that have been absorbing refugees. That recovery approach follows traditional utility practice: focus on restoring vital public services where possible and otherwise rebuild by expanding outward from the parts of the power grid still functioning.

Mr. Helmick says he thinks of himself as an air traffic controller rather than a field general. To restore Entergy's power grid as rapidly as possible, the efforts of its distribution companies in Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas most be coordinated with the repair of transmission lines and substations.

The amount of power Entergy generates at its plants must be carefully balanced with the network's ability to deliver it. And the effort requires management of outside resources like the thousands of temporary repair workers from other utility companies or from contractors who specialize in disaster recovery.

Although bristling with phones and PC's, Mr. Helmick's improvised command center belies the years of thought and practice behind Entergy's response. Not only had the company rehearsed its hurricane plan in April, as it does every year, but it had specifically practiced for a storm landfall near New Orleans.

On Saturday, Aug. 27, the day before the storm bore down on New Orleans, more than half the employees in the city were told via e-mail and Web notices not to come to work on Monday and to take whatever steps were necessary to protect their families.

Most of the rest were told to leave the city but stay in touch. The core group of storm managers went to Jackson while other senior managers were dispatched to Baton Rouge and Little Rock, Ark.

But last spring's drills did not anticipate several realities, including the flooding in New Orleans, the civil unrest and the delays in obtaining thousands of workers from other companies, who were still repairing the damage Katrina had caused in Florida. At no time did the company dream it would become more than temporarily homeless itself, and have to determine what to do with thousands of displaced employees.

Last Sunday, Entergy acknowledged that it may be a corporate refugee for months and announced that J. Wayne Leonard, the chief executive, and other senior managers would establish temporary headquarters 10 miles west of here in Clinton, Miss. Entergy is moving to the posh campus that was the headquarters of the telecommunications giant WorldCom before it collapsed in an accounting scandal.

Mr. Leonard vowed to return eventually to New Orleans but said that he had no idea when that would be possible.

In some respects, Entergy has never performed better. As of Monday evening, the company had reconnected 575,000 customers - more than twice as many customers as it handled in July after a tropical storm, Cindy. The reconnected include vital oil refineries and nearly all of its major commercial customers north of New Orleans. But Katrina's impact was so much more extensive than its predecessors that more than 500,000 customers are still without power.

Those still without power include customers in rural areas where days of work may add only a few users, those too flooded to receive power and those like the refineries downriver from New Orleans where Entergy workers must traverse treacherous marshes.

DOJ_NMG_0002955

Within New Orleans, where Entergy is also the natural gas utility, the company is just beginning the painstaking and potentially hazardous task of inspecting and repairing its gas distribution network. The system is functional but is likely to have developed potentially deadly leaks.

In Jackson, where 20 percent of Entergy customers still lack power, hundreds of maintenance crews converge each night on the sprawling parking lot around the Coliseum and the adjoining exhibition center.

Inside the exhibition hall, not far from where the Red Cross provides food and clothing to refugees, Entergy's caterer serves dinner for thousands. Buses ferry the workers to the hotels, church campgrounds and other facilities in which Entergy houses the repair crews. During the weekend, more than 100 men were sleeping on cots in abandoned office cubicles of the largely empty WorldCom campus.

Entergy has hired more than 10,000 workers from other utilities and contractors, all of whom must be trained to work on its network. So far, according to Entergy, the only serious casualty has been an employee of Air2, a contractor based in Timonium, Md., who was crushed last week while handling 75-foot transmission poles.

The workers often arrive in convoys, like the 47 repair vehicles from FirstEnergy, a utility holding company in Akron, Ohio, that pulled into the Coliseum parking lot Saturday. The group arrived from Florida, where it had spent nine days repairing storm damage.

Local Entergy officials like Haley Fisackerly have been scrambling for fuel and other resources required to keep the crews working. On Friday, Mr. Fisackerly learned that a local contractor had photocopied an Entergy letter, which authorizes fuel priority for the contractor's firm, and given it to family members to help them jump gas lines. That led to a hasty redesign of the authorization form to thwart such finagling.

The need to prevent theft once fuel has been acquired is one of many reasons Entergy has found itself requiring far more security workers than anticipated. "We're all running on adrenaline," said Mr. Fisackerly. "People realize there's a worse disaster farther south, so we are trying to fend for ourselves."

According to out-of-state repair workers, that awareness has also made Entergy's customers in this region some of the most grateful they have encountered. "One guy came out and said he wanted to give me a great big hug," said Randy Myers, a contract line repairman from Wyalusing, Pa. "That's not the reception we get on Long Island."

Inside City, The Deluge Came After The Storm (USAT)

By Patrick O'Driscoll, Steve Wieberg, Peter Eisler And Rick Hampson

USA Today, September 6, 2005

Those who stayed in New Orleans
describe initial relief followed
by desperation

NEW ORLEANS — The fall of New Orleans was a catastrophe with an added cruelty: hours of false hope, when it seemed the city had been spared the worst, not doomed to a sodden grave.

By noon last Monday, people thought the crisis had passed; by noon the next day, they knew it had just begun.

In between came that moment of exquisite horror when each person still in the city grasped that destruction would come not by great wind or mighty wave, but by water rising inch by inch.

Deborah Caldwell, cowering in her attic, realized there was no way to go but up.

Twanda Otis looked out a second-story window and saw water a few feet below.

Pat Thomas stepped outside for a rake and found she needed a dam.

They didn't know that a 20-foot chunk had burst out of the levee along the 17th Street Canal and that Lake Pontchartrain was filling their city like a soup bowl. They did know this: It was time for fight and flight.

So Caldwell grasped her only implements of escape: an ax and a household hammer. Otis, hugging her newborn, stepped uncertainly into a wobbly boat. Thomas waded off into chest-deep water polluted with who-knew-what.

At dawn Sunday, Aug. 28, Hurricane Katrina was 24 hours from New Orleans. It was a Category 5 hurricane with sustained winds as strong as 160 mph and a potential storm surge 25 feet high — easily enough to top the levees and flood walls that keep water from the city.

For decades, engineers had feared that New Orleans' flood controls weren't sufficient to withstand anything stronger than a Category 3 hurricane. The city sat largely below sea level, surrounded by the Mississippi River, the Gulf of Mexico and Lake Pontchartrain, a huge tidal basin.

DOJ_NMG_0002956

The city was like the little pig who built his house from straw. Years ago, James Lee Witt, then director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, had asked, “What do you do about New Orleans?”

What would New Orleans do about Katrina? About 80% of its people had left or were leaving.

This is the story of three who stayed.

Caldwell, 44, a casino employee, holed up with her family in her stilt-legged shotgun house not far from the Superdome. She was motivated by a desire to stay put and by a religious fatalism: She was a Christian. She trusted the Lord. She didn't have a problem dying, if it came to that.

Otis, 20, a cook at the Bourbon Street restaurant Remoulade, had two good reasons to leave: her baby, Richard, born seven days earlier, and her 5-year-old son, Philip. She, her children, her boyfriend and nine relatives packed into a van and tried to get out of town Sunday morning. They never made it through a snarl of traffic. Finally, they turned back.

Thomas, 62, a retired school counselor, knew that hurricanes nearly always missed the city and never flooded her Carrollton neighborhood, whose stately homes had withstood a century of storms. So she decided to stay with her dog, Ginger. On Sunday night, as Katrina closed in, she had rice and beans and a big bottle of wine with a few other neighbors who stayed behind. They were sure they could beat the storm.

That's New Orleans: Laissez les bon temps rouler. Let the good times roll.

Before dawn Monday, Katrina had weakened slightly, picking up drier air from the west, and dropped to Category 4. Even better, the storm began turning just east of New Orleans, perhaps sparing it from the worst storm surge.

About 10 a.m., Katrina passed 35 miles east of the city. Winds above 100 mph battered downtown; Pontchartrain, normally a foot above sea level, rose 3 feet. Water began spilling over some flood walls and levees, but they held.

By lunch, the worst of the storm had passed. While some neighborhoods had flooded, particularly along the south side of Pontchartrain, many areas, including the historic French Quarter, had been spared serious water damage.

“The thing we're happy about is that there wasn't as much loss of life or property damage as there might have been,” FEMA spokesman James McIntyre said. Some officials were talking about a relatively quick rebound, but McIntyre warned: “This is still a dangerous situation.”

On its website, the Army Corps of Engineers, which maintains the levees, declared: “The fact that Katrina … didn't cause more damage is a testament to the structural integrity of the hurricane levee protection system.”

Caldwell's house survived the storm. There was some water in the street Monday, but when the family retired for the evening, they had phone service, running water and plenty of food.

Otis and her children rode out the storm at her parents' house, which was undamaged. There seemed little reason for fear. Everyone thought the worst had passed.

At dinnertime, Thomas and her neighbors celebrated their good luck with a New Orleans feast of blackened fish and shrimp cakes.

But New Orleans' armor had begun to crack.

The water level on Pontchartrain had peaked 7 feet above sea level early Monday afternoon. A levee had failed on the city's east side. By late afternoon, water had climbed to the tops of the walls of some one-story homes near the canal, forcing residents to their roofs.

After nightfall, water broke through a flood wall atop a levee along the 17th Street Canal, a main drainage outlet into Pontchartrain. Water from the swollen lake had been pouring over the wall all day, eating away the earthen levee that holds it up. Finally, a 20-foot chunk of the wall burst forward. The rushing water crumbled an additional 400 feet of flood wall.

The corps said it might use barges to block the breaches, or helicopters to fill the holes by dropping sandbags, stone, even Jersey barriers into them — but there was no way to do anything until the next morning's light.

All night, Pontchartrain drained unchecked into the city.

Tuesday morning, it became clear that New Orleans' good fortune had been fool's gold.

Water began to rise through the floorboards of Caldwell's one-story home, forcing everyone into the attic with clothes, fruit, water, flashlights and a bucket, partly filled with water, for a toilet.

The water downstairs was 3 feet deep and rising. Reality was starting to kick in. It was survival time, Caldwell realized.

She and the others chopped a hole through the steeply pitched roof. They took turns poking their heads out and waving a white towel at helicopters passing overhead: FEMA, Red Cross, the military. None indicated it had seen her.

Finally, Caldwell and her 19-year-old son eased into the oily water. Using ice chests, they floated from porch to porch to the end of the block, where they latched onto a chain-link fence and moved along it to dry land. They flagged down a boat. After a night at an open-field camp for evacuees, they were on a bus to Houston.

When Otis and her children drove to her aunt's home nearby, there was ankle-deep water on the street outside her second-floor apartment. Soon, it had climbed halfway up the first floor.

DOJ_NMG_0002957

Her father took a boat from a fire station around the corner. Otis stuffed one bag with Pampers and another with baby formula and bottled water. Clinging to her children, Otis got in the boat and floated off. They reached dry land, eventually walked to the Superdome and later boarded a bus to the Houston Astrodome.

Thomas awoke Tuesday well-rested and ready to clean up the windblown mess outside. But when she opened her door, she thought, "Oh my God! What is this?" Water, which had covered only the street the previous night, had risen over the sidewalk and was lapping at the third of her five front steps.

Thomas knew it was time to move to higher ground. She had the keys to another house but had to walk in water up to her chest for several blocks to get there.

Over the next few days, she lost telephone service and running water. A nearby drugstore was looted. There were gunshots at night and no sign of police.

Thomas wanted to leave, but if she was going to catch a bus out of town, she would have to leave Ginger behind. Then she ran into a neighbor who had a car in a garage downtown. If they could get to it, they would drive to Baton Rouge.

A journalist offered her a ride downtown. So early Friday morning, Thomas loaded Ginger into the car for a circuitous drive through storm-damaged neighborhoods. Soon, they passed the convention center, where a vast, vaguely threatening-looking throng waited for evacuation buses.

Then there was a reassuring sign ahead: a police car at the curb. As she passed it, Thomas saw that the cruiser was battered, abandoned and stripped of its tires.

Laissez les bon temps rouler. The old city's motto had become its epitaph.

US Prepares To House Hurricane Victims (FT)

By Joshua Chaffin, Sheila McNulty And Dan Roberts

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

Authorities as far away as Utah and Detroit are preparing to house evacuees from Hurricane Katrina for many months, as the US grapples with the longer term implications of relocating hundreds of thousands of refugees.

While rescuers try to assess a regional death toll estimated by the New Orleans mayor at up to 10,000, it is becoming clear that the next phase of the tragedy may involve an exodus of people unparalleled in modern American history. "We are basically moving the city of New Orleans to other parts of the country," said Michael Chertoff, secretary of homeland security. "This is a tremendous medium-term and long-term challenge."

The Federal Emergency Management Agency, which is co-ordinating the various agencies involved, said it was too early to tell how many people were involved. But based on the demographics of the region, it estimated more than 1m would need help moving from temporary shelters to longer-term housing.

As refugees began to fan out across the country, President George W. Bush on Monday declared emergencies in states far from the storm, including Utah, Colorado, Georgia and North Carolina. The emergency declarations made federal aid available to help those states deal with the thousands left homeless.

But efforts to co-ordinate the relief strategy are also complicated by resistance among many of those affected, who worry about what awaits them.

"They don't tell you what you're going to do or how you're going to live when you get there," said Darrell Johnson, a cook from New Orleans now sheltering in Baton Rouge. Elsewhere, victims of the storm evacuated to Houston said they were worried about being forced to go back to the hellish conditions they escaped last week.

Rick Perry, Governor of Texas, on Monday prepared to airlift victims of Katrina to other states and bring in cruise ships to house the overflow, as relief operations in the state approached capacity. Texas has received about 230,000 evacuees, though more continue to arrive.

Authorities are also scouring military bases, sports stadiums, hotels and other facilities for lodging. As well as placing huge strain on state and federal resources, the disaster presents politicians with the sensitive question of how much rebuilding will take place in New Orleans and the surrounding areas.

Launching a relief fund with Bill Clinton, former president George Bush warned "recovery is going to take years". His son, president George W. Bush, made his second visit to the region on Monday. After criticism of the government's slow response, Mr Bush promised to "do what it takes" to help victims get back on their feet. Meanwhile, Admiral Timothy Keating, co-ordinating the military's response, said thousands of troops were likely to remain in the area for "months not weeks". The army is leading efforts to repair levees and pump water out of flooded streets - a process some warn could take up to 80 days.

1 Million People Can't Go Home For Months (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

DOJ_NMG_0002958

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

The vastness of the displacement created by Hurricane Katrina became more clear yesterday as officials struggled to respond to the needs of more than 1 million people who will be out of their Gulf Coast homes for months to come.

So many homeless people flocked to Texas in the past few days that Gov. Rick Perry (R) declared that his state was full and could take no more. Electronic highway signs in Houston directed bus drivers with evacuees to Fort Chaffee, Ark., but that facility quickly filled up as 9,000 people arrived within 16 hours Saturday. Arkansas officials asked for the signs to be removed.

With shelter space in the deep South filling up, the Federal Emergency Management Agency yesterday began to airlift storm survivors to states as far away as Michigan, Utah and California.

FEMA officials said they have secured as many as 50,000 shelter beds in often faraway states, but the flow of people to those states has sometimes been chaotic.

The office of Michigan Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm (D) said, for instance, that FEMA officials told them that more than 1,000 people would be flown to Battle Creek by yesterday evening, but 140 arrived. The airlift of 400 Hurricane Katrina evacuees to the D.C. Armory was delayed indefinitely.

In all, FEMA officials said, more than a quarter million people are living in shelters set up by the American Red Cross, the National Guard, local churches and municipal officials in cities from Albuquerque to Memphis.

Most of the homeless are from Louisiana, where officials estimate about 1 million people evacuated before the hurricane, and another 100,000 were evacuated afterward.

FEMA officials said that about 50,000 people are in Louisiana shelters, but Brecke Latham, spokeswoman for Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D), said that virtually none of the 1 million evacuees have been able to return to their homes. Many are now living in hotels, with family or with friends, but officials said they are preparing for many of them to need help as their money, or their welcome, wears out.

In Mississippi, 15,000 people are in shelters and many more are unable to return home. An official in Gov. Haley Barbour's office said that "several hundred thousand" Mississippians are believed to have been displaced and are living elsewhere.

While FEMA and Red Cross officials praised the outpouring of help and offers of lodging from the states, some voiced concern that evacuees were being moved too far from their homes. Speaking at the Astrodome in Houston, Jesse L. Jackson said it will be a shock for many people to wake up in places like Salt Lake City or Minnesota. "It's a long way from home, from where they lived and acculturated," he said.

The Albuquerque Convention Center was one typical relocation site yesterday, and it received 100 people who had spent much of the past week in the Superdome. Carisa Malanum, sales director of SMG, the company that manages the center, said that 500 to 900 more evacuees are expected.

She said that the people can stay in the center indefinitely, but that officials hope to move them into more permanent lodgings within a few weeks. More than 500 Albuquerque area households have signed up to host a family, she said, and an additional 600 apartment units have been offered.

The new arrivals "seem to be doing fine," Malanum said. "We'll have people to help with psychological and emotional issues."

According to FEMA spokesman Butch Kinerney, the agency has been involved in placing more than 229,000 people into shelters. Another 63,000 survivors have been evacuated with unknown destinations. He said a significant number of people in Louisiana and Mississippi are still living in shelters without electricity or running water, and that their relocation out of the area is a top priority. Almost 60 percent of Louisiana and 40 percent of Mississippi remain without power, he said.

Texas officials decided to stop accepting new evacuees after placing almost 130,000 in shelters and providing hotel or family lodging for 100,000 more.

"We are concerned about our capacity to meet this great human need as thousands more arrive by the day," Perry said. "We want to make certain every evacuee has a safe haven where they can receive medical care, water, food and other assistance."

Perry said that some evacuees will be moved to other facilities in Texas, while others will be flown out of state from Houston and Dallas. It was unclear how officials would decide which evacuees would be sent elsewhere, or how much choice they would have on where to go.

"So far, people just seem to be happy to have a place to stay and some food to eat," Kinerney said.

Waves Of Evacuees Swamp Host Cities (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002959

More than 500,000 evacuees from Hurricane Katrina are on the move. It is a storm surge of the dispossessed, an exodus on a historic scale in the USA.

The forced migration from flooded Gulf Coast homes is swamping cities in Louisiana and Texas. The waves are rolling to Michigan, New Mexico, Arizona and as far as Oregon and New York. School officials in many states are cutting red tape to enroll more than 160,000 displaced children.

Federal, state and local officials are grappling with housing the homeless after a stumbling start. Chastened by scenes of chaos last week at New Orleans' Superdome and convention center, they are running short-term shelters in sites that range from Houston's Astrodome to three Carnival Cruise Lines ships that will provide berths for about 7,000 evacuees in Galveston, Texas, and Mobile, Ala.

What comes next for governments: Planning longer-term quarters for the most impoverished of the displaced, who may be dispersed to even more disorienting surroundings outside the Deep South.

Meanwhile, charities are groping through an emergency of a long-lasting kind that they've never seen before. “We're trained to deal with major evacuations, but not with the thought that people might never go home again,” says Keith Berger, who oversees four shelters as chairman of volunteers for San Antonio's Red Cross chapter. “We're writing a brand-new book here.”

The Red Cross is caring for 142,000 storm victims at 487 shelters in at least 12 states. Many churches and other private groups are pitching in to transport, house and feed evacuees.

This country hasn't seen mass movements of refugees since Southerners fled Civil War armies. The newly uprooted Americans find themselves added to the 25 million people worldwide who, the United Nations says, have at least temporarily lost their homes in environmental disasters or wars.

In sympathy for the homeless, the welcome mat is out. Nationally, charitable donations are breaking records set after the 9/11 terror attacks and December's Asian tsunami. In Texas, where nearly 250,000 are camping out, emergency shelters have an oversupply of volunteers handing out food and clothes.

Evacuees are taking Detroit Mayor Kwame Kilpatrick up on his offer of free hotel rooms for 500 families. The First African Methodist Episcopal Church of Los Angeles is painting a house donated by comedian Arsenio Hall, preparing to offer a year's free room and board to a Gulf Coast family.

David Perez, owner of a San Diego oil and gas company, spent $250,000 to charter a jet to Louisiana. At a shelter there, he told reporters, he offered rides to California. He got 80 takers, who were put up at San Diego's Kearny High School. Perez then turned the jet around and went back for another load of evacuees.

Robert Lang, director of the Metropolitan Institute of Virginia Tech in Alexandria, Va., likens the generosity to the reception Americans gave South Vietnamese refugees after Saigon fell to communists in 1975. “There's a tradition in this country of providing safe harbor to those who encounter disaster,” Lang says.

There are signs of local uneasiness, too. Unnerved by TV reports of looting and sniping in New Orleans, some homeowners near the Astrodome hired security guards. In Baton Rouge, the display cases for guns at the Wal-Mart in the Cortana Mall have been empty since Thursday. Sales clerk Damon Cephas, 23, says buyers made a run on the weapons as evacuees began making the 80-mile trip from New Orleans. Wal-Mart stores have since stopped selling guns.

“People act like they are in fear of their lives,” Cephas said. “I think all of that (violence) was being done by a small number of bad people. Not everybody from New Orleans is like that, but all the people saw was the bad stuff.”

Houston authorities say there have been some vehicle burglaries and a few intoxication arrests involving hurricane victims. But the new arrivals are overwhelmingly law-abiding, no rowdier than the out-of-towners at “a Super Bowl or an All-Star Game,” assistant police chief Brian Lumpkin says.

Still, police have stepped up patrols in surrounding neighborhoods. To restrict evacuees from meandering outside the Astrodome and the adjoining Reliant Arena and Reliant Center, officials are shoring up perimeter fences. Authorities aren't using the word “curfew,” but they're telling the 23,600 people at the Astrodome complex to be inside by 11 p.m. or they'll be locked out for the night. On a more welcoming note, shelter residents are getting invitations to the nearby Six Flags amusement park, museums and malls.

Many Katrina evacuees are low-income African-Americans. New Orleans was 67% black, and 35% of the city's blacks were living below the poverty line, U.S. Census Bureau figures from 2000 show. That raises a potential for racial conflict. Leaders of the Congressional Black Caucus last week advocated placing black families in cities with large black populations.

The evacuees are making other kinds of substantial impact wherever they've landed:

·Baton Rouge, which had a population of 228,000, swelled by 200,000 evacuees, instantly surpassing New Orleans as Louisiana's largest city. Hotels are bursting. Roads are clogged with traffic. Local service stations are suffering gas shortages and long lines. On busy Florida Boulevard, Wendy's and Church's Chicken stores were warning patrons that there were no more french fries.

DOJ_NMG_0002960

·More than 6,000 evacuee students enrolled in Houston kindergarten through high school classes last week, and the number could reach 10,000, Kevin Hoffman of the Houston Independent Board of Education estimates. Saying Texas shelters are full while "there are shelters set up in other states that are sitting empty," Texas Gov. Rick Perry ordered emergency officials Saturday to airlift some evacuees to other states that have offered help.

·Some resilient, middle-class evacuees are already putting down new roots elsewhere. In Baton Rouge and Jackson, Miss., so many of them are buying houses that Sen. David Vitter, R-La., calls it "the great land rush." The average home price in Baton Rouge has jumped about $25,000, to $200,000, since Katrina, real estate agent Beth Alford says. One New Orleans law firm bought 50 houses in Baton Rouge, sight unseen, says Ann Prewitt, a Madison, Miss., agent.

No racial violence has been reported in any city, but that remains a potential problem, says Jorja Leap, an adjunct professor of social welfare at UCLA.

If the government doesn't allocate low-income, black evacuees to cities with federally backed plans for housing and other services, "I don't think they're going to be absorbed seamlessly into the fabric of American life," Leap says. "Whether it's something as mundane as parking places or seats on a bus in public transportation, competitive pressure on resources will bounce into issues of money and color."

Leap says evacuees are apt to be psychologically battered by "very nearly the same postwar pattern" she discovered in the 1990s in interviewing refugees in Kosovo, Bosnia and Serbia. They'll pass through successive stages of "protest, despair and detachment," she says.

The evacuees' losses of social networks and paying jobs are "a form of identity theft," says Mary Pipher, a clinical psychologist. Her 2002 book, The Middle of Everywhere, examined the impact of refugees from Cambodia and other countries on Lincoln, Neb., where she lives. "Our identities are built around the people around us, the things that we do."

Roy Bernardi, deputy secretary of the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, says the government wants to disperse evacuees from cities already heavily impacted. The government's focus is slowly shifting from emergency shelter to finding housing that can be used by hurricane victims for as long as a year.

HUD issued a plea last week to mayors and county executives across the country for inventories of what's available. The tally should be in this week. HUD also is identifying how many of the 26,000 properties it owns are vacant. And it's studying how many of the manufactured housing kits it owns could be put up.

If HUD has its way, poorer New Orleans residents who were bused to shelters in Texas will be relocated to every U.S. region. The new quarters may be on military bases or in old hospitals, university dorms, nursing homes, schools and public housing.

Detroit's Kilpatrick says his city will work with HUD to place evacuees in permanent subsidized housing, getting them out of the rooms that about 60 area hotels are opening for them. "I want them to really be a part of our community," he says. "I'd say 90% will stay."

The process of planning beyond six months to a year will be complicated by uncertainties. Eight days after Katrina, no one can paint a picture of what the human dimensions of the storm's aftermath will look like in the long term. Some questions it's too early to answer:

·How many people will choose to return to once-beloved places they may now associate with traumas of wind, water, fear and loss? "I'm never going back," Elena Temple, spokeswoman for the U.S. Conference of Mayors, says tearfully. A New Orleans native and current resident of Washington whose family escaped, she doubts that her home in the Garden District will ever be habitable again. She's sure all the family pictures are gone. "Twenty years from now, when I have children, how am I going to be able to explain what my city was like when I grew up?"

·Even if the pull of home is strong, how can people go back if jobs are not re-created? Joseph Gregory, a Gulfport, Miss., optometrist with several offices on the Gulf Coast, has moved temporarily to Jackson but says he may move on to Dallas to restart his practice. His house has been reduced to a slab. His offices survived, but his patients scattered to the winds.

·With 40% of Gulf Coast homeowners lacking flood insurance, how many can afford to rebuild houses that have washed away?

Rebuilding New Orleans is an especially thorny task. The Army Corps of Engineers says it will take at least 38 days to pump water out of the city. That would be just the start of a comeback. The scope of rebuilding could be contentious. To the irritation of Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, a Democrat, U.S. House Speaker Dennis Hastert, a Republican, has said "it doesn't make sense" to rebuild a city several feet below sea level. He later issued a statement saying he was not "advocating that the city be abandoned or relocated."

"They may not choose to develop the entire site," says Lt. Gen. Carl Strock of the Corps of Engineers.

Lang of Virginia Tech's Metropolitan Institute says that if New Orleans can rebuild, it has a future. Families have lived there for generations, and people will return because the city has its own ethnic identity, language and cuisine, Lang says. "It's one of the most iconic places that has as strong a regional identity as exists in the United States," he says. "That probably favors reconstitution."

Homesick or not, few evacuees can afford to be jobless for long. Officials in Texas, Tennessee, Georgia and other states with evacuee inflows have started programs to link the newcomers with employers. Craigslist, the Internet-based classified advertising service, is replete with job offers for evacuees willing to relocate for good.

Moves may be permanent for evacuees like the 25 members of Carl Douglas Jr.'s extended family. Rousted from their three homes in New Orleans, they are getting to like the Baton Rouge area. Douglas, 68, says that since reaching a shelter in Gonzales, La., last week, they have been overwhelmed by the welcome: kind volunteers, a comfortable kennel for the dogs, a veterinarian on call. "The people here have been wonderful," Douglas says. "We think we might just move here, period."

Some Of The Dispossessed Say They Won't Return (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Displaced residents of this city — especially the poorest blacks, who were hardest hit by the storm — are pondering whether they will try to return to a town the tour guides often missed, one that has suffered decades of crime, corruption and grinding poverty.

"Katrina had a tremendous impact on the black people who lived here," said Lance Hill, director of a diversity training program at Tulane University. "This city was tough on a lot of them even before the hurricane. A lot of them were already unemployed or had minimum-wage jobs. Many of them were renters. They don't have anything to come back to. A lot of them are just not going to come back."

Before the storm, most Americans knew New Orleans as a blend of old Southern elegance and Bourbon Street decadence. The aftermath, however, has highlighted a primarily black city in which one-third of the African American population — more than 100,000 people — lives below the poverty line. Many of those hardest hit by the storm are not sure whether they want to go back.

"I didn't have no money for gas," said Thomas Lallande, a 60-year-old black man, as he rubbed his raw feet after finally evacuating.

Lallande said he wanted to leave before the storm but couldn't afford to. As the flood rose chest high last week, he waded from his submerged apartment in the 9th Ward to the Superdome, where he and thousands of people — nearly all of them black — waited for days without food, water or security.

Lallande escaped New Orleans — he was recuperating at a Baton Rouge shelter Monday — and, for now, he has no plans of going back: "What for? I don't have nothing back there."

And where some saw grim images and shattered futures, the city's most destitute saw rare opportunity.

"Actually, some people were a little better off after the storm," said a 26-year-old man who spoke on condition of anonymity as he took groceries out of a store last week. "I had gotten to the end of my rope. Now, I got a little something."

But even middle-class African Americans are reconsidering their futures in New Orleans. Herman and Christy Taitt, devotees of the city's music and culture, said they already had calls out to several different cities.

Herman, 44, is the head maintenance manager at Dillard University, and Christy, 37, is an accounting supervisor at a pharmaceutical firm. They had a house and three cars — including a Corvette — but they always thought they might have done better outside New Orleans.

Last week, at a Kinko's computer in Baton Rouge, they found aerial photos of their New Orleans home on the Internet. Water had inundated their neighborhood.

"Family kept us here," Herman Taitt said. "And I love the history of this place. The culture. It's the birthplace of jazz. The food. The parties. You can have a good time here. So we stayed. We allowed ourselves to have a second-class status to Southern white folks."

But now, Herman Taitt said, his elderly father is missing — and a crucial bond to the city has been broken.

"We're looking at Houston," he said. "We're looking at L.A."

New Orleans teacher Karen Francois, 53, said her apartment in the 9th Ward was destroyed. Though she would like to return to her job in January, she's thinking about Arizona after that.

"I'll be sad because I don't think there are people like us anywhere else outside of New Orleans," she said. "But you can't get any money there. There's no real opportunities in New Orleans — not for us."

New Orleans has always been a city of ironies. The first European settlers were Frenchmen lured in the 1700s by a Scottish pyramid schemer who paid land speculators with profits he reaped from newer real estate investors.

DOJ_NMG_0002962

By the 19th century, New Orleans was a major cotton producer and market for slaves, many of whom built the beautiful antebellum buildings that drew so many tourists over the last century.

It was also home to one of the nation's largest free black communities. Many of the free were "Creoles" of mixed ancestry, sometimes the offspring of privileged plantation owners and black concubines. Some free blacks even owned property — including slaves.

Now, New Orleans' small but influential black middle-class community is one of the oldest in the nation. Many of them were educated at one of New Orleans' predominately black colleges, including Dillard University and Xavier College, the nation's only historically African American Catholic college and a leading producer of black medical and dentistry graduates.

New Orleans' three-tiered racial structure — white, black and Creole — plays a subtle but decreasing role in the city, residents say. New Orleans natives, especially people of color, say they can tell who's black, and who's Creole, by differentiating between kinky or smooth hair. Most of the city's black leaders have Creole ancestry.

"I can distinguish because I'm from there. My older sister used to go to 'Brown Bag parties' " in the 1950s, said Eric Spurlock, who fled his home in the 9th Ward. "They would hold up a brown paper bag, and if you were darker than that you would have to pay 25 cents to get in."

Francois said she considered herself Creole and acknowledged that her status afforded her access in New Orleans that was not extended to many of her African American friends.

"I went to a white university, I can speak as they do, act as they do," said Francois, the schoolteacher. "Whites are comfortable around me, but it's not that easy for other people I know."

The problems of urban America linger here. Last year, New Orleans' per capita homicide rate was among the nation's highest, as was its illiteracy rate.

In the last decade, the city has been rocked by a series of bribery scandals and police brutality scandals that led to investigations of a former mayor, a parish judge and a variety of other city administrators.

"They was killing each other in broad daylight," complained Tynia Williams, 42, explaining the city's problems with street crime.

Williams had to evacuate her apartment in Jefferson Parish, right on the New Orleans municipal line. She worked and had family members in New Orleans proper, on the other side of the 17th Street Canal.

Williams said her home was destroyed, but she is not sentimental about it. She is looking for work in Baton Rouge.

"The politicians were crooked, the judges were dirty," she said. "A judge convicted my son for murder and sentenced him to a life sentence, and two months later the judge got convicted."

In 2002, Mayor C. Ray Nagin came to office with a mandate to clean up city corruption and to lift residents out of poverty. The latest in a succession of black leaders who have broken into New Orleans' political system since 1978, Nagin ordered the arrests of dozens of city employees on bribery and related charges in the early months of his administration. Several federal corruption investigations were in process when Katrina hit.

In an effort to lower crime, city leaders had set about a controversial plan to replace many public housing projects with single-family homes and businesses. The notorious St. Thomas housing projects, for example, were replaced a few years ago by a Wal-Mart.

Supporters of the program say it is one reason crime had, in fact, been somewhat reduced in New Orleans. Detractors said it would displace black project residents, many of whom went to live in the eastern part of the city, one of the areas hit hardest by the flood.

They needn't have bothered with the debate — Katrina displaced more poor people than gentrification ever could.

Filling A Desperate Need For Shelter Begins With Cruise Ships And Proposals (NYT)

By By Ernest Beck And Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

Phase 1 of the government's plan to provide desperately needed transitional housing for tens of thousands of hurricane evacuees is scheduled to begin this morning, when homeless elderly people from various Texas locations board 30 buses destined for two Carnival cruise ships in Galveston, Tex.

Relief plans also call for housing evacuees in emergency trailers, hotels, motels, military bases and schools.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency chartered three vessels from Carnival Cruise Lines of Miami, the world's largest cruise-ship company, to lodge evacuees of Hurricane Katrina for up to six months. (All guests whose bookings have been canceled have been offered full refunds, according to the company).

DOJ_NMG_0002963

The two ships, each capable of holding 2,600 people, will remain docked in Galveston; another, with an occupancy of 1,800, will be in Mobile, Ala. They will be used primarily for elderly victims and people with special health problems, with families a second priority, according to James McIntyre, a FEMA spokesman.

Red Cross personnel and the ship's medical team will be on board, but "this is not for those who are severely ill, it's for those who can be effectively independent," Mr. McIntyre said. Nor is it for those expecting luxuries associated with cruises.

"We bought a basic package without amenities - a room to live in, based on need, and food to eat," Mr. McIntyre said. "This is not about being bathed in luxury - it's to get people out of the Astrodome."

A FEMA spokesman said the agency has also put out a call to producers of "manufactured housing" and recreational vehicles - campers and the like - asking for assistance, and has placed orders for more than 50,000 trailers.

"They're looking at all types of housing, whatever anybody has right now and can ship right away," said Joanne Foist, a spokeswoman for Fleetwood Homes, one of the nation's biggest makers of manufactured housing. Fleetwood is based in Riverside, Calif., but it has 11 plants in Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky and Texas that could supply about 400 homes a week to the hurricane-hit areas.

Mr. McIntyre pointed out that travel trailers were a bit roomier than the cabins on cruise ships, and added that they would be dispatched to locations in Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana, home states of the displaced, to "return them to some normalcy in their life as quick as possible," he said.

As rescue efforts for the devastated Gulf Coast cities gather pace, relief organizations and policy makers - as well as architects - are also thinking about the next phase. Daniel Libeskind, the celebrity architect known for his crystalline forms and his plan for a soaring Freedom Tower at ground zero, has an idea to help the tens of thousands left homeless by Hurricane Katrina: give them refuge in a low-cost modular shelter he has designed.

What Mr. Libeskind has in mind is a far cry from his more avant-garde buildings, like the Denver Art Museum extension and the Jewish Museum in Berlin. Imagine instead a compact 580-square-foot house with two small bedrooms, a bathroom, a kitchen and possibly a veranda, all for an estimated price of $3,700 or less. Featuring a pitched roof and latticework siding, the house, which is based on his design for a village in Sri Lanka flattened by the tsunami, is a dignified response to the crisis, Mr. Libeskind said, and could be built in about two weeks, depending on the materials.

"People should not be treated like sardines," he said. "These are not barracks."

After a disaster, there is no shortage of possible ways to house the displaced. But there is no best answer. Tents and shipping containers, for example, which have been used in other disaster zones around the world, have many drawbacks.

"In a hot environment, the idea of tents and things of that nature without ventilation or privacy makes for serious conditions," said David Downey, the director of the Center for Communities by Design, a resource center of the American Institute of Architects in Washington for architects interested in sustainable communities.

Shigeru Ban, the renowned Japanese architect, who is designing one of the multimillion-dollar homes in the enclave known as the Houses at Sagaponac in the Hamptons on Long Island, suggested in an interview on Friday that Katrina relief groups use his design for temporary housing made of cardboard tubes and plastic beer crates.

Called paper tube structures, the shelters were used after the 1995 earthquake that badly damaged Kobe, Japan, and after quakes in Turkey and India. One advantage is the cost: using donated materials from local companies and volunteer builders, "the houses are practically free," Mr. Ban said. They can be assembled by six people in six hours, once the materials are assembled.

Any temporary housing, however, has a way of becoming permanent once an initial emergency subsides, financing dries up and news media attention dwindles. Months after Hurricane Andrew flattened a large swath of South Florida in 1992, tent cities put up by relief organizations were still sheltering people, a source of much anger and resentment.

In Punta Gorda, on the west coast of Florida, more than 11,000 homes were wiped out when Hurricane Charley roared through in August of last year. Officials brought in 550 three-bedroom mobile homes as a temporary measure, but today the makeshift community - called "FEMA Village" - remains home to 1,500 people.

Its residents, most of whom lived in public housing before the storm, have had few opportunities to change the situation. Mr. McIntyre says the Punta Gorda mobile homes are "the standard" for those that may be used to house Katrina refugees.

Compared with a mobile home park, a fancy passenger ship - anchored in the Gulf, its cabins full of people in need of housing for months - sounds more inviting. Yet cruise ships are not ideal. On a ship, people would be far removed from any semblance of the life they once knew. A cruise ship, said Roberta Cohen, a co-director of the Brookings-Bern Project on Internal Displacement at the Brookings Institution in Washington, "is not a return to normalcy - it's some sort of 'first world' fantasy idea."

Beyond cruise liners and trailers, a growing number of architects are responding to global crises with innovative designs and concepts for affordable temporary housing that can be erected on the site with local materials or easily shipped to a disaster region, including packed-mud structures, durable prefabs and biodegradable "flat pack" units. Sean Godsell, an Australian architect, has designed temporary housing using shipping containers, calling them Future Shacks.

DOJ_NMG_0002964

Like all good designs, those promoted by architects can be tweaked to fit different environments and cultures. Kevin Teague, an architect who is working on the Sri Lanka houses in Mr. Libeskind's New York office, said that plastic or fiberglass could be substituted for concrete blocks to make structures lighter.

Still, it is not clear how popular such housing might be. And much depends on the amount of aid made available by governments and relief agencies. Despite the low cost of his shelters, Mr. Ban managed to get only 50 or so cardboard dwellings built in Kobe and 30 in Turkey, aiding a tiny portion of the thousands left homeless and destitute.

Until now, Mr. Ban and Mr. Libeskind have not been in contact with relief organizations. "My energy alone," said Mr. Ban, "cannot build for the mass of the people."

U.S. Delays Planned Airlift Of Evacuees To D.C. Armory (WP)

By Hamil R. Harris And Theola S. Labbe

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

The proposed airlift of 400 Hurricane Katrina evacuees to the D.C. Armory yesterday was temporarily delayed by federal officials who sought more time to develop a comprehensive national plan for placing victims across the country, authorities said.

"We temporarily paused some airlifts while we identified cities and states who were ready and willing to receive these evacuees," said Russ Knocke, spokesman for the U.S. Department of Homeland Security.

"It is very important that we have an organization in place so that there are city and state officials as well as nonprofit groups ready and willing to receive and care for these individuals," he said.

Knocke said evacuees could be airlifted to the Washington area as early as today.

The postponement frustrated some city officials who had stocked the cavernous D.C. Armory with supplies and hundreds of cots in anticipation of the arrival of evacuees. It also reflected confusion nationwide as federal officials contend with dwindling shelter space in the deep South and a mass movement of displaced people that has sometimes been chaotic.

"There are certain evacuees who have been rescued from their nightmarish scenarios, and they have been taken to certain airports where they are waiting for airlifts and people are able to receive them," Knocke said. "We are working more closely with state and local officials to develop a comprehensive plan while all the while airlifts from the New Orleans airport have continued."

The airlift delay came as District officials were waiting to learn whether the 10 buses they sent to New Orleans on Friday would bring back storm victims. The buses did not take on storm survivors in New Orleans and were rerouted to Baton Rouge and then to other cities. Along the way, survivors who had the chance to board buses reportedly declined. Additionally, city officials confirmed that two bus drivers left the convoy yesterday.

But D.C. Council member David A. Catania (I-At Large), who proposed that the District assist storm victims, said yesterday that the buses had completed part of their mission by delivering food and water, while medical personnel on board treated storm victims in shelters.

Catania said he was disappointed that storm evacuees had not arrived in the District but was confident that they would.

"This is an exercise that requires flexibility and patience," Catania said. "In the next couple of days, we'll have evacuees in Washington. We'll still have them."

On Sunday night, Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) arranged with Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (R) to house hurricane evacuees after an Arkansas military base received 9,000 evacuees, twice as many as it had prepared for. Yesterday, the state was sending many of the evacuees at Fort Chaffee to summer church camps that had been empty.

Catania said Barbara Childs-Pair, director of the D.C. Emergency Management Agency, spent the day on the phone with federal officials trying to learn the status of the evacuees. City officials had expected them to arrive at Andrews Air Force Base yesterday. Officials at the base told The Post that they had no knowledge of a flight.

"The federal coordination of this disaster is certainly lacking," Catania said. But he added that the additional time would give city officials and nonprofit groups more time to prepare the D.C. Armory. An industrial-size air conditioner is scheduled to arrive today, Catania said.

Meanwhile, Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.), who said she sought a reason for the airlift delay, said she was told that federal officials needed time to start a tracking system to determine the identity of each person taken to a temporary shelter.

She said she was appalled to learn that such a concern could have delayed evacuees' arrival here.

"These evacuees have been waiting to go someplace now for three or four days," Norton said. "If they are just setting up a tracking system four or five days after the disaster, they've added insult to outrage. The only question ought to be is, 'Do you want to go to x?' "

DOJ_NMG_0002965

At the armory, where preparations continued throughout the day, volunteers arriving in the late afternoon learned from the American Red Cross, which will manage the shelter, that the evacuees would not arrive as planned.

Gwen Rogers, 36, of Alexandria was hoping to donate two boxes of her daughter Cheyanne's baby clothes and toys, and lend a helping hand.

"I'll be back," Rogers said after signing up on the volunteer sheet.

City officials announced yesterday that they would seek reimbursement from the Federal Emergency Management Agency for providing aid. Williams planned to send a letter to the agency requesting reimbursement for costs that the city estimates could run as much as $6 million.

FEMA spokesman Mike Howard said yesterday that 14 states had been approved for federal disaster relief aid and that the agency was considering applications at 100 percent reimbursement.

Texas Agencies Cut Red Tape For Evacuees (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

HOUSTON -- Roderick Tureaud, 31, a welder by trade and the father of twin girls, spent his morning Monday in a tent outside the Astrodome filling out job applications and calling prospective employers. .

It was Labor Day, traditionally a time to celebrate the value of work. Tureaud and his wife, Rhodesia, 31, hope for a more personal celebration -- by finding a job for him and a school for her to continue her nursing studies.

There is also the problem of finding child care for Robin and Raven, 3.

"It's a new life now," Tureaud said. "The old life is gone, and we're going to make this one work. We don't have any choice."

Moments earlier, at a news conference a few hundred yards away, former Presidents Clinton and George H.W. Bush announced formation of a fund-raising foundation to help victims of hurricane Katrina -- bushclintonkatrinafund.org.

"A lot of these people have no cars, no work, no home, no nothing, they will depend on us to give them a future," Clinton said.

As Clinton and other high-level officials noted, it will take a national effort to provide that future. But Houston is the front line of that effort.

The nation's fourth-largest city is the ad-hoc home to more than 100,000 evacuees in shelters, motels, hotels and private homes. Officials expect many of the evacuees will not return to their former homes.

The impact on Houston, which calls itself the "city of opportunity," has been swift. The City Council met in emergency session. Two schools closed due to declining enrollment are being reopened to enroll children from evacuee families.

The Astrodome, largely abandoned since the Astros' Major League Baseball team moved to a new stadium, has been given new life as the largest shelter for Katrina victims. Officials said they have made tentative plans to keep it open as a shelter until December.

With more than 220,000 evacuees spread throughout Texas, Gov. Rick Perry on Monday ordered state health officials to develop plans to meet the short and long-term medical needs.

The plan to airlift some evacuees out of Texas has been halted, Perry said, as the Federal Emergency Management Agency develops a multi-state strategy.

The Harris County Housing Authority will announce this week a plan to find several thousands housing units.

Many people who have taken refuge in the Astrodome and three other shelters in public buildings had spent several days waiting to be rescued from the Superdome or the New Orleans convention center.

"Some are very grateful, but others are angry and say things like: 'You're lying to me just like they did in Louisiana,'" said Dianna Gunnels, manager of outplacement services for a company that works for the Texas' equivalent of the state unemployment office.

"I tell them, 'We're doing the best we can.'"

If some evacuees react with anger because of their experience at the Superdome or other gathering spots, others are grateful at the welcoming attitude they found in Houston.

"We were like dogs, thrown-away dogs, to the police in New Orleans," said Antoinette Lamerson, 38, who fled with her three children. "Houston is so much different. We're poor again but we're free and safe."

The Texas Workforce Commission has trailers at the Astrodome to take job applications and help evacuees contact their home states so their unemployment checks can be forwarded to the new Astrodome zip code. A job fair is set for this week in the parking lot .

The Texas agency that deals with child support checks has set up shop in the convention center across from the Astrodome. Like much of the relief effort, it was put together in a rush.

DOJ_NMG_0002966

Alex Camacho, an agency employee, said he thinks the support checks from Louisiana and Mississippi can begin to be sent to newly opened Post Office annex at the Astrodome by the end of the week. Robin Allen, 45, who fled to the Astrodome with her six children, hopes he is right.

"Without that check, I can't begin to start over," she said. "We're here to stay but I need to support my kids."

Allen plans to enroll her five-school age children in school when the Houston district sends registrars to the Astrodome on Tuesday. Elea Batiste, 54, plans to to enroll her four grandchildren.

"Unless your kids are in school, you're not really living here, just surviving," she said. "But we're going to live here if we can."

Texans Handle Influx Of Evacuees (USAT)

By Dan Reed

USA Today, September 6, 2005

FORT WORTH — The Lone Star State is big, wide and generous, but even this great state is beginning to fill up with evacuees from New Orleans and the Gulf Coast.

Along Interstate 45 near Houston, electronic signs flashed messages telling evacuation-bus drivers to divert to Fort Chaffee, Ark., near Fort Smith on the Arkansas-Oklahoma border, the Associated Press reported.

In Houston, Dallas and San Antonio, sports arenas and convention centers are hosting thousands of evacuees. In Fort Worth, they are settling into convention and meeting halls, a high school athletics complex, an unfinished jail and even a nearly deserted terminal at the an old general aviation airport.

Individual families are also taking in far-flung relatives — or strangers.

Texas officials estimate that nearly a quarter of a million people have become new residents of the state since Katrina stormed ashore Aug. 29. With most of the state's official shelters nearing capacity, Gov. Rick Perry called on three big Texas-based airlines — American, Southwest and Continental — for help in flying evacuees to other states.

In Fort Worth, Carlos Walker can't even keep track of how many relatives are coming and going.

“We've got 36 people living here right now,” Walker said Sunday evening. “It was up to 40, I think.” It went down only temporarily because some members of his wife's extended family, all from the New Orleans area, left to go pick up still more relatives.

Some the nine branches of Nakisha Walker's family now living under her roof already are looking for more permanent housing. But the Walkers, who normally share their home with their four small children and a nephew, expect it will be weeks or even months before their home returns to normal.

Nakisha Walker said “God knew what he was doing” when her family felt compelled to buy a four-bedroom home that she fretted was too big. “He knew we would need a lot of space.”

“People have been so good to us,” she added, standing almost waist-deep among donated clothes, shoes, toiletries and bedding that have turned two large rooms, a living room and a dining room into a mini-warehouse.

At night, family members bunk side-by-side on the floor in the bedrooms and a big game room upstairs. The kitchen overflows with food, stacks of bottled water and an assortment of goodies, nearly all from members of the Walkers' church, friends and faculty members at Paschal High School, where Carlos Walker is an assistant football coach. The teenage athletes at the school dug into their own pockets to help out.

This spontaneous outpouring of generosity is evident throughout the state, as churches began converting fellowship halls and Sunday school rooms into temporary housing. Civic groups have organized fundraising campaigns.

Many merchants are giving large discounts to people who can prove they are from the storm-battered region.

In McKinney, a suburb 30 miles north of Dallas, one group of individuals converted an abandoned Wal-Mart store into a privately run shelter in 24 hours. In Weatherford, 20 miles west of Fort Worth, a church took in nearly 40 families.

In Fort Worth, Larry Kelly and his wife, Jean, made several runs to discount stores over the weekend to buy underwear, socks and other necessities and bring them to collection points around the city.

On Sunday, they were in a steady line of trucks and sport-utility vehicles dropping off relief supplies at the sheep barn at the Will Rogers Memorial Center. The sprawling complex includes an exhibition arena that hosts the Fort Worth Stock Show and Rodeo each winter.

Texans' response, Kelly said, is part “cultural, yes, but a lot of it comes from the very deeply ingrained belief system here. And it's that belief system that motivates people to respond this way.”

Randy Austin, a former pastor and now head of security at Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary in Fort Worth, was among a group of 75 young people and adults who came to the center to do what they could.

DOJ_NMG_0002967

“We came here to pray and witness to people,” said Austin, who also serves as an auxiliary chaplain with the Fort Worth Police Department. “But we learned that God needed us to sort clothes and carry in all this stuff that people are donating. And that's great. We'll still get to pray and witness, but right now God needs our hands and our backs more.”

Inside the nearby Amon G. Carter Jr. Exhibits Hall, about 400 evacuees have settled in and another 400 are expected.

A medical team led by faculty members from the University of North Texas Health Science Center's Texas College of Osteopathic Medicine checked out arriving evacuees. Many were just scared, hungry and dehydrated. Some were chronically ill and had been without their medication for days.

The outpouring of aid and care from Texans overwhelmed many of the evacuees.

The first thing Dave Arns, a 57-year-old restaurant worker from New Orleans, did after his medical checkup was attend a rodeo — sitting in prime seats donated to evacuees. “I will never go home to New Orleans,” he said. “As of now, I am a resident of Texas.”

Houston Finds Business Boon After Katrina (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

HOUSTON, Sept. 5 - Perhaps no city in the United States is in a better spot than Houston to turn Katrina's tragedy into opportunity. And businesses here are already scrambling to profit in the hurricane's aftermath.

Oil services companies based here are racing to carry out repairs to damaged offshore platforms in the Gulf of Mexico; the promise of plenty of work to do sent shares in two large companies, Halliburton and Baker Hughes, soaring to 52-week highs last week. The Port of Houston is preparing for an increase in traffic as shippers divert cargoes away from the damaged ports of Pascagoula, Miss., and New Orleans.

Owners of office space here are witnessing a surge in leasing as New Orleans companies, including that city's oldest bank, scramble to set up new headquarters in Houston, helping to shore up its sagging property market. With brio that might make an ambulance-chaser proud, one company, National Realty Investments, is offering special financing deals "for hurricane survivors only," with no down payments and discounted closing costs.

All this, of course, is capitalism at work, moving quickly to get resources to where they are needed most. And those who move fastest are likely to do best.

Meanwhile, even small businesses and cheap hotels are benefiting from the population surge, which could total up to 250,000 people. Some hardware stores have sold out their entire supply of gasoline cans and generators to people preparing for an eventual return to the devastated region.

"It feels like the only things left in south Louisiana are snakes and alligators," said John E. Olson, co-manager of Houston Energy Partners, a hedge fund that operates out of a skyscraper downtown. "Houston is positioned for a boom."

Long known for its commercial fervor, Houston is the largest city in the South and has a metropolitan population of more than four million. It has one of the nation's busiest ports and remains unrivaled as a center for the American energy industry.

Halliburton, for instance, moved its headquarters to Houston from Dallas in 2003, joining dozens of companies based here that provide services for oil and natural gas producers.

Halliburton differs from many oil services companies in that it also does significant business with the federal government. The company, which has contracts in Iraq, has a contract with the Navy that has already kept it busy after Hurricane Katrina. The company's KBR unit was doing repairs and cleanup at three naval facilities in Mississippi last week.

Halliburton was also planning to go to New Orleans to start repairs at other naval facilities as soon as it was considered safe to do so, Cathy Mann, a spokeswoman, said.

Executives at other Houston companies said they were wasting little time in carrying out repairs in the Gulf of Mexico, where at least 20 offshore rigs and platforms are believed damaged or destroyed. Tetra Technologies, which repairs or decommissions old platforms in the gulf, had employees in a helicopter the day after the storm passed to survey the damage.

"I always hate to talk about positives in a situation like this, but this is certainly a growth business over the next 6 to 12 months," said Geoffrey M. Hertel, Tetra's chief executive. By Friday, Tetra had been able to send an 800-ton barge it owns, the Arapaho, to the gulf to be used for platform repairs, Mr. Hertel said.

Some here are wary about seeming too gleeful in light of New Orleans's misery. Houston officials were quick to point out on Friday that they were making a convention center downtown available to evacuees from the disaster zone, potentially forcing some events to be canceled. And the Port of Houston Authority tried to soften the blow to other ports as it started to receive shipments diverted from Louisiana and Mississippi.

"We sincerely hope that these great gulf coast ports can get back to work as soon as possible," the port said in a statement last week.

DOJ_NMG_0002968

But the new business is obviously welcome. "We're getting inquiry calls since the beginning of the week," Felicia Griffin, a spokeswoman for the port, said on Friday. "We're prepared to do whatever is necessary to meet the needs of our customers."

If the storm works to Houston's benefit, it would not be the first time a natural disaster of extraordinary size sparked some economic dynamism here. The hurricane of 1900 in nearby Galveston, which killed more than 6,000 people and almost leveled the most thriving commercial city in Texas, paved the way for Houston, located 50 miles inland, to emerge as a regional center for shipping and the refining of oil discovered in East Texas fields.

The displacement of companies to Houston from New Orleans is an abrupt acceleration of a trend that has been going on for decades. Many large companies, particularly those in the energy business, have made that move over the years, leaving New Orleans more dependent on tourism and other service industries.

A surge of business activity in Houston this time around might lift the fortunes of a city that is still struggling to recover from the collapse of Enron and two decades of job cuts in the energy industry, which has shrunk as production of oil in Texas and the United States has declined.

Rising oil and natural gas prices in the last two years have strengthened the finances of Houston's largest energy companies, but have done little to improve employment prospects in the city, where the unemployment rate was 5.5 percent in July, compared with 5 percent nationally. During the last oil boom in the 1970's, 150,000 jobs were created in the business of oil field equipment, according to Barton Smith, director of the Institute for Regional Forecasting at the University of Houston.

However, since the 1980's, about 130,000 of those jobs have been lost as oil and natural gas exploration migrated farther away from Houston, largely to countries in West Africa, the Middle East and Asia - and companies were able to produce oil field equipment more cheaply abroad. Houston remains essential for energy research and is the undisputed center for energy deals and finance, but those activities employ relatively few people.

Partly as a result, Houston has one of the most moribund big-city real estate markets.

"There are many instances of companies coming to Houston for temporary space," said Louis B. Cushman, vice chairman of Cushman & Wakefield, a commercial real estate company here. In its own offices, Cushman has finally been able to sublease some extra space to a business of 8 to 10 people that had been in New Orleans. Mr. Cushman said his firm had found offices for two companies that had already decided they were not going back.

One company that has temporarily exchanged New Orleans for Houston is Whitney Holding, the parent company of Whitney National Bank, founded in 1883 and one of the oldest banks in New Orleans. Another New Orleans oil exploration company, Energy Partners, said in a statement last week that it was also making Houston its temporary headquarters. Other companies are following suit.

"It's exploding," said Stephen D. DuPlantis, senior managing director at CB Richard Ellis. "When I talk to owners of office buildings, they say people are not even negotiating. As tragic as it is for New Orleans, it is a boon for Houston."

Dwaine Ofczarzak, the general manager of Buffalo Hardware, an independent store near central Houston, has seen out-of-towners who seem to be preparing to leave and some who are settling in.

On Friday, Mr. Ofczarzak sold out his supply of five-gallon gasoline cans to people from Louisiana. But some shoppers were coming in to get keys made for their new homes and talking about enrolling their children in local schools. "I have friends who've already done that," he said.

The newcomers may take some getting used to. "Everybody is still pretty much in awe," Mr. Ofczarzak said. "And with everybody coming in the buses, it hit home."

As Evacuees Pour In, A Flood Of Generosity And Some Unease (WSJ)

By Jose De Cordoba, James Bandler and Ann Zimmerman

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

HOUSTON -- As pastor of Impact Houston Church of Christ, the Rev. Charlie Middlebrook is matching refugees from Hurricane Katrina with volunteers who have offered to share their homes.

But the outpouring of generosity hasn't blinded Mr. Middlebrook to humanity's less noble impulses. With the help of a law firm that is donating its services, he is conducting background searches on all refugees as well as on those who have volunteered to take them in.

"We want to send somebody who is not a danger to you," Mr. Middlebrook tells a caller offering to house a hurricane victim. "We are trying to be very careful." Mr. Middlebrook is requiring from all parties Social Security numbers or driver-license numbers.

Katrina's dislocation of hundreds of thousands of people from Gulf Coast states is inspiring extraordinary acts of charity. In less than a week donations to victims have exceeded $400 million, on top of millions of volunteer man-hours. As of late Monday afternoon, the American Red Cross said it is sheltering more than 135,500 evacuees at more than 470 shelters in 12 states.

DOJ_NMG_0002969

To Jerome Lyons, a New Orleans construction worker who spent five days trapped in waterlogged New Orleans, the wave of help in Houston seems more powerful than the hurricane. "All races, all colors, all express their love," he says. Mr. Lyons, who was rescued by boat from his home, says strangers have given him money on the street to help him get a new start.

But the massive displacement is also creating new fault lines. Many refugees, having lost nearly everything or having had little to lose in the first place, are seeking more than shelter from the storm. They're seeking new lives, competing with locals for jobs and crowding their children into new schools.

Noel Jones, a 38-year-old Houstonian, predicted that some arriving workers are likely to be shut out of construction and manufacturing jobs because of competition from Mexicans and Mexican-Americans. Mr. Jones said the competition often forces him and other African-Americans as well as poor whites into low-paying service jobs.

"Don't stop" in Houston, is Mr. Jones's advice to Katrina refugees. "It ain't meant for you."

Texas Gov. Rick Perry has already called for an airlift of evacuees to other states from Houston and Dallas. He cited strains on Texas, which is hosting about a quarter of a million refugees from Katrina.

Cities and families providing shelter and other help have no way of knowing how long their assistance will be needed. Duchesne Academy of the Sacred Heart, a private, all-girls school in Houston, enrolled 150 students from a related New Orleans school as of Friday, waiving tuition through January. "Hopefully, they'll go home in January," says Beth Speck, Duchesne's director of admissions. "If not, we'll see what happens then."

Interviews with evacuees from New Orleans suggest that some have no intention of returning. Even a modest job in a new home may represent an improvement over what they left behind. Reco Parker, 31, a hairstylist now staying at Houston's Astrodome complex, says he's going back to New Orleans, but only long enough to try to salvage the more than $1,000 worth of hairstyling equipment he left behind. He plans to return to Houston, saying he's bowled over by Texan hospitality.

"They seem like loving people here," he says, adding that he's scared of staying in New Orleans after the hurricane.

One caller to Impact Houston Church of Christ was Janice Stocks, who has offered to share her three-bedroom country home with a couple from 50 to 70 years old. "It's the right thing to do," says Mrs. Stocks, whose husband is an executive with a Houston chemical company. "That could be us on the road, without a place to go."

But she acknowledges some questions and concerns. "What is one supposed to do? Drive with them to the grocery? Drive them to the doctor's office?" As far as the duration of the arrangement, she says, "We are willing to go the whole yard, as long as we get along with one another. I hope we get a good family."

Mayor Laura Miller of Dallas, which has 45,000 refugees in shelters, hotels and homes, worries about the welcome mat fraying. "A group of doctors volunteering at Reunion Arena and the Convention Center told me that they're having fun now, but worry how they'll feel in two weeks, when they're tired from combining volunteering with their day-to-day jobs," she says.

The prospect of dealing with long-term refugees is prompting the federal government to consider some dramatic solutions -- for instance, creating a city of 50,000 people where none exists now, says Lt. Gen. Carl Strock of the Army Corps of Engineers. Gen. Strock says the corps is considering sites for such a city as well as sites for possible trailer and mobile-home parks.

"After the hurricanes in Florida, we went in and built, essentially, trailer parks," he said. "We have general plans on the shelf always but specific planning for New Orleans began before landfall" of the hurricane. He added that authorities also are looking at military bases, including those that have been closed but once housed military personnel.

Those decisions will come later, said Lt. Gen. Strock. Right now authorities are just trying to continue evacuating residents to safer temporary facilities, such as the Astrodome.

Mr. Middlebrook, the Houston pastor, says virtually all callers have been as enthusiastic and sincere as Roxanne Grice, a member of the congregation who on Saturday night cooked a feast of ribs and beans for some 20 hurricane victims. "I just want to hug somebody," said Ms. Grice, stirring a huge pot of beans as she waited for her guests to arrive.

The church did receive a call from one man offering to share his one-bedroom apartment with up to "four ladies." Mr. Middlebrook declined the offer.

In Baton Rouge, A Cool Welcome (WP)

By Wil Haygood

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 5 -- When this city's mayor, Melvin "Kip" Holden, issued a stem-winding warning that he would not tolerate "lawlessness" from arriving Hurricane Katrina evacuees, it seemed a page torn from the playbook of the celebrated former governor Huey Long, exposing an us-against-them dictate.

But many blacks here -- and those arriving from New Orleans -- were suddenly wondering whether this city was about to turn into a kind of ground zero of class warfare between blacks and blacks.

Holden himself is black, which had the potency of lifting the debate above the usual black-white fault lines.

DOJ_NMG_0002970

"We know we don't want that criminal element," Sheila Mosby, 40, said while sitting on her front porch on the south side of this city and recalling scenes of recent looting in New Orleans. "I can understand trying to survive. But that element coming here, well, they might try to rob stores. To tell you the truth, it's really going to be something."

While dabbing at sweat beads with a pink hand towel, Mosby, who is black, went on: "Like Mayor Holden said, if they come down here and try to break into people's houses, and stores, there's a place for them."

She -- like the mayor -- was referring to the Baton Rouge jails.

Mosby said she envisioned "shoot to kill" orders if break-ins do occur.

Orders for the police? "No! From the people who live in these homes. They will shoot to kill. They gonna let these people know, 'You ain't in New Orleans. You in Baton Rouge.' "

This city of approximately 260,000 people, which lies 90 miles northwest of New Orleans, has not had the dramatic racial narratives of many other southern cities. There were bus boycotts in the 1960s -- and those of a certain age still remember a violent confrontation that took place during that decade between local Muslims and police here, which resulted in gunfire and injury.

Holden's comments seemed to bring to the surface the reality that local resources may well be strapped; that the holding-on blacks of this community realize there is sudden competition, from other blacks, for help in escaping poverty.

All day Sunday, hundreds had lined up at the Department of Social Services office to get assistance, especially food stamps. Many were Katrina evacuees, but hardly all.

"Now my biggest concern is the schools," said Tara Willimas, 34, a medical transcriber who is black and resides in Baton Rouge. "We don't mind sharing, but there's going to be competition for jobs."

Many, including the mayor, contend this city's population could more than double in the coming days and weeks, exceeding half a million.

"I can understand these people coming here from New Orleans," said Isadore Brown, 32, who also was standing in line for food stamps. He's a crane operator, a black man who says the power at his Baton Rouge home went out, ruining food. Brown says he already has visions of criminals from New Orleans running amok. "They're coming down here from New Orleans making us fear for our lives," he said. "Some people have talked about not leaving their house."

Already, this city -- home to Louisiana State University -- has been showing signs of tension. Some stores are closing early, leaving many to wonder whether they're doing so because of those unsettling images of blacks looting in New Orleans -- or simply because stores are running out of supplies. And it has not been uncommon in recent days to hear gunshots ring out in the night.

"Why do store owners all of a sudden want to close up their stores at 10 p.m.?" wonders Tammy Ruffin, 33, also black. "Many of these stores used to be open 24 hours."

There are upwards of 30 evacuees now staying at the Shiloh Missionary Baptist Church on Eddie Robinson Sr. Drive -- named after the legendary Grambling football coach who grew up on this street. Eula Smith -- wife of Pastor Charles T. Smith -- directs volunteer efforts at the church, which serves a predominantly black congregation.

She says she immediately began to wonder about class divisions in the aftermath of Holden's comments.

"I don't know if the mayor was trying to alienate people or what," she said, seated in her office, the hallway buzzing with the sounds of New Orleans children playing tag. "He didn't say it right. Every population has this criminal element. But it sounded like he said all New Orleans people are thuggish."

Sleep has been hard to come by for Smith and her harried staff. She yelled out for someone to brew more coffee. "Now we do have to be careful," she continued, "that some of our people aren't using this situation to their benefit, getting into our shelters, and what have you. But Baton Rouge is bigger than Mayor Holden anyway. I think he said what he said for the benefit of his white voters, because he's looking to the future."

Simmering class divisions aside, the bugaboo of racism also has reared its head. Barbara Martin, 58, was a teacher in New Orleans. She and her husband, Alphonse, who are black, evacuated here. "Soon as the mayor made his statement about New Orleans," she said, "no-vacancy signs went up everywhere here on apartment complexes."

"We have sat in our car and watched whites go in these places and come out with paperwork to get apartments. The mayor is black. His head must be in the sand," she said. She goes on, her husband amen-ing her every word: "I accept what he said in terms of lawlessness. I don't believe in lawlessness myself. But what he said affected everybody. Some people were on lockdown here, as if we were going to tear up the city."

Martin says she has been made to feel "uncomfortable" in Baton Rouge. "I'm a middle-class black person, and I'm being treated by the color of my skin."

Hundreds Refuse To Evacuate (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0002971

By Scott Gold, David Zucchino And Stephen Braun

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Search teams pressing to evacuate the living and find the dead after a full week under the high-water sway of Hurricane Katrina found their efforts complicated Monday by the refusal of hundreds of residents to leave the paralyzed city.

President Bush returned Monday for a second tour of the disaster zone, praising emergency workers in Baton Rouge, La., and stressing the work of religious charities during a visit to a church packed with evacuees. Federal officials said relief operations were proceeding apace, but Bush's tour was soured by an ongoing feud with Louisiana's governor over who would manage National Guard troops in the state.

A senior New Orleans police official said Monday that some 10,000 inhabitants remained in the city, hidden inside flooded residences, apartments and housing projects, surviving on foraged scraps and food drops by the military. Searchers have been frustrated by hundreds of holdouts who have refused to leave their homes, fearing possessions will be pillaged, pets will die and their way of life will be erased.

"There are, to our surprise, thousands of people still in the city that we're trying to identify and locate," said Deputy New Orleans Police Chief Warren Riley. "We're trying to convince them there's nothing for them here — no food, no jobs, nothing to let them live the way they're used to."

But there were nascent signs of progress too. The gaping break in the city's 17th Street Canal levee was finally stopped up by metal sheets, tons of earthen fill and a strand of massive 3,000-pound sandbags. Engineers and contractors working on the breach and two other levee ruptures said water levels dropped by as much as a foot Monday in some parts of the city. The next step is "de-watering," the removal of water that is expected to take months.

More than 50,000 anxious evacuees began returning for the first visit to their submerged homes in Jefferson Parish, which borders the city on the west and the south. They waited for hours in cars lined for miles along a clogged highway.

"I was scared to come back," said Mike "Opie" Johnson, 37, who retrieved a pillow-case full of his mother-in-law's jewelry. "I heard there were looters everywhere, but turns out there weren't too many looters in this parish."

Thousands of residents arrived lugging coolers crammed with food and water to sustain them until Thursday, when parish sheriff's deputies will force everyone to leave again. Authorities cautioned that many other residents might not see their homes for months. In New Orleans, Mayor C. Ray Nagin also tamped down expectations, warning that it would take 10 years to rebuild the city and that storm-related deaths could rise as high as 10,000.

A week since Katrina blasted through the Gulf Coast, bursting levees and flooding out hundreds of thousands of residents, New Orleans remains bereft of the spark of high life that has made it a tourist and jazz mecca. It has descended into a nightmarish tableau of gas-line fires, sporadic gunfire and the sound of helicopters on searches for residents still trapped.

Soldiers, looters and scavengers sloshed through murky water under picturesque 18th century flats with trademark iron-gated balconies. The century-old jazz haunts of Storyville and Basin Street, where Louis Armstrong and Sidney Bechet played for tips, were silent as graves. The old port blockaded by Union ironclads during the Civil War remains useless, its entry canals bottled up by loose barges, scrap metal, silt and flood debris.

Yet many survivors ignored pleas to evacuate, foraging for sustenance by day and staying hidden at night in a city deprived of basic functions.

"They're trying to starve us out," said Barnell Roman, 53, who drank a warm beer on the porch of his two-story home on Elysian Fields Avenue in the Mid-City neighborhood.

Roman said he and a dozen other neighborhood residents were no longer able to cadge food or water from National Guard troops posted nearby. Faced with shrinking supplies, two neighbors gave up and accepted a ride from authorities to an evacuation point, he said.

On Interstate 10, where a flooded highway exit served as a ramp to launch rescue boats, search crews said hundreds of people had declined to be rescued over the last two days. One Texas crew operating east of the interstate was turned way by 450 people living in houses surrounded by water. On Monday, the crew rescued 183 people but was turned away by 150 more, said Billy Parker, manager of the Texas Task Force One Water Strike Team.

"They have water up to the porch, but they don't want to go," Parker said. "They sit up on the second floor and say: 'We got food. We got water. We're staying.' " Parker said his crews had no authority to forcibly remove anyone but had passed the information on to state and city agencies.

Nagin has said the city will remove all residents. He has not provided details on how or when the process would be carried out. But Riley warned Monday that officials were considering "stopping food drops" to the stragglers to increase the pressure on them to leave.

DOJ_NMG_0002972

There were emerging signs that water-borne bacterial disease has begun to fester among survivors being brought out of the flood zone by military and police search teams. Medical authorities working in the city report treating several cases of vibrio vulnificus, a gastrointestinal disease that spreads through exposure to polluted water.

Health officials said they clearly identified strains of the disease, which has effects similar to cholera, among some storm refugees. But they do not yet have a handle on the number of cases.

"We are seeing some cases," said Von Roebuck, a spokesman for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta. "It could be life-threatening."

Among healthy people, the illness can cause vomiting, diarrhea and abdominal pain but is generally not life-threatening. It can be cured with antibiotics. But it can be more serious among people with chronic liver disease and compromised immune systems, leading to fever, chills and septic shock.

"The water quality in the streets continues to deteriorate," said Nagin, who said he was concerned about West Nile virus and other mosquito-borne diseases. "There is some really nasty looking stuff out there."

In a visit to the Louisiana Emergency Operations Center in Baton Rouge, Bush told several hundred local, state and federal public safety officials that their efforts in evacuating and providing medical treatment and food to tens of thousands of flood survivors brought "immediate light to people who needed help."

Bush returned to the storm-torn Gulf Coast region for the second time in three days to boost the morale of authorities and urge churches and other religious organizations to aid the flood victims of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

"I want to thank every church member who's helping people who have been displaced," Bush said as he toured the Bethany New World Prayer Center in Baton Rouge, consoling refugees along with televangelist T.D. Jakes and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco.

Behind the scenes there were tensions between Blanco and the administration over the White House's attempt last week to force her to cede the constitutional authority she wields over the Louisiana National Guard.

A senior administration official who spoke on condition of anonymity confirmed Monday that top White House officials had pressed her to allow federal officials to unify National Guard and active-duty troops under one chain of command. The official said that "we wanted to unify the command and control for security" under Army Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honore, who is heading National Guard troops in New Orleans.

But Blanco has resisted, fearing the White House is attempting to paint her as the weak link in last week's slow-moving government disaster operations. On Monday, Blanco's aides learned only at the last minute that Bush was touring the state capital in Baton Rouge and complained that she was being punished for holding tight to her constitutional authority over state-based National Guard units.

When the two sat together at the Emergency Operations Center, Bush smiled benignly while Blanco stared ahead solemnly. At one point, Bush leaned over to give her a peck on the cheek, but her stern gaze did not waver.

Later, Blanco minimized rumors of sniping and said she supported the work of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which has drawn sharp criticism in recent days. "This debate was simply about an organizational structure," she said. "We needed the versatility to use the National Guard members as they needed them."

After attending a meeting with Bush, Blanco and other federal and state officials, James Lee Witt, the former Clinton administration FEMA director, said that "in two days, you'll see a different program down here."

But Witt, who was hired as an advisor last week by Blanco to shore up her emergency planning and to blunt federal efforts to seize authority over military relief operations, also said that the Bush administration had "minimized FEMA" by folding it into the Department of Homeland Security.

"You can't report up through three different chains of people and make things go fast," Witt said. "FEMA needs to be put back as an independent agency with the people and resources to do its job well."

Homeland Security Director Michael Chertoff and FEMA head Michael D. Brown have been under fire for moving aid in too slowly and for not coordinating with local officials. They continued to defend their performance.

During one news conference Monday, a perturbed Brown resorted to listing his previous experience dealing with public emergencies.

"Yeah, I've been through a few disasters in my life," he said.

During a Monday meeting to unveil a fundraising foundation to aid hurricane victims, former Presidents Clinton and George H.W. Bush agreed that sniping between disaster officials should cease while relief operations were still underway. But Clinton said a national commission should investigate mistakes made in the first days after the hurricane, which hit Aug. 29. And he also questioned FEMA's current structure.

"It has something to do with how they reorganized after I left," Clinton said.

DOJ_NMG_0002973

Shoring up his organization, Chertoff named a new federal official to help oversee rescue and recovery operations in New Orleans. Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, the Coast Guard's chief of staff, will be deputy federal officer under Brown. The Coast Guard has been widely praised for making more than 15,000 rescues of people trapped by the hurricane.

Allen's job will be to set up a new headquarters in New Orleans and work with Honore, who commands Joint Task Force Katrina, the military group in New Orleans.

Troops at the heart of relief operations in New Orleans and Mississippi continued to grow Monday. Major Gen. Bennett Landreneau of the Louisiana National Guard said the total number of forces in the city would climb to 10,000.

Honore, the commanding general of the First Army, seemed to be everywhere during the day.

He directed troops, met with Bush and Blanco, and charmed and blustered at television news anchors who began to mimic his gruff phrasing — repeating his "boots on the ground" to refer to growing troop strength and ending questions with his terse, "Over!"

The general waved off the political firestorm over the Bush administration's halting response, chalking the chaos following Katrina's assault to the vagaries of nature.

"The storm did this. It wasn't anything the government did," Honore said. "The storm had the damn vote. You can't vote that damn water out of the city of New Orleans. Now let's take care of the evacuees! Let's get it on!"

"Over!"

'No Reason To Stay,' But Some Won't Leave (DMN)

By Lee Hancock

The Dallas Morning News, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS – By persuasion and by force, authorities worked Monday to complete the biggest evacuation of an American city in modern times.

Despite a week of flooding, hellish conditions and slim prospects that the city would be livable for months, some people still didn't want to leave.

"This city has been destroyed, has completely been destroyed," Deputy Police Superintendent Warren Riley said. "There's absolutely no reason to stay here. There are no jobs. There are no homes."

Nonetheless, he said, "Unfortunately there are still people that do not want to leave this city."

In the Garden District, police backed by California National Guardsmen stopped pedestrians and bicyclists at a major intersection and ordered them into vans even after some protested that they would be leaving friends and family behind.

It was a stark contrast to suburban areas where Hurricane Katrina's impact was less devastating. Residents were allowed to return to their homes temporarily to inspect damage and salvage belongings.

As authorities began removing dead bodies, engineers scored an initial success in the battle against the floodwaters. Louisiana officials said Monday afternoon that the 17th Street Canal levee, where a huge breach caused the disastrous flooding, had been patched.

After several days of helicopters dropping huge sandbags into the gap, the flow finally stopped and pumps were able to begin pushing water back to Lake Pontchartrain. But much of the city remained under water. Meanwhile, President Bush, who has come under intense criticism for his administration's response to the storm, made his second trip to inspect the damage and chaos. He pledged that "all levels of the federal government are doing the best they can."

'Lock down the city'

In New Orleans, the effort to impose order involved about 4,000 U.S. Army troops and Marines, National Guardsmen and law enforcement officers from across the country. They were patrolling city streets with local police in an effort to, in Mr. Riley's words, "lock down the city."

It wasn't easy. Army Lt. Gen. Russel Honore told ABC that fewer than 10,000 people remained in the city, based on aerial reconnaissance. That would be a fraction of New Orleans' half-million residents, but still a formidable number of holdouts.

Mayor Ray Nagin – who said Monday that the death toll in his city could reach 10,000 – declared that the city had the authority to force residents to evacuate. He would not say if authorities were doing that, but he announced that people who refuse to leave will no longer be given drinking water.

The deputy superintendent stressed voluntary evacuations, saying: "We are working with them and talking to them, trying to convince them to leave."

While some officers went further, others, in a neighborhood off Interstate 10 called Gentilly, said they could only warn people to get away from water that could carry encephalitis, typhoid, dysentery and toxic pollutants.

DOJ_NMG_0002974

Some people wandered the streets, and others scavenged in hotels and apartments for whatever they could find to survive. On Chef Menteur Highway, 73-year-old Navy veteran Silas Walker huddled beside wrecked gas pumps at a gutted Shell station.

"This is the area of the typhoon," he said, rocking back and forth in green hospital pajamas and sock feet. "I don't want to leave."

A police officer who tried to talk Mr. Walker into leaving was frustrated, but sympathetic.

"Some of these people have had so much psychological stress, all they been through, that they have lost their minds," he said.

Boat crews and air searchers continued combing the city for survivors, while police officers from Texas and other parts of Louisiana cruised neighborhoods, handing out food and patrolling for looters.

Humvees packed with heavily armed troops and SUVs filled with SWAT police officers prowled largely deserted streets and guarded the 18-wheelers hauling fuel for emergency vehicles and generators.

In Washington, military officials said that 8,500 active-duty personnel and 38,000 National Guard troops would be deployed in the hurricane-afflicted areas by today, along with 21 Navy ships.

Collecting the dead

The grim task of retrieving the dead began Monday as refrigerated trucks began fanning out across the city, collecting bodies from hospitals, roadways and apartments.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency is overseeing the recovery, setting up a temporary morgue near the New Orleans airport.

One FEMA truck stopped at midafternoon to pick up corpses in the Garden District. It was parked on the grassy median where the city's famous streetcars normally run, while workers wearing masks and white protective suits lifted body bags in.

"We just really got started, and we got nine so far," said Sgt. Richard Hazlewood, a Louisiana state police officer helping the truck navigate through neighborhoods.

In the poorer neighborhoods, the squalor grows worse by the day. Floodwaters have steadily gone down, leaving a malodorous, contaminated stew of sewage, chemicals, garbage and the bodies of animals and people.

In badly hit areas like the Ninth Ward, several residents said, neighborhoods are infested with snakes, prowled by packs of abandoned dogs and dotted with bodies of the dead.

A New Orleans police officer who passed through the area late Sunday on his way to check on his flooded home said some residents were wandering confused and disoriented through the filthy water.

"There were people really about like zombies, like that Night of the Living Dead movie," he said.

Even in the city's lushest neighborhoods, stores have been looted and streets are dotted with garbage and reeking water.

Trying to bring order has sometimes resulted in violence. Police across the city say they've dealt for the past week with sporadic gunfire. Officers based in the French Quarter say they had particular problems from Iberville, a desperately poor area just outside the famed tourist destination.

Police said that a Sunday morning shootout that left two civilians dead and two wounded did not involve U.S. Army Corps of Engineers contractors on their way to help patch a levee, as initial reports indicated.

The incident in East New Orleans began, officials said, when an emergency worker heard gunshots and called police for help. When officers responded, the gunmen began firing at them, and a backup tactical team ended up killing and wounding several of the assailants, Mr. Riley said.

Even in areas packed with police, looters roamed. Several U.S. Marshals and a state police officer, all brandishing M-16s, pulled over a van Monday morning and hauled out five people armed with machetes, knives, rifles, stun guns, brass knuckles and handguns.

The van had been hot-wired, stolen and decorated with an obscenity about Katrina. Inside, police also found a large cache of expensive-looking musical instrument cases. Its occupants were heavily tattooed 20-somethings who sat sullenly, three of them holding mongrel dogs.

"They're from New York, New Jersey," a deputy marshal said. "Looks like they've come down here to do a little looting and stuff."

The officers made the group sit on the ground until a truck came to take them and all but their weapons to an evacuation point. Even though they had obviously stolen the car and possibly the equipment, officers said, they could do nothing but ensure that they left the city unarmed.

"What can we do but evacuate them?" the exasperated deputy marshal said.

In New Orleans, Not Everyone Wants To Be Rescued (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS - Gregory Scott steers a commandeered pleasure boat through the flotsam of New Orleans's flooded 17th Ward, occasionally scraping bottom - actually, the roofs of submerged cars.

The area of modest two-story and shotgun-style homes seems empty of life - and officials believe that hundreds who tried to ride out hurricane Katrina here may have perished in their attics. But Mr. Scott, who makes his presence known by blasting a hand-held horn as he maneuvers the boat forward, knows there's life - even laundry - in some quarters.

"There's people all through here," says mate Timothy Waters.

A mucky brown soup flows through what used to be the 17th Ward's neighborhood of Holly Grove, the only spot Scott has ever called home. Under almost 10 feet of water, the Beautiful People club is gone. Scott's own house, with a broken window where he climbed out just ahead of rising waters, is part of a scene so macabre that even New Orleansian vampire-novelist Anne Rice might struggle to imagine it.

Yet while thousands finally got out over the Labor Day weekend, Scott and Waters are holding on - just two of many who are fierce in their determination to stay, keeping their feet planted in the muck of this Cajun Atlantis.

Such decisions perturb emergency-response officials, who warn that public-health risks posed by the fetid floodwater may worsen, and that two months of flood conditions may await residents who insist upon staying put. A stubborn resistance to leaving, they add, will only waste time and resources of an already-overtaxed search-and-rescue operation. The mission remains dangerous, as a nonfatal crash of a civilian rescue helicopter late Sunday illustrated.

Dennis Nunez, a Louisiana wildlife officer, has seen hundreds of people living deep in the neighborhoods. Some told rescue workers to move on, to save others first. In one mostly Vietnamese neighborhood, people were feeling comfortable enough to have gone fishing, and were drying fresh fish on their porches. "They won't come out," says Mr. Nunez. Less panic, more patience

As response to Katrina enters its second week, 17,000 National Guardsmen patrolled the Big Easy by foot, helicopter, and boat, and the atmosphere shifted from one of panic and scattered violence to one of a soggy siege. Here on the Jefferson Parish line, a few miles from where the 17th Street Canal was breached last Tuesday, the water line has fallen hardly at all as of Sunday afternoon.

On Sunday, many hangers-on gave up. Rescuers pulled one woman, barely conscious, from her home, mattress and all. The job of the day: Extricating a frightened, 400-pound man. Another woman came ashore with three cat carriers, each one containing three cats.

But the conflict between the stranded and the rescuers is playing itself out in ways that, at times, seem bizarre. Rescue helicopters have even come under sniper fire, police say, as some resist relocation.

"It's hard on the rescuers, to risk their lives and have somebody say, 'I don't want to be saved.' It boggles your mind," says Lt. Col. Pete Schneider, a spokesman for the Homeland Security Department, in Baton Rouge, La.

Rescue volunteer Jef Talbert, who has arrived from Texas in a friend's flat-bottom boat (which he's promised to return without bullet holes), says it's an odd feeling to be loading every gun he owns before he heads out to rescue people.

Scott, Waters, and six other men are locals who are aiding with the rescue, camping on a plot of high ground. They've rescued hundreds since last Tuesday, asking only food and water in return. They're using whatever equipment is at hand - whether an 18-wheel truck (which they stalled out in deep water) or a waterski boat with a 130 horsepower Yamaha four-stroke on the back.

As they shove aside downed wires and look for submerged cars and street signs that can damage the propeller on "their" boat, Scott and Waters shout at one house and toot the horn. Two men emerge onto the porch.

"Day 7," yells Anthony Belt, refusing his rescuers, indicating he's got food. He also has a flat-bottom sloop in case he really has to get out.

As the number of those in need, or want, of being rescued diminishes, rescuers are shifting priorities: If they see someone has stockpiled supplies, they've stopped handing out more food.

"If they're not coming out, we're not going to force them," says Lieutenant Colonel Schneider. "But we can't keep coming back to resupply." Fish dinner

If some survivors are struggling, increasingly aware that they are surrounded by a huge septic tank, others seem to be doing fine. Rescuers report seeing large Vietnamese families cooking fish and "looking very comfortable," some even keeping fish in makeshift pools, then hanging them out to dry.

Indeed, the stayers-on may be clinging to a belief that, beyond the muck, is hope. For some, a desire to protect their property is the driving factor in their decisions to stay, and others simply have nowhere else to go and are clinging to their patch of the globe. After surviving for a week in hellish conditions, many say perhaps things will only get better, suggests Mike Lindell, a psychologist at Louisiana State University. "We're in uncharted territory for human behavior."

DOJ_NMG_0002976

Two women who had walked through chest-high water from the Superdome to their homes to get fresh clothes were glad to jump in Scott's boat, but then started to bicker with each other. Scott wanted none of it. Voice rising, he sounded off, saying the women should lay aside petty differences as they pass through waters of death. As the boat neared a staging area where rescue workers bring their human cargo, one woman, Tina Collins, turned around and said, quietly, "thank you."

Back on the levee, Scott, a tailor and French Quarter doorman, says he's found a new calling that lets him stay close to home, bringing his neighbors to safety when they're ready. Despite the rough conditions, he has no wish to leave.

"They say a rat has many holes, but I've got only one," he says. "And I plan on going down in it."

Crews Plug Levee Break A Week After Storm (AJC/AP)

By Doug Simpson, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — A week after Hurricane Katrina swept through, engineers plugged the levee break that had swamped much of the city and floodwaters began to recede, but along with the good news came the mayor's direst prediction yet: as many as 10,000 dead.

Crews had put up metal sheets and dropped 3,000-pound sandbags from helicopters onto the 17th Street canal leading to Lake Pontchartrain to plug the 200-foot-wide gap, and water was being pumped from the canal back into the lake.

State officials and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers say once the canal level is drawn down two feet, Pumping Station No. 6 can begin pumping water out of the bowl-shaped city.

Some parts of the city already showed slipping floodwaters as the repair neared completion, with the low-lying Ninth Ward dropping more than a foot. In downtown New Orleans, some streets were merely wet rather than swamped.

"We're starting to make the kind of progress that I kind of expected earlier," New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said even before the plug of the break, which opened up a day after the hurricane and flooded 80 percent of the city.

The news came as many of the 460,000 residents of suburban Jefferson Parish waited in a line of cars that stretched for miles to briefly see their flooded homes, and to scoop up soaked wedding pictures and other cherished mementoes.

"A lot of these people built these houses anticipating some flood water but nobody imagined this," sobbed Diane Dempsey, a 59-year-old retired Army lieutenant colonel who could get no closer than the water line a mile from her Metairie home. "I'm going to pay someone to get me back there, anything I have to do."

"I won't be getting inside today unless I get some scuba gear," added Jack Rabito, a 61-year-old bar owner who waited for a ride to visit his one-story home that had water lapping to the gutters.

Katharine Dastugue was overjoyed to find that floodwaters had gone across her lawn but stopped just inches from her doorstep. As she stood waiting for a boat to take her in, she made a list of things she hoped to salvage before being forced to leave again Wednesday.

"If I can just get my kids' baby photos," she said. "You can't replace those."

In New Orleans, Nagin upticked his estimate of the probable death toll in his city from merely thousands, telling NBC's "Today" show, "It wouldn't be unreasonable to have 10,000."

As law enforcement officers and even bands of civilians — including actor Sean Penn — launched door-to-door searches of the city for survivors, they were running up against a familiar obstacle: People who had been trapped more than a week in damaged homes yet refused to leave.

"We have advised people that this city has been destroyed," said Deputy Police Superintendent W.J. Riley. "There is nothing here for them and no reason for them to stay — no food, no jobs, nothing."

Riley, who estimated fewer than 10,000 people were left in the city, said some simply did not want to leave their homes — while others were hanging back to engage in criminal activities, such as looting.

Nagin said the city had the authority to force residents to evacuate but didn't say if it was taking that step. He did, however, detail one heavy-handed tactic: Water will no longer be handed out to people who refuse to leave.

With almost a third of New Orleans' police force missing in action, a caravan of law enforcement vehicles, emblazoned with emblems from across the nation and blue lights flashing, poured into the city to help establish order on the city's anarchic streets.

Between 400 to 500 officers on New Orleans' 1600-member force were unaccounted for. Some lost their homes. Some were looking for families. "Some simply left because they said they could not deal with the catastrophe," Riley said. Officers were being cycled off duty and given five-day vacations in Las Vegas and Atlanta, where they also would receive counseling.

At a news conference in Baton Rouge, police Superintendent Eddie Compass denied that officers deserted in droves, acknowledging some officers abandoned their jobs but saying he didn't know how many.

DOJ_NMG_0002977

Two police officers killed themselves. Another was shot in the head. Compass said 150 had to be rescued from eight feet of water and others had gotten infections from walking through the murky soup of chemicals and pollutants in flooded areas.

"No police department in the history of the world was asked to do what we were asked," Compass said with a mix of anger and pride.

The leader of troops patrolling New Orleans declared the city largely free of the lawlessness that plagued it in the days following the hurricane. And he angrily lashed out at a reporter who suggested search-and-rescue operations were being stymied by random gunfire and lawlessness.

"Go on the streets of New Orleans — it's secure," said Army Lt. Gen. Russel Honore. "Have you been to New Orleans? Did anybody accost you?"

Hopeful signs of recovery were accompanied by President Bush's second visit to Louisiana, which exposed a continued rift between state and federal officials over the slowness of a relief effort. The first significant convoy of food, water and medicine didn't arrive in New Orleans until four full days after the hurricane, and the mayor and others said some survivors died awaiting relief.

Louisiana's largest newspaper, The Times-Picayune, called for the firing of every official at the Federal Emergency Management Agency in an open letter to President Bush that it published.

At a stop in Baton Rouge, Bush said all levels of the government were doing their best, and he pledged: "So long as any life is in danger, we've got work to do."

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco has refused to sign over National Guard control to the federal government and has turned to a Clinton administration official, former Federal Emergency Management Agency chief James Lee Witt, to help run relief efforts.

Blanco, a Democrat, was not informed of the timing of Bush's visit, nor was she immediately invited to meet him or travel with him. In fact, Blanco's office didn't know when Bush was coming until told by reporters.

Late Monday, Blanco denied there was tension with Bush.

"We'd like to stop the voices out there trying to create a divide. There is no divide," she said. "Every leader in this nation wants to see this problem solved."

In Texas, U.S. Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt declared a public health emergency for that state, saying it would speed up federal assistance to help almost 240,000 storm evacuees — the most of any state.

While the New Orleans' refugees were mostly poor and black, Jefferson Parish brought the storm's destruction to a much wider economic cross-section.

The sprawling parish stretches from Grand Isle on the Gulf of Mexico to Lake Pontchartrain in the north, and includes some of the metropolitan area's most exclusive neighborhoods.

In the enclave of Old Metairie, the rows of palatial, six-bedroom homes sustained little structural damage but had some of the worst flooding. Water rippled up the knobs at front doors and completely covered Mercedes-Benzes and BMWs in garages.

Many residents were happy that the storm spared their homes, but angry that the failure of the levee system left them swamped. Some were considering a lawsuit against the federal government for having a levee that could survive no more than a Category 3 hurricane.

"That's what's so devastating, that goddamned levee breaking," said Bobby Patrick, who is now staying in Houston. "My home didn't lose a shingle but it's got six feet of water in it."

Since the storm, rumors had swirled that looters had crossed over the parish line and begun breaking into evacuated homes in Jefferson. Many were relieved to return home Monday to find their belongings untouched.

Across the neighborhood, residents took what items they could fit in a boat. One woman loaded up her boat with her collection of cashmere sweaters, her cat and the 1957 Leica camera that belonged to her grandfather. A man packed his pickup truck with his silverware, his wife's clothes and a cherished animal figurine.

Unlike the poor in New Orleans, these refugees had other places to go. And few here planned to stay through what could be a long recovery. With police checkpoints on every major street corner, even looting was not a major concern.

Said personal trainer Rod McClave: "I'm more concerned about them damaging my stuff just for the hell of it."

New Horrors Discovered As Recovery Effort Goes On (MH)

By Lee Hill Kavanaugh, Natalie Pompilio And Martin Merzer

The Miami Herald, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS - Ghastly new evidence of Hurricane Katrina's horror emerged Monday night when a sheriff reported the recovery of 22 bodies lashed together around a pole - a desperate, futile attempt to survive the storm.

DOJ_NMG_0002978

Sheriff Jack Stephens of St. Bernard Parish, just east of New Orleans, said rescuers found the bodies tied with rope and wrapped around a pole in the tiny village of Violet along the eastern bank of the Mississippi River.

The bodies were found soon after the storm in a flooded area of the village but still haven't been identified, he said. He said he believed they had tied themselves together, one by one, so they could escape the rising water.

The report came on a day when rescue crews still sought the living and the dead, and when New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin shared a grim estimate of Katrina's human toll - as many as 10,000 people dead, though he didn't cite the basis for that statement.

And more: Biloxi Mayor A.J. Holloway said he expected the death toll in his Mississippi city to exceed that of Hurricane Camille, which killed 200 people in 1969.

Meanwhile Monday, engineers repaired the ruptured 17th Street Canal levee in New Orleans and floodwaters receded a bit as some suburban residents, carrying suitcases and heavy hearts, briefly returned to their homes and sifted through the sodden debris.

Many of those who briefly returned to suburban Jefferson Parish or stayed there throughout the ordeal reported a landscape dotted with bodies.

On Stella Street, Eric Breaux said he saw 15 corpses, most of them caught in barbed wire at the Metairie Country Club. "I don't want to see it again," he said. "I personally tied three dead bodies to street signs."

Authorities permitted residents of the area, a parish just west of New Orleans that includes Metairie and Kenner, to inspect their houses and recover possessions worth removing.

Many neighborhoods still were flooded to the rooftops, but others had dried out, leaving behind an awful, reeking residue. About 460,000 people lived in the suburban parish before the storm, and now some labored on a day that felt like anything but a holiday.

"We have lost everything," Carol Crokem of Kenner said as she surveyed what was left of the home on West Tulane Lane where she and her husband raised three children and two grandchildren.

Maggots gathered at her front door, and sewage and garbage polluted the interior.

In Metaire, Vinson Serio, 59, stacked dining room chairs outside while his wife, Claire, 57, swept malodorous black water from their home. Among the destroyed possessions: his daughter's never worn wedding dress.

"I'm grateful it wasn't death," Serio said. "But it's bad as far as destruction, emotional destruction."

As they and others viewed the wreckage of their houses and their lives - and as the water in and around New Orleans slowly receded, President Bush conducted another partial tour of the region, though he again bypassed New Orleans.

"We're here for the long term," Bush said during a stop in Poplarville, Miss., 45 miles inland but savaged by Katrina. He's been harshly criticized over the federal response.

At the same time, rescue crews continued searching for people still believed trapped throughout the vast region assaulted by Katrina more than a week ago - and for people who chose to stay.

"To our surprise, there are still thousands of people - thousands of people - inside this city who we are trying to identify and relocate," said Warren Riley, deputy chief of New Orleans' police force. "There is absolutely no reason for them to stay. No jobs, no food. ...

"We advise people that this city has been destroyed."

Though there were some exceptions, the large-scale rescues of the weekend seemed nearly over, signifying a shift from finding the living to preparing to recover the dead.

Crews aboard U.S. Navy search-and-rescue helicopters spent much of the morning searching in vain, buzzing the rooftops, floating just above putrid, fuel-stained olive-black waters.

Car and truck roofs remained submerged, and holes in rooftops attested to previously successful rescues.

"You see some of the roofs without holes right next to the ones that have them," said Ren Owens, 26, a Naval rescue officer. "It kind of makes you wonder what's in there or who's in there."

Throughout the day, squads of National Guard troops probed sections of the city, searching for holdouts or the trapped, producing war-like scenes that seemed almost cinematic.

In the city's Garden District, troops formed lines along either side of the oak-lined streets and conducted reconnaissance missions. They found 56 people in a parking garage a few buildings away from their newly commandeered headquarters on St. Charles Avenue.

They picked up 85 more at the intersection of Napoleon and St. Charles avenues, where rescue boats dropped off people plucked from flooded houses.

The order for forced removals hadn't yet come, said Maj. David Parker of the Oklahoma National Guard, but if it does, he's prepared. "We'll use sheer force," he said, "or coercion of some type."

DOJ_NMG_0002979

Elsewhere, at a spot not yet reached by the patrols, a helicopter fluttered overhead and a woman yelled at it. "Please come down," Jarnette Williams said, waving her arms frantically. "We want to leave."

Riley said at least 400 of his 1,600 officers were unaccounted for, but 4,000 soldiers, National Guard troops and police officers from other cities and states augmented his demoralized police force. He said they were bringing order to a city that had descended into anarchy.

Nagin, the New Orleans mayor, said Sunday night that all uniformed New Orleans officers would be pulled off the streets and sent for evaluation and counseling, but Riley offered no such indication Monday.

"We feel the city is very secure," Riley said, though he reminded everyone of the magnitude of the challenge and the scale of the work that remained. "This was probably the greatest catastrophe in an American city."

Asked for his estimate of the death toll, Nagin told NBC's "Today" program: "It wouldn't be unreasonable to have 10,000" dead.

During his visit, Bush stopped in Baton Rouge, a city largely untouched by Katrina but now nearly overwhelmed with evacuees. Its population mushroomed from 225,000 to 325,000 within a week, city officials said, and soon could reach 450,000.

Although the federal effort has been widely criticized as slow, insufficient and uncoordinated, Bush was upbeat.

"All levels of the government are doing the best they can," he said during a stop at a shelter at the Bethany World Prayer Center in Baton Rouge. "So long as any life is in danger, we've got work to do.

"Where it's not going right," he said "we're going to make it right."

Stung by accusations of racism, given that most of the victims are black and poor, he met with several African-American ministers, but many people remained unconvinced.

"How else can you explain it?" said Ronald Walters, a political science professor and director of the African American Leadership Institute at the University of Maryland. "Look at how the president responded to hurricanes that took place on the other side of Florida in predominantly white populations. ...

"White life has always been more valuable than black life," Walters charged. "That explains it for people."

Bush hasn't responded directly to the allegations.

In Small Town, Huge Morgue Takes Shape (NYT)

By Peter Applebome

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

SAINT GABRIEL, La., Sept. 5 - After the wind, after the flood, after countless bodies are fished from muddy bayous or lifted off street corners or carried down from roofs or attics, the road ends here.

At a warehouse next to the modest city hall in this ragged town just past where the sprawl of Baton Rouge gives way to farmland, refrigerated trucks on Sunday began the task of bringing what is expected to be thousands of bodies to the temporary mortuary set up to process victims of Hurricane Katrina.

All day long on Monday, trucks bearing equipment and supplies and sometimes victims clattered down the narrow street just over the railroad tracks to what is called the Disaster Portable Mortuary Unit. There a staff of 100 workers - morticians, forensic pathologists, anthropologists, medical examiners, coroners, fingerprint technicians, radiologists, dental technicians and others - will identify bodies and prepare them for burial.

No one knows how long it will take or how many bodies to expect.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin of New Orleans warned on the NBC program "Today" that "it wouldn't be unreasonable to have 10,000" dead in the city.

Capt. Marlon Defillo, spokesman for the New Orleans police, said city officials did not expect to have even a rough estimate of the number of dead until the end of this week.

"It's not going to be low," Captain Defillo said.

So far only 23 bodies have been brought to the mortuary, and the official death toll for Louisiana stands at 71. Officials said the low count was due mostly to the arduous recovery process and the desire for accuracy. But some also said there was no way to make any kind of reliable projection, so the estimate of 10,000 deaths could turn out to be way off base.

Whatever the number, nearly all bodies will come here, where officials say they are committed to what seems an almost impossibly contradictory mission - handling with dispatch the victims in a death toll that could rival that of any natural disaster in American history and treating each body with the knowledge that it was someone's father, someone's mother, someone's child.

"Our goal is to do everything we can under the circumstances to treat each body with as much dignity and respect as we possibly can," said Bob Johannessen, a spokesman for the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals, which is managing the mortuary operation with the Disaster Mortuary Operational Response Team of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. "We're trying to treat them all as individuals."

DOJ_NMG_0002980

Mobile units in New Orleans began collecting bodies from streets and flooded areas on Monday and going house to house in some neighborhoods to look for the dead. Until now, bodies had been left to rot in the streets while rescuers focused on searching for survivors.

Some corpses were tied to road signs and electricity poles so they would not float away, but many have decomposed beyond recognition.

Mr. Johannessen said bodies would first be taken to collection sites where preliminary information would be gathered to help identify them, including where they were found and any documentation or personal effects found with them.

They will then be put in body bags, loaded onto refrigerated trucks and sent to this town of 5,300 just south of Baton Rouge, home to two prisons and the only long-term treatment facility for Hansen's disease, or leprosy, in the continental United States.

The mortuary facility is about the size of football field and had been used by businesses to store merchandise. It can process about 140 bodies a day and is set up to accommodate 1,000 bodies, but it can be upgraded to handle "in excess of 5,000," Mr. Johannessen said. He said he expected that the facility would be able to handle whatever need arose.

Mr. Johannessen said bodies taken to the center, many of which have been decomposing in toxic water for a week, would first be decontaminated so they can be handled safely.

Then officials will begin gathering forensic data, including dental X-rays, photographs, fingerprints and DNA samples, in an effort to identify bodies. Medical records, including information like pacemaker serial numbers or evidence of artificial hips or knees, will be compiled into a profile of each victim and stored in a database made accessible to families looking for missing people. Relatives will not be allowed to visit the bodies at the mortuary, Mr. Johannessen said.

The state is looking for burial space, and victims not immediately identified will be buried there. Officials said families could later move bodies to family plots.

Local residents, who were not told about the facility in advance, had mixed reactions to its presence. Chief Keith Ambeau of the police department acknowledged that some residents had expressed fears about health, odors and the stigma of a giant mortuary operating, perhaps for months, next to a residential area.

"It's human nature to have some concerns about bringing in dead bodies," Chief Ambeau said. "People are going to worry about disease, contamination. But I've been saying all morning, my office is right here. I'm not going to put myself in danger. I think for the most part people are compassionate here. Their hearts go out to those people. New Orleans is only 75 miles away. Those are our brothers, our sisters, our loved ones."

But at a house just a few hundred yards from the mortuary, three residents shuddered at the thought, with one woman expressing concerns about safety and property values.

And echoing the issues of class and race brought up by the tragedy, she asked why it was put in her neighborhood, its residents largely, but not entirely, black and lower income. The per capita income in the town is $8,952, compared with $16,912 for the state and $21,587 for the nation.

"You look around this neighborhood for yourself," said the woman, who is black and did not want to be identified. "You look at what color lives here. What their economic situation is. There's plenty of empty land in Louisiana. Why put it here?"

A few houses closer to the site, Paula Chong, who has two grown children and lives with a baby granddaughter, said she would prefer the mortuary to be elsewhere but believed it would be safe.

"We just need to turn to God," Ms. Chong said. "All I ask is that they be careful and do everything in accordance with the law."

Besides, she said, in the extended family that is south Louisiana, it is a facility that she may need, too.

Counting her missing cousins, Ms. Chong said: "I've got, what, 4, 5, 9 or 10 still missing? Lots of my cousins. So why would I complain when I still have family of my own missing?"

Along Gulf, Aiding The Living And Counting The Dead (WP)

By Timothy Dwyer And Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 5 -- Federal officials opened a vast morgue to collect the dead and health officials scrambled to create a health care network to help the living, while states across the country struggled to find housing and other provisions for the more than 1 million people driven from their homes by Hurricane Katrina.

Although the storm's announced death toll was just over 200 on Monday, officials began to brace themselves and the public for a body count that could reach well into the thousands.

DOJ_NMG_0002981

Meanwhile, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers said it had closed gaps in levees damaged by the hurricane and had begun pumping water out of the city and into Lake Ponchartrain. The flood in the swamped Ninth Ward had dropped by a foot, and downtown streets were wet instead of inundated.

The vast scope of the calamity triggered by the storm was still emerging. officials estimated that more than 1 million people -- many of whom fled with only the clothes on their back and a few prized possessions stuffed in a bag -- have been forced from their homes, most likely for many months.

Amid mounting recriminations about the slow pace of the government response to the calamity unleashed by last week's storm, President Bush visited the stricken area for the second time in four days, and his administration appointed a federal official to assume control of recovery efforts in storm-ravaged New Orleans.

Homeland Security Director Michael Chertoff tapped Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen to coordinate the government's relief efforts in the city. Allen will report to beleaguered FEMA Director Michael D. Brown, who will keep responsibility for the rest of the Katrina-affected Gulf Coast region.

Bush also declared a state of emergency in eight states -- as far away as Utah and West Virginia -- bringing to 13 the number eligible for special federal aid as a result of the hurricane.

Federal agents, troops and law enforcement officers from around the country continued to pour into New Orleans, and police officials expressed confidence the city was mostly safe from the marauding gangs that had terrorized citizens in the storm's chaotic aftermath.

The rapidly growing scale of the effort was evident in the official statistics of federal personnel involved as of midday Monday: 38,000 National Guardsmen, 6,000 FEMA responders and 4,000 from the U.S. Coast Guard, according to the Department of Homeland Security. The USS Iwo Jima, an amphibious assault ship, pulled into New Orleans port Monday and will assist in aid efforts.

Across the state, doctors and nurses worked feverishly to cobble together a new health care network, transforming abandoned stores, basketball arenas and other spaces into hospitals to treat the hurricane's victims.

The relief effort even grew to include counterfeit clothes, 100,000 items of which were taken from U.S. Customs Service storehouses and distributed to evacuees in Houston's Astrodome. Two cruise ships anchored in Galveston, Tex., were to begin taking on evacuees as well -- as many as 2,600 each.

About 990,000 customers remained without power Monday because of Hurricane Katrina, the Energy Department said, down from 1.3 million on Sunday.

Allen's appointment in New Orleans came as the president moved to reassert his leadership in the wake of withering criticism about what many local officials and residents saw as his administration's lethargic response to the deadly storm. Bush made his second visit since Friday to the devastated region, talking to evacuees in a church-run shelter and meeting with disaster-relief officials in Louisiana before speaking to emergency personnel in Poplarville, Miss.

"I understand the damage. I understand the devastation. I understand the destruction. I understand how long it's going to take," Bush said in Mississippi. "And we're with you. That's what I want you to know."

As Bush visited the region, rescue workers continued their search for survivors. As choppers maneuvered overhead, rescuers trolled debris-strewn city streets in flat-bottom boats, going house to house, peering in windows and knocking on doors in an effort to evacuate the estimated 10,000 New Orleans residents thought to still be in the city.

Often, they found people who refuse to leave.

Keith Edwards, a rescue worker from Arkansas, tried in vain to talk an elderly woman into abandoning her home in a public housing complex not far from the Superdome. Sitting at a table in her darkened apartment, the woman refused his offer to be evacuated by airboat. "Hon, you don't know how dangerous this is?" Edwards said. ". . . the water out in your front yard will kill you."

One New Orleans police officer said the search was still focused on the living. "We're going up to buildings looking for people," said the officer, who said he was not authorized to speak on the record. "When you break the window and the smell comes back at you, you know they're dead." And they move on. "You just can't worry about the dead right now," he explained.

But other workers are. The bodies of those left dead in Katrina's wake were scheduled to start to arrive Monday in a massive warehouse outside Baton Rouge. Lifted from the fetid waters swamping this city, they will be transported in refrigerated trucks to the temporary morgue. A similar morgue has been set up in Mississippi.

As officials forged ahead with the recovery work, Bush spent the day near the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast. Some critics said the impression of a slow federal response to Katrina was only deepened by the president's visit to the region last week, during which Bush seemed tentative in his comments and was kept away from some of the most dire misery spawned by the storm.

DOJ_NMG_0002982

Some civil rights leaders have questioned whether the response to the storm was hindered by the fact that many of those most severely affected are poor and black -- a charge dismissed by federal officials. In the face of the growing denunciations, senior administration officials have fired back by blaming local officials for the inadequate response to the hurricane.

Bush seemed intent on rising above the finger-pointing during his visit, saying that "all levels of government are doing the best they can" to restore order and to address basic needs of the storm victims.

"So long as anybody's life is in danger, we've got work to do," Bush said. "That's why I want people to be assured we're going to do it."

Bush posed for pictures with children and talked with several of the 800 people staying at Bethel World Prayer Center in Baker, a few miles north of the Baton Rouge airport. Some asked the president about the growing use of the word "refugee" to describe them.

"A refugee is a prisoner of war or something," said Paulette Jolla, a New Orleans who left before the storm hit. Also in on the conversation was Terry Thompson, 42, of New Orleans, who said the president agreed to urge officials to start referring to those who escaped the storm as "displaced citizens."

"I don't know who came up with the term 'refugee' anyway," said Thompson. "He said if that term was making us feel like we were less, he didn't want to do that."

Thompson, who served in the National Guard in the Persian Gulf, said the military should have been called upon earlier to bring in helicopters to help evacuate residents and deliver food and water. "He's going over there to save the Iraqis and all that," Thompson said. "But he responded terribly to this tragedy."

Others were more charitable. "It's good that he came," said Iris Henderson, 38, who is at the shelter with her daughter and one grandchild. "People said he doesn't care but it seemed like he does. He showed that he's human. He's trying to do what he can."

Among those joining Bush on his visit to the shelter were the Rev. T.D. Jakes, who is one of the nation's best known African American religious leaders; Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D), first lady Laura Bush, Baton Rouge Mayor Melvin L. "Kip" Holden and Chertoff.

As Bush visited the region, some residents of Jefferson Parish were allowed to return briefly to their homes for the first time since they were forced to flee. A line of vehicles miles long began moving into the parish west of New Orleans at about 6 a.m.; officials planned to allow traffic in for 12 hours, though they encouraged residents to inspect their property, pick up personal items and leave.

Mississippi officials said the situation in the state was improving -- slowly. The availability of fuel continued to be "a significant problem" in some areas, said Gov. Haley Barbour (R), but, overall, he said, things were getting better.

Many Of The Dead Never To Be Identified (AP)

By Tim Dahlberg, Associated Press Writer

The AP, September 5, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — They died on flooded city streets in the Big Easy and in country homes in Mississippi. One survived seven months of combat in Iraq only to die near his boyhood home. An 80-year-old woman died sitting in a bedroom chair when a tree crashed through the roof. One man was killed when he went out to his car to charge his cell phone during the storm.

A woman known only as "Vera" was struck by a car after the hurricane hit, according to her husband.

Most of the dead from Hurricane Katrina don't have names yet. Many will never be identified because their bodies decomposed in the floodwaters and heat before they were found.

For some, a few details are emerging from relatives who want them remembered:

_ Jewelry shop owner David "Kip" Logan, 49, liked to play golf and hunt and attended a Baptist church. His last act was to tell his wife to run as a tree cracked and fell on the porch of his Laurel, Miss., home, collapsing an awning on top of him.

Deborah Logan suffered two broken vertebrae and broken fingers, but stayed with her husband as neighbors pulled him from the wreckage, dug a damaged car out of the debris and drove him to the hospital.

"I held his head in my hands the whole way," Deborah Logan said.

_ For some reason, 43-year-old Vicky Thaggard wrote a letter to her preacher four months ago describing how she wanted her funeral carried out. She died when a tree fell on her car in Leake County, Miss.

"Different people think you know before you die," said Kay Cain, her niece. "I don't know. ... Why else would she leave a letter like that?"

_ Whenever Merry Thompson went out for a drive, she was accompanied by a 3 1/2-foot-tall stuffed toy, Sylvester the cat. It was a tribute to her late father, who was named Sylvester, and it was guaranteed to draw stares from drivers around Eagle Lake, Miss.

DOJ_NMG_0002983

The 43-year-old died when a tree fell on her mobile home.

"She's crazy — not looney bin crazy — but she just had a lot of personality," her son, Nick Thompson, said. "She's very outgoing and warm."

_ Josh E. Russell had spent a tour in Iraq, then switched to the National Guard from the Marine Corps so he could spend more time at home. The 27-year-old was killed when the Humvee he was riding in hit debris on a highway in Pearl River County, Miss.

Russell was nervous about being called into action, sent into the teeth of the hurricane, said his widow, Jamie Russell.

"He didn't want to go, because he knew it was going to be a bad storm. But he went, because that was his duty," she said.

These are just a few of the dead whose names are known and whose stories are being told. But there are sure to be thousands more in months ahead.

Many, like the man whose body was on a wooden cart on New Orleans' Rampart Street near downtown may simply be buried in anonymous pauper's graves. The elderly man was wrapped in a child's bedsheet decorated with the cartoon characters Batman, Robin and the Riddler. He had one shoe on, one off.

Identifying the dead will be a daunting task, made even more desperate because many will likely be bloated and decomposed by the time they're taken away. FEMA officials said they would try to locate dental records, but urged family members to bring in photos, fingerprints or even a toothbrush or provide DNA samples.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff warned the nation to prepare for the worst as bodies believed to be in houses and in floodwaters are recovered.

"It is going to be about as ugly of a scene as I think you can imagine," Chertoff said.

Slowly, though, some faces are being matched with the dead, mostly by family members.

For days, mystery shrouded the body of "Vera" as closely as the sheet that eventually cloaked her body. She stayed there in the Garden District, at the corner of Jackson and Magazine, with a spraypainted tribute on the sheet over her: "Here lies Vera. God help us."

Vera turned out to be 66-year-old Elvira Smith, who lived with her common-law husband, C.N. Keene, about five blocks from where she was killed. Sitting shirtless and with a growth of beard on the front porch of his modest duplex, Keene said he last saw his wife Monday after the hurricane struck.

Keene said she was on her way to Jewel's grocery when someone driving in the frantic aftermath of the hurricane struck her just a few feet from the store entrance and sped away. The next day, Keene said he walked over and put a bedspread over her body but he didn't want to return to it.

On Saturday, Keene was sitting on his porch when a man came up to him with some news.

"Some guy I didn't even know named John came by and said, 'I've just buried Elvira in the park,'" Keene said. Her body remained in the same spot, but a short wall of bricks had been built around her, anchoring the tarp.

"I told him I appreciated it," Keene said.

Bacterial Disease Afflicts Some Evacuees (LAT)

By Scott Gold

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Authorities said Monday that some of Hurricane Katrina's evacuees have contracted a bacterial disease that is considered a more benign cousin of cholera, but is potentially fatal in people whose immune systems have been compromised.

Officials at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta said the bacterium, vibrio vulnificus, may have been picked up by people with open wounds who were forced to wade through polluted floodwaters for a long time.

Von Roebuck, a CDC spokesman, said officials have detected the disease among some storm evacuees and stragglers but have not been able to determine how many cases there are. It does not appear that anyone has died, Roebuck said.

Since flooding began, authorities have predicted that New Orleans could be stricken with a host of diseases, particularly as unretrieved bodies remained in the water. This appears to be the first confirmation of illness caused by the storm and the flood.

New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin said Monday that the possibility of epidemics is a critical concern.

"The water quality in the streets continues to deteriorate," he said. "There is some really nasty looking stuff out there. I worry about it every day. The more time that passes, there are more dead bodies left floating, and more mosquitoes breeding and hatching. They bite people who are dead."

Nagin said he is also concerned about a wide outbreak of the potentially fatal West Nile virus. For two days, he has called upon the federal government to provide crop dusters that can coat the city with chemicals to kill mosquitoes breeding in the floodwaters. That had not occurred by Monday evening.

DOJ_NMG_0002984

He said he is also concerned about airborne toxic hazards and natural gas in the area.

Those health threats are why every resident must leave the city for now — even those living on dry land, he said, adding that they "will be able to come back."

Vibrio vulnificus belongs to the same family as cholera — and those stricken with the bacterium were only discovered, officials said, because tests were done amid false reports that cholera had been discovered among evacuees.

Among healthy people, vibrio vulnificus causes vomiting, diarrhea and abdominal pain but is generally not life-threatening. It can be readily cured with antibiotics such as doxycycline or cephalosporins, with no long-term effects.

It is substantially more serious in people with chronic liver disease or people who have compromised immune systems, such as those taking transplant drugs. In those cases, the bacterium escapes into the bloodstream, where it causes fever and chills, septic shock — characterized by sharply decreased blood pressure — and blistering skin lesions.

About half of those who contract bloodstream infections die, according to the CDC.

There is no evidence that the bacterium spreads from human to human.

The bacterium can also cause skin infections if people have open wounds, which can lead to skin breakdown and ulceration.

About 45 hospitalizations and 16 deaths are reported each year in the Gulf Coast states, but many experts believe the actual number of cases is far higher. Most cases occur between May and October, when the ocean is warmer.

In New Orleans' 9th Ward, O'Neil Broyard, 67, said Monday that he is not concerned about the threat of disease, although several feet of increasingly fetid water stands just behind his business, the Saturn Bar.

Broyard has been mucking around in the water for days. During the height of the flooding, 2 feet of water was in the bar and he spent three days cleaning it out. He said he took precautions every time he slogged through the water.

"I washed up good," he said. "I got that antibacterial soap and I just put it on my feet."

Like thousands of others left in town, Broyard rejected the mayor's call to evacuate. Instead, he said he was intent on guarding his bar, a small, strange gem in the east of the city that has acquired a cult following over the years for its collection of surreal, comic paintings by a local artist and its earthy, no-nonsense management.

Hurricane Refugees Reach Safety Carrying Many Health Problems (WSJ)

By Betsy McKay, Marilyn Chase and Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

Hurricane victims moving out of the floodwaters of New Orleans and elsewhere are arriving at shelters and medical facilities with troubling health problems, including infectious diseases caused by exposure to contaminated water.

Doctors are seeing many patients with infected wounds and gastrointestinal illnesses, and worry that more are coming in the days ahead. A reported outbreak of gastrointestinal illness sickened a large number of people at a Mississippi shelter. Doctors also are treating a wave of patients with broken bones, dehydration and chronic illnesses such as diabetes and heart disease that were destabilized during the past week.

To prevent disease outbreaks, the federal Health and Human Services Department shipped 90,000 doses of tetanus vaccine, 22,000 doses of Hepatitis A vaccine and 36,000 doses of Hepatitis B vaccine over the weekend to states and health facilities, said HHS spokeswoman Christina Pearson. The department also has provided antibiotics as well as medications for chronic illnesses such as heart disease, diabetes and anxiety. Overall, the government said it has deployed 100 tons of medications and other supplies for victims of the hurricane.

A temporary government medical facility set up last week in Baton Rouge, La., is filling more than 1,400 prescriptions a day, said Ms. Pearson. The facility has seen about 3,500 patients since Tuesday, and an average of about 100 of its 250 beds have been filled.

At a huge Red Cross shelter at the River Center complex in Baton Rouge, volunteer physician Chris Montgomery says he and other doctors have treated several evacuees with skin infections from contaminated water, as well as lacerations and a few cases of diarrhea.

"We're very worried about easily spreadable skin infections," says Dr. Montgomery, a family physician from Poplar Bluff, Ark. He is particularly concerned about serious infections such as an overgrowth of bacteria in the colon that is common in nursing homes and hospitals. The shelter's approximately 6,000 residents include some elderly and infirm patients. The makeshift clinic also is providing continuing medical care to many shelter residents with diabetes and heart and lung problems.

To minimize infections, the Red Cross staff are requiring all shelter residents and visitors to clean their hands with hand sanitizer at the entrance. Dr. Montgomery says he also is coating the inner rim of his nose with antibiotic ointment, to ward off bacteria that he may contract from patients' coughs. He says he also is concerned about viral gastrointestinal diseases, although there have been very few cases yet, and no cases of dysentery. Flu is another concern for him -- the season will start in a month or two.

DOJ_NMG_0002985

Joseph Guarisco, chief of the emergency department at Ochsner Clinic Foundation in New Orleans, said he saw several cases of gastroenteritis with nausea, vomiting and fever on Friday due to contaminated water or food. A spokeswoman later added that the emergency room over the weekend mostly treated broken bones, including in people brought in by search-and-rescue teams, and dehydration and exhaustion of the elderly. The hospital was seeking to restore the full range of services; it performed a heart catheterization Sunday and was planning lung surgery and a heart bypass.

Dr. Joseph Dalovisio, head of the department of infectious diseases at Ochsner, said he is concerned mostly about tetanus infections and gastrointestinal illnesses related to contaminated food and water, rather than exotic illnesses such as cholera. Noting there were dozens of cases of the mosquito-borne West Nile virus before the storm, he says he is "worried about mosquitoes now that people are out of their houses."

Edward Hill, president of the American Medical Association, said scores of Katrina-affected patients are being brought to the Good Samaritan Clinic, an outpatient center where he works in Tupelo, Miss., about 150 miles north of the most severely hit parts of the state.

"The predominant problem is the lack of medication for hypertension, diabetes and people suffering from heart problems," said Dr. Hill. Physicians in Tupelo have donated drugs, including samples provided to them by drug companies. Pharmacists on site are helping to match patients with available drugs.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt ventured to several affected areas to meet with local health and political leaders. He also signed an order on Sunday that officially declared a public-health emergency in Texas, which will allow Medicaid recipients arriving from other states to continue to get coverage from the health-insurance program for the poor.

Improvising To Replace Services For Many Thousands (WP)

By Ceci Connolly

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 5 -- Legions of doctors and nurses are frantically patching together a new medical care network to handle the swelling flow of Hurricane Katrina's victims. The extraordinary process includes the task of converting basketball arenas, an abandoned Kmart and even the New Orleans airport into working hospitals and clinics.

The storm -- and more significantly the flooding, lack of food and exposure to the baking sun that doctors say left victims to "rot alive" -- have presented medical workers with an overwhelming challenge. Overnight, New Orleans and surrounding communities lost 6,000 hospital beds.

The health care demands of this disaster far outstrip those of previous ones. In seven endless days and nights, doctors have delivered babies, revived failed hearts, hooked up diabetics to dialysis, bandaged snakebites and distributed thousands of medications, including many antibiotics for cases of gangrene and other infections caused by the lethal pairing of open wounds and putrid water.

"This is the worst disaster I've ever seen in my life," said Robbie Prepas, a midwife from San Diego who arrived a week ago with a federal Disaster Medical Assistance Team, or DMAT. "And I have been to disasters in Afghanistan, Asia, Africa, Guam after the typhoon."

With an influx of patients who are predominantly poor and in poor health, the emergency medical challenges are compounded by longer-term issues of managing chronic conditions such as high blood pressure, heart disease, diabetes and mental illness. At the same time, officials say they remain on the alert for outbreaks associated with flooding, such as typhoid and cholera, as well as increasing numbers of asthma attacks, fevers, rashes and suicide attempts.

Disaster care in New Orleans was far more difficult than in typical hurricane situations because of the flooding that not only forced downtown hospitals to evacuate but made it impossible for the Federal Emergency Management Agency to set up triage units in hospital parking lots, as it has done in the past.

Predictions about infectious disease outbreaks have yet to come true, though the flooding in New Orleans and disintegrating corpses throughout the Gulf Coast continue to make that a possibility. Hospitals here, operating at full capacity, have seen a spike in cases of pneumonia, stroke, lice, diarrhea and premature birth, said Louis Minsky, medical director of the Baton Rouge emergency response unit.

In many cases, people already weakened by underlying afflictions found the trauma of the storm, the days of heat and a hellacious evacuation through water, sewage and rotting garbage almost too much to endure.

"These are mostly elderly people with chronic diseases who were herded into the convention center with no medications, scared out of their minds," said Lt. Col. Constance McNabb, commander of a Texas Air National Guard unit overseeing medical evacuations in New Orleans. "I don't know how they survived."

DOJ_NMG_0002986

More than 5,000 medical workers have been dispatched by the Bush administration to supplement hundreds of state, local and private health care workers. Already, the federal government has flown in 100 tons of medical supplies, including 90,000 doses of tetanus vaccine, portable oxygen tanks, gloves, sutures and antibiotics.

"Every DMAT team in this country is deployed," said FEMA spokesman Marty Bahamonde. A dozen of the 35-person teams have been treating victims in tents at Louis Armstrong International Airport, just outside New Orleans. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention dispatched 140 people, while the Department of Health and Human Services has more than 700 people on the ground.

The unprecedented effort to provide care to tens of thousands of people has required millions of dollars, improvised medical techniques and, in at least one case, theft by a physician who persuaded local police to help him snatch medications from a pharmacy. For one full week now, doctors have worked in MASH-style surroundings, leaning over patients on flimsy military cots, flipping through textbooks to make sense of symptoms they have never seen before.

"I'm a pathologist," said Greg Henderson, a physician who moved to the New Orleans area two weeks ago. Roaming the streets of downtown in his surgical scrubs, Henderson was suddenly confronting rashes and illnesses he hadn't seen since medical school. Armed with a Physicians' Desk Reference -- the pharmaceutical bible -- and the stolen medicines, he administered to the sick and dying in a hotel lobby and the corridors of the city's convention center.

Thousands -- including infants, elderly and patients with existing health problems -- literally sat in the sun for days, with no food, water or medicine. "They basically start to rot alive," Henderson said as he led one group of ill people to McNabb's military helicopters.

Many landed on the track field of Louisiana State University here, where they were whisked into the arena named after basketball legend "Pistol Pete" Maravich. In the arena and an adjacent field house, volunteers from Illinois, New Mexico and the federal Public Health Service Commissioned Corps staffed an 800-bed hospital, making the gymnasium the largest acute care facility in the state.

"You have built a city where there was none before," Surgeon General Richard H. Carmona said after touring the improvised hospital Sunday.

With military precision, patients were designated red for most severe, yellow for serious and green for walking wounded. By Monday afternoon, 3,500 patients had passed through the arena and more than 1,400 prescriptions had been filled, said Capt. Charles McGarvey. "One night we had 800 individuals assessed by Public Health Service officers on buses," he said.

"People who were healthy enough to get up and walk out did," said James Gregory, who came to LSU with the Illinois Medical Emergency Response Team. The bulk of his patients have been diabetics, heart patients, the obese, and elderly with a full range of maladies who have no money, no home, no medications, no medical records and no doctor.

As recovery teams shifted Monday from rescuing people to retrieving the dead, health leaders here struggled to conceive of how they will provide care over the long term for hundreds of thousands of new residents.

It appears Baton Rouge has the hospital beds to serve the expected 400,000 people, said Minsky, the emergency medical director. But that amount of population growth will require as many as 2,000 more nurses and about 200 physicians, he said.

At the one-week mark, the latest challenge is treating some of the most severe cases, Minsky said. The most recent arrivals, he said, "are fatigued, been under extreme duress, prolonged exposure to the elements and inappropriate nutrition."

Rescues Taper Off; Recovery Ahead (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson And Matt Kelley

USA Today, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — The surge of rescues of hurricane victims slowed to a trickle Monday as emergency workers steeled themselves for the shift from joyful rescues of those who survived to the grim task of recovering the bodies of those who didn't.

One Army medical evacuation unit saw their rescues ebb from 200 Thursday to one Monday: Alfred Davis, 67, plucked from the roof of a grocery store near the Superdome.

“We have gotten thousands of people out of there,” said Maj. Patrick Bossetta, who has been directing the rescue effort for the Louisiana National Guard. “But search-and-rescue is coming to an end. What we likely have left are people who have expired. We have a gruesome task ahead. … We could be stacking bodies like wood.”

The rescuers who saved thousands in the week after Hurricane Katrina knew they couldn't find and save everyone. In areas where hundreds of people were plucked to safety a few days ago, there is an eerie stillness punctuated by the rhythmic thud from a fleet of rescue helicopters.

The crew of a Navy MH-60 Knighthawk helicopter anticipated this stage last week when the rescuers saved three elderly people trapped in a boarded-up and flooded New Orleans home.

DOJ_NMG_0002987

Petty Officer Royce Burroughs said the only reason his crewmates found the flood victims was a tip from neighbors rescued from their nearby roof.

Petty Officer Nicholas Kontodiakos, a rescue swimmer, waded through the fetid floodwaters to the home and ripped off some of the boards to find bars over the windows. Finally, an elderly woman's face appeared at a window, and she let rescuers in.

The woman and her husband were huddled in the flooded one-story home's attic. Another elderly man, too sick to move, was in a back bedroom. Kontodiakos found him lying naked on a bed amid the floodwaters.

Burroughs came down from the helicopter and helped Kontodiakos get the man into a basket that was winched up to their helicopter.

These three people weren't on their roof; they were too scared, too frail, to climb onto their roof to signal for help. Kontodiakos winced when he thought of how many others like them there are in the flooded city.

“I can't fathom how many old people there are just floating around in their homes,” he said.

Burroughs and Kontodiakos were among the dozens of rescuers faced with wrenching choices: Whom to take and whom to leave behind?

Their helicopter could hold only about a dozen survivors at a time. “There are so many people, and you can't get them all,” said Burroughs, who operated the helicopter's winch to lower rescuers on a cable and pull survivors to safety. “We know there are dead people because you can't get everyone.”

Kontodiakos and Burroughs worked out their own priority list.

“The people I want to grab first are the people who would have the least chance of living: the babies and their mothers, the elderly, the handicapped,” Kontodiakos said.

The helicopter crew, based in Norfolk, Va., flew search-and-rescue missions starting Wednesday. The team was based on the amphibious assault ship USS Bataan stationed in the Gulf of Mexico, 50-100 miles from New Orleans. The rescuers flew for 12 hours a day or more, calling off efforts in darkness because of the danger of crashing into unlighted buildings.

The crewmembers, flying on one of two Knighthawks from the Bataan, estimated they saved hundreds of people.

“This is why I joined the military. This is what I joined the Navy to do: Save people's lives,” Kontodiakos said.

The crew of another helicopter flying from the Bataan, this one a massive MH-53E Super Stallion, had similar priorities.

Before leaving the ship Saturday morning, pilot Lt. Greg Hill and his crew chief, Petty Officer Cory Appling, agreed to urge authorities on the ground to let them take the sick and elderly first on their helicopter, one of three sent to the Bataan from a unit based in Corpus Christi, Texas.

Their mission: Airlift people from the convention center, where thousands were stranded for days without food, water, electricity or security, to Louis Armstrong New Orleans International Airport for medical treatment or a flight out of their devastated hometown.

Convention center survivor Bobbi Smith called the rescue flights a blessing. “It's been a total disaster,” Smith said as she waited to board a Super Stallion. “No lights, no food, no respect.”

A convention center parking lot had been transformed for the day into a busy heliport. Military troops divided the survivors into two lines. One was for the disabled, ill, elderly and young; the other for the able-bodied. Most of Hill's passengers came from that first line.

Most were elderly, disabled or both, sagging in the unforgiving sun. Relatives or volunteers pushed those who couldn't walk in wheelchairs or nearly anything else with wheels.

The healthier survivors carried all they had, often clutching their belongings to themselves as if their lives, or their sanity, depended on it.

“We're saving the world, one exhausted hurricane survivor at a time,” Hill said during his helicopter crew's brief break for lunch and refueling.

At the airport, medical workers and those they treated faced their own crises.

On Friday, survivors nearly rioted, said Senior Airman Chris Chadwick of the Air Force's 88th Medical Group. One patient stabbed a nurse, and medical workers confiscated knives and other weapons from other patients, he said.

“We were scared for our lives,” Chadwick said Saturday.

“My husband dropped dead, and I had to leave him behind,” said Barbara Pratt, 73, as she waited for a flight out of the New Orleans airport Saturday.

Their home flooded in chest-high water, Pratt and her 75-year-old husband got a boat ride to an elevated section of Interstate 10, where they began walking toward the convention center.

“That's where he died,” Pratt said. She didn't know what killed him.

DOJ_NMG_0002988

An Air National Guard crew stopped to help. “I said I wouldn't leave his body,” Pratt said. “They said to leave his ID on him and leave him. They could only save the living.”

Clutching her only possessions — a brown leather purse, two bottles of water and a roll of toilet paper — Pratt asked passersby at the airport how to direct authorities to recover her husband's body.

No one could answer her question.

Troops Back From Iraq Find Another War Zone (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 5 -- Spec. Frank Atkinson, wearing his tan desert fatigues from his recent deployment in Iraq, alternately drove a Humvee through downtown New Orleans streets littered with debris and putrid garbage and held suspected looters at gunpoint with his M-4 rifle.

"It's just so much like Iraq, it's not funny," said Atkinson, of Woodlawn, Ark., "except for all the water, and they speak English."

For a year ending this spring, Atkinson's infantry company of the Arkansas National Guard patrolled Baghdad's deadly Haifa Street, and scores of its members were awarded Purple Heart medals after fighting insurgents. Those war-zone images and instincts came flooding back Friday when Atkinson and 300 other Arkansas guardsmen, wearing helmets and full body armor, rolled into the chaos of central New Orleans.

"It's like Baghdad on a bad day," said Spec. Brian McKay, 19, of Mount Ida, Ark.

The Arkansas contingent is among the estimated 16,000 National Guard troops from 40 states flowing into greater New Orleans to help curb the rash of crime sparked by Hurricane Katrina. An additional 24,000 guardsman and 7,200 active-duty ground troops are committed to relief efforts across the Gulf Coast. Paratroops from the 82nd Airborne Division "locked down" the historic French Quarter on Monday, according to city and military officials.

But the massive military effort remains severely disjointed and hampered by a lack of basic communication between units, Army officers here say. Ground commanders for New Orleans have been functioning without the ability to track the location of some units reporting to them -- something unheard of in Iraq, the officers say.

Much work remains for U.S. soldiers in this gutted no man's land, where looting, drive-by shootings and other crime are rampant. Much as in Iraqi cities, the troops are moving by the hundreds into makeshift bases in schools and other public buildings, setting up checkpoints and 24-hour patrols. The guardsmen have been authorized to seize weapons and detain people.

"We're having some pretty intense gun battles breaking out around the city," said Capt. Jeff Winn of the New Orleans police SWAT team. "Armed gangs of from eight to 15 young men are riding around in pickup trucks, looting and raping," he said. Residents fearful of looters often shout to passing Humvees to alert the soldiers to crimes in progress.

"Hey, stop!" a man wearing a baseball cap yelled to an Arkansas Guard team Sunday afternoon as it drove through the city's Metairie district in Jefferson Parish. "Those people don't live here!" he said, pointing to a white sports car parked outside a large brick home.

Atkinson sped over to the car, hopped out and pointed at it with his M-4 rifle. He and Capt. Derald Neugebauer, 36, of Vilonia, Ark., questioned the two men about looting -- but because they had no radio communication with the New Orleans police, they had to flag down a passing patrol car to hand over the two men.

About an hour later, as dusk fell, Atkinson and Neugebauer were driving down Jefferson Street when the owner of a mini-storage business yelled at them from behind his fence. "Hey, get back here! Those guys just broke into that store!" Across the street, the guardsmen saw two men in their twenties outside a car stereo store with the front window broken in.

Atkinson again swung the Humvee around, and within minutes, the guardsmen had two of the four suspects facedown on the Jefferson Street median. The guardsmen then waved down a passing sheriff's vehicle.

"When I charged a round in the chamber, he got down real fast," Atkinson said later of a suspect.

The guardsmen voiced little hesitation at using deadly force -- a skill honed in Iraq -- on the streets of New Orleans. "If we're out on the streets, we'll fight back and shoot until we kill them. That's too bad but that's what has got to happen," said Spec. Jake Perry, 20, of Camden, Ark. "I didn't spend a year in Iraq to come to Louisiana and get killed."

Indeed, just the smell and feel of a war zone in the city put the soldiers on edge.

"The worst feeling was putting that body armor on," said Spec. Richard Dunlop, 36, also of Camden, who with his comrades has vivid memories of the dozens of Arkansas soldiers who perished in Iraq. "I find myself checking the rooftops. I worry about stepping on something in case it is an IED," he said, referring to an improvised explosive device or roadside bomb.

"I was waiting on a gunfight," he said. "It's weird."

DOJ_NMG_0002989

Many of the guardsmen were shocked and angered by the violence and looting. One described 70-year-old women in new Nike high-tops, and stores along the riverfront that looked bombed out.

"The fear in the eyes of the people, the uncertainty . . . people shooting and killing over little bitty things . . . it surprised me. I didn't think it would be that bad in my own country," said McKay, a history student at the University of Arkansas.

But the soldiers said they were gratified to be able to evacuate so many needy -- from elderly residents in wheelchairs, lifted into the backs of U-Haul trucks, to drug addicts jittery from withdrawal.

Meanwhile, conditions for the troops were no better than for New Orleans residents. They slept outdoors on concrete loading docks, living on bottled water and packaged military meals that many flood victims wouldn't eat. They had virtually no power, and initially no portable toilets.

While some Arkansas guardsmen said they had volunteered for hurricane duty, many felt wearied by the back-to-back deployments. "I'm still stressed out. I'm still having nightmares over Iraq -- give me a break!" said guardsman Dominic Nettles.

Sitting in a warm breeze on the riverfront on a recent night, as fish leapt out of the Mississippi and a fire blazed out of the blackness on a distant shore, Nettles and his buddies smoked cigarettes and traded war stories that transported them back to the banks of the Tigris.

"When I came down here, it was just like I was in Iraq. It was unreal," said Spec. Keithean Heath, 20, of Crossett, Ark., shirtless in the heat. "This doesn't happen in your own back yard."

La. Guard Pilot Has Trouble Taking In Scope Of Destruction (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, September 6, 2005

BATON ROUGE — Maj. Patrick Bossetta has been to Iraq and back, but the helicopter pilot with the Louisiana National Guard still has difficulty believing that the devastation spread below him on countless rescue missions is his beloved New Orleans.

“Sometimes, I feel like an actor in a sci-fi movie,” Bossetta said Monday.

Last week, Bossetta said, a National Guard colleague began hacking into a roof after spotting a white cloth waving from a small attic vent. “When the hole was cut,” Bossetta said, “nine people popped out.”

Days later, Bossetta's voice still reflects disbelief. But the enormous tragedy strikes every time a rope is lowered to another dazed survivor or another body is tagged for pickup.

It was particularly difficult when one of Bossetta's recent rescues took him near the battered St. Christopher Hotel. When he is not directing air missions for the Guard, Bossetta owns and operates the high-rise near the city's French Quarter.

For Bossetta, 45, who returned from Iraq in March, the assignment has become a personal effort to salvage a way of life.

In addition to personal losses, his National Guard unit's problems are substantial. The unit lost its headquarters at Lakefront Airport and millions of dollars in equipment to the storm. Other equipment has not returned from the troops' deployment in Iraq.

For now, Bossetta and his 17 helicopters are operating from Baton Rouge Metropolitan Airport.

“We've lost a lot,” Bossetta said. “Have you seen the Superdome? If I would say there was a hell on Earth, that would be it. That was the same place where I watched Super Bowls and college football championship games. It's stunning.”

With Some Now At The Breaking Point, Officers Tell Of Pain And Pressure (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster And John Desantis

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 5 - Sgt. Jeff Sandoz, dressed in black SWAT team fatigues with an assault shotgun nearby, took a break on Monday afternoon for a cheeseburger, his first hot meal in a week, in the breezeway at the shuttered Harrah's casino on the edge of the French Quarter.

Rescuing people from rooftops and attics and chasing looters since Hurricane Katrina flooded the city, the discomforts have piled up, Sergeant Sandoz acknowledged. His shoulder was bruised on Wednesday when his police cruiser was rammed by someone running a stop sign on one of New Orleans's nearly deserted streets. He has been catching about three hours of sleep a night, curled up in the back seat of his patrol car, and showering with a garden hose.

He did not want to talk about the blisters or funguses and rashes that have erupted - after days of wading in polluted water in wet boots and dirty socks - on the feet of most everyone in the eight-man tactical unit he commands.

The last week has been a series of nonstop rescue missions, shootouts in the night and forays into foul-smelling shelters in response to gunshots and reports of rape for Sergeant Sandoz and the others on the New Orleans police force. And like most everyone else in New Orleans, police officers have been traumatized by the loss of homes and family members.

DOJ_NMG_0002990

Morale on the police force is in tatters. About 500 officers - a third of the force and far more than previously estimated - have dropped out of the daily lineup. Some of them may still be in houses cut off by the storm or may have simply gone off to help their families and will eventually return. But most of the missing officers have either told their superiors that they were quitting or simply walked off the job. Two officers have shot themselves to death.

Sergeant Sandoz and his urban commandos, one of the city's toughest, most elite units, have absorbed much of the violence in stride. Unlike some other officers who have succumbed to the pressure, the sergeant said he was not going anywhere except into the streets to do his job.

"You just suck it up and drive on," he said. "I'll be here as long as they need me. I'm not running away from anything."

Still, he reserved judgment, as did many others, of the officers who have abandoned the force or collapsed.

Sergeant Sandoz and his commandos have been tested by the long hours and the nagging inconveniences, like shortages of gasoline for their cars and other supplies. They expressed concerns, like many others, about the security of their jobs in a city that is taking steps to shut down for repairs. They wonder whether they will be paid for the overtime that they are logging under near-battlefield conditions.

Trying to lift spirits, the Police Department is giving every officer a five-day vacation over the next two weeks as the military steps in to replace them. Those who want to go to Las Vegas are being given plane tickets and hotel rooms for them and their families. Their breaks are beginning with physical examinations in Baton Rouge, the state capital, 75 miles north of New Orleans, inoculations against water-borne disease and other necessary medical treatment. After their breaks, the officers will start receiving psychological counseling.

Many officers said Monday that they are grateful for the breather but that they had no interest in going to Las Vegas.

"There's nothing in Las Vegas for me," said Officer Darryl Scheuermann, 41, a SWAT team member. "I'm going to see my family. I miss my wife and my dogs."

In one week, some officers have seen more violence than in a lifetime. Officer Brian French ducked sniper bullets while ferrying 50 women and children to a shelter in a commandeered rental truck.

Lt. Julie Wilson watched a fellow officer and friend being shot by looters attacking a convenience store. Lt. Billy Ceravalo and Lt. Brian Weiss lost their police station in the flooding. The floodwaters also swamped a nearby hospital. Responding to a call for help, the officers raced to the hospital and began helping patients using hand-operated breathing devices. They managed to keep several of the critically ill alive for hours until help arrived.

Some officers stayed in their homes as the hurricane swept over New Orleans and were forced to climb onto roofs with their families as floodwaters rose. Their pleas for help poured in over emergency radios.

"We were hearing officers on the roofs of their houses begging for someone to help them," Lieutenant Wilson said.

One officer, she said, "told me he was trapped in water up to his chest."

"I tried to get somebody out to him," she continued, but "we haven't heard from him since. I don't know if he is alive or dead."

Lieutenant Wilson's 11-year-old son, Daniel, was shipped off to neighbors. But for most of the week she had no idea where he was and worried that he feared for her as well. Now, the promise of a vacation in Las Vegas does not make her feel better.

"It's a really nice gesture," she said. "But I just want to be able to get one night's sleep without hearing helicopters. I don't think I need five days off from this, just a couple of nights."

Officer French, 25, a native of Ohio, joined the New Orleans Police Department because he wanted a chance to do "real police work."

Although he has heard city and state officials criticize the federal government as not coming fast enough, Officer French also questioned why local officers were not mustered sooner for special duty.

"They told us not to come in on Sunday, the day of the storm, to come in the next day to save money on their budget," he said.

But he never made it to work on Monday, at least not to the station house.

Officer French moved his family into a hotel. The hotel flooded, and looters attacked a nearby gasoline station. He went out into the storm, grabbed two of the looters and handcuffed them to a railing at the hotel. But, he eventually let them go.

As the water rose, Officer French and his family escaped to the roof with other guests. They were stuck there for two days, before some boats came along and rescued them.

Afterward, Officer French spent several days rescuing others. On some missions, he worked with Officer Willie Gaunt, who has since resigned.

The city's police superintendent, P. Edwin Compass III, hustled to position boats and cars before the hurricane and afterward directed rescues and charged after looters.

DOJ_NMG_0002991

"We had no food," Mr. Compass told reporters on Monday. "We had no water. We ran out of ammunition. We had no vehicles. We were fighting in waist-deep water."

Mr. Compass has been accused of poorly planning for the hurricane. But he and other city officials said they were simply overwhelmed by a crisis that no municipality could handle. The disaster was compounded, they said, when federal officials in Washington ignored their cries for help for several days.

On Monday afternoon at Harrah's casino, as armored cars, fuel trucks, police cars and ambulances jammed the casino's ramp and spilled into the street, Officer Russell Philibert, 38, turned to Sergeant Sandoz's unit for help. He needed a bulletproof vest. His was lost when he escaped in shorts and sneakers as water gushed into his house.

Shortly before he fled his house, he had received a radio message from another officer who lived nearby and was trapped in his attic by floodwaters in the middle of the storm. With the wind howling, Office Philibert broke a window in that officer's house and dragged him to safety.

Officer Philibert said his unit had now taken shelter in a Wal-Mart. The SWAT team has moved into an elementary school on high ground, where some officers are sleeping on cafeteria tables and kindergarteners' nap pads.

Even the urban commandos acknowledged the strain of what they had seen. "I might have trouble sleeping, thinking about all the horrific stuff," said Officer Robert Haar, 35. "But I'm so exhausted I just pass out."

Halliburton Subsidiary Taps Contract For Repairs (WP/AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor, Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 5, 2005

An Arlington-based Halliburton Co. subsidiary that has been criticized for its reconstruction work in Iraq has begun tapping a $500 million Navy contract to do emergency repairs at Gulf Coast naval and Marine facilities damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

The subsidiary, Kellogg, Brown & Root Services Inc., won the competitive bid contract last July to provide debris removal and other emergency work associated with natural disasters.

Jan Davis, a spokeswoman for the Naval Facilities Engineering Command, said yesterday that KBR would receive $12 million for work at the Naval Air Station at Pascagoula, Miss., the Naval Station at Gulfport, Miss., and Stennis Space Center in Mississippi. KBR will receive $4.6 million for work at two smaller Navy facilities in New Orleans and others in the South.

The company has provided similar work after major disasters in the United States and abroad for more than 15 years, including in Florida after Hurricane Andrew.

KBR has been at the center of scrutiny for receiving a five-year, no-bid contract to restore Iraqi oil fields shortly before the war began in 2003. Halliburton has reported being paid $10.7 billion for Iraq-related government work during 2003 and 2004. The company reported its pretax profits from that work as $163 million. Pentagon auditors have questioned tens of millions of dollars of Halliburton charges for its operations there.

Last month three congressional Democrats asked Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to investigate the demotion of a senior civilian Army official, Bunnatine H. Greenhouse, who publicly criticized the awarding of that contract.

Vice President Cheney headed Halliburton from 1995 to 2000, and Democrats have questioned whether the firm received favorable treatment because of his connection.

Rice Defends Bush Against Racism Charges (AP-Y2)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP2, September 5, 2005

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice defended President Bush on Sunday against charges that the government's sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina showed racial insensitivity.

"Nobody, especially the president, would have left people unattended on the basis of race," the administration's highest-ranking black said as she toured damaged parts of her native Alabama.

Later, during a service at the Pilgrim Rest AME Zion church outside Mobile, Rice nodded in agreement as the Rev. Malone Smith Jr. advised the congregation, "Wait for the Lord."

"There are some things the president can do; there are some things the government can do," Smith told about 300 worshippers during a rollicking two-hour service. "But God can do all things. I want you to know he's never late. He's always on time."

Rice later echoed the call for patience.

"The Lord is going to come on time — if we just wait," she said.

It was a sort of homecoming for Rice, an Alabama native and granddaughter of a Presbyterian minister.

DOJ_NMG_0002992

Her visit came as some black leaders, including the Rev. Jesse Jackson, have complained bitterly about the slow response to the disaster, whose victims have been disproportionately black and poor. They have said racial injustice was a factor in the government's slow relief effort.

"How can that be the case? Americans don't want to see Americans suffer," Rice said. "Nobody, especially the president, would have left people unattended on the basis of race."

Since Katrina struck, an estimated 70 nations, from Azerbaijan to Venezuela, have offered hundreds of millions in cash donations for the federal government to relay to the American Red Cross, Rice said. Many countries have also donated supplies, ranging from helicopters and medical aid to food and blankets.

Among the largest contributions was Kuwait's $400 million worth of petroleum product plus $100 million in cash intended for relief efforts. Among the smallest: $25,000 in cash from Sri Lanka, a poor nation still recovering from last December's tsunami.

After the church service, Rice visited a community center in Bayou La Batre, one of Alabama's hardest hit areas. Flood waters following Katrina reached 11 feet in some places in southern Alabama, while about 718,000 homes and businesses in Mobile were left without power for days, and at least two people died.

Republican Alabama Gov. Bob Riley, escorting Rice through the community, said power had been restored to all but about 50,000 residents and businesses, while up to 2,500 Alabamians were still looking for shelter.

"It was devastating, but in comparison to what they had in southern Mississippi and Louisiana, it kind of pales in comparison," Riley said.

While welcoming Rice, some Alabamians expressed frustration with the administration's response.

"It's so unfortunate that the time it's taken to rescue them is too long," Democratic state Rep. Yvonne Kennedy said at the church service. "Had the response been more timely, I think we could have saved lives. To be so slow in coming, people lose hope."

While touring domestic disasters falls outside her official domain, Rice told Bush that "if there is anything I can do outside of my responsibilities as secretary of state, I'd be happy to do that, too." She was criticized last week for attending a Broadway show and shopping in New York during an abbreviated vacation.

Rice Denies Race Had Role In Response (WT)

The Washington Times, September 5, 2005

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday said the federal response to Hurricane Katrina was not slowed by racial insensitivity.

"Nobody, especially the president, would have left people unattended on the basis of race," the administration's highest-ranking black said as she toured damaged parts of her native Alabama.

Later, during a service at the Pilgrim Rest African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church outside Mobile, Miss Rice nodded in agreement as the Rev. Malone Smith Jr. advised the congregation, "Wait for the Lord."

"There are some things the president can do; there are some things the government can do," Mr. Smith told about 300 worshippers during a rollicking two-hour service. "But God can do all things. I want you to know he's never late. He's always on time."

Miss Rice later echoed the call for patience. "The Lord is going to come on time -- if we just wait," she said.

It was a sort of homecoming for Miss Rice, an Alabama native and granddaughter of a Presbyterian minister.

Her visit came as some black leaders, including the Rev. Jesse Jackson, have complained bitterly about the slow response to the disaster, whose victims have been disproportionately black and poor. They have said racial injustice was a factor in the government's slow relief effort.

"How can that be the case? Americans don't want to see Americans suffer," Miss Rice said. "Nobody, especially the president, would have left people unattended on the basis of race."

Mr. Jackson complained that television and press coverage of the disaster was racist for calling storm survivors "refugees" and showing images of blacks looting in New Orleans.

Using "refugees" to describe the people evacuated from storm-ravaged areas "is insulting, it is racist, it does not describe American citizens," Mr. Jackson said. "If you characterize them as refugees, it is someone other than citizens."

The veteran activist accused the press of a double standard in its coverage of chaos in New Orleans.

"With a black person, it is called looting; with a white person, it is called finding food," he said.

Bruce Gordon, president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said any recriminations over the storm response can wait.

DOJ_NMG_0002993

"Right now, the NAACP is in what I call a life-saving mode. We are not in a finger-pointing mode, and until every life has been stabilized and every life has been saved, we will devote all of our energies for that purpose," Mr. Gordon said.

In Maryland yesterday, Claude Allen, a leading official in hurricane recovery efforts as senior domestic policy adviser to President Bush, decried racial discord and appealed for national unity.

"Pray that God would prevail against efforts to divide this nation," Mr. Allen asked 2,000 fellow members of Covenant Life Church in Gaithersburg. "This is not a situation of black or white, rich or poor. This storm was indiscriminate in who it took, and we as a people must pull together."

Mr. Allen, who is black, accompanied the president on his tour of the stricken region. Pray "most of all for peace, because people are trying to find places to lay the blame, and this is not a time for that," said Mr. Allen, who was invited by senior pastor Joshua Harris to address the church.

Amid Criticism Of Federal Efforts, Charges Of Racism Are Lodged (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

HOUSTON, Sept. 5 - The devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina became a rallying cry for African-American religious and political leaders here in President Bush's former hometown on Sunday, with pleas for charity mixed with a seething anger at the response to the crisis.

Many blacks voiced suspicions that thousands of people were left to suffer and die in the floodwaters because they were, for the most part, poor and black.

"Are you telling me we can coordinate a relief effort on the other side of the world and we can't do it here?" I. V. Hilliard, pastor of the New Light Christian Center Church in northern Houston, thundered from the pulpit of his megachurch on Sunday morning. "I'm not saying they didn't care. I'm saying they didn't care enough!"

"I can't help but think that race has something to do with it," he added to a chorus of amens. Mr. Hilliard's church is the largest predominantly black congregation in Houston, with 20,000 members, four locations and a broadcast ministry.

Mr. Hilliard's comments were echoed throughout the country over the weekend, as the Rev. Jesse Jackson and Representative Maxine Waters of California made a trip to the convention center in New Orleans and the president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People met with the governor of Louisiana and visited the emergency operations center in Baton Rouge.

Interviews with African-American church leaders, local politicians and residents here made clear the damage that the faltering relief effort has had on their perceptions of the Bush administration. Mr. Bush and his chief political advisers have mounted an effort to try to court more conservative black voters, particularly since the 2004 election, by encouraging black Republican candidacies and reaching out to black churches.

But their outreach efforts appear to have been significantly set back. Criticism of the response is coming not only from black members of Congress and national civil rights leaders, but also from prominent local officials and ordinary residents here.

"There is a lot of anger here in Texas," said the Rev. William A. Lawson, retired pastor of the Wheeler Avenue Baptist Church in Houston. "Even a lot of conservative whites are angry. This was not the reaction people expect to a disaster of this magnitude. We wanted to see them get off their butts and get over there."

Rodney Ellis, an African-American Democratic state senator who represents a district in Houston, said he was trying to focus on the needs of the evacuees, thousands of whom are in Houston. Mr. Ellis said that the initial federal response was clearly inadequate and that many in the administration bore responsibility, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who is black and from Alabama.

"This problem is so mammoth it's not going to go away any time soon," Mr. Ellis said. "There will be ample time for Condi Rice and others in the federal government to redeem themselves. And I'm hoping they do that."

Administration officials have tried over the last two days to repair the damage. Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, met with civil rights leaders and members of the Congressional Black Caucus at the White House on Saturday to discuss aid efforts and accusations of racial indifference.

Mr. Bush held a live news conference in Washington on Saturday to announce that he was sending additional troops to the Gulf Coast and to defend the government's response to the storm. The size of the disaster area, he said, "has created tremendous problems that have strained state and local capabilities."

"The result is that many of our citizens simply are not getting the help they need, especially in New Orleans," he said. "And that is unacceptable."

Ms. Rice visited the Gulf Coast on Sunday, flying to Mobile, Ala., to attend a church service and meet with storm victims.

DOJ_NMG_0002994

On the plane trip from Washington, Ms. Rice challenged accusations that the government had responded slowly because many of the victims were black.

"How can that be the case?" Ms. Rice said, according to The Associated Press. "Americans don't want to see Americans suffer."

She added, "Nobody, especially the president, would have left people unattended on the basis of race."

Later, at Pilgrim Rest A.M.E. Zion Church in Whistler, Ala., the Rev. Malone Smith Jr. invited Ms. Rice to say a few words.

"The Lord Jesus Christ is going to come on time," she said, "if we just wait."

At the New Orleans airport yesterday, Mr. Jackson and Ms. Waters, a California Democrat, offered bitter criticism of those who, they said, had failed them.

"This looks like the hull of a slave ship," Mr. Jackson said as he reviewed the packed sidewalk where families had gathered, their belongings in torn trash bags.

Ms. Waters said she had traveled throughout Africa and never seen anything quite like that scene. "This looks like an undeveloped country," she said. "No time did I think in America we would see this kind of homelessness, this kind of displacement. This is the worst thing I have ever seen."

In Baton Rouge, Bruce S. Gordon, president of the N.A.A.C.P., said federal aid for victims should be commensurate to what was given to those who lost relatives in the Sept. 11 attacks, adding that "the benchmark for recovery should be 9/11."

"Ask yourself," Mr. Gordon said, "have we put the investments, have we put the assets, have we put the resources that we put into 9/11?"

There was also abundant criticism of the news media over the weekend. The Rev. Al Sharpton, after visiting the encampment of displaced Louisianans in the Houston Astrodome on Saturday, objected to the use of the word "refugees" for the people who fled the hurricane.

"These are not refugees," he said. "They are citizens of Louisiana and Mississippi, tax-paying citizens. They are not refugees wandering somewhere looking for charity. They are victims of neglect and a situation they should have never been put in in the first place."

Many also took the news media to task for seeming to single out black people as looters in lawless New Orleans last week.

Kanye West, the rap star, dropped his prepared script at a televised benefit for storm victims on Friday night to say: "I hate the way they portray us in the media. If you see a black family, it says they're looting. See a white family, it says they're looking for food."

Mr. West also said, "George Bush doesn't care about black people."

Ronald Joubert, 41, a member of the New Light congregation in Houston, was a bit more charitable to the president, though not much.

"The people are saying that that's why the people in New Orleans didn't get a more direct response, because they're all black," Mr. Joubert said. "Me, I don't blame Bush personally. I blame the whole government. But 10 or 15 or 20 years from now, people are still going to be blaming Bush."

What Happens To A Race Deferred (NYT)

By Jason Deparle

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

WASHINGTON

THE white people got out. Most of them, anyway. If television and newspaper images can be deemed a statistical sample, it was mostly black people who were left behind. Poor black people, growing more hungry, sick and frightened by the hour as faraway officials counseled patience and warned that rescues take time.

What a shocked world saw exposed in New Orleans last week wasn't just a broken levee. It was a cleavage of race and class, at once familiar and startlingly new, laid bare in a setting where they suddenly amounted to matters of life and death. Hydrology joined sociology throughout the story line, from the settling of the flood-prone city, where well-to-do white people lived on the high ground, to its frantic abandonment.

The pictures of the suffering vied with reports of marauding, of gunshots fired at rescue vehicles and armed bands taking over the streets. The city of quaint eccentricity - of King Cakes, Mardi Gras beads and nice neighbors named Tookie - had taken a Conradian turn.

In the middle of the delayed rescue, the New Orleans mayor, C.Ray Nagin, a local boy made good from a poor, black ward, burst into tears of frustration as he denounced slow moving federal officials and called for martial law.

Even people who had spent a lifetime studying race and class found themselves slack-jawed.

DOJ_NMG_0002995

"This is a pretty graphic illustration of who gets left behind in this society - in a literal way," said Christopher Jencks, a sociologist glued to the televised images from his office at Harvard. Surprised to have found himself surprised, Mr. Jencks took to thinking out loud. "Maybe it's just an in-the-face version of something I already knew," he said. "All the people who don't get out, or don't have the resources, or don't believe the warning are African-American."

"It's not that it's at odds with the way I see American society," Mr. Jencks said. "But it's at odds with the way I want to see American society."

Last week it was how others saw American society, too, in images beamed across the globe. Were it not for the distinctive outlines of the Superdome, the pictures of hovering rescue helicopters might have carried a Somalian dateline. The Sri Lankan ambassador offered to help raise foreign aid.

Anyone who knew New Orleans knew that danger lurked behind the festive front. Let the good times roll, the tourists on Bourbon Street were told. Yet in every season, someone who rolled a few blocks in the wrong direction wound up in the city morgue.

Unusually poor (27.4 percent below the poverty line in 2000), disproportionately black (over two-thirds), the Big Easy is also disproportionately murderous - with a rate that was for years among the country's highest.

Once one of the most mixed societies, in recent decades, the city has become unusually segregated, and the white middle class is all but gone, moved north across Lake Pontchartrain or west to Jefferson Parish - home of David Duke, the one-time Klansman who ran for governor in 1991 and won more than half of the state's white vote.

Shortly after I arrived in town two decades ago as a fledgling reporter, I was dispatched to cover a cheerleading tryout, and I asked a grinning, half-drunk accountant where he was from, city or suburb. "White people don't live in New Orleans," he answered with a where-have-you-been disdain.

For those who loved it, its glories as well as its flaws, last week brought only heartbreak. So much of New Orleans, from its music and its food to its architecture, had shown a rainbow society at its best, even as everyone knew it was more complicated than that.

"New Orleans, first of all, is both in reality and in rhetoric an extraordinarily successful multicultural society," said Philip Carter, a developer and retired journalist whose roots in the city extend back more at least four generations. "But is also a multicultural society riven by race and class, and all this has been exposed by these stormy days. The people of our community are pitted against each other across the barricades of race and class that six months from now may be last remaining levees in New Orleans."

No one was immune, of course. With 80 percent of the city under water, tragedy swallowed the privilege and poor, and traveled spread across racial lines.

But the divides in the city were evident in things as simple as access to a car. The 35 percent of black households that didn't have one, compared with just 15 percent among whites.

"The evacuation plan was really based on people driving out," said Craig E. Colten, a geologist at Louisiana State University and an expert on the city's vulnerable topography. "They didn't have buses. They didn't have trains."

As if to punctuate the divide, the water especially devastated the Ninth Ward, among city's poorest and lowest lying.

"Out West, there is a saying that water flows to money," Mr. Colten said. "But in New Orleans, water flows away from money. Those with resources who control where the drainage goes have always chosen to live on the high ground. So the people in the low areas were hardest hit."

Outrage grew as the week wore on, among black politicians who saw the tragedy as a reflection of a broader neglect of American cities, and in the blogosphere.

"The real reason no one is helping is because of the color of these people!" wrote "myfan88" on the Flickr blog. "This is Hotel Rwanda all over again."

"Is this what the pioneers of the civil rights movement fought to achieve, a society where many black people are as trapped and isolated by their poverty as they were by legal segregation laws?" wrote Mark Naison, director of the urban studies program at Fordham, on another blog.

One question that could not be answered last week was whether, put to a similar test, other cities would fracture along the same lines.

AT one level, everything about New Orleans appears sui generis, not least its location below sea level. Many New Orleanians don't just accept the jokes about living in a Banana Republic. They spread them.

But in a quieter catastrophe, the 1995 heat wave that killed hundreds of Chicagoans, blacks in comparable age groups as whites died at higher rates - in part because they tended to live in greater social isolation, in depopulated parts of town. As in New Orleans, space intertwined with race.

DOJ_NMG_0002996

And the violence? Similarly shocking scenes had erupted in Los Angeles in 1992, after the acquittal of white police officers charged with beating a black man, Rodney King. Newark, Detroit, Washington -all burned in the race riots of the 1960's. It was for residents of any major city, watching the mayhem, to feel certain their community would be immune.

With months still to go just to pump out the water that covers the city, no one can be sure how the social fault lines will rearrange. But with white flight a defining element of New Orleans in the recent past, there was already the fear in the air this week that the breached levee would leave a separated society further apart.

``Maybe we can build the levees back," said Mr. Carter. ``But that sense of extreme division by class and race is going to long survive the physical reconstruction of New Orleans."

In Tale Of Two Families, A Chasm Between Haves And Have-Nots (NYT)

By Jodi Wilgoren

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

KENNER, La., Sept. 4 - It was moving day for the families of Gaynell Porretto and Tracy Jackson, the first page of the next chapter in their Hurricane Katrina horror stories.

Mrs. Porretto's four-car caravan crammed with a lifetime of photo albums, a few changes of clothes and coolers of drinks pulled up to a yellow house with a wide front porch that she had just rented for $600 in the humble hamlet of Arnaudville, La.

It is 125 miles from her storm-sacked home in the New Orleans suburb of Metairie, half the size for twice as many people, but she can see the church steeple from the yard, and her son is signed up for football at the nearby high school.

"I have a ZIP code!" she said, exulting. "It's the happiest I've ever been."

Outside the New Orleans airport here, Ms. Jackson's four sickly and hungry children, ages 1, 3, 5 and 7, were sprawled on a skycap's cart as she slogged through the sweaty, snail-like line, the baby atop a blue plastic bin filled with what they had scrounged from strangers.

It is all they have, their $2,000 cash savings burned up with their belongings - including birth certificates - in a post-flood fire at their apartment in uptown New Orleans. Even as they waited to board a plane, they did not know where they were taking it.

"I'm just hoping it's a better place," she whispered. "I've never been on an airplane before, I'm afraid of heights."

Two families displaced by the same disaster, both facing uncertain futures as they moved forward on Saturday, but in completely divergent circumstances.

Just as it ripped through levees to send water pouring through New Orleans, the storm cleaved a harsh chasm among the region's refugees, providing a stark portrait of the vast divide between America's haves and have-nots.

The more than 100 members of Mrs. Porretto's extended family have cars that carried them out last Sunday morning, well before the hurricane hit.

Ms. Jackson, who does not know how to drive, escaped on foot only after the floodwaters started filling her apartment on Tuesday, walking first to a bridge, then to the squalid Superdome.

Mrs. Porretto, 51, has an American Express card that covered her $564.26 bill at the Hilton in Lafayette, La., where a cousin who works for AT&T secured a low corporate rate when she booked a block of rooms days before of the storm.

Ms. Jackson, 24, does not have a bank account, and her husband, Jerel Brown, spent their last $25 to buy fish and shrimp from men grilling on the street in the chaos, so now there is nothing in the pockets of his baggy jeans but a crushed pack of Benson & Hedges someone gave him to calm him down.

The Porrettos have cellphones and connections in city government and churches that not only helped them find one of the last available rental properties anywhere around here, but also let them sneak back into their neighborhood early this weekend to grab televisions and furnishings for their new house.

Mr. Brown, in tears, has no recourse but to ask a reporter to look for his missing brother, Wallace, and if he turned up, find out how they could get back in touch.

John Edwards, the former senator whose presidential primary campaign last year was based on the theme that America is a country torn in two by race and class, sent an e-mail to supporters last week, saying that the hurricane's destruction exposed "a harsher example of two Americas."

"Every single resident of New Orleans, regardless of their wealth or status, will have terrible losses and life-altering experiences," Mr. Edwards wrote. But poor people, he added, "suffered the most from Katrina because they always suffer the most."

Mrs. Porretto, a court clerk, and her husband, Joel, a retired police officer, are hardly rich. But as they embark on life in exile, they look like royalty compared with Mr. Brown, Ms. Jackson and their children, wandering to a destination unknown with little more than the clothes they have worn for a week.

DOJ_NMG_0002997

"We don't know where we're going, we don't know how we're going to survive when we get there - we're starting all over," Mr. Brown said as he stood in line for three hours in the airport's heat. "I never been out of this city. I'm going to be a stranger."

Nearly one in four of New Orleans' 445,000 residents live in poverty, many of them in neighborhoods like the one where the Jackson-Brown clan huddled in a $350-a-month two-bedroom apartment across from a dilapidated and dangerous housing project; 69 percent of the city is black, and the median household income is $31,369. To the west in Metairie, where Ellen DeGeneres grew up, the median income is $41,265, just below the national average, 87 percent of the 145,000 residents are white, and fewer than 1 in 10 are poor.

But in the hurricane's wake, the poorest have turned desperately destitute, while the well-to-do make do with what they have left.

For the past week, the Porrettos and their many cousins converged at the Hilton, Lafayette's finest hotel, drinking red wine late into the night as they laughed in the lobby. The teenagers put a dollar on a string in front of the elevator, watching guests lunge for it as they yanked it away. The adults stayed up until 2 a.m. daring the dozens of dogs among the evacuated to strut their stuff.

"Every dog that did a trick, we drank a beer," Mrs. Porretto explained.

But some days, she stayed in bed depressed through the afternoon, or burst into tears out of nowhere. Their house has roof damage, and they do not yet know what the water has wrought inside. A Ford Taurus full of prized possessions that her husband parked outside Macy's to ride out the storm has been ravaged. The court where she has worked for 25 years is closed indefinitely. Her sister Kathy Skeins, whose family of four will share the little house along with Mrs. Porretto's 78-year-old mother-in-law, is worried about how her boys, 15 and 11, will fare in public school for the first time, and what will happen to the $3,500 tuition she already paid at the Catholic school back home.

"It hit us Monday that we were homeless," Mrs. Porretto said. "We have meltdowns. You just have nothing to look forward to."

Until they found the shotgun-style house in Arnaudville, a town of 1,400 down a long country road north of Lafayette.

On Saturday, as the two sisters unpacked the storm-survival arsenal they had amassed at the hotel - pounds of ham for sandwiches and a new toaster oven, all manner of snacks and condiments, even a bottle of olives to ease Mrs. Porretto's arthritis - a neighbor stopped by with a box of cleaning supplies.

The landlord, who is lending an air mattress and queen bed, drew a map to the nearby restaurant and movie theater. The women debated whether they need a land line, but agreed cable television was a must, and set out shopping to stock their new shelves.

"We need to make a list, Gay," Mrs. Skeins said. "We need a mop and a broom, so we can keep up the kitchen."

Mrs. Porretto propped a photo collage of her son's first year on a bedroom windowsill, and imagined the morning sun streaming in through the living room. The sisters stocked the refrigerator with bottles of Coors Light they had brought.

"Gotta relax some way," Mrs. Skeins said. "We'll sit on the porch and have a cold beer."

"We've got a porch, Kathy, I can't wait!" Mrs. Porretto said, forgetting the hurricane for a minute. "We grew up with a porch!"

On moving day, Mrs. Porretto wore a clean T-shirt and fresh lipstick. Two hours' drive away at the airport, Ms. Jackson was braless under her soiled shirt and had a blue bandana covering her unwashed hair.

The Skeins' 125-pound Rottweiler, Buster, galloped across the grass in Arnaudville to drink from a spigot, after a week squished in a hotel bathroom; the Jackson children are without their mutt, Max, last seen as their apartment began to burn.

"We heard the dog barking," Ms. Jackson said. "I think he's dead."

Like the Porrettos, Ms. Jackson, Mr. Brown, their children, a nephew and a friend they call Auntie left New Orleans last Sunday morning, to stay with a friend. But they went back on Tuesday, and as the water rose to waist level, they fled with no provisions. After two nights shielding the baby's eyes from dead bodies at the feces-infested Superdome, they set out for the convention center, where rumors of rapes and worse left them taking turns sleeping on the floor in fear for their children's safety.

"Last night I heard a baby screaming, 'Stop, stop, get off me, don't touch me,' " Ms. Jackson recalled.

Their blue plastic bin is filled not with family treasures, but with scraps that other refugees and relief workers have handed out: three rolls of toilet paper, a box of Teddy Grahams, toddlers blue plastic sandals, two apples, a gallon of milk.

Mr. Brown was barefoot until a friend gave him a pair of sneakers that remain unlaced because they are too small; he has no socks. An elderly lady gave Ms. Jackson a quilted handbag to hold diapers and the pink pills the triage nurse gave to 7-year-old Waynenisha, who suffers from febrile seizures.

"It has some perfume and some body spray," she said thankfully. "I'm a lady. I can't walk around smelling like a grown man."

DOJ_NMG_0002998

Now, Ms. Jackson is wondering whether she will be able to enroll her children in school without identification - even her own Social Security card is gone. Mr. Brown, who had been making do washing 18-wheelers and running errands for a convenience store, said he will "go there and get a job if they let me," though he is still unsure where there might be.

"We just started life's journey together," he said, gesturing at the little ones on the luggage cart. "As we're building, it just all fell apart at one time."

Standing in the sweltering line, Mr. Brown occasionally lashed out, slapping the leg of a child on the move or barking at others in line for pushing. When an older woman passed out on the curb, he pushed through the crowd to pour water down her head and back. "Where's the help?" he called out. "We need help! Give her some air, please."

A few minutes later, the Rev. Jesse Jackson turned up with three buses. The Jackson-Browns leaped out of line to rush aboard with their blue plastic bin and grabbed the last row in the air-conditioned coach, leaving the skycap's cart behind.

To The Rescue (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

It didn't look like America, the exodus of stunned refugees wading through turbid, waist-high water, carrying only what mattered most: sick relatives, bundled babies, storm-soaked family Bibles. It looked like another country, the kind of place where armed bandits outnumber police and desperate families search garbage dumpsters for food. A place where the poorest of the poor die in the heat, their corpses ignored on the side of the road.

Across the Gulf Coast, lifelong residents who thought they had seen it all were left with nothing in the wake of a storm that has caused what may well be the worst natural disaster ever to hit the United States. Katrina's lethal one-two punch of 145-mile-per-hour winds and a 25-foot storm surge left 90,000 square miles of heartbreak, devastation, and unhinged lives, as rich and poor alike scrounged for food and water, searched for loved ones in rivers of foul, tea-colored water, and wondered, Why on earth was help so slow in coming? "A national disgrace," Terry Ebbert, New Orleans's homeland-security director, said of Washington's emergency-relief efforts.

The challenges of delivering help and restoring order were without precedent. Experts placed the price tag on the havoc caused by Katrina's wrath at $30 billion, but for now, that can be only an educated guess. What can be said for sure is that Katrina uprooted more Americans than the Civil War, the Dust Bowl storms of the 1930s, or the San Francisco earthquake of 1906. Reaching for a more recent comparison, a weary, crestfallen A. J. Holloway, the mayor of Biloxi, Miss., which saw its own share of despair and heartbreak, said: "This is our tsunami."

Early in the week, the nation had breathed a sigh of relief for its beloved Crescent City--Bourbon Street was dry, and Katrina seemed like just another dodge-the-bullet story as revelers roamed the rain-smeared streets, go-cups in hand. By nightfall after landfall, it looked as if the Bananas Foster would be flaming merrily at Commander's Palace once again. But after the levees broke the next day and the bathtub-shaped Big Easy began filling up with the brackish waters of Lake Pontchartrain, a complicated network of pumps failed and 80 percent of the city was soon under water, creating what public health officials warned could soon become a breeding ground for West Nile virus, dysentery, and a host of other potentially lethal diseases.

"Help us." In what officials say is the largest domestic military relief effort in the nation's history, the Pentagon sent aircraft, rescue crews, and teams of Navy SEAL s to help out. Coast Guard divers descended from hovering helicopters, smashing though roofs with axes, sweeping the sick from makeshift rafts, and spiriting away those most in need of aid.

But for far too many, for the first few days, relief remained elusive. Kids climbed on a roof holding a sign that read simply, "Help us." Bands of looters, some deadly, some merely desperate, roamed the streets. At week's end, the floodwaters covered slightly less than half the city, but police and National Guard units were still keeping a wary eye on looters and gun-toting residents while trying to restore order amid reports of beatings, rapes, and shootings. New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin issued a "desperate SOS," pleading for more of everything--food and water, relief help, buses to evacuate the sick and elderly--anything that could help jump-start what inevitably will be a slow and tortuous return to something like normal.

'Understanding Katrina (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

By noon Monday, it was clear there was trouble. It was at the levee along the industrial canal that separates New Orleans from St. Bernard Parish to the east. The breach was obvious and, for the moment, irreparable. On Tuesday morning, there were two more gaps, both along a floodwall of the city's 17th Street Canal. It was the beginning of the end, just a matter of time. The waters rushed in.

DOJ_NMG_0002999

At the worst moment of the worst week in New Orleans's history, the water downtown was 20 feet deep. How could it have happened? The city's levees, many decades old, had been built to withstand only a Category 3 storm. Katrina was a 4. A high 4. The local authorities knew that. But they had no comprehensive plan to evacuate people from even the lowest parts of a city whose virtually every corner lies below sea level. Nor were there plans for an enhanced police presence on the streets after Katrina struck. In Washington, too, there was a curious lassitude, both as the massive storm bore down on the Gulf Coast and in the immediate aftermath of the levees failing. At week's end, an obviously stricken President Bush said: "I don't think anybody anticipated the breach of the levees."

But why not? The potential failure of the city's 350-mile levee system had been studied for years. The extensive network was built to keep floodwaters out, but it can also lock them in when the levees are breached or "overtopped" by surging water on the other side. This is what old New Orleans hands refer to as "flooding the bowl." And it's the very reason the Red Cross listed a direct hurricane hit on New Orleans as the nation's most deadly natural-disaster threat a few years ago. Everyone, it seemed, knew the risks. Scientists at Louisiana State University had warned that even a Category 3 storm could dump up to 27 feet of water in some neighborhoods. "Everybody knew this was coming," says Walter Maestri, director of emergency preparedness for Jefferson Parish (a parish is akin to a county), which borders downtown New Orleans. "But we all hoped it wouldn't be in our lifetime." John Harrald, codirector of the Institute for Crisis, Disaster, and Risk Management at George Washington University in Washington, D.C., agrees. "To paraphrase the 9/11 commission," he said, "we are seeing a failure of imagination."

Shared blame. The failure, however, was not on everyone's part. For years, officials in the New Orleans district office of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which built and administers the levee network, pushed to raise the protection level from Category 3 to Category 5. "We have the ability to protect this city [from Category 4 and 5 storms] for a 2-to-3-billion-dollar investment," Al Naomi, a senior project manager for the corps, told U.S. News in June. "It's not rocket science; its concrete and steel." Environmental groups, meanwhile, lobbied for more than a decade to restore southeastern Louisiana's vanishing wetlands, which once provided New Orleans with a robust, natural hurricane buffer. They got nowhere.

In The Ruins, Angels Of Mercy (USNEWS)

By Nancy Shute

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

April Fugere has discovered that it takes only about 36 hours to turn a modern American hospital into something more like a Civil War-era battlefield unit. "The stench is unbelievable," Fugere, an intensive care nurse, said from her post at flood-ravaged Charity Hospital last week, a few days after Hurricane Katrina battered New Orleans.

The hospital had no running water or working toilets. Food and bottled water were in short supply. The pain medication was long gone. When the emergency generators gave out, Fugere and her colleagues kept critically ill patients alive by squeezing their ventilator bags by hand. Rescuers had turned away after being fired upon, but by week's end, most of the patients had been evacuated. It was too late for some. "There are lots of patients who died," Fugere says. "They are laying them out in a hospital stairwell, in body bags."

From the flooded city of New Orleans and eastward along the Gulf Coast, doctors and nurses at dozens of hospitals and nursing homes last week struggled against enormous odds to keep thousands of seriously ill people alive without the most basic tools--food, water, medicine. The situation outside hospital walls was no better. Swarms of displaced residents with chronic health problems tried to make do without life-sustaining treatments like insulin and kidney dialysis. Even those who were healthy when the hurricane hit risked serious injury or death through dehydration, infection, or starvation as the week dragged on with no rescue or basic rations in sight. "We're seeing people who have been holed up in heated attics without food or water for days," says Christopher Guarisco, director of the emergency department at the Oschner Clinic Foundation in Jefferson Parish, La. At the New Orleans Convention Center, corpses lay abandoned amid throngs of people desperate to escape. A lucky few got out: Premature babies and other critically ill patients were airlifted to hospitals as far away as Houston. But most were left to suffer.

The healthcare crisis was exacerbated by the fact that hospitals weren't immune to the violence that erupted. "When the crowds tried to take the ambulances away from us, we just abandoned the ambulances and locked them up," says Richard Zuschlag, chief executive officer of Acadian Ambulance Service in Lafayette, La. In their second attempt to evacuate Charity Hospital, "we got shot at," Zuschlag says. But as National Guard troops began entering the city, the ambulance crews started moving again.

"It's utter chaos here," says Deano Bonano, chief deputy administrator for Jefferson Parish, just outside New Orleans. At midweek, the parish's hospitals were crammed with patients, most of them old or frail and in need of dialysis or oxygen, who were moved into the hospitals before the storm hit and had no place to go. "People are lined up in hallways, everywhere we can plug in a machine," Bonano says. "We're trying to relocate these special-needs patients to hospitals outside the area, but transportation right now is hard or impossible." Early in the week, he had taken to going out with the police or National Guard and raiding local supermarkets. "We are actually breaking into grocery stores," he says. By week's end, however, Bonano said Wal-Mart and Sam's Club had shipped in tractor-trailers with food, water, and ice, and power and water were being restored to the three open hospitals.

DOJ_NMG_0003000

Another Flood That Stunned America (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

For days, the rain fell. The rivers swelled, the lakes rose. And when the water could no longer find a place to go, it battered the weakest parts of the levees that had protected thousands of people and blew through, sending a surge of white-capped brown water faster than the spill of Niagara Falls.

So began the Great Mississippi Flood of 1927, the most catastrophic deluge ever to hit the South and one of the worst natural disasters in U.S. history.

The seminal event of pre-integration southern politics, the 1927 flood inundated an area about half the size of New England. It killed as many as 1,000 people and displaced about 700,000 more. At a time when the entire federal budget was barely $3 billion, it caused an estimated $1 billion in damage.

Most significant for the course of America, however, the tragedy hastened the mass migration of African-Americans to northern cities and marked the beginning of the end of southern sharecropping. "You'd say, 'I'd like to talk to you about the 1927 flood,' and you didn't need to explain anything else," says Pete Daniel, author of Deep'n As It Come: The 1927 Mississippi River Flood. "It was the most significant event of their lives."

The 1927 flood spared New Orleans, yet parallels to the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina are hard to miss. Authorities were ill-prepared to deal with refugees, and the brunt of the damage was borne by poor blacks unable to get to high ground.

Like Katrina, the tragedy was in many ways born of man's hubris--fitting because New Orleans itself grew out of man's assumption that he could control nature, no matter how stubborn nature was. The city was founded in 1718 by Jean Baptiste Le Moyne de Bienville on a piece of high ground between the Mississippi and Lake Pontchartrain. It was built below grade, against the advice of engineers. Pumps and canals, its founders thought, would handle the water.

Over the centuries, the same attitude would direct development of the rest of the lower Mississippi. Earthen levees rose ever higher to corral the river in its channel. But they have come at a price: The same volume of water just moves faster through a smaller space, scouring the channel and weakening the levees from below.

When the rains broke records in April 1927, the Gulf of Mexico was full and worked as a stopper to the Mississippi. The Mississippi was full, too, pushing its own waters up tributaries, breaking levees and causing flooding as far as Ohio and Texas. All that water had to go somewhere.

It couldn't go to New Orleans, panicky city fathers told the Army Corps of Engineers; it would devastate the regional economy.

To save New Orleans, the leaders proposed a radical plan. South of the city, the population was mostly rural and poor. The leaders appealed to the federal government to essentially sacrifice those parishes by blowing up an earthen levee and diverting the water to marshland. They promised restitution to people who would lose their homes. Government officials, including Commerce Secretary Herbert Hoover, signed off.

On April 29, the levee at Caernarvon, 13 miles south of New Orleans, succumbed to 39 tons of dynamite. The river rushed through at 250,000 cubic feet per second. New Orleans was saved, but the misery of the flooded parishes had only started. The city fathers took years to make good on their promises, and very few residents ever saw any compensation at all.

The water, which had started rising on Good Friday, would not recede until July. Many victims would never return to their homes. Hoover, who won support for leading relief efforts, went on to win the presidential election. And the Corps of Engineers, who had said the levees would hold, was humbled. Says Daniel: "People complained about the corps . . . but they never blamed the river. They understood: 'That's the river. That's nature. That's what it's supposed to be doing.' " -Judd Slivka

The Lost CityWhat Went Wrong: Devastating A Swath Of The South, Katrina Plunged New Orleans Into Agony. (NWSWK)

Newsweek, September 5, 2005

Sept. 12, 2005 issue - It wasn't exactly a surprise. "This ain't gonna last," New Orleans City Council President Oliver Thomas told his security guard as they watched the waters of Lake Pontchartrain rising and racing and eating away at the dirt levee beneath the concrete floodwall built to protect New Orleans from disaster. It was 4 o'clock on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 28. Hurricane Katrina was still 14 hours away, but the sea surge had begun. Thomas returned to the city's hurricane war room and announced, to anyone who was listening, "The water's coming into the city."

Story continues below ? advertisement

DOJ_NMG_0003001

Thomas was asleep on his office couch early Tuesday morning when he was awakened by the sound of banging on his door and someone yelling, "The levee broke!" Thomas stood up on his soaked carpet and felt as though he were standing in concrete. He was paralyzed, he later said, by the fear of predictions coming true. Thomas, who had been rescued off the roof of his house in New Orleans during Hurricane Betsy in 1965, had been a city councilman for a dozen years. His specialty is water. He knew all about the studies and reports and dire warnings stacked up on the desks of bureaucrats, he knew about all the relief and reconstruction and restoration projects that had been discussed but never paid for or carried out, and he knew his beloved old city was doomed.

A few rescuers were ready, but precious few. On Monday morning, as the storm slammed into the Gulf Coast, Col. Tim Tarchick of the 920th Rescue Wing, Air Force Reserve Command, got on the phone to call every agency he could think of to ask permission to take his three rescue helicopters into the disaster zone as soon as the storm abated. The response was noncommittal. FEMA, the federal agency that is supposed to handle disasters, told Tarchick that it wasn't authorized to task military units. That had to come from the Defense Department. Tarchick wasn't able to cut through the red tape until 4 p.m. Tuesday—more than 24 hours after the storm had passed. His crews plucked hundreds of people off rooftops, but when they delivered them to an assigned landing zone, there was "total chaos. No food, no water, no bathrooms, no nothing." There was "no structure, no organization, no command center," Tarchick told NEWSWEEK.

Only despair. The news could not have been more dispiriting: The reports of gunfire at medical-relief helicopters. The stories of pirates capturing rescue boats. The reports of police standing and watching looters—or joining them. The TV images of hundreds and thousands of people, mostly black and poor, trapped in the shadow of the Superdome. And most horrific: the photographs of dead people floating facedown in the sewage or sitting in wheelchairs where they died, some from lack of water. For many across the city and the Gulf Coast, prayer seemed one of their few options. On CNN, Mayor C. Ray Nagin asked the country to "pray for us," a plea repeated by survivors who needed that, and much more.

New Orleans has long been an inspiration to soulful writers and artists who sing the blues. But there was nothing romantic about Katrina's wake. Most of the poets had headed for higher ground (although legendary R&B man "Fats" Domino stayed, was reported missing, then found alive). Left behind were the poor who couldn't get out, a few defiant members of the local gentry and gangs of predators.

No one seemed to have any idea how many people died, but it was clearly the worst natural disaster since a hurricane wiped out Galveston, Texas, in 1900, killing 6,000 to 12,000 people. No major American city had been evacuated since Richmond and Atlanta in the Civil War. The economic cost will be enormous, starting with gasoline prices jumping to more than $3 a gallon. The political cost to President Bush could also be stiff. When Air Force One dipped below the clouds on Tuesday so the president could peer out the window down at the disaster, the image was uncomfortably imperial. A folksier Bush toured the wretched region on Friday, hugged some victims and did a rare but necessary thing: he admitted that the results of the relief effort had been "not acceptable."

Day after day of images showed exhausted families and their crying children stepping around corpses while they begged: Where is the water? Where are the buses? They seemed helpless, powerless, at the mercy of forces far beyond their control. The lack of rapid response left people in the United States, and all over the world, wondering how an American city could look like Mogadishu or Port-au-Prince. The refugee crisis—a million people without homes, jobs, schools—hardly fit George W. Bush's vision of the American Colossus.

After Failures, Government Officials Play Blame Game (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

This article was reported by Scott Shane, Eric Lipton and Christopher Drew and written by Mr. Shane.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 4 - As the Bush administration tried to show a more forceful effort to help the victims of Hurricane Katrina, government officials on Sunday escalated their criticism and sniping over who was to blame for the problems plaguing the initial response.

While rescuers were still trying to reach people stranded by the floods, perhaps the only consensus among local, state and federal officials was that the system had failed.

Some federal officials said uncertainty over who was in charge had contributed to delays in providing aid and imposing order, and officials in Louisiana complained that Washington disaster officials had blocked some aid efforts.

Local and state resources were so weakened, said Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, that in the future federal authorities need to take "more of an upfront role earlier on, when we have these truly ultracatastrophes."

DOJ_NMG_0003002

But furious state and local officials insisted that the real problem was that the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which Mr. Chertoff's department oversees, failed to deliver urgently needed help and, through incomprehensible red tape, even thwarted others' efforts to help.

"We wanted soldiers, helicopters, food and water," said Denise Bottcher, press secretary for Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana. "They wanted to negotiate an organizational chart."

Mayor C. Ray Nagin of New Orleans expressed similar frustrations. "We're still fighting over authority," he told reporters on Saturday. "A bunch of people are the boss. The state and federal government are doing a two-step dance."

In one of several such appeals, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, called on President Bush on Sunday to appoint an independent national commission to examine the relief effort. She also said that she intends to introduce legislation to remove FEMA from the Department of Homeland Security and restore its previous status as an independent agency with cabinet-level status.

Mr. Chertoff tried to deflect the criticism of his department and FEMA by saying there would be time later to decide what went wrong.

"Whatever the criticisms and the after-action report may be about what was right and what was wrong looking back, what would be a horrible tragedy would be to distract ourselves from avoiding further problems because we're spending time talking about problems that have already occurred," he told Tim Russert on "Meet the Press" on NBC.

But local officials, who still feel overwhelmed by the continuing tragedy, demanded accountability and as well as action.

"Why did it happen? Who needs to be fired?" asked Aaron Broussard, president of Jefferson Parish, south of New Orleans.

Far from deferring to state or local officials, FEMA asserted its authority and made things worse, Mr. Broussard complained on "Meet the Press."

When Wal-Mart sent three trailer trucks loaded with water, FEMA officials turned them away, he said. Agency workers prevented the Coast Guard from delivering 1,000 gallons of diesel fuel, and on Saturday they cut the parish's emergency communications line, leading the sheriff to restore it and post armed guards to protect it from FEMA, Mr. Broussard said.

One sign of the continuing battle over who was in charge was Governor Blanco's refusal to sign an agreement proposed by the White House to share control of National Guard forces with the federal authorities.

Under the White House plan, Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honoré would oversee both the National Guard and the active duty federal troops, reporting jointly to the president and Ms. Blanco.

"She would lose control when she had been in control from the very beginning," said Ms. Bottcher, the governor's press secretary.

Ms. Bottcher was one of several officials yesterday who said she believed FEMA had interfered with the delivery of aid, including offers from the mayor of Chicago, Richard M. Daley, and the governor of New Mexico, Bill Richardson.

Adam Sharp, a spokesman for Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, said the problem was not who was in command. FEMA repeatedly held up assistance that could have been critical, he said.

"FEMA has just been very slow to make these decisions," Mr. Sharp said.

In a clear slap at Mr. Chertoff and the FEMA director, Michael D. Brown, Governor Blanco announced Saturday that she had hired James Lee Witt, the director of FEMA during the Clinton administration, to advise her on the recovery.

Nearly every emergency worker told agonizing stories of communications failures, some of them most likely fatal to victims. Police officers called Senator Landrieu's Washington office because they could not reach commanders on the ground in New Orleans, Mr. Sharp said.

Dr. Ross Judice, chief medical officer for a large ambulance company, recounted how on Tuesday, unable to find out when helicopters would land to pick up critically ill patients at the Superdome, he walked outside and discovered that two helicopters, donated by an oil services company, had been waiting in the parking lot.

Louisiana and New Orleans have received a total of about $750 million in federal emergency and terrorism preparedness grants in the last four years, Homeland Security Department officials said.

Mr. Chertoff said he recognized that the local government's capacity to respond to the disaster was severely compromised by the hurricane and flood.

"What happened here was that essentially, the demolishment of that state and local infrastructure, and I think that really caused the cascading series of breakdowns," he said.

But Mayor Nagin said the root of the breakdown was the failure of the federal government to deliver relief supplies and personnel quickly.

"They kept promising and saying things would happen," he said. "I was getting excited and telling people that. They kept making promises and promises."

DOJ_NMG_0003003

A Delicate Balance Is Undone In A Flash, And A Battered City Waits (NYT)

By Peter Applebome, Christopher Drew, Jere Longman And Andrew Revkin

The New York Times, September 5, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 3 - They waited, and they waited, and then they waited some more in the 90-degree heat, as many as 5,000 people huddled at a highway underpass on Interstate 10, waiting for buses that never arrived to take them away from the storm they could not escape.

Babies cried. The sick huddled in the shade in wheelchairs or rested on cots. Dawn Ray, 40, was in tears, looking after an autistic niece who had soiled herself and her son who is blind and has cerebral palsy. A few others, less patient, simply started walking west with nowhere to go, like a man pushing a bike in one hand and pulling a shopping cart in another. But most just waited with resigned patience - sad, angry, incredulous, scared, exhausted, people who seemed as discarded as the bottles of water and food containers that littered the ground.

"Disease, germs," one woman, Claudette Paul, said, covering her mouth with a cloth, her voice smoldering with anger. "We need help. We don't live like this in America."

New Orleans has always existed in a delicate balance between land and water, chaos and order, black and white, the very rich and the very poor. It has been the lacy ironwork of French Quarter balconies, the magical shops and galleries on Royal Street and the magisterial cuisine not just at Galatoire's or Mr. B's or Commander's Palace but also at humble po-boy joints and neighborhood restaurants in every part of town.

But it has also been a place of crushing poverty, of dreary housing projects and failing schools, where crime and violence have been an incessant shadow in daily life, as much a part of the local sensibility as the smothering blanket of heat and humidity.

This week, bit by bit, that delicate balance came completely undone. Water took over earth when levees broke, putting 80 percent of the city under water. The mix of fatalism and bravado that allowed the city's biggest fear - a killer hurricane - to become the marquee drink of Bourbon Street gave way to terror and despair and horrifying spasms of looting and violence. New Orleans became unrecognizable not just physically, but psychologically as well. Faced with a disaster of biblical proportions, everything fell apart, and government was either overmatched or slow to the task.

The flood-control apparatus, which government officials and scientists had long said was inadequate, gave way, but federal engineers did not even realize that a major breach had occurred until the next morning, when citizens began reporting rising flows on Web logs. The city's evacuation plan worked, except for the thousands who were too poor or disabled to find their own way out of the city before the storm. The radios and cellphones that officials and police officers use to communicate failed, erasing any remaining semblance of authority in a city beset by chaos and crime. And finally, a full federal response came only after the dialogue between local and federal officials devolved into anger.

Just two months ago, further evidence emerged that the city and its levees were sinking, increasing the risk of a catastrophic flood, even as federal money to protect the city was being cut afresh. As flood waters rose on Tuesday, Senator Mary L. Landrieu tried to impress upon colleagues in Washington that this was America's tsunami, but she said that the more she pleaded, the more she felt she was not being heard. Most local officials who were supposed to be running the city eventually left, mainly because they could not communicate with the outside world, whose help they desperately needed. It took four days for National Guard troops to arrive to restore order as looting and lawlessness spiraled out of control.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin said federal aid began flowing after he spoke by telephone to President Bush and told him bluntly: "Man, this is a mess, and I am not getting the resources I need. I need help, and if I don't get the help I need this city is going to blow up and this is going to be a national disgrace."

New Orleans, Flannery O'Connor once wrote, is a place where the devil's existence is freely recognized.

But not this devil. Not the devil of bloated bodies floating in muddy waters washing lazily over submerged pickups and campers, of corpses being eaten by rats as they decomposed on city streets, of people dying in wheelchairs outside the convention center as friends poured water over their heads to try to keep them alive.

Not the devil who left Bill and Gail Orris sitting exhausted, dazed after escaping through the hole they poked through the roof of their home in nearby Chalmette, while their 20-year-old daughter, Lennie, unable to walk and mentally disabled, sucked her thumb and jerked spasmodically back and forth in her wheelchair in the hot sun.

Not the devil who left Catherine Weiss, at 75, apologizing profusely for not having her teeth with her - she had left in a hurry, after all, when the water filled her house like a bathtub - and panicked about what had happened to her nephew, Michael Phillippello, who collapsed as a boat ferried them across the river to safety.

Not the man on talk radio, stranded in his house but begging people not to try to come back to see what they had left behind.

DOJ_NMG_0003004

"It's like the five stages of accepting death," he said. "First, I was thinking if I had enough ice to save the good shrimp and tilapia, then it's whether I can save the house, now it's about my life. If I had two AK's I'd feel safe here. As it is, someone could pop me off, and I could end up bloated, no one would check for bullet holes, and I'd just end up in some potter's field. You can feel human life kind of receding like the waters."

The storm that brought those waters began as Tropical Depression 12, yet another swirl of tropical turbulence in the southeastern Bahamas. But at each step of the way Hurricane Katrina seemed to overachieve. It hit Florida with more power than expected, killing nine people and knocking out electricity for a million more. Then it crossed back into the Gulf of Mexico, intensifying into one of the strongest storms on record as, in a horrific bit of timing, it churned directly over the "loop current," a great, deep whorl of tropics-hot seawater that pulses in between the Yucatán and Cuba each year and then stays south of Louisiana into late summer. Often, storms weaken as they suck up cool water that lies stratified beneath the warm surface. But in the loop, even the depths are hot.

"We are facing a storm that most of us have long feared," said Mayor Nagin, who urged people on Saturday to leave town and then gave an evacuation order on Sunday, when it looked as if a Category 5 storm, with winds as high as 175 miles an hour, could be headed for New Orleans. "This is a once-in-a-lifetime event."

Many of the 1.3 million people in the metropolitan area did that. But, as always, many did not. This surprised exactly no one. In a 2003 Louisiana State University poll, 31 percent of New Orleans residents said they would stay in the city even if a Category 4 hurricane struck.

Many stayed because they felt they had no choice.

The survey found that those who said they would stay tended be poor, less educated, disabled, older, childless or isolated, or had lived in the city for a long period. Twenty-eight percent of the population of New Orleans lives below the poverty line, compared with 9 percent nationwide, according to census figures. Twenty-four percent of its adults are disabled, compared with 19 percent nationwide. An estimated 50,000 households in New Orleans do not have cars.

And there was another bit of bad timing: the hurricane came at the end of the month, when those depending on public assistance are waiting for their next checks, typically mailed on the first of every month.

"They wouldn't have had any money to evacuate," said Councilwoman Cynthia Hedge-Morrell.

Experts disagreed on whether there were adequate evacuation plans for those most in need. Brian Wolshon, an L.S.U. civil engineering professor who consulted on the state evacuation plan, said the city relied almost entirely on a "Good Samaritan scenario," in which residents would check on elderly and disabled neighbors and drive them out of the city if necessary.

Planning was stymied by a shortage of buses, he said. As many as 2,000 buses, far more than New Orleans possessed, would be needed to evacuate an estimated 100,000 elderly and disabled people.

But Chester Wilmot, an L.S.U. civil engineering professor who studies evacuation plans, said the city successfully improvised. He said witnesses described seeing city buses shuttle residents to the Superdome before Hurricane Katrina struck.

"What I've heard is that there were buses, but they weren't very well utilized," Professor Wilmot said. "They literally carried very few people."

The two professors agreed that the evacuation of New Orleans residents with cars went well. They said a new "contraflow plan," which used all lanes of I-10 for outbound traffic, avoided the kind of traffic that snarled during a voluntary evacuation of the city during Hurricane Ivan in 2001.

"What you're going to find is that everyone who wanted to get out, got out," said Professor Wolshon. "Except for the people who didn't have access to transportation."

But many other stayed because they wanted to stay. Because their friends were staying. Because they were worried about looters if they left. Because they felt they could protect their property by staying home. They stayed because they had elderly parents who were going to stay, because they thought they knew which parts of the city flooded and which did not. Or because they always had.

"Hard-headed, honey," said Mrs. Weiss, when asked why she rode out the storm in the same brick home where she has stayed for storms for 41 years. "From now on, I'm leaving for a tropical storm."

And then there were the tourists, many of whom came with only the haziest sense of what they were facing and not the slightest idea of what they should do. When Chris and Tammy Distefano, Kris and Mike Miller and Chad and Michelle Toomey arrived from York, Pa., on Saturday morning for their first trip to New Orleans, they asked the limo driver, Joseph, what to expect. Not much, he answered. The storms always went somewhere else. He took them on a tour and dropped them off at their hotel. They dropped off their bags and walked over to Pat O'Brien's for a hurricane, the mix of dark rum, passion fruit and other juices that people drink from plastic cups as they tour the French Quarter. They were scared to death as the storm rattled their hotel, shutting off the power, Sunday night and Monday morning.

DOJ_NMG_0003005

But as Monday rolled into afternoon and the storm moved west, people peeked outside to find streets battered, trees down, roots torn up, but the city mostly dry. It looked like the N'awlins luck had held again.

Thriving on Bluff

And why not? For generations - centuries, really - this city had thrived in part on the poker-hand bluff, its sheer allure masking its starker realities.

Eighteenth-century accounts sent back to France as the first settlers carved into the Mississippi silt focused on the fanciful, not the real, said Craig E. Colten, a geographer at L.S.U. and the author of a new book on the city, "An Unnatural Metropolis."

Few entrepreneurs seeking to sell the idea of building a town on this swampy island mention that as they dug into the earth, they came upon recently buried tree trunks - a sign that they were standing on land laid down by epic floods.

And as the city grew, wedged between the Mississippi River and the broad, shallow Lake Pontchartrain, so too did efforts to ring it with earthen levees. But the very expansion of the city contributed to the rising flood risk, Dr. Colten said. As swampier spots were drained, the drying soil compressed, causing reclaimed land to sink ever more.

In the 20th century, more land was drained as the city's legendary system of pump stations and purging canals spread. But that made it sink all that much faster.

Hurricanes feeding on warmth from the gulf rumbled by most summers. Some potent ones smashed other Gulf Coast towns, like Galveston, Tex., in 1900, and storms in 1947 and 1965, struck New Orleans directly, but with survivable intensity. Hurricane Betsy, in September 1965, finally spurred a federal hurricane protection plan for Lake Pontchartrain and vicinity.

But the system that emerged was a compromise from the start, cut back by competing Army Corps of Engineer projects, by pressure from local communities that had to pay part of the tab, and by the tendency to focus more on current costs than on future risks.

Officials settled on a system of levees sufficient to protect against another Hurricane Betsy - roughly akin to what is now called a Category 3 storm, the kind that statistics estimate might strike New Orleans once in 200 years.

A lull in Atlantic hurricane frequency from around 1970 until 1995 probably contributed to complacency, said Bob Sheets, a former director of the National Hurricane Center.

But more recently, a string of studies found that after 1995, a natural Atlantic cycle had switched from the pattern that stifles storms to one that nurtured them. Other studies pointed to an eventual increase in storm intensity from global warming.

Computer simulations showed ever more clearly how New Orleans could swamp like a low boat in high seas under the assault from certain hurricanes.

Still, the compromises over flood protection persisted. After a scare from Hurricane Georges in 1998, Congress authorized the Corps of Engineers to begin studying bolstering the city's defenses against a Category 5 storm. But money for that study, and simply for finishing the last components of the original plan to protect against a Category 3 storm, dribbled in district at a fraction of annual requests.

In 2004, with insufficient money to close contracts with the companies doing the work, Alfred Naomi, a senior district project manager, told the local East Jefferson Levee Authority, according to the New Orleans Times-Picayune: "The system is in great shape, but the levees are sinking. Everything is sinking, and if we don't get the money fast enough to raise them, then we can't stay ahead of the settlement."

This year, the New Orleans district was hit by a $71.2 million cut. Without more federal money, the district reported in May, the raising of various levees and other "pressing needs" would not be met. In June, at a meeting of emergency planners and hurricane experts, Roy Dokka, an L.S.U. engineer who has spent much of his career refining measurements of elevations around the gulf, presented findings that parts of the coast and New Orleans were sinking 2 to 50 times faster than earlier estimates.

Many spots were two to four feet lower than anyone thought, recalled Stephen Baig, a National Hurricane Center meteorologist, a chilling hint that calculations of the flood potential of particular storms, and the vulnerability of levees, might be significantly underestimated.

"For levee heights, and for our models," Dr. Baig recalled, "that could mean the difference between overtopping and not overtopping."

On Monday, there was nothing dramatic when the levee failed, no sound of an explosion or a crash. At midday, as the storm was blowing out of the city, the Web site of The Times-Picayune quoted residents near the 17th Street canal saying that after experiencing only minor flooding from the storm, suddenly the water in their yards was rising from what seemed to be a breach in the canal. One man said later that afternoon that the water was rising one brick on his house every 20 minutes.

By 4:20 p.m. on Monday, the Web site reported that the water had already rolled through the nearby Lakeview neighborhood and on down to the center of the city. By then, the water in Lakeview had reached the second stories of many houses. The berms along Lake Pontchartrain had held. The problem was in canals that had been built to carry water pumped from city drains out to the lake. But on Monday, with the lake rising, the flow in the canals reversed.

DOJ_NMG_0003006

A surge, probably 10 feet above normal, flowed in from the lake, rising until it began cascading over the top of the sleek, butter-colored walls that stood between the east side of the 17th Street Canal and the city's Bucktown neighborhood.

Greg Breerwood, a deputy district engineer for the Corps, said it appeared that as the weight of the water pressed on the high part of the wall, the water pouring over the top hit the ground on the other side and ate away at the soil supporting its base.

A section of the wall pushed in and the rush of water turned that breach into a gash as broad as a football field is long. The lake and below-sea-level city were becoming one body of water.

"We heard about the flood wall failing," Mr. Breerwood said. "Then we realized there was an open corridor to the city."

A Reluctance to Leave

Once the levee broke, most long-time New Orleanians knew that the city could unravel quickly, with nothing to stop the lake from pouring into neighborhoods that were still dry and surging across a huge city park and into downtown.

Ms. Landrieu, a Democrat who grew up in New Orleans, whose father, Moon Landrieu, had been mayor, whose brother, Mitch, is currently Louisiana's lieutenant governor, was at the federal and state command center in Baton Rouge when the first warnings about the break flashed on Monday afternoon.

Ms. Landrieu knew how reluctant people could be to leave. This was the first time her own father had ever left during a hurricane. She said in an interview that she knew instantly that thousands who thought they had survived the storm would now be trapped in their houses, racing the rising floodwaters to their second floors, or to their attics or rooftops.

But she and other local officials suddenly faced a new problem: convincing federal officials that just one break in one canal with such a mundane name could bring on a cataclysm.

"I have been with Michael Brown since the minute he landed in this center," Ms. Landrieu said Friday in Baton Rouge, referring to the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, "and I have been telling him from the moment he arrived about the urgency of the situation."

But, she said, "I just have to tell you that he had a difficult time understanding the enormity of the task before us."

Natalie Rule, a spokeswoman for FEMA, disputed Ms. Landrieu's account. "There was no doubt in our minds that a Category 3, 4 or 5 headed for New Orleans was going to be dangerous," Ms. Rule said. She said agency officials told state and local leaders: "We will be there for you. You just go for it. We've got your back."

But if they did, no one knew it. And as the flood-control system broke down, so soon did everything else.

There was no immediate announcement that the levee had been breeched or what it meant, but different people realized at different times that maybe the bullet had not been dodged, after all. The prestorm evacuation, as chaotic as it seemed to anyone stuck on the road, was still part of a plan. Now , a whole new ad hoc stage began.

The tourists from York ventured out Monday to see gangs of youths, maybe four, then a dozen, then another four, breaking into the Canal Place Mall, home to high-dollar retailers like Saks and Gucci, Brooks Brothers and Ann Taylor. Worried that things were slipping out of control, they managed to make a plane reservation at $637 a ticket to get out of town. A local family staying at the hotel drove them out for $100 a head, the best money they ever spent. There had been no plans for what to do with stranded tourists, and before long, the hotels were closing down.

With the Superdome overloaded and without food or air-conditioning, the hotels guided visitors to the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, a huge rectangular building that stretches about a mile and is several hundred yards wide. It has been used for conventions with more than 70,000 people. But soon the situation there devolved into anarchy, too, to the point that officials, often circumspect and cagey with the news media, were just the opposite.

"The tourists are walking around there and as soon as these individuals see them, they're being preyed upon," said P. Edwin Compass III, superintendent of police. "They are beating, they are raping them in the streets."

The Flooded Ninth

Before dawn on Tuesday, Ms. Landrieu's brother, the lieutenant governor, and Sgt. Troy McConnell of the state police left Baton Rouge to assist in the rescue of flooded residents of the Ninth Ward in New Orleans. Mr. Landrieu knew the city intimately. But now he was navigating the Lower Ninth Ward not by car, but by boat. The four men on board would cut the engine and float in watery silence, listening for calls for help from inside houses or attics.

People yelled from rooftops or waved shirts or rags, as if they were flags, from vents in the attic. A few wooden houses floated like buoys.

It had become so hot inside the fetid houses that some residents shivered in the cold water as they swam to the rescue boat. One woman was so heavy and immobile that 12 men were needed to lift her off a gurney.

DOJ_NMG_0003007

They must have rescued 100 people, but by the end of the day the mood began to change to one of irritated impatience. "By dusk, people were getting agitated and upset," Sergeant McConnell said. "They had been in those houses for two days with nothing to eat or drink."

Soon there was a small army of evacuees, refugees with no place to go who were deposited on the island of dry land at the edge of I-10 in Metairie. During the long, hot afternoon and into the humid night, the crowd swelled to 2,000 hungry, flood-weary people, residents of the northern neighborhoods of New Orleans and of St. Bernard Parish to the northeast who had been plucked from their roofs and attics.

Barefoot women cradling naked, screaming babies limped from a National Guard rescue truck, everything they owned on their backs after 36 hours of watching the floodwaters breach their doors, topple their refrigerators and drive them to the only high ground available - roofs, trees, attics and bridge spans. Behind them, elderly couples in nightgowns and slippers leaned on each other for support as they walked slowly from the helicopter that rescued them. Many clutched garbage bags holding all the possessions they could salvage; many had no more than damp tank tops and shorts clinging to their bodies. Most were hungry, thirsty and alone.

Chermaine Daniels, 49, had left her flooded one-story house in the Ninth Ward on Tuesday morning, gashing her ankle on a fence as she struggled to swim to a neighbor's two-story house. Later that day, Ms. Daniels and several others were rescued by a uniformed officer in a boat and deposited at an I-10 encampment.

"What do we do now?" she asked the boat driver.

"You're on your own," the driver replied.

An Array of Complaints

Increasingly, local officials also felt that they were on their own.

On Tuesday night, Mayor Nagin complained that while federal officials had agreed that morning that stemming the flow from the breach was the highest priority, "it didn't get done."

Ms. Landrieu said she had talked to Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, on Tuesday and told him: " 'You remember when I flew over the tsunami with you? This was worse than anything we saw.' He said, 'No, you've got to be kidding.' I said, 'I know it's hard to grasp.' And he said, 'We're on it.' " Mr. Frist's office did not respond to requests for comment.

By Wednesday, with little visible response from the federal government, Ms. Landrieu said that she talked to FEMA officials. "I started to sense they were thinking I was a little overwrought, that maybe I was exaggerating a little bit," she said. When she pressed Mr. Brown on when he was going to finally get buses to pick up the people who had been trapped at the Superdome, "he just mumbled," she said.

Mayor Nagin said that he could not remember whether he spoke to President Bush on Wednesday or Thursday, but that the president acknowledged the federal government could have done more and promised to fix the situation.

By then, the state leaders also had an array of complaints. People were infuriated about the lack of National Guard troops to keep order and end the looting. How could the Corps of Engineers, which builds and takes care of the levees, have not had a contingency plan for dealing with a levee breach, especially in such a critical spot? And each time another federal agency offered to help, FEMA seemed to delay in providing guarantees that it would reimburse them later.

For instance, a defense agency had packages of communications gear ready to deploy and held them while awaiting FEMA's approval, according to two congressional aides.

Inside New Orleans, city officials were trying to keep some semblance of control over their city, and failing. The most basic reason was a massive breakdown of the communications system. Cellphones failed and satellite phones did not arrive for several days, according to Representative Charlie Melancon, a Democrat who represents suburban New Orleans.

Ms. Landrieu said on Wednesday: "Our communications systems are not functioning adequately; they are compromised. Not Louisiana's communications system. The United States of America. We didn't have the right communications system for 9/11. We don't have the right communications system now. By that I mean the simplest things. A police chief in a city talking to a mayor in a city wasn't happening while this was going on because their cellphones were down and their radios didn't communicate."

Were The Feds Fiddling While New Orleans Flooded? (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

Republican strategists were hoping that President Bush's show of leadership and empathy during a tour of Mobile, Biloxi, and New Orleans on Friday would offset his lackluster performance earlier last week--and bring hope not only to the populace of the stricken Gulf Coast but to his political shipmates as well. Anger over what appeared to be a slow federal response to the disaster wreaked by Hurricane Katrina had brought virulent criticism from local officials--and from Democrats everywhere--and Bush's own evaluation at week's end that the federal effort was "not acceptable" didn't help. White House insiders admitted Bush wasn't at the top of his game earlier in the week, but they predicted he would right himself and turn public perceptions around--much as he did after 9/11 when, after a tentative first reaction, he delivered a powerful call to arms at the World Trade Center. One aide suggested that Bush pick one person to update the public on hurricane relief efforts--"There is nobody holding round-the-clock briefings like Rudy Giuliani did during 9/11" --and that the president provide "inspirational and heartfelt" rhetoric.

Meanwhile, several GOP strategists worried that the slow federal response would seriously hurt the party in 2006. "People already weren't happy before this happened," said one. "It looks like we're not doing anything." In Washington, therefore, the blame game began, with some calling for Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to get the ax. Administration officials, however, said that firing Chertoff would not be smart in the midst of the Katrina disaster. At any rate, said Joe Lockhart, a Democratic strategist and former White House press secretary for President Bill Clinton, "the buck eventually stops in the Oval Office."

No Shrinking Violet Here at the U.N.

John Bolton is already making waves as U.S. permanent representative to the United Nations. Appointed just a month ago, Bolton is spearheading an effort to redraft a contentious document on U.N. reform, human rights, genocide, and more into a concise statement of principles in sync with Bush administration thinking. Diplomats complain, however, that he proposed so many changes--from slight wording shifts to big stuff, some 750 in all--that he risks scuttling the process that is supposed to churn out the document for an international conclave September 14-16 with more than 170 world leaders--including George Bush.

Meanwhile, in the Middle East...

The Bush administration has frequently outlined its vision for spreading democracy in the Middle East. But a panel of outside experts convened by the National Intelligence Council has issued a worrisome assessment of the region's potential for democratizing. "The odds are still against such a development," it concludes. Several Arab nations have made tentative steps toward limited elections, but the NIC experts deride the moves as "tactical [and] easily reversible." Panelists found that while many people favor democracy, their opinions are "shallow [and] illiberal." Even if these forces gain strength, it would ironically be from Islamist movements. "Most participants believed that significant secular democratic forces are unlikely to emerge," the report says.

With Kenneth T. Walsh, Paul Bedard, Thomas Omestad and Kevin Whitelaw

The Aftermath (TIME)

By NANCY GIBBS

Time, September 5, 2005

New Orleans lives by the water and fights it, a sand castle set on a sponge nine feet below sea level, where people made music from heartache, named their drinks for hurricanes and joked that one day you'd be able to tour the city by gondola.

A city built by rumrunners and slave traders and pirates was never going to play by anyone's rules or plan for the future. So as Katrina, wicked and flirtatious, lingered in the Gulf with her eye on the town, many citizens decided they would stay, stubborn or stoic or too poor to have much choice. As for the ones packing up to go, disaster officials told them to take a look around before they left, because it might never look the same again.

But by the time President Bush touched down in the tormented region on Friday, more than just the topography had changed. Shattered too was a hope that four years after the greatest man-made disaster in our history, we had got smarter about catastrophe, more nimble and visionary in our ability to respond. Is it really possible, after so many commissions and commitments, bureaucracies scrambled and rewired, emergency supplies stockpiled and prepositioned, that when a disaster strikes, the whole newfangled system just seizes up and can't move?

It may be weeks before the lights come back on and months before New Orleans is mopped out, a year before the refugees resettle in whatever will come to function as home, even without anything precious from the days before the flood. But it may take even longer than that before the nature of this American tragedy is clear: whether the storm of '05 is remembered mainly as the worst natural disaster in our history or the worst response to a disaster in our history. Or both.

Watching helpless New Orleans suffering day by day left people everywhere stunned and angry and in ever greater pain. These things happened in Haiti, they said, but not here. "Baghdad under water" is how former Louisiana Senator John Breaux described his beloved city, as state officials told him they feared the death toll could reach as high as 10,000, spread across Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. No matter what the final tally, the treatment of the living, black and poor and old and sick, was a disgrace. The problem with putting it all into numbers is that they stop speaking clearly once they get too big: an estimated half a million refugees, a million people without power, 30,000 soldiers, up to $100 billion in damage. "This is our tsunami," said Biloxi, Miss., Mayor A.J. Holloway. The overstatement is forgivable, for at some point suffering becomes immeasurable, reduced to a hopeless search for a place to sleep, or a bottle of water or a body to bury.

DOJ_NMG_0003009

Mother Nature behaved as everyone warned one day she would, but human nature never fails to surprise. Stripped of safety and comfort, survivors made their choices: greed, mercy, mischief, gallantry, depravity or a surrender to despair. So nurses hand-pumped the ventilators of dying patients after the generators and then the batteries failed, while outside the hospitals, snipers fired at ambulances, and invading looters with guns demanded that doctors turn over whatever drugs they had. Hijackers shot the tires of fleeing vehicles, slapped the spares on after the owners escaped and drove the cars away themselves. Some police officers battled the looters; others joined them. As the floodwaters rose, EMS technicians told TIME they were left stranded at the downtown Hampton Inn by panicking cops who jumped into their private cars to flee the city. In the wretched Superdome, where several people died before they could get out, a young violinist took out his instrument and played a Bach adagio. "These people have nothing," he told a Los Angeles Times reporter. "I have a violin. And I should play for them."

Around the country, people watched the scene in growing horror, as babies and old people and diabetics and those worn out surviving the storm died on live television for all to see. Churches started assembling comfort kits; 500,000 hot meals a day are being prepared by Red Cross disaster volunteers. "I just had a gentleman walk in off the street and write a $10,000 check," said a Red Cross director in Massachusetts. She'd never seen him before; he had no family down there. He just said it seemed the right thing to do.

The private response was all the more urgent because the public one seemed so inept. Somehow Harry Connick Jr. could get to the New Orleans Convention Center and offer help, but not the National Guard. Bush praised the "good work" on Thursday, then called the results "not acceptable" on Friday. By then, 55 nations had offered to pitch in--including Sri Lanka, whose disaster scars are still fresh. "Get off your asses, and let's do something," New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin raged in a radio interview that he ended in tears. But he of all people was in a position to understand the odds. A city known both for its charm and its rot, not just from the termites consuming whole neighborhoods but from a corrupt police force, dissolving tax base, neglected infrastructure, rising poverty and a murder rate that inspired old-timers to pack a gun beneath their tuxes on their way to the Mardi Gras parade, could hardly have been less equipped to cope with a catastrophe that everyone knew was coming. "Half of Louisiana is under water," former lawmaker Billy Tauzin used to say, "and the other half is under indictment." Three of the top state emergency officials were recently indicted for mishandling disaster funds.

Louisiana staggered under the blow, but others all along the Gulf Coast were ravaged as Katrina, still spitting tornadoes and spraying wood and shingles and glass, made her way slowly up to Canada to die at last. A sudden twirl coming ashore meant that the Mississippi coast got smacked the hardest. In many towns, what the winds spared the floods claimed, as the gusts flung water into the streets in storm surges as high as 25 ft. "It was like the houses were playing bumper cars around here," said Biloxi fisherman Alan Layne. There were cemetery coffins tossed around the beach, and disemboweled slot machines, and boats perched up in trees like ridiculous overweight birds. In Gulfport, Miss., the sea-salty air smelled of corpses. At one Catholic church, only the foundation remained--and a sign that read MASS AT 9 A.M. BRING A CHAIR.

John Padgett, a boat captain in Pass Christian, Miss., who runs supplies to the off-coast oil rigs, saw his cottage disappear. But he was able to throw his dogs, a tent, a sleeping bag and a Coleman stove and lantern into his pickup before the storm arrived. He's living in the woods just north of Gulfport off Highway 49. "Everything I own now is in that truck," he told TIME, "but the shelters are too overcrowded and uncomfortable. I was born and raised on this coast, so I'm a good little redneck. I got a bow and arrow to kill food, and that's what I'm going to be eating." Where will he go from here? "I don't know," he said. "But at least in the woods I don't have to smell the dead bodies."

But it was in New Orleans where the cameras converged, a city that had braced for the worst, then briefly exhaled when it looked as if the threat had passed. Several hours after the storm moved through on Monday, some streets were essentially dry. Then shortly after midnight, a section almost as long as a football field in a main levee near the 17th Street Canal ruptured, letting Lake Pontchartrain pour in. The city itself turned into a superbowl, roadways crumbled like soup crackers as the levees designed to protect them were now holding the water in. Engineers tried dropping 3,000-lb. sandbags, but the water just swallowed them. As the days passed, the Army Corps of Engineers, which oversees the levees, admitted they weren't able to assess what might work. Part of the problem was a lack of heavy helicopters; the choppers were all busy doing search and rescue.

The levee breach left 80% of the city immediately submerged and 100,000 people stranded. Canal Street lived up to its name. As the temperature rose, the whole city was poached in a vile stew of melted landfill, chemicals, corpses, gasoline, snakes, canal rats; many could not escape their flooded homes without help. Among those who could, only a final act of desperation would drive them into the streets, where the caramel waters stank of sewage and glittered with the gaudy swirls of oil spills. A New Orleans TV station reported that a woman waded down to Charity Hospital, floating her husband's body along on a door.

For the first time ever, a major U.S. city was simply taken offline, closed down. Food and water and power and phones were gone; authority was all but absent. Most of the people left to cope were least equipped: the ones whose Social Security checks were just about due, or those who made for the Greyhound station only to find it already closed, or those confined to bed or who used a wheelchair. "We're seeing people that we didn't know exist," declared Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) director Michael Brown in a moment of hideous accidental honesty. Rescue workers could hear people pounding on roofs from the inside, trapped in attics as the waters rose. The lucky ones were able to cut holes with knives and axes to reach the open air. Emergency workers hovered from house to house, plucking out the living, leaving bodies behind. The potential for a disaster in the air was such that pilots told TIME reporter Adam Pitluk, who was embedded with them, to help scan the skies for stray news helicopters and sightseers in Cessnas among the flocks of military craft. "It was like a pickup game," said Lieut. Commander Bill Howey, a Navy helicopter pilot. "You got three or four different types of Army helicopters, same for the Navy. Then there's Customs, Coast Guard, Marines, and then there are the news helicopters." While rescuing a group of blind people trapped for five days, a Marine helicopter pilot told TIME's Tim Padgett, "It's like flying into a hornets' nest."

DOJ_NMG_0003010

When Dr. Greg Henderson, a pathologist turned field medic, arrived at the Convention Center on Friday, he was the only doctor for 10,000 people. "They're stacking the dead on the second floor," he told TIME by phone. "People are having seizures in the hallway. People with open running sores, every imaginable disease and disorder, all kinds of psychiatric problems. We have people who haven't had dialysis in several days. They'll be going into kidney failure. I just closed the door on a man who ran out of medicine for his kidney transplant. Very soon his body is going to go into rejection." Henderson went in with New Orleans police, and when people saw him in scrubs, they surged at him from every side. He tried to tend the sickest and the babies first. "The crowds here have gotten a bad rap. There are not many human beings you could cram into a building with 10,000 others, in 105Â° heat, that wouldn't get just a little pissed off." He tried to get them settled and asked them to show him the sickest. "And they lead me. It's not a subtle thing. It's generally the ones who are seizing on the floor."

Helicopters airlifted the sick from around the city to the airport, converted into a field hospital where patients were being pushed around on luggage carts and triaged for evacuation. At Lakefront Airport on the edge of the city, fights broke out for seats on the departing choppers. "The gang bangers," said Jimmy Dennis, 34, a Lakefront Airport fire fighter who had been up for two nights trying to keep order, "couldn't understand that we had to get the sick people out first." Frightened, the small band of fire fighters called in 10 New Orleans police with semiautomatic weapons to settle the crowd.

In the few hospitals left operating, the staff fought to keep people alive until rescue came, only to have days pass with no relief. At Charity Hospital, in the dark but for a lone generator and dying flashlights, nurses who hadn't bathed in days tried to sterilize themselves with hand sanitizer. Two patients on the parking deck died waiting to be evacuated. Caregivers wept as they begged for help that did not come. "They'd been keeping these patients alive for a week with very little in terms of resources," says TIME contributor and CNN correspondent Dr. Sanjay Gupta, "and to see them die on the deck--it really was very difficult."

After Gupta arrived by helicopter on Wednesday, hours passed before it was safe to ferry him past the snipers and across a putrid moat into the hospital building. With a full evacuation still several days away, "people came to me and said, 'Why haven't they taken care of us? Why did they forget us?'" The food supply was down to beans and a few raw vegetables; candy vending machines had long since been emptied. "One of the guys here has been trying to call FEMA, and all he gets is a busy signal or voice mail," Gupta said. The stress was so overwhelming that perhaps half a dozen hospital staff members had to be treated in the psychiatric ward. The basement morgue was flooded, so the growing numbers of bodies were stacked in body bags in the stairwells.

The seething center of the angry Crescent City was the Superdome, refuge of utterly last resort for 25,000 people who had waited out the worst of the storm while the sheet-metal roof peeled like fruit, letting the rains pour in. Soon there was no light, no air, no working toilets. Reports came that four of the weakest died that first night. An elderly man, playing cards and seemingly fine, threw himself over a railing inside the stadium and committed suicide, witnesses told TV reporters. Members of the city's EMS team made their way there only to find anarchy. "We tried to start triaging and getting the special needs in one section," a technician recalls, but his team was overwhelmed by the hungry crowd and retreated with armed guards to Army trucks outside. When a 4th Infantry Division helicopter arrived, all but three of the evacuees had to be wheeled onto the Chinook, the elderly panting like animals suffering heatstroke, their mouths sagging and their tongues heavy and swollen. One paraplegic woman looked as if she had been broiled, her motionless legs beet red on the front and ghostly white on her calves. The evacuees were frightened, of both their plight and the booming helicopter that was there to save them. As the chopper pulled away, mothers down below screamed after it for rescue, holding their children high and sobbing.

Opportunity and desperation make a flammable mix. All along the coast, people broke into parked cars to siphon gas. Police reported that a man in Hattiesburg, Miss., shot his sister in the head in a fight over a bag of ice. A rescue team from Texas that had ferried hundreds of people to safety in their flat-bottom boats were told by a New Orleans sheriff that unless they were armed, they should get out of the city. At one point, rescuer Randy White says, "Someone yelled out to me, 'If you don't get us out by 12 o'clock, we're going to start shooting all the rescuers.'" One man was standing on Canal Boulevard with water up to his chest wearing a mink coat that he had liberated from a store. "This natural disaster is beginning to look like a Watts riot," said a worried congressional aide in Washington as he watched the chaos. "There's something really ugly going on here, something wrong at a deeper level."

DOJ_NMG_0003011

One thing that was wrong may have been that right and wrong had jumped their tracks. For all the scorching images of armed thugs making off with sneakers and wide-screen TVs, the larger reality wasn't as simple as the President's call for "zero tolerance"of looting. Was it wrong to take a bottle of milk from a store when your baby was sobbing and there was no way to pay for it if you tried? When cans of food are scattered in the debris, does taking them amount to theft, or salvage? At one point, police with guns drawn escorted Dr. Henderson through a Walgreens as he emptied the pharmacy of drugs to use in a French Quarter bar turned makeshift clinic. Dudley Fuqua, tall and lean in baggy blue shorts, broke into neighborhood shops and took canned goods, frozen chicken and ribs and cigarettes to his neighbors, who called him a hero. "I was in a building with no food, no water for five nights," Fuqua's neighbor Mohammed Ally, 70, told TIME's Brian Bennett. "They were taking care of the elderly people." Fuqua saw a neighbor using his empty refrigerator as a rowboat to paddle through the water to get help for his pregnant wife. When the buoyant refrigerator tipped, Fuqua dove off a second-story balcony to help and sliced his feet on a rain gutter. "I was going to make sure everyone was O.K."

Only by Friday did some palpable help arrive, in the form of thousands of National Guard troops and lumbering convoys of supplies. Virtually alone, Lieut. General Russel Honore, commanding Joint Task Force Katrina, whom Mayor Nagin referred to as the John Wayne dude, seemed to be moving pieces into place. He was out in the streets with his troops, directing convoys and telling anxious Guardsmen to keep their weapons pointed down. He "came off the doggone chopper," Nagin said, "and he started cussing, and people started moving. And he's getting some stuff done. They ought to give that guy full authority to get the job done, and we can save some people."

Americans sometimes ask what the governmentÂ does and where their tax money goes. Among other things, it pays for all kinds of invisible but essential safety nets and life belts and guardrails that are useless right up until the day they are priceless. Furious critics charged last week that the government had not heard the warnings. Instead it cut the funds for flood control and storm preparations, mangled the chain of command, missed every opportunity. And an angry debate opened about how much the demands of the Iraq war, on both the budget and the National Guard, were eating into the country's ability to protect itself at home. Louisiana Republican Congressman Jim McCrery--working the phones with FEMA, the Army, the White House, state officials--argues that Katrina revealed how much doesn't work. "Clearly, with all the money we've spent, all the focus we have put on homeland security, we are not prepared for a disaster of this proportion whether it's induced by nature or man."

And this time a crucial consolation was missing. After 9/11, whatever the evidence of intelligence failures, many people still saw that attack as almost unimaginable, so brutal and brazen an assault. But Katrina was in the cards, forewarned, foreseen and yet still dismissed until it was too late. That so many officials were caught so unprepared was a failure less of imagination than will, a realization all the more frightening in light of what lies ahead. For if we couldn't help our citizens in an hour of desperate need, how well will we do in six months or a year, when many are still jobless and homeless, but no longer center stage? With reporting by Mike Billips/Biloxi, Massimo Calabresi, Sally B. Donnelly, Mark Thompson and Douglas Waller/Washington, Ellin Martens, Coco Masters and Carolina A. Miranda/New York and Greg Fulton/Atlanta

The (Big) Ripple Effect (USNEWS)

By Marianne Lavelle

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

Most Americans watched the ravages of Katrina's Category 4 winds and floodwaters from a safe distance, but they won't be able to escape the storm's economic aftershocks. From California to Maine, the commute to work will cost more. The price of a morning cup of joe is soon to rise. Anyone visiting a hardware store for building supplies should expect sticker shock. And it might be a good idea to stow away some extra cash to pay this winter's home heating bills.

One of the worst storms to hit the United States in modern times chose as its landfall one of the nation's most vital industrial hubs--a key shipping center and a crossroads of the energy business. As a result, Katrina is not expected to have the silver lining that has been typical of hurricanes and other natural disasters: job creation and the economic stimulus of rebuilding. This hurricane's long-term impact is murky, primarily because it has crippled a quarter of the country's oil and natural gas infrastructure when supplies already had been tight and prices painfully high. "Katrina is something new," says Joel Naroff, president of Naroff Economic Advisors. "Until the levee broke, most economists had a reasonable way of evaluating a natural disaster like this. This time we have the effects on the energy sector and a city under water, which is something we have no idea how to evaluate."

Stormy weather. The economic outlook for the rest of 2005 dimmed as the extent of the hurricane's damage became clear. Ian Shepherdson of High Frequency Economics in Valhalla, N.Y., adjusted his third-quarter-growth forecast down a whole percentage point, from 3 to 4 percent growth in gross domestic product, to 2 to 3 percent. He also predicted the economy will lose 500,000 jobs in September as a result of the storm. Wal-Mart, the nation's biggest retailer, warned Wall Street that Katrina might crimp its sales (the discounter had to close 126 stores in the South because of the storm). Yields on 10-year treasury notes fell sharply, a sign that Wall Street expects a slowing economy.

But few economists were talking recession. The fact that the economy was growing above 3 percent before the storm struck will prevent a downturn, says Anthony Chan, senior economist at JPM organ Fleming Asset Management. In contrast, the 9/11 terrorist attacks happened as the economy was already in recession (though that was not known until later) following the bursting of the Internet stock bubble. Indeed, the unemployment rate for August of 4.9 percent announced last week was the lowest in four years. Post-storm cleanup and rebuilding may create jobs and spur retail spending. The past 10 major hurricanes added 500,000 jobs, on average, to nonfarm payrolls, says Chan, who believes Katrina will cut third- and fourth-quarter growth by about 0.5 percent but will end up boosting the economy over the next 12 months.

Clearly, the energy industry bore the immediate economic impact of the storm. Photos captured the industry's dislocation, such as the oil rigs loosed from their moorings in the Gulf of Mexico that landed on Alabama beaches. But industry officials were hampered in assessing the damage, especially to the eight refineries knocked out of commission. Without electricity, it was impossible to test systems immediately. Power problems also meant a slow restart and reduced operations at the two major pipelines that deliver fuel from the region to the mid-Atlantic and Northeast.

Bigger, Badder Tropical Blows (USNEWS)

By Thomas Hayden and Megan Barnett

U.S. News and World Report, September 6, 2005

Katrina's fury had not yet subsided last week when Germany's environment minister sparked a minitempest of his own. Writing in the Frankfurter Rundschau newspaper, Jurgen Trittin suggested that the hurricane's severity was at least partly a result of global warming and charged that "the American president is closing his eyes to the economic and human costs" of refusing to sign the Kyoto Protocol, which seeks to limit production of climate-warming greenhouse gases.

Trittin's message of "you asked for it" certainly won't be winning him any awards for tact. But with this year threatening to overtake last as the most expensive American hurricane season ever, it's hard not to wonder if maybe he has a point. Are hurricanes getting worse? And if so, is global warming to blame?

Simple enough questions, but the answers are less so. There certainly have been more Atlantic hurricanes recently. According to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the Atlantic has kicked up an average of 7.8 hurricanes and 3.8 major hurricanes per year since 1995, compared with an annual average of just five hurricanes and 1.5 major hurricanes over the preceding 25 years. But most scientists agree that the increased frequency is caused by a natural cycle, not global warming. And over the past 50 years at least, increased numbers of hurricanes in the Atlantic are generally offset by fewer tropical cyclones in the Pacific and Indian oceans; the global average is holding steady at about 90 per year.

Still, there is growing evidence that global warming is making the storms stronger and wetter. For all the unstoppability of a fully formed hurricane, a nascent tropical cyclone is a fairly fussy thing, says climate researcher Tom Murphree of the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, Calif., requiring just the right conditions in the sea and the air to develop into a destructive powerhouse like Katrina. In a June article in Science, head climate analyst Kevin Trenberth of the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo., warned that global warming may already be nudging some of those conditions--like warm surface waters and increased moisture in the air--in directions that intensify storms.

Kerry Emanuel, a professor of atmospheric science at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, thinks he has found evidence of that trend. In a study published last month in Nature, Emanuel calculated the intensity and duration of tropical cyclones for the past 75 years, estimating each storm's destructive power. "When you look at the numbers globally," he says, "you see a 70 to 80 percent increase in the potential destructiveness of tropical cyclones over the last 30 years. That's much more than anyone expected." And that surprising jump, he says "is strongly in concert with increases in the tropical sea surface temperature over the same time period." Many oceanographers are convinced that those warmer seas are the direct result of human-caused global warming.

Building boom. Even though hurricane activity along the Gulf Coast and up the Atlantic is expected to stay high for years, and maybe even intensify, official warnings and expert opinion apparently do nothing to dampen people's desire for living on or near the water. "People think a hurricane might not hit, or it might not flood, for 20 years," says Chip Law, an insurance industry analyst with SNL Financial, a research firm. Coastal development in the hurricane zone has been booming for years, he says, and even after Katrina, "it's not going to slow down."

Understanding hurricanes better may help scientists predict their severity. But thanks to the building boom--aided, in some cases, by taxpayer-backed federal flood insurance--limiting storm damage in the future won't depend on brilliant atmospheric science nearly so much as it will on common-sense planning and regulation.

DOJ_NMG_0003013

SEC Relaxes Rules In Storm Zone (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon And Siobhan Hughes

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

The Securities and Exchange Commission will extend filing deadlines and suspend requirements to deliver documents to areas affected by Hurricane Katrina.

"We've got to do everything humanly possible to help our fellow citizens," SEC Chairman Chris Cox said. "No one in the region should have to worry about attempting to file government documents in near-impossible circumstances."

At the same time, the agency warned that it is "on the lookout for Katrina-related securities scams" and vowed to vigorously prosecute those who try to defraud hurricane victims.

The SEC plans to help broker-dealers provide access to accounts held at offices that no longer are operable. Mutual-fund companies and other securities firms won't be required to deliver prospectuses and other documents in the affected area.

"We are also working to ensure that individuals and families who suddenly find themselves in desperate financial circumstances have access to representatives of securities firms that hold their assets," Mr. Cox said.

The SEC established hot lines to answer questions and to identify the needs of those in the securities industry affected by the hurricane. The SEC can be reached at 202-551-3300 or by email at cfhotline@sec.gov.

The National Association of Securities Dealers published a notice outlining procedures for allowing customers continued access to their accounts. The NASD also said its New Orleans District Office, whose operations cover Louisiana, Mississippi, Kentucky, Arkansas, Oklahoma and Tennessee, would be closed indefinitely. The office's enforcement caseload is being transferred to the Chicago district office.

In Louisiana, state regulators asked displaced brokers and money managers to contact the Louisiana Securities Commission to provide updated information that could be passed along to inquiring investors. The phone number to contact is 225-925-4660.

In Mississippi, the business-regulation division plans to reopen today after being closed because of power outages. Mississippi residents with securities-related questions can call 1-888-236-6167.

Foreign Aid Flows In For Storm Victims; 131 Britons Missing (USAT)

By César G. Soriano

USA Today, September 6, 2005

LONDON — British Prime Minister Tony Blair, assailed for doing too little to help Britons caught in Hurricane Katrina, apologized Monday and sent foreign service officers to aid survivors.

“I'm really sorry if there have been difficulties. … But I can assure you some of these staff have been working round the clock,” said Blair, who was in Beijing, for trade talks with China. As of Monday, 131 British citizens were listed as missing in the hurricane.

News of the disaster has dominated British and continental European media since Katrina struck last week. Foreign criticism of slow U.S. relief efforts has combined with official statements of sympathy and aid offers from at least 70 nations, including countries usually on the receiving end of U.S. and other foreign help. Among them was Bangladesh, which Monday pledged $1 million.

British survivors who returned over the weekend told local newspapers they had been stuck in New Orleans' Superdome without help. Some said they were referred to a non-existent British consulate in New Orleans. Others said they felt intimidated as white people in the mostly African-American crowd of displaced persons.

“The army told us to stick in a group and for the women to sit in the middle with the men around the outside and be ready to defend ourselves,” Will Nelson, 21, told The Times of London.

Monday, Britain began airlifting a half-million food ration packs to the USA. The British Embassy in Washington said Britain, which holds the rotating presidency of the 25-member European Union, was coordinating the response of other member states. The European Parliament opened its plenary session Monday with a minute of silence to honor the hurricane victims. “The United States is dealing with a tragedy of incomparable dimensions. Victims will be numerous,” Parliament President Josip Borrell said.

Germany sent 25 tons of food. Italy shipped meals ready to eat (MREs). France flew in tents and blankets from Martinique, a French possession in the Caribbean. The United States accepted a Greek offer of two cruise ships to house evacuees, Greek spokesman Theodoros Rousopoulos said.

U.S. embassies provided lists of supplies needed including forklifts, generators, veterinarian supplies and baby formula and diapers.

DOJ_NMG_0003014

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who traveled Sunday to her home state of Alabama, said U.S. authorities already have used helicopters from Canada and Singapore and Air Canada aircraft to evacuate survivors.

Cuban President Fidel Castro on Sunday repeated an offer of 1,586 Cuban doctors equipped with medical supplies, but he said U.S. authorities had not responded.

Rice expressed appreciation for the foreign offers. “People have said that America has been so generous … in other places, and now it is time to be generous to America.”

But media reaction suggested that the U.S. image, already battered by Iraq, had taken another blow. “Hurricane Katrina has revealed that the U.S. is also fragile at home,” wrote the al-Khaleej newspaper in the United Arab Emirates on Monday.

Hurricane Aid Pours In (CSM)

By Peter Ford

The Christian Science Monitor, September 6, 2005

PARIS - Governments around the world rushed aid and relief teams to America's stricken southern states on Monday - some repaying past favors the United States has offered them to recover from natural disasters - while their citizens continued to express amazement and dismay at the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

In a dramatic reversal of usual roles, small nations such as Sri Lanka - badly hit by last December's tsunami - have extended their hands to the most powerful country on earth. And after initial ambivalence, American officials were accepting offers of help from over 50 countries with thanks.

"My country needs a lot of help because it has suffered a catastrophe that has no historical parallel," US ambassador to Spain, Eduardo Aguirre, said in Madrid on Monday, after asking the Spanish government for generators, medical equipment, pumps, and oil. "The most important thing right now is to know that we have friends."

Even America's foreign friends, however, have been free with their criticism of the way the US authorities handled rescue and relief operations in New Orleans last week. Repeated TV images of bodies floating in the floodwaters, crowds of homeless people abandoned to their fate for days, and looters emptying shops have raised harsh questions in Europe about the nature of American society.

"America's dark underbelly has been laid bare," charged London's Daily Mail in a headline Saturday, above a commentary drawing attention to the way in which the large majority of flood victims are poor and black.

As the scale of the disaster that hit Louisiana, Alabama, and Mississippi became clear, and Washington reversed its earlier decision that it did not need foreign aid, its allies readied thousands of tons of emergency supplies and hundreds of millions of dollars to feed, shelter, and care for displaced Americans forced from their homes.

As part of a NATO plan, the British government has flown 500,000 military ration packs to the afflicted zone, while the German government has sent food and is readying a hospital ship in case it is needed.

The French Red Cross has dispatched 17 logistics experts, trained in food distribution, shelter management, and other emergency skills, along with thousands of "family kits" containing food, medical, and hygiene items that had been stocked in Guadeloupe, ready for a disaster in the Caribbean.

The French and Italian governments put their military transport planes to work Sunday, carrying blankets, cots, tents, and inflatable dinghies, but there were signs that the sudden flood of relief supplies was overwhelming US authorities.

The Swedish Rescue Services Agency said Sunday it had postponed sending two portable water purification stations to New Orleans until the authorities were able to install them at Louis Armstrong International Airport.

Asian countries were kicking in too, led by South Korea, which has pledged $30 million and 40 rescue workers. A fleet of Singaporean Chinook helicopters is already lifting survivors from roofs in New Orleans, and the Thai prime minister said Monday that his offer of 100 doctors and nurses had been accepted.

Even tiny Sri Lanka, which is still struggling to rebuild after last December's tsunami, has promised $25,000 to the American Red Cross.

In the Middle East, wealthy Gulf countries have promised funds to pay for the posthurricane clean-up: Kuwait - freed from Iraqi occupation 14 years ago by US-led troops - has pledged $500 million, the largest single donation so far. Even countries unfriendly to the US, such as Iran and Syria, have offered help. Cuba, too, has offered to send 1,100 doctors to Houston, if Washington wants them.

From Iraq, however, came a jarring note: Al Qaeda in Iraq, led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, issued a statement on the Internet calling Katrina divine retribution. "God's great wrath has hit the head of the oppressors," the statement read.

Less vicious criticism of the US has been widely voiced in Europe and elsewhere, however, as foreigners expressed their bewilderment at the apparent inability of the government to care for its most desperate citizens in a crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0003015

Commentators have returned time and again to the fact that the vast majority of flood victims, left to fend for themselves, are poor African-Americans. "America has been forced to wake up to the racial injustice that has been its historic curse," Jonathan Freedland wrote in Monday's edition of the left-leaning London daily The Guardian.

Others, including a BBC reporter in New Orleans, have been dismayed by the speed at which social ties broke down under pressure: There were no reports of tourists in Sri Lanka or Thailand being mugged after the tsunami, they point out, nor of looters shooting at policemen.

That might, perhaps, help explain one striking aspect of the international reaction to the tragedy in New Orleans and surrounding areas: It does not appear to have sparked the spontaneous outpouring of charitable solidarity in Europe or elsewhere that last December's tidal wave provoked in millions of people worldwide who sent donations.

As fleets of transport aircraft ferried emergency aid to America from around the world, pointed out Andre Kaspi, a history professor at the Sorbonne University in Paris, "this is intergovernmental solidarity. It is not the popular solidarity that was shown after the tsunami," he told French radio.

US Thanks NATO For Help With Katrina Disaster (REU)

Reuters, September 6, 2005

The top U.S. envoy to NATO thanked European allies on Monday for generous pledges of support in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, which has devastated New Orleans and U.S. Gulf Coast states.

NATO said on Sunday it was coordinating offers of help from its 26 members after Washington asked it and the European Union for help in dealing with the crisis, which has left hundreds and possibly thousands dead.

"The United States has been enormously grateful for the outpouring of support, both emotional and concrete, from allies over the past week," Victoria Nuland, the U.S. ambassador to NATO, said in a statement issued in Brussels.

"We have had specific offers from almost every ally... This once again proves the effectiveness and resilience of this alliance and its value for the American people and all allies."

NATO has activated its internal disaster response center to coordinate offers of help, as it did during a bout of flooding in Romania and Bulgaria earlier this summer. It has also sent an officer to work at the U.S. Federal Emergency Management Agency.

The United States has issued a list of things it needs most to tackle the disaster, ranging from financial aid to bedding, ready-to-eat meals, medical supplies and other humanitarian aid. It is not seeking military equipment such as helicopters.

France has said it is readying 300 tents, 980 field beds and other material for the United States, while over the weekend Germany sent two German army Airbus planes loaded with a combined 25 tonnes of food rations.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

Dad's wisdom

During an appearance to appeal for Katrina relief funds in Houston yesterday, former President George Bush was asked how he felt about the unending criticism over the White House response to the hurricane, which has raged in much of the press this week.

Mr. Bush said as a father he does not like the criticism leveled at his son, President Bush, but added, "As a president, it goes with the territory," according to the Associated Press.

Clinton tag team

Hmmm. Could this portend political maneuvers to come? At that very same fundraising appeal yesterday, former President Bill Clinton was also asked about the government's response to Katrina.

"I think there should be an analysis of what happened." Mr. Clinton said, benevolently adding, "The time to do that is after some time passes."

His wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, was in the aggressor's role, however, calling the hurricane "a wake-up call." The New York Democrat is already urging the White House to set up a "Katrina Commission" in a letter sent to Mr. Bush.

"It has become increasingly evident that our nation was not prepared," Mrs. Clinton wrote, according to Agence France-Presse yesterday.

Mrs. Clinton also claimed that the pace of relief efforts "seems to confirm that our ability to respond to cataclysmic disasters has not been adequately addressed."

She plans to propose legislation to separate the Federal Emergency Management Agency from the Department of Homeland Security and make it into another Cabinet-level agency.

DOJ_NMG_0003016

A cultural moment

Impoverished Afghanistan will give $100,000 for Katrina relief efforts, the U.S. Embassy has announced.

U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann thanked the Afghan people Sunday during a ceremony at which the aid was pledged by the government on behalf of the people of Afghanistan.

"Their compassion and generosity bears testimony to the strength of the ties between our two peoples," Mr. Neumann said, according to Reuters news agency.

Greatest show on Earth

Is the U.S. Senate getting ready to be the "world's greatest deliberative body" or a political circus during upcoming confirmation hearings for U.S. Supreme Court nominee Judge John G. Roberts Jr.?

Newsday's Raymond Keating wants to know, advising viewers and voters to "keep an eye on how their own senators behave," particularly Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat.

"Schumer's problem is he seems to forget he is not president and does not get to pick who sits on the federal bench. He also twists the Senate's 'advice and consent' role on court selections, promising to further undermine confidence in the process and the courts.

"New York's senior senator portrays himself as moderation's great defender. ... Schumer summed up the activist view: 'The Supreme Court makes law.' " Mr. Keating writes. "That's a gross misunderstanding, or misrepresentation, of our system of government. The Supreme Court is not supposed to make law, but to apply the law and the Constitution."

"It's also clear that Schumer evaluates judicial nominees based on a set of ideological issues. That's reflected in the long list of questions Schumer handed Roberts, seeking the judge's views on topics like campaign finance, abortion, the death penalty and environmental policy. If such questions become the norm, then nomination hearings will continue to degrade into vicious political games," Mr. Keating concluded.

Questions of the day

The National Pro-Life Action Center has five questions for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. that could provide the nation with a "foundational understanding of Judge Roberts' judicial temperament without asking him to 'forecast' or 'prejudge' any cases that may come before the high court," says director Paul Chaim Schenck.

The group wants to know:

·Do basic human rights come only from government or are they rooted in something that transcends government?

·Is man's inherent human nature fixed, or does raw political power determine who is and is not a member of the human family?

·Is law merely the construct of jurists and lawmakers, or is it based first on principles of morals and justice?

·Is the proper role of the judiciary to restrain/limit itself to interpreting law or does it possess de facto legislative powers?

·Should the judiciary share power equally with the other two branches of government (the legislative and executive) or should its powers transcend them?

End of finger-pointing

It's time to neutralize the caustic Katrina blame game, according to the Chicago Tribune's Dennis Byrne yesterday.

"The ease and earnestness with which people express the knee-jerk belief that one of the most destructive and powerful forces in nature could have been defeated 'if only ...' belies a troubling level of ignorance or naivete," he writes.

"To suggest that all 'they' have to do to beat such a force is to build a sea wall 10 feet higher is screwy. So is the idea that all the food, water and shelter that a million refugees need can be positioned, as if overnight, within a day's ride of the destruction."

"The bigger story is the determination and compassion of the rescuers. So is the patience and courage of all those stranded, struggling, homeless people who have nothing left. How many of us would have so patiently tolerated such conditions? When patience overcomes desperation, it is a huge, moving story," Mr. Byrne wrote.

"This is no apologia ... Rather it is a disagreement with the simplistic view that 'they' can prevent or ameliorate every imaginable calamity. And if 'they' don't, it's proof of someone's incompetence, greed or callousness."

Beach Blanket Bingo (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, September 6, 2005

Rich is one word that comes to mind when we think of Rep. Darrell Issa (R-Calif.). Skimpy may now be another.

We hear Issa, the second richest Member of Congress, shocked his staff when he showed up at an office whitewater tubing outing wearing bikini briefs. Yes, a Speedo, a banana hammock, a ... well, you get the drift. A Congressional aide who relayed the story to HOH said Issa was "out there" for all to see, including the gals, who were sporting their own itsy-bitsy teeny-weeny bikinis.

DOJ_NMG_0003017

One person who attended the outing laughed uncontrollably when HOH asked if Issa wore "a Speedo" but managed, between guffawing, to say that the Congressman didn't wear his revealing suit the entire time. He wore swim trunks over his bikini for much of the tubing and then took them off while he was drying off and hanging out with the gang, the source said.

Issa's office declined to comment to HOH about the Congressman's choice in bathing attire.

Congressman Elmo? It must have been a little confusing for the residents of tiny Silverton, Colo., when they tuned into a local radio interview of a guest they thought was Rep. John Salazar (D-Colo.), their Congressman, but who answered a question with, "Tee hee hee hee. Baby Elmo's happy!" There's more to the answer than meets the ear.

It was, indeed, Baby Elmo, not Congressman Salazar, who was giggling and asking for his "ba-ba" on the low-power station, independent KSJC. After Salazar blew off the host of one of the station's rock 'n' chat shows, the free-spirited libertarian host, Nick Sustana, decided to interview his child's Baby Elmo doll instead, pretending that the "Sesame Street" character was Salazar.

"You have to appease your base at some point," Sustana said in one of his first questions, "but you face a unique challenge: 98 percent of your base are less than 2 years old and won't be eligible to vote until the year 2021. How do you plan to win re-election given this seemingly insurmountable challenge?"

The host also attacked "Salazar" for pretending to have rural values when he grew up on a famous street in an urban area with a bunch of misfits. "One of your best friends lived in a trashcan. Another was some goth who thought he was Count Dracula and one youngster there was usually so stoned all he could think about was eating cookies 24 hours a day. Tell me, Congressman, what rural values did they teach you?"

The outrageous interview went on and on, with the host accusing his guest of soiling himself and crying all the time and Congressman Baby Elmo responding with "goo goo ga ga" and "tee hee hee." At one point, Sustana declared mockingly to the people of Silverton — population 531 — that by standing him up, "Congressman Salazar just urinated in all of Silverton's corn flakes."

Well, if he did, he tinkled in his family's corn flakes, too! Salazar has two elderly cousins who live in Silverton who likely would not be pleased to have their public servant cousin likened to Baby Elmo. Sustana told HOH that his station manager called in the middle of his tirade to say "tone it down" on account of Salazar kin living in the area.

Salazar was unaware that Baby Elmo was taking questions on his behalf, but his spokeswoman took the joke — and the obnoxious host's corn flakes jab — with good humor. "Congressman Salazar represents a large district and even though he begins each morning with the 'breakfast of champions' he can't be in two places at once," Nayerra Haq told HOH. "Despite being upstaged by Elmo, John would be 'tickled' to be on the show next time he is in Silverton."

A Hurricane of Support. While devastated residents of New Orleans could not get relief soon enough, plenty of Washingtonians were eager to help inside the Beltway. Bipartisan fundraisers galore have been planned all over town, mostly to benefit the Red Cross and all, of course, promising libations and entertainment for the recess weary.

The biggie of the Big Easy parties is Wednesday night at the lobbying firm Jones Day, a joint fundraiser by the Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi and Florida state societies. The folk-funky group Down Dexter is opening for the popular Wil Gravatt Band. Organizers were hoping to convince former Louisiana Sen. John Breaux (D) to serve as VIP emcee for the event. Reps. Alcee Hastings (D-Fla.), Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and Charlie Melancon (D-La.) were among those who had RSVP'd as of Friday afternoon.

Admission prices come in three ranges: $20, $1,000 and $2,000 per person. The party's fundraising goal is $50,000, all of which will go to the American Red Cross Disaster Relief Fund for victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Run, Don't Drink. For the non-lushes who want to help disaster victims — or for those who can at least burn the candle at both ends — there will be a Gulf Coast Relief Run on Sept. 17 in Old Town Alexandria. The 5K race is being sponsored by Roll Call, the Great Harvest Bread Company and Mizuno USA.

VIP runners include none other than Ragin' Cajun James Carville, his wife, Mary Matalin, and sports commentator Tony Kornheiser. The cost to enter the race is $25, which includes a T-shirt. Again, all proceeds will go toward the Red Cross relief fund.

Double Trap For Foreign Workers (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

BILOXI, Miss., Sept. 5 - Like so many other people here, Pedro, a landscaper from Chiapas, Mexico, is desperately trying to get out of Biloxi. He wants to take his wife, Anna, who is eight months pregnant, someplace cleaner and safer, wherever that might be.

DOJ_NMG_0003018

But aside from being low on gas like everyone else, Pedro, who would not give his last name because he is undocumented, is nervous about traveling in a city swarming with police officers and National Guard troops.

Bran Dize, a prep cook from Spanish Town, Jamaica, near Kingston, worries that Hurricane Katrina may suddenly have made him an illegal immigrant because, he said, his guest worker visa requires him to work at a casino - the Beau Rivage - that, for all practical purposes, no longer exists.

Hurricane Katrina has left its victims feeling vulnerable and uncertain, but for many noncitizens trapped here, the anxiety is especially acute because they worry that they will jeopardize their legal status if they try to leave.

There are worries, too, about those who may not have survived the storm. The Mexican government has opened two mobile consulates in the affected areas, one in Mobile, Ala., and the other in Baton Rouge, La., to begin looking for tens of thousands of their citizens reported missing. The authorities in Mexico estimated that 145,000 Mexicans live in the area. At a tense meeting on Friday with immigration officials from the Jamaican government, a group of about 40 Jamaican guest workers from the Grand Casino, the Beau Rivage and the Casino Magic fired a battery of tough questions.

"Will we get paid for the remaining three months left in our contracts?" one woman asked from the back of the crowd gathered at the Fairview apartments here. "We don't have plane tickets back to Jamaica," another said. "Who will pay for these?"

Solid answers were in short supply. "I'm looking into this right now, but you have to be patient," said Barbara Dacosia, who oversees the 950 or so Jamaicans who work in casinos along the Gulf Coast in a nine-month guest worker program. "We're going to do some practical things, and we're going to do some tropical things, and that means we're going to pray."

Much like these immigrants, the city of Biloxi, defined over the past century by its transient culture of summer vacationers, sailors and gamblers, is at a standstill. Boats have been washed ashore. The number of visitors has dropped to zero from 10 million a year. The floating casinos have sunk. And movement is difficult.

"We tried to get gas, but when we got to the counter with our container, the man waved his hand and said no," Pedro, the Mexican landscaper, said in Spanish. "We couldn't say anything because we thought he might get mad and call the police."

José, also a Chiapas native who did not want to give his last name because he is undocumented, said that the only people he knew outside of Biloxi lived in Denver. But aside from having less than $20 left, he said he was also unsure whether he could make it that far without getting caught by the immigration authorities.

Like the many immigrants who came to the area as cheap labor to help rebuild Biloxi after Hurricane Ivan, José arrived in the area in September 2004 looking for contract work. "If I get a chance to get out of here, I'm going," he said. "This is all I know."

Ian Nelson, a Jamaican guest worker who for the last six months had been a housekeeper for the Grand Casino, said he would also rather not stay in the country. But as the only source of income for his parents in Jamaica, Mr. Nelson said he hoped the casino would find work for him in another state.

"I doubt they are going to help us," he said, "because no one from the company has even checked to see if their workers who are stranded here are O.K." About 344 Jamaican guest workers were in Biloxi, based at the three casinos in the city, said Ms. Dacosia, the chief liaison for the Jamaican Central Labor Organization. It is not clear whether they will be returned home without pay or placed in other jobs, she said.

Mr. Nelson said he had never felt more trapped in his life.

"I have come and gone under the work program for the past four years and never had troubles with the program," he said. "But I paid for my own plane ticket and now I am here and I don't know if I will get the work and money that I was promised."

After Katrina, Insurance Costs To Rise (WSJ)

By Theo Francis

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

Home and car owners in the Gulf Coast states can expect to see substantial increases in their insurance premiums in coming months, while rate rises could spread more broadly if insurance-company losses from Hurricane Katrina continue to climb.

Early estimates of damage to insured property from the massive hurricane range from $14 billion to $35 billion, with some catastrophe-modeling companies sharply raising their latest forecasts late last week as they gained details about the extent of the devastation from aerial surveys and learned more about damage to offshore oil production. That could make Katrina the costliest U.S. storm on record. Total economic losses -- including damage to uninsured property and flood damage -- is expected to exceed $100 billion.

"No matter where it falls in that range, it puts additional rate pressure on commercial-property and home owners in that region," says Robert Hartwig, chief economist for the Insurance Information Institute, a trade group in New York.

Past calamities suggest that broad increases are possible when the industry receives an unprecedented shock. After 1992's Hurricane Andrew -- currently No. 1 among natural disasters, at $21.6 billion of insured losses in today's dollars -- homeowners' rates spiked in states beyond the storm-hit region and insurers began offering less-generous policy provisions. After the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, which triggered $35.9 billion of insurance claims in today's dollars, commercial-insurance rates soared across the country.

DOJ_NMG_0003019

So far, many analysts have been wary of predicting steep rate increases outside the hardest-hit areas, anticipating that insurance regulators elsewhere would be reluctant to approve rate increases for car and home owners in their states if Katrina, as devastating a human tragedy as it has been, eats up only a tiny fraction of the property-casualty sector's overall $400 billion in capital. The more depleted insurers' capital, the assets insurers can draw on to pay claims, the more pressure they would feel to seek rate increases.

"Obviously, the risks to a place like New Orleans were underestimated, and the cost of insurance in those exposed areas will go up," Allstate Corp. Chairman and Chief Executive Edward M. Liddy said in an interview Friday.

Beyond premium increases, homeowners in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama could see stark changes in the insurance landscape. Thanks to Hurricane Andrew, Florida homeowners now pay steep deductibles for hurricanes -- often 3% or more of a home's insured value. Many can find coverage only from a state-run insurer of last resort. After the four hurricanes that struck Florida last year, several insurers, including Allstate, stopped writing new policies in the state; many are seeking stiff rate increases from state regulators. Most insurance policies pay damages for wind, including wind-driven rain, but don't cover damage from flooding. The federal government offers residential flood insurance.

The estimates for Katrina-related losses are based on unusually imperfect data. As of Friday, neither the firms that specialize in estimates nor insurers had gotten close enough to flooded New Orleans or Mississippi coast cities to actually survey the damage. Moreover, catastrophe-modeling firms say some wind-speed sensors failed in the storm. At least one firm is taking aerial photos to try to make up for the lack of data.

For insurers, raising rates locally or nationally won't change what is likely to be a significant third-quarter hit to profits, albeit after enjoying strong results in recent years. In the longer term, raising rates could help profitability -- and leave the industry still better-prepared to face similar disasters -- at least until the next time the industry vies for market share, triggering one of its recurring price wars.

Late last week, as TV footage showed looting and fires in New Orleans, a report by Moody's Investors Service cited "unusual characteristics" of Katrina that could make it "relatively more costly for insurers than their recent experiences with Florida hurricanes might suggest, and may cause the industry's insured losses to exceed the midpoint of preliminary estimates, possibly by a large amount."

Moody's noted that automobile claims will be higher than in other storms due to the extensive flooding; although flooding isn't covered under most homeowners' policies, submerged cars could prove costly to auto insurers. The flooding in New Orleans also could lead to "a meaningful amount of disputes between insureds and insurance companies," said Jeffrey Berg, a Moody's senior analyst, as policyholders seek proceeds despite the flooding exclusion.

Also pointing toward higher costs: "the extensive infrastructure damage which will complicate the task of remediating losses, and expected demand surge in labor and material costs," said Moody's Group Managing Director Ted Collins, a co-author of the report.

And the longer New Orleans or other locations are sealed off by authorities, the more insurers will have to pay in business-interruption claims, which compensate commercial policyholders for revenue lost from covered perils.

"Response time is the enemy in all natural disasters and impacts everyone including the insurance industry," says Richard Clinton, president of EQECAT, a catastrophe-modeling company that on Friday raised its estimate of insurance losses to between $14 billion and $22 billion, from an earlier estimate of $9 billion to $16 billion.

Any effort by insurers to seek increases may be fought by consumer groups. Insurers have little excuse for seeking rate increases nationally, or even within the hardest-hit states, maintains Robert Hunter, a former Texas insurance commissioner and director of insurance for the Consumer Federation of America. Despite the four Florida hurricanes last year with a combined $23.7 billion in claims in today's dollars, he says that rates dropped for homeowners' policies last year outside Florida and "the profits continued to roll in," setting industry records in this year's first and second quarters. Moreover, he argues that current rates incorporate the likelihood of severe storms. Given insurers' extensive computer modeling, "the fact that one of the [storm] events happens shouldn't be a surprise," he says.

Bush Nominates Roberts As Chief Justice (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003020

President Bush nominated John G. Roberts Jr. yesterday as the 17th chief justice of the United States, promoting his nominee for associate justice to lead the Supreme Court and the rest of the federal judiciary even before Roberts was confirmed for the first assignment.

Moving swiftly as he copes with the devastation of Hurricane Katrina, Bush announced his decision just two days after the death of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and 48 days after picking Roberts to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. In elevating Roberts, Bush chose the candidate most likely to be confirmed in short order by the Senate, which was poised to ratify the appeals court judge for O'Connor's seat.

The move could ensure Bush's influence on the judiciary long after his presidency ends. In the past half-century, only two other presidents have had the opportunity to name a chief justice to a lifetime appointment. A former Rehnquist clerk, Roberts shares a philosophical outlook with the man he would succeed and, at age 50, would be the youngest chief justice since John Marshall was appointed in 1801, potentially giving him decades to shape the court's direction.

Since O'Connor agreed to remain until her successor is confirmed, the move means that the court could open its next term on Oct. 3 with nine justices sitting. But in shifting Roberts to the center chair, Bush now must find someone else to replace O'Connor, in some ways an even more consequential choice because she cast the swing vote on issues such as affirmative action, abortion and the death penalty for many years.

"It is in the interest of the court and the country to have a chief justice on the bench on the first full day of the fall term," Bush said in the Oval Office before flying to the Gulf Coast for a second time to inspect relief efforts. "The Senate is well along in the process of considering Judge Roberts's qualifications. They know his record and his fidelity to the law. I'm confident that the Senate can complete hearings and confirm him as chief justice within a month."

Roberts, who appeared alone at Bush's side, seemed mindful that he would replace his mentor rather than join him on the court. "I am honored and humbled by the confidence that the president has shown in me," he said. "And I'm very much aware that if I am confirmed, I would succeed a man I deeply respect and admire, a man who has been very kind to me for 25 years."

The Senate Judiciary Committee, which had been scheduled to open hearings on Roberts's confirmation to O'Connor's seat today, decided yesterday to postpone the process probably until Monday in deference to Rehnquist, who will be buried at Arlington National Cemetery tomorrow.

The same liberal groups that opposed Roberts for associate justice declared him even more unfit for chief. "His views are very much out of sync with civil rights, women's rights, privacy," said Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice. "Certainly reviewing so many of those memos and briefs and papers he authored makes one wonder whether he understands how the law affects ordinary people."

Several Senate Democrats argued that Roberts should receive greater scrutiny for chief justice. "The stakes are higher and the Senate's advice and consent responsibility is even more important," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), adding that "the Senate must be vigilant in considering this nomination."

But there was no indication that his nomination faces any significant threat. "He will be an excellent chief," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). "I still expect Judge Roberts to be confirmed before the Supreme Court starts its new term on October 3."

Bush always had Roberts in mind for the next chief justice, aides said yesterday. Roberts was first secretly interviewed for a Supreme Court slot in April in anticipation that the cancer-stricken Rehnquist would retire or die. When O'Connor surprised the White House by announcing her retirement in July and Rehnquist declared that he was not stepping down, Bush decided to appoint Roberts to O'Connor's seat.

Even then, aides said yesterday that the president intended to elevate Roberts to chief justice whenever the job came open. "This had been something in the back of the president's mind in case such a scenario came into being, if the chief justice had retired," said White House press secretary Scott McClellan. "The president, when he met with [Roberts], knew he was a natural-born leader."

Bush summoned Roberts to the White House on Sunday, and the two met in the residential quarters at 5:30 p.m. for 30 to 45 minutes, McClellan said. White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. sat in at first and then left the two alone. Bush called Roberts back to the White House at 7:15 a.m. yesterday and offered him the job. Bush made the announcement 45 minutes later.

Card discussed the decision with Frist, Reid, Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and the committee's ranking Democrat, Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), while the White House counsel's office called Justice John Paul Stevens, the court's senior member and acting chief, to inform him of the decision. Bush did not call O'Connor to tell her that her retirement may be postponed until after he was on Air Force One flying to Louisiana.

Although the chief justice has no more votes than his eight brethren, he presides over their conferences, sets the initial agenda for considering cases and, when in the majority, assigns which justice will write a ruling, defining the extent of its reach.

He also wields a variety of administrative and policy powers not only over the high court but the broader federal judiciary and has a number of unique responsibilities, such as presiding over presidential impeachment trials and appointing the court that reviews secret wiretaps by U.S. intelligence agencies.

Most chief justices have been appointed from outside the Supreme Court, but in the past century they typically had long tenures on lower courts or had served as governors, Cabinet secretaries or, in one case, president. With just two years on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, Roberts boasts no such credential and would be much younger than the colleagues he would lead. Three and a half decades his senior, Stevens, 85, was already a justice when Roberts was an undergraduate at Harvard University.

But Roberts has the advantage of being well known to the justices, having argued 39 cases before the Supreme Court. "He can pull it off because they really respect him," said Leonard A. Leo, executive vice president of the Federalist Society, a conservative legal group. "What other justices look for in a chief justice is honesty, straight-shooting and smarts. That's what they want, and that's what they'll get."

Roberts grew up in Indiana, graduated magna cum laude from Harvard Law School, clerked for Rehnquist, worked as a lawyer in Ronald Reagan's Justice Department and White House, and served as principal deputy solicitor general under Kenneth W. Starr in the George H.W. Bush administration. A decade of private practice earned him the status of one of Washington's most accomplished appellate lawyers before the president put him on the appeals court in 2003.

Documents released from his government service in the past few weeks revealed Roberts to be a strong conservative with a sharp pen opposed to many affirmative action programs, open to more religion in public arenas and deeply skeptical of what he called the "so-called right to privacy" that undergirds abortion and other rights established by the Supreme Court.

As the Senate digests that record in coming weeks, Bush will turn his attention to his second nomination, although advisers believe he is likely to wait to make an announcement until after the final Roberts confirmation vote to avoid complicating that process and to allow him to publicly focus on disaster relief in the Gulf Coast.

Conservative allies will press the White House to pick another Roberts. "He's a perfect fulfillment of the president's promise," said Wendy E. Long, chief counsel to the Judicial Confirmation Network, a group dedicated to promoting judges who will strictly interpret the Constitution. "There's great happiness with him. If there were another Judge Roberts out there, or the closest thing, I think that would be perfect."

In this view, appeals judges such as J. Michael Luttig, Edith Hollan Jones, Priscilla R. Owen and Emilio M. Garza would be leading contenders. Appellate judge Edith Brown Clement, who fled her home in New Orleans because of Katrina, was a finalist when Roberts was chosen and, although not considered for chief justice, she could again be on the list for associate justice. So, too, could Judge J. Harvie Wilkinson III, who was interviewed by Bush in July, although at 60 he may be older than the president would like to ensure a long tenure.

The most prominent candidate on Bush's list is Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, his Texas friend who would be the first nation's Hispanic justice, but conservatives vocally oppose him out of fear that he is a closet moderate.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), a Bush ally, said yesterday that the president will probably name a woman or a minority to replace the nation's first female justice and offered a vigorous defense of Gonzales. "He would be a very good nominee and one that I would be happy to support," Cornyn said. "I've read about these concerns from some conservatives, and I really wonder where they are getting some of these strange ideas."

Democrats Seek Increased Scrutiny Of Roberts (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, September 6, 2005

Key Democrats called for greater scrutiny of John Roberts on Monday after President George W. Bush nominated him to head the U.S. Supreme Court rather than be an associate justice.

Their call was seconded by liberal groups, which have voiced concerns about Roberts' record on civil and women's rights in an uphill bid to deny the 50-year-old conservative a seat on the high court.

But Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican, hailed Bush's decision and predicted Roberts would win Senate confirmation as chief justice of the Supreme Court before the court begins its new term on October 3.

"This nomination certainly raises the stakes," said Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), a New York Democrat and a member of the Judiciary Committee that will hold confirmation hearings.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), a Massachusetts Democrat, said, "Before the Senate acts on John Roberts' new nomination, we should know even more about his record, and we should know whom the president intends to propose to nominate as a replacement for Sandra Day O'Connor."

DOJ_NMG_0003022

Bush nominated Roberts, a federal appeals court judge the past two years, to replace Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who died on Saturday after a long bout with cancer.

In doing so, Bush recast the nomination he made of Roberts in July to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

O'Connor, a moderate conservative, often cast the decisive vote on the nine-member court. Rehnquist was one of the most powerful and conservative jurists in U.S. history.

Roberts' confirmation hearing was to begin on Tuesday. But in wake of Rehnquist's death, Bush's new nomination of Roberts as chief justice and Hurricane Katrina, Senate leaders agreed to postpone the proceeding briefly.

Senate leaders arranged to announce on Tuesday a new date.

A congressional aide said the hearing would start next Monday.

Preparing for the hearing, Schumer said, "We hope the White House will reconsider its refusal to release relevant and important documents that will shed light on what kind of Chief Justice Judge Roberts would become."

DOCUMENTS DEBATE

Thousands of pages of documents have been released in recent weeks stemming from Roberts' work as an attorney in the Reagan administration two decades ago.

But the White House has refused to make public records related to his work as deputy solicitor general in the administration of the first President George Bush.

Roberts, who has received the American Bar Association's highest rating, appears to enjoy broad support in the Senate, which Republicans control, holding 55 of 100 seats.

No Senate Democrat has come out against him, while others have spoken glowingly of the nominee. Some say they want to see him closely questioned before making a decision.

Debra Ness of the National Partnership for Women & Families, which opposed the nomination of Roberts as an associate justice, denounced the bid to make him chief justice.

"Judge Roberts stood out, even in the Reagan administration, for his ultra-conservative views and his disdain for measures that would protect rights of critical importance to women and people of color," Ness said.

Senators Differ On Pace Of Hearing (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — Senate Republicans and at least one key Democrat said Monday that John Roberts appears headed for confirmation this month as the youngest chief justice in more than two centuries.

But some liberal Democrats are arguing for a delay to let senators and the public better assess the impact that filling two vacancies will have on the nation's highest court. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said the Senate should postpone a decision on whether Roberts replaces the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist until President Bush announces how he plans to fill the other court vacancy.

“We should know whom the president intends to propose to nominate as a replacement for Sandra Day O'Connor,” Kennedy said, referring to the retiring Supreme Court justice Roberts originally was tapped to succeed.

Rehnquist's death on Saturday — and Bush's decision Monday to make Roberts, 50, his replacement — set off a tug of war over the timing of confirmation hearings, demonstrating that tensions over the court's makeup are close to the surface in the Senate and could erupt into a political firefight.

Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the Judiciary Committee's top Democrat, told MSNBC the hearings would begin Monday. However, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., who sets the Senate's schedule, would only say that they would begin within a week.

Liberal Democrats argued for more time, but some conservative Republicans are pushing for an early start. “It is now more critical than ever for the Senate to move quickly,” Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., said.

Frist plans a full Senate vote on Roberts during the last week of the month so the jurist would be in place when the court begins its 2005-2006 term Oct. 3. Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada agreed. “We should move forward,” he said, but he'd wait to talk to fellow Democrats about timing.

Even before Rehnquist's death, Roberts was getting favorable reviews from senators, including centrist Democrats such as Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Ben Nelson of Nebraska.

On Monday, Nelson said Bush “has taken the path of least resistance” in nominating Roberts to replace Rehnquist. Nelson said he doesn't want to commit his vote but said, “I can't imagine there will be anything that comes out that causes me not to vote for him.”

DOJ_NMG_0003023

Nelson and Lieberman are members of the “Gang of 14,” a bipartisan group of senators that stopped a near-political meltdown in the Senate over judges earlier this year. The group brokered a deal that could have a major impact on Bush's pick for the second Supreme Court vacancy.

Frist and other conservatives wanted to eliminate Democrats' ability to filibuster, or block, a nominee by refusing to end debate. Some veteran Senate Republicans such as John Warner of Virginia opposed that, arguing that it would give up an important check on White House power.

The “gang” agreed to preserve the minority's right to filibuster, so long as it is used only in “extraordinary circumstances.”

Senators now believe a battle could be joined over O'Connor's replacement. Unlike Rehnquist, a reliable conservative, “she's a swing vote,” Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas., said. Cornyn, who is close to the White House, believes the president's choice will be dictated less by ideology than other political considerations.

“I would expect to see either a woman or a minority nominated,” he said.

Hill Calls On Heavyweight Advisers In Supreme Court Battle (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

When Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, one of the key Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee, faced a re-election fight against an unknown businessman in 1994, he turned to a highly trusted private lawyer to dig up dirt on his opponent.

Now, James Flug has rejoined Mr. Kennedy's staff and will advise him during the Supreme Court confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr.

"Jim Flug is the 8,000-pound gorilla who will be driving this thing," said Makan Delrahim, former Judiciary Committee staff director for Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican.

He is "very personable, experienced and weathered in nominations fights," added Mr. Delrahim. "He knows how to build coalitions, how to ask the probing questions and he knows how to staff somebody like Ted Kennedy."

Conservatives have noted Mr. Flug's role.

"It is hard to fathom Mr. Flug coming back to Capitol Hill after 30 years of private practice for anything other than a bitterly tough confirmation fight," Ed Meese of the Heritage Foundation, Leonard Leo of the Federalist Society and Jay Sekulow of the American Center for Law and Justice warned in a joint statement.

Mr. Flug, who did not respond to e-mail, worked for Mr. Kennedy during the defeat of Nixon Supreme Court nominees Clement Haynesworth and G. Harold Carswell. After leaving Mr. Kennedy's staff for private practice, Mr. Flug rejoined the Kennedy staff two years ago.

But his involvement in Mr. Kennedy's 1994 campaign against Mitt Romney, who is now state governor, caused a stir when the Boston Globe revealed that the campaign had paid Mr. Flug to hire the Investigative Group Inc., the firm run by former Watergate investigator Terry Lenzner, to dig through Mr. Romney's background.

Mr. Flug isn't the only operative brought back for Supreme Court vacancy fights. Michael O'Neill, former nominations counsel to Mr. Hatch, was hired earlier this year to be chief counsel to Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania.

A professor at George Mason University, Mr. O'Neill clerked for Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas and served on the U.S. Sentencing Commission from 1999 to 2005. Many Republican judiciary staffers believe Mr. Specter hired Mr. O'Neill to help assuage conservatives that he was committed to ensuring confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees.

Mr. O'Neill's Democrat counterpart on the committee is Bruce Cohen, chief counsel for Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and ranking minority member of the committee. Mr. Cohen, who joined Mr. Leahy's staff in 1993, was hired by Mr. Specter to be his counsel on the Judiciary Committee in 1981.

One of the most energetic staffers behind the scenes of the confirmation fight will be Don Stewart, the relentless spokesman for Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican. Mr. Stewart, a former intelligence analyst in the Army, joined Mr. Cornyn after he was first elected in 2002.

Last week, the Hill publication National Journal predicted that Mr. Cornyn would be one of Judge Roberts' "most staunch and resolute" defenders.

"Cornyn, a savvy freshman who is closely allied with the White House, will vie for the mantle of the quickest, most relentless defender of the nominee," Kirk Victor wrote. "Cornyn's aggressive press shop has established a rapid-response role in which it immediately challenges every charge leveled by Democratic critics against the nominee."

As Mr. Cornyn likes to say: "A charge unrebutted is too often a charge believed."

New Kid On Top (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0003024

By Mark Leibovich
The Washington Post, September 6, 2005
Nice summer for John Roberts's career.

He goes from being a relative unknown to being The Man to being, as of yesterday morning, THE MAN -- all in a few weeks.

If Roberts, 50, is confirmed before the next session, he would be the youngest chief justice since John Marshall, who was 45 when he was sworn in 204 years ago. Fifty is Young Turk territory among Supreme Court justices, if not for the rest of us. Among chief justices, 50 is a Turk in diapers.

Roberts would assume the top position in the third branch of the federal government. He would swear in the successor to the president who just nominated him. And he would succeed the chief justice -- William Rehnquist, who died Saturday at 80-- for whom Roberts himself clerked. From Day One, he would occupy the largest seat on the Supreme Court -- the chief's seat is physically bigger than the others -- and serve with justices who began their legal careers when he was still in a highchair.

It all fixes Roberts as a seminal figure in the annals of whiz kids.

He is Doogie Howser, Rudolph taking over as lead reindeer (and getting a whole song written about him) and the youngest Osmonds -- Donny and Marie -- taking over the family act. He is Dan Quayle with spell check, leapfrogging the GOP older guard to become, overnight, the 41-year-old vice president. He is Michael Corleone in the "The Godfather: Part II," unbothered by need to rise patiently through the ranks.

Okay, so maybe it's a stretch to compare Justice Antonin Scalia to the character played by Dennis Quaid in the 2004 film "In Good Company," whose new whiz-kid boss -- played by Topher Grace -- is considerably younger and less experienced than he (and who also happens to be sleeping with his daughter). But it's worth asking: What happens when three organizational prototypes -- New Kid, Whiz Kid and Top Dog -- all combine at the same time, in the same person?

If confirmed, Roberts will find out.

"It's going to take a great deal of emotional intelligence on John Roberts's part, which I'm confident he has," says Michael Maccoby, a Washington psychoanalyst and anthropologist who has studied the psychology of leadership in business and government. Maccoby distinguishes Roberts from an array of young leaders -- such as Robert McNamara, who took over as president of Ford Motor Co. at 44, and McGeorge Bundy, who became dean of the faculty of arts and sciences at Harvard at 34 -- whom he describes as "radicals," or "narcissistic leaders." Such types tend to be arrogant and show disregard for traditional protocol.

The Supreme Court is hardly a Silicon Valley start-up with a freewheeling sensibility suited to young leaders and radical thinkers. For starters, there is no board of directors that can fire Roberts. "The Senate is John Roberts's board of directors," says Erik Brynjolsson, a professor at MIT's Sloan School of Management. And if he gets past the Senate, Brynjolsson says, "there's nobody who can boot him off the island if they don't like his work."

The lifetime appointment changes a central dynamic of whiz-kid leadership. What's more, the Supreme Court is an institution rich in tradition, grounded in precedent -- and whose customs Roberts understands. "It will certainly help Roberts that he knows the court and that he clerked there," says Rick Garnett, a law professor at the University of Norte Dame who, like Roberts, clerked for Rehnquist.

Unlike an institution such as Congress, the Supreme Court places less emphasis on seniority, Garnett says. There also tends to be less personal jealousy and ego: "These people don't have to stand for election," he says, so there is less emphasis on taking credit and getting out front on matters.

"Maybe I'm an idealist," Garnett adds, "but there is a certain sense that these justices are in this honored profession. It seems like they're doing something loftier than, say, highway appropriations."

Roberts May Replace Mentor As Chief Justice (REU-Y2)

By Jim Vicini
Reuters, September 6, 2005
John Roberts had hoped to soon join Chief Justice William Rehnquist on the U.S. Supreme Court. Now Roberts may succeed the late legal giant, who was one of his earliest conservative mentors.

A generation ago, Roberts served as a young law clerk to Rehnquist, helping the then associate justice research and write court opinions.

On Monday, President George W. Bush nominated Roberts, a federal appeals court judge for the past two years who has also worked in two Republican administrations, to replace Rehnquist, who died on Saturday after a long bout with cancer.

"I am honored and humbled by the confidence that the president has shown in me," Roberts said as he stood beside Bush in the Oval Office.

DOJ_NMG_0003025

"And I'm very much aware that if I am confirmed, I would succeed a man I deeply respect and admire, a man who has been very kind to me for 25 years," Roberts said.

The development came as the Senate prepared to open hearings on Bush's earlier nomination in July of Roberts to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate conservative who often cast the decisive vote on the closely divided nine-member court.

Rehnquist's death gave Bush a historic opportunity to reshape the court, which interprets the U.S. Constitution and decides major legal questions such as abortion.

Bush changed the nomination so Roberts, if confirmed by the Senate, would replace Rehnquist, one of the most powerful and conservative jurists in U.S. history during a more than 30-year career on the Supreme Court.

At 50, Roberts would be the youngest chief justice in more than 200 years since John Marshall was appointed in 1801 at the age of 45.

As the 17th chief justice, he could end up holding the lifetime seat for decades and help shape the court and the American way of life on matters from civil rights to voting rights to women's rights.

Bush's selection of Roberts came after weeks of tough scrutiny that found public support for the nominee and no major obstacles despite the concerns of a number of liberal groups.

Roberts' record will be closely examined by Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee, who have vowed to question him during his confirmation hearing about his judicial philosophy and whether he supports abortion rights and civil rights.

During Reagan's presidency, Roberts worked as a special assistant to Attorney General William French Smith at the Justice Department in 1981-1982, and then in the White House counsel's office.

PAPER TRAIL

Recently released memos showed that Roberts embraced the conservative Reagan administration's efforts to limit judicial power and opposed a proposed equal rights amendment for women and civil rights remedies such as busing school children.

As a Justice Department aide, Roberts advised O'Connor at her own confirmation hearings in 1981 to avoid specific answers about legal issues likely to come before the court, a tactic he is expected to use to avoid creating any controversy.

Bush first nominated Roberts for the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. The Senate confirmed Roberts in a voice vote on May 8, 2003.

While on the bench, Roberts has been involved in several important rulings.

He was part of the three-judge panel that handed the Bush administration a critical victory by ruling that the military tribunals for terrorism suspects at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, could proceed.

The ruling was announced on July 15, the same day that Roberts later disclosed he had been interviewed by Bush about the Supreme Court vacancy.

Some senators plan to question Roberts about whether he had a potential conflict of interest and should have removed himself from the closely watched terrorism case which is now pending before the Supreme Court.

Roberts argued before the Supreme Court as the principal deputy solicitor general from 1989 to 1993, during the presidency of Bush's father.

In 1990, Roberts signed a brief that stated the first Bush administration's belief that the Supreme Court's historic 1973 decision that legalized abortion should be overturned. But at his 2003 confirmation hearings, Roberts described the 1973 decision as "settled law."

Born in Buffalo, New York, in 1955, Roberts was raised in Indiana. He received his undergraduate degree from Harvard in 1976 and then graduated from Harvard Law School in 1979.

Roberts lives in Chevy Chase, Maryland, with his wife, Jane Sullivan Roberts, and with their two adopted children. The couple has a net worth of more than $5 million, Roberts said.

Chief Justice Rehnquist Dies At 80 (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Law.com, September 5, 2005

The death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist late on Saturday ends his historic 33-year career on the Supreme Court and presents President George W. Bush with a rare challenge to fill a new vacancy just as John Roberts Jr., his nominee to Sandra Day O'Connor's seat on the Court, was about to face Senate hearings.

Bush answered part of that challenge swiftly, nominating Roberts on Monday to replace Rehnquist as chief justice. In an early morning announcement from the Oval Office, the president said he hoped the Senate would confirm Roberts before the Court sits for its next term Oct. 3.

DOJ_NMG_0003026

The Senate is expected to begin Roberts' confirmation hearings as chief justice either Thursday or next Monday. The opening of his previously scheduled confirmation hearings, for the position of associate justice, initially was to be Tuesday, but that was canceled until after Rehnquist's funeral on Wednesday.

Roberts himself was a former Rehnquist clerk who would have been the first former law clerk to serve as a justice alongside the justice for whom he worked. Now Roberts could replace him if he is confirmed as the nation's 17th chief justice.

Rehnquist, 80, died at his home in Arlington, Va. after a 10-month battle with thyroid cancer. He was the first justice to die in office since Robert Jackson in 1954. He had squelched rumors of his retirement in July, promising to stay on the Court as long "as long as my health permits…." But Court spokeswoman Kathy Arberg said his health took "a precipitous decline" in recent days, and his three children were with him when he died.

President Bush in a statement on Sunday said Rehnquist's death was "a tremendous loss for our nation" and indicated he would move quickly to name a replacement. Immediately, the speculation that followed O'Connor's retirement announcement on July 1 resumed. Court historian David Garrow, now at Cambridge University, said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was "the presumptive favorite" to replace Rehnquist, but other commentators offered a range of scenarios, including the elevation of Justice Antonin Scalia, renominating Roberts as chief justice, and even O'Connor postponing her departure. In a statement Sunday, Gonzales said Rehnquist "will surely be remembered as one of our Nation's greatest Chief Justices, and his leadership, courage and humility will be missed."

Rehnquist's colleagues issued statements Sunday lamenting his passing. Justice John Paul Stevens, who will preside over the Court as senior justice until Rehnquist is replaced, said, "William Rehnquist's independent, impartial, and dedicated leadership of the Supreme Court has been an inspiration to those of us privileged to serve with him--and to the entire Nation as well."

Rehnquist had a remarkable Supreme Court career, morphing from "lone ranger" status as an associate justice into the influential leader of a conservative Court that nonetheless preserved affirmative action and abortion rights and furthered gay and women's rights.

As chief justice and titular head of the federal judiciary since 1986, Rehnquist gently nudged the nation's highest court into the 21st century, complete with a user-friendly web site that made opinions available online, and quick release of oral argument audiotapes in landmark cases. He drew the line, however, at allowing camera coverage of Court proceedings.

With a manner that was alternately genial, shy and stern, Rehnquist won admirers from all parts of the political spectrum. Republicans praised him for his fealty to a conservative jurisprudence while liberals generally found him to be an affable jurist who ran the Court collegially and well, seemingly unperturbed by his failure to steer the Court sharply to the right. "A great chief justice," the late liberal lion Thurgood Marshall once said of Rehnquist.

Though Rehnquist found conservative camaraderie in Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, his potentially conservative juggernaut was kept in check by other Republican appointees O'Connor and David Souter, and, to a lesser extent, Anthony Kennedy. One of only two dissenters in the 1973 case Roe v. Wade, Rehnquist failed to undo abortion rights when O'Connor, Kennedy and Souter joined to preserve abortion rights when it was at its most vulnerable in the 1992 case Planned Parenthood v. Casey. Even Rehnquist's vaunted federalist push to give states greater protection from federal intrusion has seemed to lose steam in the last two terms. Just this June, Rehnquist found himself in the minority in a 6-3 decision that said federal anti-drug laws trumped a state initiative that legalized the medical use of marijuana.

"It is quite clear that there are three dominant chief justices of American history, and they are John Marshall, Earl Warren, and William H. Rehnquist," said O'Melveny & Myers partner Walter Dellinger III, acting solicitor general under President Bill Clinton. "I think that there's just no question that he's of enormous historical importance."

University of Texas Law School professor Douglas Laycock said, "He started as the young radical, the most extreme of the four Nixon appointees. He finishes not too far from the center, voting with O'Connor and Kennedy slightly more often than he votes with Scalia and Thomas."

Rehnquist was born in Milwaukee and served as a meteorologist in the Army Air Corps during World War II. He graduated from Stanford University and Stanford Law School, with a graduate degree from Harvard University in between. At Stanford, he finished first in his law school class just ahead of his future colleague O'Connor.

The Supreme Court dominated much of Rehnquist's post-law school life. In his 1987 book on the Court, Rehnquist recalled the day in 1952 when he first laid eyes on the "magnificent Greek temple of white marble" as a new law clerk to then-Justice Robert Jackson. In a memo he wrote for Jackson that later haunted his reputation, Rehnquist said in the context of the pending Brown v. Board of Education case that the discredited precedent Plessy v. Ferguson was right and should be re-affirmed. Rehnquist said in his confirmation hearings for associate and chief justice that the memo did not reflect his own views.

Rehnquist went into private practice in Phoenix and cemented his conservative credentials by working in Barry Goldwater's presidential campaign. He came back to Washington in 1969 to head the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel and soon became involved in judicial selection at a time when several vacancies hit the Court. At first President Richard Nixon was not impressed by Rehnquist, who wore his sideburns long, and sported a pink shirt, psychedelic tie and hush puppie shoes at their first meeting. Nixon told an aide that "Renchburg" looked like a clown. As then-White House counsel John Dean wrote in a 2002 book, "All in all, an inauspicious introduction for a future Supreme Court nominee."

DOJ_NMG_0003027

Rehnquist himself jokingly discounted his chances of being nominated to the high court, because "I'm not from the South, I'm not a woman, and I'm not mediocre." But as Nixon considered and discarded various candidates, Rehnquist suddenly emerged, along with Lewis Powell Jr., as candidates to fill the seats of John Harlan II and Hugo Black, respectively.

Because of the Jackson memo and allegations that he had harassed black voters as a poll watcher in Phoenix, Rehnquist's confirmation was controversial, and he won by a 68 to 26 Senate vote.

Once on the Court, Rehnquist became the hero of a growing conservative legal movement that valued "strict construction" of the Constitution and a "non-activist" approach to judging that looked askance at expansions of federal power. In a 1985 dissent in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, Rehnquist objected to the 5-4 majority's grant of broad federal power over state sovereignty. But his dissent was brief. "I do not think it is incumbent on those of us in dissent to spell out further the fine points of a principle that will, I am confident, in time again command the support of the majority of the court." A decade later, he was proven right.

In a series of rulings, Rehnquist led the Court in reining in congressional power under the Commerce Clause and strengthening state sovereignty in disputes with the federal government.

"He has effected a sea-change in American constitutional jurisprudence," said Pepperdine University law professor Douglas Kmiec, a former Reagan Justice Department official. "His sophisticated revival of federalism, in particular, renews that which makes democracy work -- not in theory, but on the ground. It gives divergent voices a chance to be heard and prevail, not in one venue, but in 50. Had the Court heeded his wisdom more thoroughly, there would be less nonsense about red and blue division and far less cultural warfare."

Other scholars wonder whether Rehnquist's federalism trend will persist after his departure. "In the short run, the 'federalism revolution' of the 1990s is undeniably his most significant substantive achievement," said Cambridge University's Garrow. "But whether these rulings will survive in the long run, or instead be reversed, remains to be seen. It's much more likely that the Rehnquist Court's surprisingly liberal rulings -- on abortion, on gay rights, on gender -- will actually represent the most indelible legacy."

Rehnquist's followers began populating the Reagan Justice Department (one being the young John Roberts), and he became a favored choice to replace retiring Chief Justice Warren Burger in 1986. Again, many Democrats balked at Rehnquist's nomination, and he was confirmed by a 65-33 vote.

As chief justice, his judicial views did not change appreciably, but joined by fellow conservatives he was in dissent less often, and seemed more interested in reaching broader common ground.

Hemmed in by liberal precedents, however, he sometimes was unable to advance conservative precepts in his decision-making. Those constraints became obvious in 2000 when, in Dickerson v. United States, Rehnquist wrote the majority opinion upholding the classic pro-defendant ruling Miranda v. Arizona -- a 1966 precedent Rehnquist had often criticized previously. "Whether or not we would agree with Miranda's reasoning and its resulting rule, were we addressing the issue in the first instance, the principles of stare decisis weigh heavily against overruling it now," Rehnquist wrote. "Miranda has become embedded in routine police practice to the point where the warnings have become part of our national culture."

As administrator of the Court, Rehnquist was able to preserve the Court's traditions and penchant for secrecy, while at the same time keeping up with modern technology. In 2000, the Court launched a Web site that makes it easy to track cases. And starting with the Florida presidential election cases in 2000, Rehnquist agreed from time to time to allow immediate release of audiotapes of newsworthy oral arguments. As a result, for the first time the public outside the courtroom was able to hear the Court's debates over current cases involving issues ranging from affirmative action to campaign finance reform to enemy combatants.

The audiotape release seemed to mute, at least temporarily, the chorus of requests that the Court allow television cameras in. On the subject of cameras, Rehnquist was less adamantly opposed than his predecessor Warren Burger, but he still felt camera access might debase the Court's image. Soon after he became chief justice, Rehnquist said, "I hope we don't get to the time where the members of our court are trying to get on the six o'clock news every night, and I think if they did, it would lessen to a certain extent the mystique and moral authority" of the Court.

But Rehnquist's disapproval of the idea did not keep members of the press from trying to get cameras in. In 1990, with his blessing, the Judicial Conference approved an experiment with camera access for civil trials in selected lower courts. The experiment worked, by and large, with few if any negative findings. But in 1994, the conference declined to make access permanent - partly, it appeared, because of the media frenzy at the time over pretrial hearings in O.J. Simpson's murder trial.

DOJ_NMG_0003028

Within the Supreme Court, Rehnquist also seemed open to at least testing the idea of cameras. In 1988, he allowed media lawyer Timothy Dyk -now a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit - to put on a private demonstration of how cameras worked. The demonstration went off without glitches, but none of the justices felt any strong incentive to alter the status quo.

C-SPAN vice president Bruce Collins said that in comparison to the visibility of the other branches of government, the Rehnquist court's resistance looks "just a bit silly." But he credited Rehnquist with being "the first to open the door" to modern media. "Our hope is that his successor builds on his example."

Rehnquist had a sense of humor and not too high a sense of his own importance. He was shy, even awkward at times, though as his tenure as chief justice lengthened, he became increasingly self-confident.

"He is not a Citronelle kind of guy," said longtime friend and fellow poker player Robert Bennett, partner at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom in D.C.. referring to a fancy D.C. restaurant. "He never let power go to his head."

"William H. Rehnquist is by nature quiet and humble," said Pepperdine's Kmiec. "His legacy is that he has shown us how to disagree with civility."

In private conversation when he told funny stories, he would sometimes start giggling before he finished his sentence. The Blackmun papers released last year included a bawdy limerick Rehnquist passed to his then-all male colleagues in 1975. In 1995, acting purely on his own whimsy, he began wearing a black robe with four gold stripes on each sleeve. The inspiration for the new attire, he said, was a costume he saw at a local performance of Gilbert & Sullivan's Iolanthe.

Rehnquist came in for some ribbing from his colleagues because of the stripes. The late Justice Harry Blackmun said he and his colleagues asked Rehnquist, "Was he wanting to bring back the crimson in the robes as the British had? What were the rest of us to do about it? Did this make him a sergeant or a captain? He was defensive about it, but not in an offensive way."

Rehnquist, like other justices, basked in anonymity. For his daily constitutional that helped alleviate his back problems, he was able to walk around the perimeter of the Court grounds largely unrecognized, though he was usually shadowed by a Court police officer or two. In a 2004 interview with C-SPAN, he said one of the most appealing aspects of being a Supreme Court justice is that "you don't have to become a celebrity or raise your visibility in order to do your job."

Every four years he emerged from anonymity to conduct presidential inaugural ceremonies -- George W. Bush's on Jan. 20 was his fifth -- and he became even more familiar to the public when he presided over President Clinton's Senate impeachment trial in 1999. On occasion during the trial, television camera crews would camp out near his Arlington home to record his comings and goings--a loss of privacy he did not appreciate.

Rehnquist won high marks for conducting the impeachment trial fairly, but characteristically he made light of his role. In a 2001 interview with PBS, Rehnquist borrowed a line from Gilbert & Sullivan -again from Iolanthe to say of his impeachment trial performance, "I did nothing in particular and I did it very well." He continued, "There wasn't much to do. I realized there wasn't much to do. And I didn't do it."

Rehnquist will also be remembered for presiding over a Supreme Court that decided the outcome of a presidential election. He was in the majority of Bush v. Gore, the 2000 decision that stopped the recount of Florida ballots and sealed the election of President Bush over Democrat Al Gore. The Court's intervention in the case placed it in the center of a political firestorm.

From the bench, Rehnquist could be a stern and forbidding presence. Though he mellowed in recent years, earlier in his tenure as chief justice, Rehnquist would correct lawyers' pronunciation, scold lawyers for glancing at the clock behind the bench, and grow impatient with flabby locutions. In 1993, when then-solicitor general Kenneth Starr said he wanted to "share the record" with the justices, Rehnquist shot back, "Why not tell us the record, rather than sharing it with us."

He also for a time snapped at lawyers who addressed him as "Justice" or "Judge," rather than chief justice. After his pique generated news stories, Rehnquist poked fun at himself; at one meeting he donned a feathered Indian headdress to underline his chiefly status.

But Rehnquist also was keenly aware of the limitations of being chief justice--just one vote among nine, with few powers of persuasion over his independent-minded colleagues. He was usually unable to slow the torrent of questions aimed by justices at the lawyers arguing before them, and spoke enviously of a long-ago Canadian counterpart who was able to quiet his colleagues by tapping his pencil on the bench. "I have occasionally wished that I had similar authority in our court," he said in a 1996 speech.

But after the late Warren Burger's more imperious rule, Rehnquist's lighter touch was welcomed by justices and employees alike.

"Politically or ideologically oriented evaluations of Chief Justice Rehnquist should not overlook what a successful and popular chief justice he was within the Court as the justices' presiding officer," said Garrow. "The contrast between Rehnquist's undeniably happy Court and that of his predecessor, Warren E. Burger, could not have been greater."

DOJ_NMG_0003029

In commencement speeches and talks with young people, Rehnquist urged listeners to live well-rounded lives and not measure success entirely by their work. "Find ways to enrich your life, entertain yourself, and to enjoy activities you might not have participated in before," he told a 1992 high school graduating class in Arlington, where he lived in his Court years. "Enjoyment of this sort is not contingent upon fulfilling some far distant career goal, but can be harvested right now - today and tomorrow... Learn to live a day at a time."

Rehnquist's own interests ranged from oil painting to tennis to poker. For years he participated in a monthly poker game attended, on and off, by the likes of current appeals court judge David Sentelle, former judge Robert Bork, senior judge Laurence Silberman and bigfoot lawyers like Bennett and Leonard Garment. The unspoken rule was that when lawyers were about to bring a case before the Supreme Court, they would drop out of the poker game temporarily, to avoid improper appearances.

Characteristically, Rehnquist said he would never write a memoir, because publishers would want him to spice it up with criticisms of his colleagues - which he refused to do. He invoked Confederate leader Robert E. Lee, who said he did not want to write his memoirs "because he would have to deal unfavorably with a lot of people whom he likes and he was close to," he told PBS in 2001. "I just don't want to do that."

Tony Mauro can be reached at tmauro@alm.com. Legal Times congressional correspondent T.R.Goldman contributed to this report.

Associated Press reports contributed to this story.

A Court Choice Well Schooled In Chief Justice Job's Pitfalls (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 5 - As a Supreme Court law clerk to William H. Rehnquist decades ago, John G. Roberts Jr. learned how not to be chief justice.

Now that President Bush has chosen him for the position, he will, if the Senate confirms him, have the rare chance to put those lessons into practice.

His boss back in 1980-81 was an associate justice, one who often chafed under the leadership style of Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and who freed, even encouraged, his law clerks to poke fun at what they saw as the chief justice's pomposity and penchant for self-aggrandizement.

Robert M. Weisberg, who clerked during the same term for another justice, said Monday that he would never forget walking down a corridor at the court and coming upon Justice Rehnquist and his law clerks, who were all peering through a window into an inner courtyard, where Chief Justice Burger was supervising preparations for a reception.

"It was very funny to see Rehnquist and his clerks just spontaneously cracking up at the sight of the chief justice directing the proper placement of the silver," Mr. Weisberg said.

Later, when Mr. Roberts was working in the White House counsel's office, memorandums from that period show, he devoted considerable attention to knocking down various proposals from Chief Justice Burger, including one for a new tribunal to ease the Supreme Court's workload.

In a 1983 memorandum, to Fred F. Fielding, the White House counsel, he said a Burger request for authority to name an administrative "chancellor" for the federal courts was "the silliest" of various proposals and added, in a reference to the Anglophilia for which the chief justice was well known around the court, "The bill does not specify whether the Chancellor will wear a powdered wig."

Justice Rehnquist, upon becoming chief justice in 1986, promptly made changes that clearly reflected his own disapproval of how Warren Burger had run the court. For example, he converted the job of administrative assistant to the chief justice into a two-year appointment rather than a permanent position, to avoid the empire-building that had become evident during the Burger years.

The very different Rehnquist management style, straightforward and unadorned, was much appreciated within the court, as reflected in the statements the associate justices issued after Chief Justice Rehnquist's death on Saturday night. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg called him "the fairest, most efficient boss I have ever had."

As a law clerk, Judge Roberts, who now sits on the federal appeals court here, would not have been in a position to observe the justices' conference, the twice-weekly closed-door sessions that only the justices themselves attend. But he certainly knew how frustrating Justice Rehnquist found the meandering and confusing way in which the conference proceeded under Chief Justice Burger's leadership.

Among the papers that Justice Harry A. Blackmun left to the Library of Congress is a letter Justice Rehnquist sent to Chief Justice Burger that began: "Dear Chief: I had a feeling that at the very close of today's Conference we may have fitted Matthew Arnold's closing lines in 'Dover Beach' wherein he refers to those 'Swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight/Where ignorant armies clash by night.' "

DOJ_NMG_0003030

Justice Rehnquist then went on to "take the liberty of stating my understanding" of what had taken place. When he became chief justice, he streamlined the conference considerably, and justices rarely came away with any doubt about what had occurred.

Running the conference is only one of a chief justice's many functions that are not visible to the public. Indeed, the job is somewhat like an iceberg, with much of it below the surface. And it is confusing: there is no one place to look for a definitive description of the job.

The modern chief justiceship is "a mix of custom, practice and statute," according to Judith Resnik, a professor at Yale Law School who has made a close study of the federal judiciary and the role of the chief justice in particular. In an interview on Monday, Professor Resnik noted that there were dozens of federal statutes that mention the chief justice, with "half a dozen that really matter." The Constitution itself did not even establish the office except by implication, mentioning it only in connection with presiding over impeachment trials conducted by the Senate.

"It's basically a role that has developed over the 20th century, as the federal judiciary has developed into a kind of administrative agency," Professor Resnik said. For example, Chief Justice Burger established, and Chief Justice Rehnquist continued, the practice of issuing an annual "state of the judiciary" report to give voice to the concerns of federal judges and the chief justice's own priorities.

The chief justice presides over a corps of some 2,000 federal judges, including 1,200 with life tenure and the rest, including magistrate and bankruptcy judges, who serve for fixed terms. The judicial branch includes a staff of 30,000, with the chief justice picking the most important central administrators, and runs on an annual budget of $5.4 billion. The chief justice also picks the members of important policy-making judicial committees and of specialized courts, including the 11-member Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act Court, which issues special national security surveillance warrants.

In addition, the chief justice leads the Judicial Conference of the United States, a group of judges who make policy for the federal courts and who present the judiciary's views to Congress. The Judicial Conference has its roots in an organization created by Congress in 1922 at the behest of Chief Justice William Howard Taft, the former president, who carved out an active policy role for the chief justice. He shaped the modern court by lobbying successfully for legislation to give the court discretion in choosing which cases to hear.

As a student of American history, Judge Roberts may find none of this a surprise. Nor is it a surprise that Professor Resnik and other scholars are beginning to ask whether this array of powers, having grown bit by bit over the years, with hardly anyone noticing, really belongs in the hands of a single, unelected, life-tenured official.

"As a democracy, we generally don't believe that power should be centralized in one person for so long," she said, while offering the concededly audacious suggestion that the chief justiceship might rotate every four years or so.

Perhaps that is a conversation that might move from the recesses of the legal academy to the public, sometime during the 25 or 30 years that Chief Justice Roberts would be likely to serve.

Roberts Was Influenced By Critics Of The Warren Court (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

From his youthful days as a Reagan administration aide to his current job as a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, John G. Roberts Jr. has consistently espoused a clear view of federal judicial intervention: Less is more.

This same principle was held dear by the man Roberts served as a Supreme Court clerk, the late William H. Rehnquist -- whose former position as chief justice of the United States is now suddenly within Roberts's grasp.

In the quarter-century since he served as Rehnquist's aide, Roberts has made an instinctual and deeply held conservatism plain at nearly every turn. As a young Reagan administration aide, he registered his skepticism toward court-recognized "fundamental rights," such as the right to privacy. Earlier this year, Judge Roberts voted to permit President Bush to subject terrorism suspects to military trials at Guantanamo Bay.

The question -- more urgent now since Bush nominated him yesterday morning to lead the high court -- is where Roberts's vision of judicial restraint would lead him on the most volatile issues. The woman Roberts was originally tapped to replace, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, sometimes displayed her conservatism by bowing to precedents on social issues -- notably Roe v. Wade , which established a right to abortion rooted in a right to privacy. Rehnquist labored mightily to reverse some rulings on abortion and the rights of criminal defendants that he thought were wrongly decided in the first place.

DOJ_NMG_0003031

To Roberts's supporters, his history suggests he will be a careful and principled leader of the federal judiciary, one who would restore the true constitutional balance of power between the courts and the people's elected representatives in Congress, the White House and the states.

To his opponents, it suggests a willingness to leave the constitutional rights of women and minorities unprotected against violations by the more political branches of government.

What is unmistakable from Roberts's record, however, is that his essential philosophy about the role of courts in American life is strongly held. There is little prospect that the 50-year-old judge will be any less likely to press his beliefs in conference with colleagues on the court than he was to promote them in memos to his elders in the Reagan administration.

Sounding very much like the 26-year-old aide who ghostwrote articles and speeches on judicial restraint for President Ronald Reagan's Justice Department, Roberts told the Senate firmly in a written submission last month that federal judges "do not have a commission to solve society's problems, as they see them, but simply to decide cases before them according to the rule of law."The Primacy of Process

Roberts has said that defining the proper boundaries of judicial review is a "central problem" of American government. Few legal analysts of any ideological stripe would dispute that.

Throughout history, the Supreme Court has provoked controversy by using its power to declare laws unconstitutional in ways that critics saw as overstepping its authority.

President Thomas Jefferson condemned the 1803 Marbury v. Madison decision that established the doctrine of judicial review.

The Dred Scott case of 1857 -- which declared that black people were "beings of an inferior order" and that congressional efforts to restrict slavery in northern territories were a violation of property rights -- discredited the institution for a generation. A series of rulings striking down state and federal economic regulations provoked President Franklin D. Roosevelt's "court-packing" plan, until the justices backed down and began upholding New Deal legislation.

In the 1950s and '60s, the Supreme Court looked at the country's problems and decided, time and again, that the federal judiciary should reform society and establish individual rights. Even today, long after the death of the chief justice, Earl Warren, who led the court during that period, and long after a majority of the court has been named by Republican presidents who opposed the Warren Court's innovations, the court continues to recognize such Warren-like concepts as a "fundamental right" to privacy that protects abortion and private consensual homosexual conduct.

The Warren revolution remains a model for many people of how the court must act as a guarantor of individual and minority rights. Roberts, however, was one of those who recoiled from the Warren Court's activism.

Roberts grew up in a mostly white Indiana suburb where his father's steel company was touched by federal court battles over affirmative action, and he attended Harvard College and Harvard Law School as Boston was grappling, sometimes violently, with court-ordered school desegregation.

But his gravitation to concepts of judicial restraint probably reflected the natural bent of his orderly, traditionalist mind, rather than the controversies swirling outside the academic setting in which he spent most of the 1970s.

Asked by a senator in 2003 to name the legal text that most influenced him, Roberts chose the 1973 edition of Hart & Wechsler's "The Federal Courts and the Federal System," a 1,657-page legal textbook used in Harvard's class on federal courts. It has always been "within reach of my desk" since law school, he told the Senate. And, indeed, he has often cited it in his writings since Cambridge.

Unknown to most Americans, the Hart & Wechsler volume is instantly recognizable to law professors as an exhaustive, sophisticated -- and deeply skeptical -- treatment of the Warren Court revolution.

It is considered a virtual Bible of a postwar legal movement known as the Legal Process School, especially influential at Harvard, whose leading figures were liberals and conservatives who professed concern not so much for the results the court was reaching as for the damage its overreaching might do to the judiciary's own legitimacy.

Roberts's choice of the book is "extremely revealing," said Cass Sunstein, a professor of law at the University of Chicago.

For the Legal Process School, it was a given that "judges in solving legal problems are not doing the same thing that legislators are doing in solving political problems," says Todd Rakoff, a professor of law at Harvard.

The strength of Legal Process was its insistence that courts adhere to neutral principles, that they "should not become champions of particular causes or litigants," as Dennis J. Hutchinson, a professor of law at the University of Chicago, puts it.

Yet Legal Process has lost influence in more recent years, under attack from a new generation of law professors who fault it for ignoring the political power relationships embedded in the law -- that its insistence on identifying neutral principles is unrealistic.

"The question about legal process," Rakoff says, "is 'Is it true that there are legal answers that aren't political answers?' "A Closet Activist?

DOJ_NMG_0003032

That, in essence, is the critique liberals are raising about Roberts's jurisprudence today: that his insistence on a limited role for the federal courts is a cover for conservative policy preferences.

Announcing its opposition to Roberts, the Alliance for Justice said that Roberts supports "weakening women's rights and civil rights laws, cutting back the vital role of our courts in enforcing legal protections and restricting the ability of the people's democratically elected representatives to enact crucial, nationwide worker, anti-discrimination and environmental safeguards."

Court conservatives such as Rehnquist and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas have also espoused judicial restraint. Yet that has not prevented them from striking down many federal and state statutes, often on the basis of a states'-rights doctrine that dissenting justices on the court have criticized as too loosely based in constitutional text.

The accusation that Roberts is capable of his own brand of activism has not come exclusively from liberal advocacy groups.

On the D.C. Circuit, he wrote an opinion for a 2 to 1 majority in which he interpreted a law to deny a former Amtrak employee the right to sue the government-subsidized railroad in federal court for allegedly spending taxpayer money on defective railroad cars.

Judge Merrick Garland wrote in dissent that Roberts's opinion "falls back on policy considerations" but "the policy on which the court relies are not those of the Congress of the United States."

But to many, Roberts's intellectual pedigree marks him as a careful "lawyer's lawyer," with a healthy recognition of the courts' -- and his own -- fallibility.

"Of all the people Bush could have nominated, this is a guy who is actually telling the truth when he says he can't decide a case until he's seen the facts and the briefs," says Jonathan Macey, a professor of law at Yale University.

St. John's University law professor John Barrett, noting that Roberts has named legal craftsmen such as Justices Felix Frankfurter and Robert Jackson as the Supreme Court members he most admires, suggests that he "may end up disappointing President Bush."

If he remains true to the legal view embodied by the Legal Process School, Barrett said, "he'll shy from agenda-driven decision making" and respect long-established precedents, even those, such as Roe v. Wade , of which he may disapprove.

"A kind of continuity of judicial decision-making is a value in the process world," Barrett said. "Moderation, deference, continuity, caution, candor -- it's not swing for the fences judging."

Another crucial influence on Roberts's judicial philosophy was Henry J. Friendly, a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit in New York, for whom Roberts worked as a law clerk in 1979-1980, just after graduating from Harvard.

Friendly, a Rockefeller Republican who served on the 2nd Circuit from 1959 until his death in 1986, is widely regarded as the most talented appeals court judge of his generation. He was a longtime private-sector lawyer who wrote his own rigorous opinions, as well as many influential law review articles.

He regularly plucked top students from Harvard, where he had studied, to be his aides. Roberts, whose credentials as a prize-winning undergraduate majoring in history and managing editor of the Harvard Law Review matched Friendly's own, got his clerkship without even having to be interviewed, according to Richard J. Lazarus, Roberts's close friend.

Friendly could be a stern taskmaster. "Sometimes the clerk thought he had something interesting to say, and sometimes the judge would disagree," said Macey, also a former Friendly clerk.

Roberts loved him. His esteem is evident not only from his frequent citations of Friendly's work in his own writings, including six of his 49 opinions on the D.C. Circuit, but also from the fact that he corresponded with the judge throughout his time as a Reagan aide.

In one letter, dated Nov. 4, 1981, Roberts told Friendly that it was "an exciting time to be at the Justice Department, when so much that has been taken for granted for so long is being seriously reconsidered." He continued: "You assist us down here every day through the articles and opinions that so often light the way."

Friendly's views on many issues paralleled those of the Legal Process School, says Rakoff, a former Friendly clerk. The 1988 edition of the Hart & Wechsler book is dedicated to him.

Friendly felt that the Warren Court's 1966 Miranda v. Arizona ruling, which created the "right to remain silent," was misguided. In a famous 1970 article, Friendly attacked the Warren Court for opening up state criminal convictions to wide-ranging federal court review.

Friendly felt that a state conviction should usually be challengeable in federal court only when the prisoner also had a strong claim of innocence, rather than wasting the courts' time on technical issues raised by guilty defendants.

But the Warren Court had expanded access to the federal courts as a remedy for what it considered the widespread abuse of rights by state criminal justice systems, especially in the South.

Friendly thought state courts were just as capable of protecting federal constitutional rights as federal courts were.

DOJ_NMG_0003033

On Nov. 12, 1981, Roberts offered then-Attorney General William French Smith his unsolicited critique of the Warren Court's decisions, in a memo that cited Friendly's article seven times and the Hart & Wechsler book once.

"The current availability of federal habeas corpus" -- the legal term for post-conviction constitutional challenges -- "particularly for state prisoners, goes far to making a mockery of the entire criminal justice system," he wrote.

In April 2003, Roberts, sitting before the Senate Judiciary Committee as a nominee to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, offered similar comments in response to a question by Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) about the death penalty -- a major source of habeas corpus petitions in federal court.

Roberts replied that "it's not certain, it's not definite, and there doesn't seem to be any reasonable time limitation. The effectiveness, if you believe in capital punishment, the effectiveness of capital punishment diminishes if the crime was committed 30 years ago. And if it takes that long to get through the system, it's not working, whether you're in favor of the death penalty or against it."

In the meantime, however, conservative critiques of federal habeas had become the law of the land. In 1996, the Republican Congress passed, and President Bill Clinton, a Democrat, signed a bill that sharply restricted access to federal habeas corpus.

Nevertheless, petitions for habeas corpus from state prisoners continue to occupy much of the court's time -- far more than higher-profile issues such as abortion and school prayer.

Chief Justice Favored Roberts (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

Judge John G. Roberts Jr. was long regarded as the best Supreme Court lawyer in the nation by the very man whose shoes President Bush has chosen him to fill.

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday, played a key role in shaping Judge Roberts by making him a pupil during the early 1980s and propelling his career as a lawyer and federal judge in subsequent years.

Ted Cruz, who clerked for Chief Justice Rehnquist during the mid-1990s, recalled that he and fellow clerks once asked their boss whom he considered to be the most superior Supreme Court litigator.

"He chuckled a little and said with a smile that he thought he could probably get the majority of his colleagues to agree that John Roberts was the best Supreme Court lawyer in the country," said Mr. Cruz, now solicitor general of Texas.

Chief Justice Rehnquist's fondness for Judge Roberts dated back years earlier when he had hired him as a clerk in 1980. Judge Roberts had been recommended by federal appeals Judge Henry Friendly, another esteemed conservative for whom Judge Roberts had clerked in 1979.

In the office of Associate Justice Rehnquist, the young Harvard Law School graduate evidently shined brighter than others.

When the clerkship ended in 1981, Justice Rehnquist phoned Kenneth W. Starr, then chief of staff to U.S. Attorney General William French Smith, to recommend Judge Roberts for a Justice Department job.

"It's not every day you get [such] calls," said Mr. Starr, who won fame as a conservative lawyer during the 1990s investigating the Whitewater and Monica Lewinsky scandals and is now dean of Pepperdine University's School of Law.

When Mr. Bush nominated Judge Roberts to replace outgoing Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, some suggested that it might have been more poetic had Judge Roberts been nominated to replace Chief Justice Rehnquist, because it was under the chief justice's wing that his career in Washington blossomed.

After clerking for Justice Rehnquist and working under Mr. Smith, Judge Roberts was associate counsel to President Reagan from 1982 until 1986, when he entered private practice. He served as deputy solicitor general under President George Bush from 1989 to 1993, winning 25 of 39 Supreme Court cases he argued on the government's behalf.

The elder Mr. Bush later nominated him to be a federal judge, but that nomination was withdrawn before confirmation after Mr. Clinton won the presidency in 1992.

Judge Roberts went back to private practice until President George W. Bush nominated him to be a U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals judge in 2001. That nomination and 29 others were blocked in the Senate Judiciary Committee. He was confirmed after Mr. Bush renominated him in 2003.

Observances Begin Today At High Court (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

The flag-draped coffin of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist will be carried up the long marble stairs to the Supreme Court's main entrance this morning as two days of memorial observances begin.

DOJ_NMG_0003034

After a brief prayer service at the court at 10 a.m., the public may pay respects to the chief justice as his body lies in repose at the court from 10:30 a.m. to 10 p.m. today and from 10 a.m. to noon tomorrow.

Ceremonies will conclude with the chief justice's burial at Arlington National Cemetery tomorrow afternoon, which will be private. Rehnquist, 80, died of thyroid cancer Saturday at his home in Arlington.

Rehnquist's family was in meetings yesterday with officials from the Supreme Court and the Archdiocese of Washington, finalizing the arrangements for the funeral and burial. The family toured St. Matthew's Cathedral in Northwest Washington, where a service will be held at 2 p.m. tomorrow.

Officials have said the funeral is for friends and family.

Rehnquist belonged to a Lutheran church in Bethesda, but the family requested that the funeral be held at St. Matthew's. A spokeswoman for the archdiocese has said that the request apparently was based on such factors as size and availability. The service will be Lutheran, a Supreme Court spokeswoman said.

Details about speakers and expected guests at the funeral were not available yesterday.

Justice William J. Brennan Jr.'s funeral also was held at St. Matthew's, in July 1997, after his coffin lay in the Supreme Court's Great Hall.

Construction began on St. Matthew's in 1893, and the first Mass there was in 1895. Its sanctuary seats about 2,000 and contains the marble cathedra, or seat, of the archbishop of Washington. The church has undergone an $8 million restoration in recent years, including the cleaning and repair of two large mosaics inside and the recovering of its copper dome.

St. Matthew's was the site of the funeral Mass for President John F. Kennedy on Nov. 25, 1963. Pope John Paul II addressed 1,500 area priests there in October 1979 during a visit to Washington. The funerals of Cardinal James A. Hickey and Cardinal Patrick A. O'Boyle also were at St. Matthew's, on Rhode Island Avenue just east of Connecticut Avenue.

District police said yesterday that they had not been informed of any special traffic or security needs for the various services, Sgt. Joe Gentile said. The Supreme Court has its own police force.

Rehnquist was a World War II veteran, entitling him to burial at Arlington. His wife, Natalie Cornell Rehnquist, was buried there in 1991.

Rehnquist's two immediate predecessors, Warren E. Burger and Earl Warren, also lay in repose in the Supreme Court building before they were laid to rest at Arlington.

25 Dems Could Vote For Roberts (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, September 6, 2005

Members of the Senate Democrats' K Street inner circle are predicting that as many as 25 Democrats will vote to confirm John Roberts as chief justice of the United States.

Several attendees of the Monday Group, as Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) biweekly lobbyist meetings are known, said the Democrats could suffer politically if their Roberts strategy misfires. Left-wing ideological groups are pressuring Democratic lawmakers to expose Roberts's conservative record without workable grounds for a fight, Monday Group lobbyists said.

"It's not a good thing for Democrats to be dragged into a visible, high-profile battle on him for weeks when Congress ought to be dealing with issues the public really cares about," one key Democratic lobbyist said. "That's the biggest danger for Democrats, if they get sucked into something like that because of the ideological left."

Though some Democrats already have called for Congress to focus on aiding the blighted Gulf Coast as the new session begins, planning for the Roberts hearings likely will dominate the Monday Group's next meeting, on Sept. 12. Informal discussions among some lobbyists and Democratic aides during the recess were said to yield little in the way of cohesive counsel.

"There is no real coordinated effort to enlist K Street in getting involved," said another well-connected Democrat, one of many who hailed Roberts as an unassailably shrewd selection. "There's no sense in creating a big dustup now downtown, when what are you going to fight about?"

Democratic lobbyists' greatest concern about Roberts is not pinning down his positions on federal preemption or civil rights, despite the recent Monday Group guest appearance of Wade Henderson, president of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. Many K Street Democrats instead questioned what they characterized as poorly coordinated messaging from liberal groups that has unduly influenced some lawmakers.

"The other dirty little secret the Democrats have to deal with is … there may be some in party who see it as, 'It would be worthwhile to drag it out a little bit so we can raise some money off the deal'" from left-wing special interests, a Monday Group member said. "That's shortsighted, and politically dangerous too."

In particular, Democratic lobbyists singled out the NARAL Pro-Choice Alliance decision to endorse Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), who is certain to face a tough reelection fight next year, in a potential bid to sway him on Roberts. If Chafee spurns the pro-abortion-rights group by voting to confirm, his Democratic challenger could be weakened, and Monday Group lobbyists said a Republican voting against Roberts would be highly unlikely.

"I'd advise my clients to stay out of this one," said another lobbyist with ties to Democratic leadership. "Why would they use up political capital on something they can't possibly win on or benefit from? … I don't see a good opening for us."

One Monday Group regular likened the Roberts confirmation to this spring's tension over the "nuclear option," saying that in both cases a swift resolution and moving on to other business would be the best-case scenario.

K Street Democrats agreed that Roberts ultimately would be confirmed with anywhere from 65 to 80 votes, with most centrist and Southern Democrats voting to approve the nomination. Every Democrat who signed the "Gang of 14" agreement to preserve the minority's right of judicial filibuster will vote for Roberts, they predicted, with several openly forecasting that Reid himself will support the nominee.

Some lobbyists credited Reid with ensuring that no Democrat has declared support for Roberts yet, a stance often phrased by the minority leader as "keeping [our] powder dry."

One lobbyist said, "The only concerted strategy I've seen come out of the caucus has been: Don't make any commitments to support him. Leadership's been very successful in keeping everybody on that page."

But, K Street Democrats said, as soon as the hearings begin, either Thursday or Monday, expect Democratic senators such as Ben Nelson (Neb.), Mary Landrieu (La.) or Blanche Lincoln (Ark.) to reveal quickly their votes in Roberts's favor.

Reid spokesman Jim Manley said that Monday Group lobbyists would be consulted as the hearings progress but that they would not be relied upon for messaging. "We talk to them all the time. Are we planning on using them? No," Manley said. "It's up to the members of the Judiciary Committee to carefully review Roberts's qualifications for the job."

Asked whether a majority of the Democratic caucus voting for Roberts would concern Reid, Manley declined to comment. "Let's just wait and see," he said.

All About A Guy Named John (USNEWS)

By Liz Halloran

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

It was late August 1976, just a week before classes were to begin at Harvard Law School, and first-year student Stuart Miller, intent on a last few days of R&R on Cape Cod, had unloaded his belongings in Shaw Hall dormitory when he noticed an open door down the hall. Curious, he poked his head in and saw a young man surrounded by law books. His new classmate appeared to be at least a quarter of the way through the thick first-year texts. Why, Miller asked with some incredulity, are you doing all this work? "I want to get a head start," replied John G. Roberts, who returned to his books while Miller, now a San Francisco lawyer, set off for the Massachusetts shore.

Nearly three decades later, President George W. Bush's first nominee to the U.S. Supreme Court will have his legendary preparation skills put to the test when the Senate Judiciary Committee opens confirmation hearings this week in the historic caucus room of the Russell Senate Office Building. The hearings, chaired by Republican Sen. Arlen Specter, are expected to continue through early next week (story, Page 44).

True blue? Barring a blockbuster disclosure, Roberts will win support from a majority of the committee's 18 members, 10 of them Republicans. And he's likely to be confirmed by a majority of the full Senate later this month in time to join the court by the October 3 start of its new term.

But the hearings may still have their share of drama. Will the nominee get any Democrats' votes? How will Democrats position themselves, especially those with an eye on congressional and presidential elections to come and another Supreme Court vacancy that could materialize at any time? And, perhaps most important, what about Roberts himself? Is he the true-blue conservative his champions suggest, or might he have a few surprises up his sleeve?

There's little argument that Bush made a savvy choice in the 50-year-old federal appeals court judge who served in the Reagan and George H. W. Bush administrations and clerked for Chief Justice William Rehnquist. His sterling legal credentials and, perhaps more important, his likability and made-for-TV attractiveness have made it difficult for those opposing him to get much traction. The down-and-dirty fight everyone expected over the first appointment to the high court in 11 years simply hasn't happened.

Activist groups on both sides seem to have accepted that reality: They've used press conferences and E-mails to broadcast their messages, stockpiling most of their advertising money for future battles. Even the White House has had to spend little political capital on Roberts, who argued 39 cases before the Supreme Court and earned a small fortune as the top appellate lawyer for the Washington firm Hogan & Hartson. Though every major liberal interest group has announced its opposition to

DOJ_NMG_0003036

Roberts, no Senate Democrat has yet come out against him. "Ninety percent of this," said Democratic committee member Sen. Charles Schumer, "is going to be decided at the hearing."

Democrats plan to aggressively question Roberts about his conservative legal views and judicial philosophy but acknowledge privately that a Senate floor fight would be fruitless and politically damaging. The math doesn't work, either. Democrats are outnumbered by Republicans 55 to 44 (Vermont Sen. James Jeffords is an Independent), and this spring they essentially dealt away their ability to filibuster the nomination by agreeing not to block judicial nominees absent "extraordinary circumstances." "The filibuster deal was an incredible success for us," said the conservative Federalist Society's Leonard Leo. "It took it off the table and defanged the other side."

A Supreme History Of Conflict (USNEWS)

By Bret Schulte

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

By all accounts, John Roberts will be confirmed to take his place on the high court in a month's time as America's 109th Supreme Court justice. But before it's over, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee intend to rough him up a bit.

For many, the partisan scrapping recalls the failed nomination of Robert Bork in 1987. The Bork fight had it all: overheated rhetoric, warring ideologies, and lingering bitterness among conservatives. The bruising battle over Bork is widely considered one of the most contentious ever. But it was hardly the first.

In fact, bare-knuckle battling has always been part of the process. Of the 148 people nominated to the highest court, 28 have failed to be confirmed. Only a handful were rejected because the candidates were perceived as unqualified. The rest? Politics. "Almost never has a Supreme Court [nominee] been defeated because he was inept . . . . " says James O'Hara, a former legal professor at Loyola College in Baltimore and a trustee of the Supreme Court Historical Society. "Almost always, it's a battle between a significant portion of the Senate and the president." Nominees weren't actually present at confirmation hearings until 1925. But even in the earliest days of the high court, when it carried little prestige (some justices quit the bench to return to private practice), political crossfire took down many a nominee.

Firestorm. The first fight came with the first president--a nearly deified figure in the new nation. But George Washington appeared quite mortal when he nominated John Rutledge, a former governor of South Carolina, to replace Chief Justice John Jay in 1795. Rutledge was a defender of slavery and an advocate of exclusionary voting practices, but that's not what sparked outrage in the Senate. Federalist newspapers and a cadre of northern senators attacked Rutledge for a speech in which he criticized a new treaty with Great Britain. As Peter Irons details in A People's History of the Supreme Court, a whispering campaign ensued alleging that Rutledge's fiery speech was proof that he was "deranged in his mind," according to Attorney General Edmund Randolph, who reported the rumors to President Washington. Whether or not Rutledge was mentally unstable or just a firebrand orator remains a matter of debate, but after seeing his bid go down to defeat by a final vote of 10 to 14, Rutledge attempted suicide. He died a few years later.

In 1835, President Andrew Jackson deliberately ignited his own Supreme Court firestorm by nominating close friend Roger B. Taney. Taney was already radioactive; he'd served as Jackson's secretary of the treasury via a controversial recess appointment after two former secretaries refused to withdraw government funds--as Jackson had requested--from the Second Bank of the United States. The Second Bank was a semipublic institution that acted as the federal depository, which Jackson considered unconstitutional. Taney complied with Jackson's request, but he paid for his loyalty when outraged bank supporters in the Senate refused to accept his nomination to the treasury secretary's post.

John G. Roberts: What Answers Is He Going To Give? (NSWK)

Newsweek

Newsweek, September 5, 2005

In 39 arguments before the U.S. Supreme Court, John G. Roberts earned a reputation as an unflappable advocate for his clients. But this week, when Roberts testifies before the Senate Judiciary Committee in his own bid to join the high court, he'll face a different challenge. Instead of sparring with nine erudite justices interested in ferreting out fine points of the law, Roberts will confront 18 senators eager to score political points and rack up minutes on the cable news channels. The stakes soared after the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist late last week. While the senators will try to press Roberts for specifics on controversial topics like civil rights, abortion and congressional authority, Roberts will attempt to keep his answers as general as possible without seeming to stonewall. "There's going to be a pretty restrictive line that he's not going to cross, and some senators aren't going to be happy about it," says one person close to Roberts's confirmation team who did not want to be quoted talking about the secretive preparation process.

DOJ_NMG_0003037

Roberts has had plenty of practice. In at least 10 closed "murder board" sessions at the Department of Justice over the past few weeks, the nominee has wrangled with administration officials, lawyers and law professors playing the role of senators. Though a few have been full-blown mock panels of 18 "senators," other sessions have included just a handful of lawyers quizzing Roberts. Used to strict time limits and impatient justices, Roberts was firing off answers quickly; some participants urged him to slow down and let windy senators run out the clock, says an adviser who asked not to be named because the sessions were private. Administration officials assume Roberts will get grilled about abortion and many of the memos released from his days in the Reagan administration. They also worry that he may be pressed on the White House's refusal to release records from his days in the solicitor general's office.

Senators want to pin down Roberts's judicial philosophy, but they know the direct approach may not work. "I don't think you can ask how he would decide Roe for the future [or] extract a commitment from him," Sen. Arlen Specter, Republican committee chair, tells NEWSWEEK. But Specter says he plans to press Roberts on whether Roe—reaffirmed in 38 other decisions—is a "superprecedent" not to be tampered with. A source close to the prep who requested anonymity to speak more freely about the process says Roberts will likely follow the lead of Clarence Thomas, who confirmed a constitutional right to privacy encompassing contraception but steered clear of specifics on abortion in his hearings. "This discussion on the right to privacy will be important," says Sen. Sam Brownback.

Outside the hearing room, interest groups on both sides plan the kind of spin wars usually reserved for a presidential debate. Look for dueling press conferences, a raft of rapid-response e-mails and outside experts armed with talking points. Despite stepped-up efforts from liberal groups, Roberts is widely expected to win Senate confirmation later this month. The key question is margin of victory: a bigger bipartisan win—approaching 80 yea votes—could give George W. Bush more latitude in filling the next court vacancy.

—Debra Rosenberg, Stuart Taylor Jr. and Daniel Klaidman

Roberts' Deputy Post Not So Political (LEGALT)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 5, 2005

After weeks of document dumps and media scrutiny of John Roberts Jr.'s copious writings, the Supreme Court nominee goes before the Senate Judiciary Committee this week with one important part of his professional life still a mystery.

Roberts' three years and three months as principal deputy solicitor general (the so-called political deputy), from 1989 to 1993, produced easily as much paper as his earlier jobs in government. But except for briefs filed with the Supreme Court, all of it—including memorandums on cases—remains sealed, to the chagrin of Democrats and groups that oppose his nomination.

That part of Roberts' life is likely to provoke questioning from Senate Democrats who are intent on seeing if the conservative views he expressed as a young Reagan White House aide burned as brightly in his psyche a decade later. "The SG materials may be the only real source that reflects his own mature personal thinking," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) in an Aug. 10 statement.

Adds Nan Aron, president of Alliance for Justice, "At this point, the American people know next to nothing about the legal views Judge Roberts expressed during the most important, most influential period of his career as a lawyer." The group announced its opposition to Roberts last week.

So far, the only formal White House response has been to release a list of the Supreme Court cases Roberts handled—among them, 717 case recommendations, 77 briefs on the merits, and 31 petitions for certiorari. But the Bush administration won't release the texts, holding to the position taken during Miguel Estrada's bid for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit in 2002: that releasing the memos he wrote in the SG's office would chill much-needed candor.

Beyond the posturing and politics of the dispute, however, some question how valuable the documents would be, asserting that the tussle results from a gross misunderstanding of the job Roberts held under Solicitor General Kenneth Starr during the first Bush administration.

The documents "still wouldn't tell you his personal views about a case," says Maureen Mahoney of Latham & Watkins, who served alongside Roberts as another deputy in the office. "No matter how you describe the position of political deputy, he does not have the authority to decide to file a brief requesting the Court to overrule Roe v. Wade."

Jones Day's Donald Ayer, Roberts' predecessor in the job, agrees, saying, "The great bulk of what you do does not have any political consequences. You are in the trenches along with everybody else."

Duke University Law School professor H. Jefferson Powell, who held the principal deputy's job for part of the Clinton administration, says that Democrats are wasting their time. "The memos would reveal that he was pushing the positions of President Bush I," says Powell. "That news would make me want to yawn and take a nap."

DOJ_NMG_0003038

Some of the mystery and misunderstanding about the job Roberts held stems from its informal title, the "political deputy" solicitor general. That signifies only that the person filling the position is a political appointee who comes and goes with administrations, unlike the other three or four deputies in the office who are career civil servants. And it also means, in a general sense, that the person is "with the program" of the administration that hires him, as Powell puts it. Beyond that, though, the political nature of the job appears limited.

Yet those who have held the job say they have had to fight the impression that they were White House moles who enforced political or ideological orthodoxy in an office that has a long-standing tradition of independence.

"We thought the person with this job would be a political overseer or a political commissar, but it didn't turn out that way," says Andrew Frey, a Mayer Brown Rowe & Maw partner who served in the SG's office when the position was created, a few years before Roberts arrived.

The job's creation dates back to a 1982 episode that brought rare attention to the Office of the Solicitor General. Bob Jones University was fighting an Internal Revenue Service ruling that had stripped the institution of its tax-exempt status because it did not admit blacks. When the case went before the Supreme Court, Reagan administration officials pressured the Solicitor General's Office to support the university. Rex Lee, then the solicitor general, recused himself from the case, which meant that Lawrence Wallace, a career deputy with seniority in the office, was called on to write the brief. But there was a problem: Wallace believed the IRS position was correct and should be defended.

After much negotiation, Wallace wrote the brief as requested but made it clear in a footnote that he disagreed with it. The footnote launched headlines and editorial comment for weeks, and, ultimately, the Court supported the IRS policy, 8-1. "They didn't listen to me, and they embarrassed themselves," says Wallace, now retired.

In the aftermath of the Bob Jones debacle, Reagan officials pressed for a deputy position that would be a political appointment, so that when the solicitor general could not participate, someone else would be available to espouse the administration's position.

Lee, now deceased, resisted the idea, fearing the politicization of the office. "Rex was not enthusiastic about it," Wallace recalls. "So he decided to use it to enrich the office by bringing in someone with distinction, not someone just with political credentials." Lee recruited the late Harvard Law School professor Paul Bator, who is credited with creating the political deputy's tradition as a largely nonpolitical position equivalent in most ways to that of other deputies. As with the other deputies, the solicitor general himself signs off on all the political deputy's briefs.

Roberts has argued that the job was largely apolitical and that it served to insulate the rest of the office from politics. At a 2002 conference at Brigham Young University, Roberts, then in private practice at Hogan & Hartson, said, "It promotes, rather than undermines, the traditional institutional independence of the Office of the Solicitor General."

Roberts went on to explain that when he was in the position he, rather than the career deputies, would take the angry calls from others in the administration questioning the SG's position in a given case. "It was my job, I thought, to explain to this person that although this particular position . . . may be causing you some political heartburn, here is why we have to do it: It is compelled by our obligation to represent long-standing institutional interests of the United States."

By fielding those calls, Roberts said he protected the career attorneys in the office, who were sometimes suspected of being "holdovers" from previous administrations with different agendas.

As an example, Roberts mentioned the so-called Boston Harbor case. At issue was whether Massachusetts could require union-labor-only contracts in the project to clean up Boston Harbor. Starr filed a brief agreeing that the state acted within its powers.

The Association of Builders and Contractors pressured the administration to withdraw the brief, at one point threatening to oppose President George H. W. Bush's re-election. Starr held his ground, the brief was not withdrawn, and the Court unanimously agreed with his position.

Lawyers in the Solicitor General's Office at the time confirm Roberts' role as a buffer against political pressure. "He was certainly not viewed as a 'fixer,' " says Mahoney. "He was universally admired by lawyers in the office of all political persuasions."

In their document requests, Democrats have focused on a handful of cases in which Roberts signed the brief or handled the oral arguments. Two involve abortion rights: Rust v. Sullivan, a challenge to prohibitions on abortion advice at federally funded clinics, in which Roberts repeated in passing the administration position that Roe v. Wade should be overturned, and Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic. In that case, Roberts argued in support of the position taken by militant anti-abortion protesters that the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871 did not apply to their activities.

Democrats hope Roberts' memos on the cases might reveal more of his views, but veterans of the office say that case memos, if released, would likely contain only a handwritten sentence or two from Roberts atop what other attorneys in the office wrote analyzing the case and recommending whether the government should seek review.

DOJ_NMG_0003039

In a Washington Post op-ed column, former acting Solicitor General Walter Dellinger III suggested that because Roberts was a political appointee, a stronger case could be made that his memos should be made public, especially in the context of a Supreme Court nomination. But in an interview, Dellinger says he is not certain they should be released, partly because by doing so, the views of other attorneys in the office would also be revealed. He also says that, by and large, the work of the political deputy is no different from that of any other deputy.

One of the petitions Roberts wrote as a deputy SG might even get him in trouble this week with a Republican. He wrote the government's brief in O'Keefe v. Specter, a dispute over military-base closings, in which Roberts was on the opposite side of Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), who will preside over Roberts' confirmation hearings. Specter argued the case himself in 1994. He lost, 9-0.

Tony Mauro can be contacted at tmauro@alm.com.

The Judiciary Committee's Star Turn (LEGALT)

By T.R. Goldman, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 5, 2005

This week's Supreme Court confirmation hearings promise to be as theatrical as Congress gets. But the telegenic John Roberts Jr. will, in some respects, be a supporting actor, sharing the stage with 18 senators who view the hearings as their own star vehicle.

More than simply trying to pin down the elusive Roberts on his jurisprudence, the Senate Judiciary Committee's 10 Republicans and eight Democrats will be putting their own ambitions and agendas on display.

Rival Democrats will be trying to electrify their party base by showing who can be the toughest on the nominee, while Republicans will be seeking to burnish their own national credentials, competing to place Roberts' more controversial statements in the most benign light.

It is a committee of extremes — both liberal and conservative — and, even by Senate standards, of powerful egos. Six members have either run for president or are contemplating a bid (or in Delaware Democrat Joseph Biden Jr.'s case, another bid) in the 2008 election.

And there's another dynamic at play: A Supreme Court confirmation gives Congress a rare chance to tell the Court what it thinks about its co-equal branch.

While the Judiciary Committee already gets plenty of attention — it deals with the most explosive topics facing the country, from gun control to flag burning to abortion — the Roberts hearings will provide a chance for members to enhance or sink their own political futures. Just ask Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), another former presidential candidate. His opposition to Judge Robert Bork nearly cost him his Senate seat, while his aggressive cross-examination of Anita Hill during the Clarence Thomas hearings both failed to assuage hard-line conservatives and drew the wrath of liberal supporters.

"Think of all the legislation Congress does; most of it will be forgotten," says Melissa Patack, a former counsel to Judiciary Committee member Sen. Charles Grassley (R-Iowa), who worked on four Supreme Court nominations. "This will not be forgotten. This will make it into the history books."

JOCKEYING FOR POSITION

Specter, who is a stickler for order and has no problem cutting off the most senior committee members if they speak too long, is expected to run the Roberts hearings with characteristic rigor.

That means members will make statements and use their allotted question time in strict order of committee seniority, alternating between Republican and Democrat. That in itself has strategic implications, because each side will have very different objectives.

For Democrats, the goal is to put Roberts on the spot, to probe his few contentious writings and pin down his legal philosophy as precisely as possible.

Republicans will then do what they delicately refer to as "rehabilitation," holding up those same statements and explaining how the Democrats have willfully misread them.

"The challenge," says one senior Republican committee aide, is that "we don't know what documents they will wave around or what statements they will take out of context."

For example, Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), considered one of the brightest of the 10 GOP members, is set to follow Biden, a former Judiciary chairman, who, despite a tendency for drama, generally asks difficult, well-considered questions. But Biden, like fellow committee Democrat Russell Feingold of Wisconsin and Republican Sam Brownback of Kansas, has presidential ambitions. That, say committee staffers, might make each senator play to his respective constituencies even more than usual.

"What do Feingold and Biden have to gain by voting for Roberts?" asks one Democratic Judiciary counsel. Biden, for example, may be carrying a grudge. He sponsored the Violence Against Women Act of 1994 (VAWA), which the high court struck down in part in 2000, saying Congress had failed to establish a link between violence toward women and regulating interstate commerce. In recent years the Court has shown hostility to broad prohibitions laid down by the legislative branch.

"The Court has slapped down Congress on more than one occasion — on VAWA, on the CDA, on guns in the schoolyard," says former Democratic Judiciary counsel Beryl Howell, referring to the Communications Decency Act and a 1990 law forbidding students from carrying guns in a school zone. Like VAWA, the Court struck down those laws on the grounds that Congress had exceeded its constitutional authority.

"The Court has slapped Congress and treated them worse than an administrative agency," adds Howell, now the general counsel at Stroz Friedberg in Washington. Biden may demand to know how Roberts views congressional power. And if Biden doesn't like the answer, it may be up to Kyl to smooth it over, to say, in effect, that Biden's question is out of line — something Roberts won't be able to say directly.

For Kyl and two other Republicans, Sens. Mike DeWine (Ohio) and Orrin Hatch (Utah), who ran for president in 2000, the hearings have special significance: The three are up for re-election in 2006. Three committee Democrats are also up next year: Sens. Herbert Kohl (Wis.), Dianne Feinstein (Calif.), and Edward Kennedy (Mass.), whose presidential bid was in 1980 and who will be running for his eighth term.

PLAYING DEFENSE

Republicans, of course, have made educated guesses about the subjects Democratic members are likely to broach and are preparing their responses accordingly.

Kennedy, for example, is viewed as most likely to toe the tough line of liberal special interest groups like the Alliance for Justice and People For the American Way. He will talk about civil rights, voting rights, and affirmative action, while Biden will focus on privacy and women's issues. Ranking member Patrick Leahy of Vermont, often overshadowed by Biden and Kennedy, will raise the issue of Roberts documents missing from the Reagan archives. Kohl, the antitrust subcommittee's ranking Democrat, will most likely bring up business-related queries.

Feinstein, the only woman on the committee, is sure to talk about abortion. Like other Democrats, she's in a bit of a political bind. Roberts was confirmed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in 2003 by unanimous consent. If she votes "no," she will be accused of flip-flopping; if she votes "yes," she risks alienating her base.

Feingold is among the most unpredictable of committee Democrats: the only senator of either party to vote against the USA Patriot Act and the only Judiciary Committee Democrat to vote to confirm former Attorney General John Ashcroft. Like Biden, Kennedy, and New York's Charles Schumer, who follows Feingold in committee seniority, he can be a tenacious questioner, especially when it comes to his favorite subjects, such as the death penalty and campaign finance reform.

Of course, says one former Democratic committee counsel, members will have to remain flexible. "You wouldn't expect Feingold to focus on choice, but he follows Feinstein, and if something's left hanging, he'll try to clean it up."

Schumer, so far the most outspoken Democratic critic of the Roberts nomination — and the Democrat conservative Republicans most love to hate — has released a long laundry list of questions he might ask. "All the fireworks will be about how much Chuck Schumer makes this about Chuck Schumer," insists one Republican leadership aide working on the hearing.

Illinois' Richard Durbin, who despite being assistant Senate minority leader is the committee's most junior Democratic member, will likely focus on any subjects that are left. "He's at the bottom of the ladder, so he'll get the crumbs," notes a Democratic aide.

So important is the order of questioning that Republicans are quick to note that, given their 10-8 numerical advantage, the GOP will have three members in a row ask questions: Brownback; Tom Coburn (Okla.), the committee's most junior Republican; and then back to Specter, before Democrats get another shot at Roberts in round 2, which Specter has said will last only 20 minutes per person.

Specter, who will almost certainly vote for Roberts, could nonetheless deliver some of the week's toughest attacks on the 50-year-old judge. Last month he sent Roberts an angry letter denouncing the Court's ruling in U.S. v. Morrison, which declared that Congress could not create a federal civil remedy for gender-related crimes.

"Members of Congress are irate about the Court's denigrating and, really, disrespectful statements about Congress' competence," Specter wrote, referring to the Court's rejection of Congress' "method of reasoning."

In that vein, he is likely to mirror some of Biden's objections, though without Biden's flamboyance.

The committee's second-ranking Republican and its former chairman, Hatch, on the other hand, is Specter's polar opposite. Where Specter's questions are likely to dig in, Hatch is better known for his brand of rehabilitative questioning on the order of, " 'Isn't it true, sir, that you're a really good guy?' " mocks the Democratic counsel.

It's true that while Democrats will have the luxury of remaining on the offensive, and Republicans will largely be forced to play defense, the 10-member GOP team is hardly monolithic.

DOJ_NMG_0003041

Hatch will be followed by Grassley, a longtime committee member; he and Coburn are the panel's only non-lawyers. Grassley, a blunt-speaking farmer; DeWine; and South Carolina's Lindsey Graham are probably the panel's most independent-minded Republicans.

It is the committee's three most junior members — Coburn, Brownback, and, especially, former Texas Supreme Court Justice John Cornyn — who are most likely to do the White House's bidding.

Indeed, while Democrats would love to pin down Roberts on his views on Roe v. Wade, it is possible that the job may be done for them by a conservative Republican such as Brownback, something that would be anathema to most committee Republicans.

"Brownback and [Virginia Sen. George] Allen are the only two Republicans competing for the outer limits of the conservative party," notes a Judiciary Committee counsel for a Republican member. "So of course Brownback would love to pin him down on Roe v. Wade. That way, if he turns out to be another [David] Souter, Brownback can say he tried." But, he adds, "we're working hard on Roberts not to answer."

Brownback's office declined to comment.

The senior leadership staffer, however, denies any split in the ranks. "We've had meeting after meeting on this and we're all very much up the middle," he says. "I'm expecting a relatively dull experience."

T.R. Goldman can be contacted at tgoldman@alm.com.

Irritating Them All (USNEWS)

By Terence Samuel

U.S. News and World Report, September 5, 2005

The man with the gavel, Arlen Specter, 75, of Pennsylvania, Republican chair of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, is, depending on who's talking, a contradiction, a compromise, or a curse. He has been called pragmatic, erratic, and opportunistic. Over a political life of more than 40 years, he has bucked the odds, defied conventional wisdom, and sailed against the wind. But he's no cliche.

A moderate in a party increasingly controlled by conservatives, Specter is pro-abortion rights in a GOP that is antiabortion to its core. He is a contrarian often at odds with fellow Republicans, not just on abortion but on issues like tax cuts and tobacco litigation. He enjoys quoting a popular Democrat on party fealty: "JFK had the best line on that," Specter says, "when he said that sometimes the party asks too much." But Specter annoys the other side, too. His continued political survival remains a source of deep frustration for Democrats, who see him as perpetually vulnerable--but impossible to beat.

Always, he has been singularly Arlen Specter, infuriating his friends and confounding his enemies. It is hard to know what to expect from Arlen Specter. Which is why it will be so fascinating to watch him this week as he chairs the Judiciary Committee's hearings on Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts.

Roots. Born in Kansas in Wichita, Specter grew up in the town of Russell, which also claims former Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole as a native son. Dole was seven years older and a basketball star; Specter was on the debating team at the same high school. Specter's parents were Jewish immigrants, his father from Ukraine, his mother from Russia. His father ran a junkyard.

Specter went east to college, at the University of Pennsylvania, and then, after a stint in the Air Force, graduated from Yale Law School. After three years at a prestigious Philadelphia firm, Specter joined the Philadelphia district attorney's office in 1959 as an assistant D.A. It was while he was a prosecutor in Philadelphia, in December 1963, that he was invited by a law school friend at the Justice Department to join the staff of the Warren Commission. In that position, Specter, dogged and determined, developed the single-bullet theory to explain how a lone gunman had fired the single shot that killed President Kennedy and injured Texas Gov. John Connally, who was in the car with him.

"I now call it the single-bullet conclusion," Specter writes in his memoir, Passion for Truth. "It began as a theory, but when a theory is established by the facts, it deserves to be called a conclusion." As a commission investigator, Specter drafted 78 questions to ask Lyndon Johnson, "who would, under other circumstances, have been considered a prime suspect." Specter said he didn't think Johnson had anything to do with the assassination, but "no self-respecting investigator would omit a thorough investigation of the slain president's successor." Those questions were never asked, because Johnson submitted just a brief affidavit. But Specter was ready.

Higher Stakes For Roberts (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

Why did President Bush pull such a quick switch yesterday and name Judge John Roberts to be chief justice of the United States? There are several theories, but here's the most sensible: Bush had always planned to make Roberts chief someday.

DOJ_NMG_0003042

Recall that before Sandra Day O'Connor announced her retirement in July, much of official Washington was expecting that Chief Justice William Rehnquist would be the first to leave. The administration's extensive vetting was organized in large part to find a replacement for Rehnquist.

Roberts's combination of a conciliatory personality with firmly conservative convictions made him the perfect choice to lead the judicial revolution Bush would like to unleash. Successful chief justices need to be good politicians, and Roberts's political gifts were much in evidence this summer as he seemed to be charming his way toward relatively easy Senate approval.

But Rehnquist's passing and Bush's decision to withdraw Roberts's nomination as associate justice so he could name him chief create new political problems for both Bush and his appointee.

Until yesterday, even Roberts's staunchest critics judged their chances of stopping him for O'Connor's seat as bleak. Discussion among Senate Democrats revolved less around a strategy for blocking Roberts than on tactics that would make the best of his likely confirmation.

The debate focused on how many votes Democrats should try to muster against him -- to send a message for the big fight that would come over Rehnquist's job -- and whether senators from states where Bush had been popular should even consider voting no. Should Democrats try to look "moderate" by going along, or cast themselves as fighters for principle?

By proposing that Roberts lead the court, Bush has given the liberal groups that oppose the nomination (and Democratic senators inclined to join them) a chance to regroup and argue that this battle is no longer a practice session for the next round. This is the next round.

"Now that he's been nominated for chief justice, he's not a test case anymore," said a Senate Democratic staffer close to his party's discussions. "There's a difference between being one of nine and Number One of nine. And if he's confirmed, he's likely to hold the job for the next generation."

Fully aware that postponing confirmation hearings scheduled for today would give Roberts's opponents more time to organize, some Senate Republicans urged against any delay. Yesterday, it became clear that the hearings would be put off until either Thursday or next Monday. But the administration's allies are clearly wary of any further postponement.

Democrats, in turn, wanted more time to make the case that their requests for Roberts's past writings as an executive branch official -- documents the administration is holding back -- are more reasonable and appropriate than ever, "given the even greater importance of this new position," as Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) put it yesterday.

Moreover, now that Bush will be naming not one but two justices, it becomes clear that the argument before the Senate is not primarily about one person and his qualifications, but about the future direction of the judiciary. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) was right to say that before the Senate acted on Roberts, "we should know whom the president intends to propose to nominate as a replacement" for O'Connor, since Americans were concerned with "the overall balance of their highest court."

Until yesterday's announcement, Roberts seemed likely to win on the basis of his personal attributes. By raising the stakes, Bush has given the Democratic opposition an opportunity to show some spine. He has reminded senators that this is a vote not just about a smart, affable lawyer, but also about principles that could steer the Supreme Court for 30 years.

There is no telling whether Bush's diminished standing from the disastrous failure of hurricane relief efforts may embolden Democrats to challenge the White House across a much broader front, including the future of the court. But in the statement he issued within hours of Roberts's new nomination, Kennedy wanted no one to miss that possibility. He pointedly referred to Hurricane Katrina as "a defining moment in our nation's history" and urged the president "to take this time to unite and heal the country."

Bush no doubt turned to Roberts as a safe harbor in the midst of the greatest political storm of his presidency, and Roberts may yet triumph. But the fierce winds that have buffeted Bush could imperil what once might have been an easy passage for a calm and collected nominee who, in his warm and witty way, would move the court and the country rightward.

postchat@aol.com

By proposing that Roberts lead the court, Bush has given liberal groups a chance to regroup and argue that this battle is no longer a practice session for the next round. It is the next round.

A Weakened Bush Plays It Safe On Chief Justice (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings And Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON -- At a time of increasing political weakness, President Bush tapped John Roberts as his nominee for chief justice, choosing to avoid -- or at least delay -- a fresh ideological battle over the Supreme Court.

In quickly shifting gears following Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's death from thyroid cancer Saturday night, the White House steered away from the controversial path some supporters have advocated: elevating to chief one of the court's two most outspoken conservatives, Antonin Scalia or Clarence Thomas.

Judge Roberts -- currently a member of the federal appeals court in Washington, D.C. -- appears more likely to follow the collegial Rehnquist example. While moving the court in a rightward direction on issues such as criminal law, the late chief tried during his 19 years in charge to create an amicable atmosphere. He sometimes shaped his opinions to cement a five-vote majority, rather than hewing completely to his views.

As Hurricane Katrina, rising gas prices and Iraq have sent Mr. Bush's poll ratings to the lowest levels of his administration, the Roberts nomination in July to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor has been one of the few moves to go smoothly for the White House lately. Mr. Bush's conservative base praised the pick, while many Democrats have found the genial judge difficult to attack. Public-opinion surveys show the country largely accepting Judge Roberts moving to the high court.

"For the past two months, members of the United States Senate and the American people have learned about the career and character of Judge Roberts," Mr. Bush said in an Oval Office announcement yesterday morning before heading to the Gulf Coast for the second time in four days. "They like what they see."

The White House likes the fact that Judge Roberts, at 50 years old, could run the court for a quarter century or more. If confirmed, he would be the youngest chief justice since John Marshall, who took office in 1801 at the age of 45.

When Judge Roberts was in line to succeed Justice O'Connor, he had the potential to shift the court's positions dramatically on hot-button social issues. Justice O'Connor often split the difference between the left and right on abortion, affirmative action and government support of religion. Now Judge Roberts would replace a jurist whose votes he is thought likely to track. Viewed this way, having Judge Roberts replace Chief Justice Rehnquist, for whom the nominee once clerked, wouldn't affect the court's political balance.

But it leaves open the big question of whom Mr. Bush will choose this time to replace Justice O'Connor. She has said she will stay on the bench until a successor is approved by the Senate.

Will he select a moderate candidate and try to shore up his standing with independents who are losing confidence in the administration? Or should he pick a hard-line conservative and please the party base that still supports him?

If he wanted a strong conservative in the Scalia-Thomas mold, he could turn to Judge J. Michael Luttig, an intellectual heavyweight on the Fourth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, who has been outspoken against abortion rights. "There's no question in my mind with what's on the president's plate right now, the war and Katrina in particular, he is not going to create more uncertainty by abandoning the base on this issue," said Leonard Leo, who is helping outside groups build support for the president's judicial nominees. Mr. Leo is on leave from his position of executive vice president of the Federalist Society, a conservative lawyers organization.

But pleasing the base would risk alienating moderate voters already cooling to Republicans ahead of the 2006 mid-term elections. Gender and particularly race may also play a role, especially in post-Katrina politics. The image of poor, black families stranded on New Orleans rooftops or begging for water has rejuvenated a debate over the Republican Party's posture toward minorities. After a week of such images, Republicans may be hesitant about a second white male nominee to the high court.

Nodding to those sensitivities, the president could name his friend from Texas, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, to fill the slot. Mr. Gonzales would be the first Hispanic on the Supreme Court and has an inspiring story as a self-made man raised by Mexican migrant workers. He has sounded more moderate on abortion rights and affirmative action than some of the other jurists on the short list.

Mr. Bush said yesterday he would choose a new O'Connor replacement "in a timely manner" but aides wouldn't be more specific. The president telephoned Justice O'Connor yesterday to let her know that she might have to stay "a bit longer," said White House spokesman Scott McClellan. If Judge Roberts is cleared quickly by the Senate, the court could open its new session in October with all nine seats filled. If he isn't confirmed by then, John Paul Stevens, the senior associate justice, would preside.

The Senate decided yesterday to delay the start of the Roberts confirmation hearings until after tomorrow's[wed] funeral for Mr. Rehnquist. The Roberts hearings were originally scheduled to open today.

The assumption in Washington has been that, absent a bombshell at those hearings, Judge Roberts would easily win confirmation in time to join the court in October. The White House is betting that as nominee to be chief justice, he will fare just as well.

Records Dispute

Liberal activists and some Democrats, frustrated at their inability to slow the Roberts nomination, argued yesterday that the higher post required a new level of scrutiny. The White House has refused to release records from Judge Roberts's years in the solicitor general's office during the administration of President George H. W. Bush.

"Given the greater importance of this new position, we hope the White House will reconsider its refusal to release relevant and important documents that will shed light on what kind of chief justice Judge Roberts would become," said New York Democrat Sen. Charles Schumer, a member of the Judiciary Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0003044

Democrats hope that, in light of the heightened attention to race because of Hurricane Katrina, they can stir more criticism of Judge Roberts's record on civil rights. As Congress was considering reauthorizing the Voting Rights Act in 1982, Judge Roberts, then a White House lawyer, wrote memos urging the Reagan administration to oppose efforts to expand the law's scope. He criticized a U.S. Civil Rights Commission report that argued for affirmative action. "Under our view of the law it is not enough to say that blacks and women have been historically discriminated against as groups and are therefore entitled to special preferences," he wrote in one memo that Democrats may try to use against him.

In tapping Judge Roberts to be chief justice, President Bush yesterday praised the nominee's "natural gifts as a leader." But just as Judge Roberts's thin two-year resume on the bench makes it hard to divine how he would rule on many issues, his relative lack of management background creates uncertainty over how he would handle being head of the federal judicial system. Apart from serving as a mid-level political aide and a private lawyer, he held the post of principal deputy solicitor general in the Justice Department for four years, more than a decade ago -- his only claim to executive experience.

Judge Roberts may have less combined judicial and management experience than any of the prior 16 chief justices at the time of their confirmation. While Chief Justice Rehnquist had never been a judge before joining the Supreme Court in 1971, he served on the court for 15 years before becoming chief in 1986.

Despite his exalted rank -- something Chief Justice Rehnquist highlighted by adding gold stripes to his robe -- the chief justice has few powers beyond those of the eight associate justices. He presides over the private meetings the justices hold to discuss cases and, when he is in the majority, assigns the writing of opinions. Outside the Supreme Court, the chief justice heads the Judicial Conference, which is the policymaking arm of the federal judiciary.

In both roles, however, the chief justice's influence depends more on force of personality than raw power. Among recent chief justices, Mr. Rehnquist and Earl Warren are considered to have been strong leaders. On the other hand, Warren Burger, chief justice when Judge Roberts was a Supreme Court clerk, garnered respect neither as an intellectual force nor as an effective manager, despite his experience as an appellate judge and assistant attorney general.

Part of Mr. Rehnquist's influence as chief came from his evolution from a hard-edged ideological justice to a cooperative manager of his fellow justices. When he first joined the Supreme Court, his background had been as a Republican political operative and then an architect of the Nixon administration's hard line on criminal justice and political dissent. But when elevated to chief justice in 1986, he became known less for stinging dissents than a deep respect for the Supreme Court.

That leadership style sometimes affected the substance of judging. Chief Justice Rehnquist joined the bench as a fierce critic of the Warren Court's efforts to deter police misconduct by excluding ill-gotten evidence and requiring that authorities advise prisoners of their rights before questioning them. But in 2000, he wrote for a seven-member majority to affirm the 1966 decision that established the famous Miranda warning. "Miranda has become embedded in routine police practice to the point where the warnings have become part of our national culture," he wrote. By siding with the majority -- and against dissenting Justices Scalia and Thomas -- he could assign himself the job of writing the opinion and prevent a more liberal justice from expanding Miranda's sweep.

As a young lawyer, Judge Roberts was, like the young Rehnquist, sharply critical of a judicial establishment he considered too liberal. After serving as a clerk to then-Justice Rehnquist, Judge Roberts helped vet potential Reagan judicial nominees. At one point, he proposed a 15-year judicial term limit to help "ensure that federal judges would not lose all touch with reality through decades of ivory tower existence."

Over the years, however, he has shown signs of having more respect for the judiciary, including its long-serving members. As a litigator before the Supreme Court, he learned to craft arguments to sway the justices he now is poised to lead.

The White House has been debating how to fill the O'Connor seat since Sunday morning. The circle of participants is small, and the primary voices are those of Vice President Dick Cheney, top political adviser Karl Rove, Chief of Staff Andrew Card and White House Counsel Harriet Miers. Mr. Rove keeps the pulse of the party base, regularly communicating with the administration's outside allies.

Although Mr. Bush said he would act quickly, conservative activist groups are counseling against naming an O'Connor replacement before the Senate Judiciary Committee sends Judge Roberts's name to the Senate floor. That could take up to three weeks.

Mr. Bush has long been seen as personally partial to Mr. Gonzales, who served on the Texas Supreme Court when the president was the state's governor. He was on Mr. Bush's short list to fill the O'Connor seat the first time around.

Still, conservatives launched an unusually public campaign to derail his Supreme Court appointment over the summer, arguing he is not sufficiently opposed to abortion rights and affirmative action. It didn't help that Mr. Gonzales, in his early weeks on the job at the Justice Department, met face-to-face with officials from the liberal American Civil Liberties Union. Yesterday, conference calls among conservative activists buzzed with concern that Mr. Bush would nominate Mr. Gonzales. "We've come full circle," one participant said in an interview.

DOJ_NMG_0003045

Among conservative intellectuals, Judge Luttig remains a favorite. After service in the first Bush administration, where he helped prepare Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas for confirmation hearings, Judge Luttig was rewarded with a seat on the Fourth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va. There he quickly emerged as a powerhouse. He writes taut and sometimes acerbic opinions and has helped a large numbers of his clerks obtain Supreme Court clerkships and positions of power in the current Bush administration. Many consider Judge Luttig an academic equal of Justice Scalia, for whom he once clerked. He would probably be a more inflammatory choice, likely to provoke a political fight the president may not welcome now.

The White House is also considering naming a woman to replace Justice O'Connor. Officials have already conducted background checks on several, including two on the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans: Judge Edith H. Jones and Judge Edith Brown Clement. The White House is likely to expand its list of female candidates to include Karen Williams of the Fourth Circuit and Justice Maura D. Corrigan of the Michigan Supreme Court.

President Names Roberts As Choice For Chief Justice (NYT)

By Richard W. Stevenson

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 5 - President Bush said on Monday that he would nominate Judge John G. Roberts Jr., who had been his choice to fill the Supreme Court seat being vacated by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, to succeed William H. Rehnquist as chief justice of the United States.

Mr. Bush announced the switch less than 36 hours after Chief Justice Rehnquist's death and a day before the Senate Judiciary Committee had been scheduled to open hearings on Judge Roberts's nomination to replace Justice O'Connor.

If confirmed after hearings that are now expected to get under way in the next week, Judge Roberts would become the 17th chief justice. In taking the job at age 50, he would be in a position to play a pivotal role for decades in shaping the Supreme Court's rulings.

Saying that the Senate and the American people "like what they see" in Judge Roberts, Mr. Bush hailed what he called "his striking ability as a lawyer and his natural gifts as a leader."

The quick decision reflected the White House's conclusion that Judge Roberts, despite opposition to his conservative views from liberal groups and many Democrats in Congress, had withstood intense scrutiny since being nominated to replace Justice O'Connor and could be confirmed comfortably. Mr. Bush said he wanted him to be sworn in as chief justice before the start of the court's new term on Oct. 3.

In choosing Judge Roberts to be chief justice at a sensitive political time, Mr. Bush avoided the fiery ideological fight that would have been ignited had he chosen to elevate Justice Antonin Scalia, a favorite of many conservatives, or turned to a sitting federal judge with a clearer and more extensive conservative record of opinions on social issues than Judge Roberts has.

The rapid sequence of events left Mr. Bush back where many in Washington had thought he would be at the end of the court's last session in June, when Chief Justice Rehnquist was widely expected to step down first, perhaps to be followed by Justice O'Connor.

Having essentially moved to swap one reliable conservative for another in the chief justice's seat, the president now faces what is likely to be a much more intense battle to replace Justice O'Connor, a swing voter on abortion and other contentious issues. But the political climate Mr. Bush faces now is very different from the one in July, when he first moved to fill Justice O'Connor's seat.

The federal government's slow response to suffering inflicted by Hurricane Katrina, on top of the continued bloodshed in Iraq and high gasoline prices, has eaten into Mr. Bush's political strength, emboldening his opponents.

A senior administration official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of personnel issues, said Mr. Bush's decision on the next nominee would not be swayed by the politics of the moment. But the official made a point of saying that Mr. Bush was considering candidates "from all walks of life," signaling that the administration was sensitive to the pressure to nominate a woman or a member of a minority to replace Justice O'Connor.

Mr. Bush offered the job of chief justice to Judge Roberts at a 7:15 meeting Monday morning in the Oval Office. The two men had met in the White House residence on Sunday evening to discuss the situation, Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, said. The senior administration official who spoke on the condition of anonymity said the president had not interviewed anyone else for the chief justice position after Chief Justice Rehnquist's death late Saturday.

"It is in the interest of the court and the country to have a chief justice on the bench on the first full day of the fall term," Mr. Bush said in disclosing what has the potential to be one of the most consequential personnel decisions of his presidency.

It was fitting, he said, that Chief Justice Rehnquist "be followed in office by a person who shared his deep reverence for the Constitution, his profound respect for the Supreme Court and his complete devotion to the cause of justice."

DOJ_NMG_0003046

Judge Roberts, standing by Mr. Bush in the Oval Office for the hastily arranged announcement just after 8 a.m. as the president prepared to leave for a tour of the storm damage in Louisiana and Mississippi, said he was "honored and humbled." Judge Roberts, a Rehnquist clerk in 1980 and 1981, said that if confirmed he would "succeed a man I deeply respect and admire."

Mr. Bush said he would select a nominee for the O'Connor seat "in a timely manner." White House officials signaled that there would not be an announcement this week and that they saw no real possibility of having a nominee for that seat confirmed by the start of the new term.

Speculation immediately centered on the same group of people who had been most prominently mentioned for the O'Connor seat the first time around. They include Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and several federal appeals court judges, including Edith Brown Clement, Edith H. Jones, J. Michael Luttig, Michael W. McConnell, Priscilla R. Owen and J. Harvie Wilkinson III.

Republican leaders in the Senate continued to work late Monday on a timetable for Judge Roberts's confirmation hearings, taking into account the funeral services for Chief Justice Rehnquist on Wednesday. Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, said the Judiciary Committee would announce a schedule on Tuesday, with the hearings most likely to start on Thursday or next Monday.

With the White House on the defensive over Mr. Bush's performance in dealing with the hurricane, Democrats pressed their advantage on Monday, pledging to subject Judge Roberts to more intensive scrutiny than they had so far and suggesting that the president was already displaying signs of political uncertainty.

Senate Democrats signaled that they would press the White House again to release more documents that might shed light on his thinking about divisive issues likely to come before the court. They have been seeking, unsuccessfully, the release of documents from the four years he spent as principal deputy solicitor general under the first President Bush, when he helped argue the government's position on civil rights issues and other topics of intense interest to liberal groups.

A CBS News poll released Monday found that 57 percent of Americans believed that the Senate should consider a Supreme Court nominee's positions on the issues as well as his or her legal qualifications. That was up from 46 percent last month.

"Now that the president has said he will nominate Judge Roberts as chief justice, the stakes are higher and the Senate's advice and consent responsibility is even more important," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader.

In what amounted to a warning to the White House not to select too conservative a nominee for Justice O'Connor's seat, Mr. Reid also urged Mr. Bush to take into account Justice O'Connor's role as what he called "a voice of moderation and reason on the court" in selecting a replacement.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said there were signs that Mr. Bush was pulling his ideological punches because of political weakness.

"If he had been in a stronger position, he would have nominated Scalia as chief justice," Mr. Schumer said. "The president's general view on court nominees has been to make sure the hard right is happy. His weakened position removes him from that a little bit. We'll see how much."

Mr. Bush called Justice O'Connor from Air Force One on Monday morning, a little more than two hours after announcing his decision about Judge Roberts. A spokeswoman for Mr. Bush, Dana Perino, said Justice O'Connor had not heard the news until the president called. Justice O'Connor repeated to the president that her retirement would become effective when a successor was confirmed, Ms. Perino told reporters traveling with the president, indicating her willingness to start the new term on the bench.

On Sunday, Justice O'Connor said that not having a successor in place by Oct. 3 would present her with a "surprising dilemma."

It is not clear whether she will choose to hear any cases during the opening weeks of the term, since she would most likely have departed by the time they were decided, assuming Mr. Bush makes a choice relatively soon and the nominee appears headed toward confirmation.

Roberts Tapped For Higher Court Calling (CSM)

By Warren Richey And Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON - By naming Supreme Court nominee John Roberts to succeed William Rehnquist as chief justice, President Bush is seeking to avoid a Senate showdown that might have left the nation's highest court short-handed and embroiled in controversy with a new term fast approaching.

DOJ_NMG_0003047

Instead, the move maintains the rough balance of power that existed on the high court prior to the chief justice's death on Saturday. It does so by requiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor to continue to serve on the court until a new nominee to her seat is named and confirmed. What remains unclear, given Mr. Roberts's sparse judicial record, is how a Chief Justice Roberts might compare to Chief Justice Rehnquist. Will Roberts embrace the same conservative constitutional approach as Rehnquist?

"It's too early to tell. Some people believe that Roberts may be similar to Rehnquist in his jurisprudence, although that's not at all clear yet," says Carl Tobias, a constitutional law professor at the University of Richmond Law School.

Should Roberts win Senate confirmation, court watchers will learn the answer soon enough with a lineup of hot-button cases on the court's docket this fall - including assisted suicide on Oct. 5, abortion on Nov. 30, and gay rights on Dec. 6.

The real impact of Rehnquist's sudden passing is that instead of replacing Justice O'Connor, a centrist, with Roberts, who is presumed to be more conservative, the president is now replacing Rehnquist, a conservative, with a prospective chief justice who is to some extent an unknown quantity. The result is likely to be that O'Connor continues to wield her decisive tie-breaking vote in high-profile cases.

Legal analysts and court scholars say the president had few other options.

"To have a Supreme Court open just four weeks from now, the first Monday in October, with only seven people and no chief justice would be unprecedented, and I don't see that happening," says Sheldon Goldman, a political scientist at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

Although O'Connor's continued presence on the high court is a welcome development to Democrats, most fear that it will be short-lived. The president is expected to move quickly to appoint an O'Connor replacement who could shift the court significantly to the right.

In the meantime, Democrats say that Roberts's elevation to chief makes his nomination even more controversial and substantially raises the stakes. In anticipation of his confirmation hearings, Democrats are ramping up to use Roberts's record on civil rights and affirmative action as a main point of attack.

"The chief justice is the most important judge in the country, with even more responsibility for the protection of the rights and freedoms of all Americans. Thus, John Roberts bears a heavier burden when he comes before the Senate," says Sen. Edward Kennedy (D) of Massachusetts.

Republicans are praising the White House choice of Roberts as chief justice, noting that he has the necessary leadership skills to guide the high court. Some suggest his service on the court will mirror that of Rehnquist's.

"Throughout his years on the nation's high court, Chief Justice Rehnquist stood as a beacon of judicial restraint and reverence for the Constitution and the institution of the Supreme Court. I believe Judge Roberts will follow the lead of his mentor, and guide our nation's highest court by those same principles and devotion to the rule of law for all," says Sen. John Cornyn (R) Texas.

Although the chief justice casts only one vote like the other justices, the chief has the power when in the majority to assign who will write the majority opinion. In a closely divided court, the assigning power can sometimes be used strategically to draw an otherwise dissenting justice into the majority by naming that justice to write the opinion. The chief justice also has the power to assign the decision to him or herself and thus limit or expand the scope of a decision in subtle but meaningful ways.

The chief justice's personality is also important, legal analysts say. "He does have many of the qualities that potentially can make for a great and influential chief justice," says Professor Tobias. "He has that great intellect, which no one has denied, and a personality in many respects similar to Rehnquist's - a very charming, affable, low-key, modest personality that was able to make the court a much friendlier and somewhat less contentious place."

Liberal advocacy groups say they will continue to oppose the Roberts nomination. Ralph Neas, president of People For the American Way, says the group's objections apply to an even greater degree to efforts to elevate Roberts to chief justice.

"The nomination of John Roberts has evolved considerably since July, when the White House was successful in portraying him as a lawyer above the fray.... Almost daily revelations coming out of the Reagan presidential library show someone at the epicenter of a comprehensive assault on fundamental rights that have been part of the law for decades," says Mr. Neas. The road to confirmation

Supreme Court nominations over the past three decades have encountered a variety of receptions by the Senate.

William Rehnquist

Nominated by President Nixon (R), 1971.

Democrats controlled the Senate.

Senate confirmed 68-26.

John Paul Stevens

Nominated by President Ford (R), 1975.

Democrats controlled the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0003048

Senate confirmed 98-0.
Sandra Day O'Connor
Nominated by President Reagan (R), 1981.
Republicans controlled the Senate.
Senate confirmed 99-0.
Antonin Scalia
Nominated by President Reagan (R), 1986.
Republicans controlled the Senate.
Senate confirmed 98-0.
William Rehnquist
Nominated as chief justice by President Reagan (R), 1986.
Republicans controlled the Senate.
Senate confirmed 65-33.
Robert Bork
Nominated by President Reagan (R), 1987.
Democrats controlled the Senate.
Senate rejected 42-58.
Anthony Kennedy
Nominated by President Reagan (R), 1987.
Democrats controlled the Senate.
Senate confirmed 97-0.
David Souter
Nominated by President George H.W. Bush (R), 1990.
Democrats controlled the Senate.
Senate confirmed 90-9.
Clarence Thomas
Nominated by President George H.W. Bush (R), 1991.
Democrats controlled the Senate.
Senate confirmed 52-48.
Ruth Bader Ginsburg
Nominated by President Clinton (D), 1993.
Democrats controlled the Senate.
Senate confirmed 96-3.
Stephen Breyer
Nominated by President Clinton (D), 1994.
Democrats controlled the Senate.
Senate confirmed 87-9.
Source: Congressional Directory

Newsview: Bush Takes Safe Path On Roberts (AJC/AP)

By Ron Fournier, Ap Political Writer
The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush chose the path of least resistance in nominating John Roberts as chief justice, acting with unusual haste as the war in Iraq and Hurricane Katrina sap his political strength. He was the safest choice Bush could make.

Roberts is a Washington insider well versed in the functions of the Supreme Court and the levers of power in Congress, an accomplished lawyer whose smile and sterling resume seem to take the sharp edges off his deeply conservative ideology.

Liberal activists who opposed Roberts' nomination to replace retiring justice Sandra Day O'Connor had found little in his record to suggest they could thwart that nomination.

He will draw less partisan fire than two other candidates pushed by Bush's conservative backers to succeed the late William H. Rehnquist — associate justices Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia.

DOJ_NMG_0003049

While Roberts' confirmation still seems likely, he may face a tougher road to confirmation because the position of chief justice will be held to a higher standard. Bush's weakening political standing could complicate things for Roberts, according to strategists in both parties.

Republican and Democratic strategists also agree that Bush will come under intense pressure now to name a woman or minority to replace O'Connor. It's no small factor that flooding in New Orleans hit poor, black residents the hardest, raising questions about Bush's sensitivity to minorities and the poor.

"When Roberts' record on civil rights is reviewed inside the Judiciary Committee, it's going to sound more jarring post-Katrina than before the hurricane," said Democratic consultant Jenny Backus. "America was reminded about the big issue out there that has not been openly addressed by the administration — economic disparity based on race."

Bush may also be boxed in ideologically — less inclined to nominate somebody as conservative or to the right of Roberts. But officials close to the White House predicted the president would pick a conservative in the mold of Roberts.

"The fight is over the next one," said Democratic consultant Nick Baldick. "Roberts is taking the Rehnquist voting slot and no one worried about him being much more conservative than Rehnquist."

Privately, several Republicans predicted Monday that Bush's political stature will continue to decline as the Gulf Coast death toll mounts. That may make Roberts an easier target.

But the real complications come later, when Bush turns to O'Connor's seat.

As one senior Republican put it: Weak presidents beget weak nominees. Whoever Bush selects next will be vulnerable because the president's political troubles have grown since he first tapped Roberts. The officials, including two who are working closely with the White House on Supreme Court picks, spoke on condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to discuss the process publicly.

Democrats wondered why it took Bush less time to name Rehnquist's replacement than it did to visit the Gulf Coast after Katrina hit.

"This is about who will run the Supreme Court for the next generation and it looks like they rushed a decision together in a way that doesn't look that thoughtful," said Joe Lockhart, press secretary in the Clinton White House.

Some Democrats urged Bush to delay the nomination process while he responds to Katrina, a not-too-subtle dig at his efforts thus far. "In the midst of a national disaster of biblical proportion," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., said, "it is difficult for the American people to participate fully in the selection of the next chief justice."

In fairness to Bush, he had weeks to consider Roberts' qualifications, and a summer spent in the spotlight turned up no warts on the nominee.

"I think the public vetting proves that this guy is the real deal — bright, knows the issues and can leave a long-term imprint on the court because of his youth and intellect," said Rick Davis, a GOP consultant.

That is a major point that easily gets lost amid the politicking. Roberts, 50, could lead the nation's judicial branch for a generation or more. He may be the last chief justice most Americans know.

On top of that, O'Connor's seat is a critical swing vote — and she may not be the last justice who leaves during Bush's term.

When voters re-elected Bush, they gave Republicans the keys to the future of the U.S. judiciary. Bush and his party control the Judiciary Committee and a solid majority of votes in the Senate. Nobody should be surprised that the Supreme Court, once a liberal bastion, will continue further down the conservative path plowed by Rehnquist himself.

Political Equations Are In For A Revision (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — By choosing federal judge John Roberts to succeed William Rehnquist as chief justice, President Bush picked someone who has been screened extensively and who could be confirmed by the Senate before the court's term begins Oct. 3.

Roberts, who had faced confirmation hearings this week as Bush's choice to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, was perfectly positioned to move over to the chief's slot when Rehnquist, 80, died Saturday. Suddenly, the White House was able to put its top choice for the high court in the center seat.

But Bush's nomination of Roberts to be chief justice shakes up the complicated political calculus that invariably accompanies judicial nominations, particularly those involving the Supreme Court. It also reopens the debate over who should replace O'Connor's moderate voice on the divided court at a time when the Bush administration is battling criticism over its response to Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0003050

A key question in the coming weeks will be whether the White House — which has been feisty in its determination to put strict conservatives on the bench in lower courts — now has the appetite for a knock-down, drag-out fight over a Supreme Court nomination. With O'Connor's seat back in play, Bush also will be under increasing pressure to select a woman or a minority for the nine-member court.

The events of the past several weeks mean that a court that went 11 years without a change in membership will be transformed.

Roberts now is in line to replace the solidly conservative Rehnquist rather than the moderately conservative O'Connor. Roberts, a former law clerk to Rehnquist, was a conservative go-getter as a government lawyer during the Reagan and first Bush administrations, before he moved on to a lucrative private-sector legal career. But his paper trail is not complete, and his current views on major issues of the day — such as abortion, affirmative action and religion's role in government — aren't totally clear. Regardless, he has friends in both parties and has been moving toward a relatively easy confirmation.

Meanwhile, the court will eventually be without O'Connor, who supported affirmative action in college admissions and who is one of six justices who have endorsed abortion rights.

Her successor could shift the court to the right — as Bush's conservative base wants — or add more unpredictability.

It's unclear how all the maneuvering will affect the law in America, but there is certain to be a long shakeout period among the members of the nation's highest court. O'Connor's successor probably won't join the court until after the start of the annual term on Oct. 3. O'Connor has said she will stick around to hear cases until her replacement arrives, but the possibility that she will leave the bench during the middle of a case could further complicate matters for the court.

A key political question is how Bush will respond to pressure to pick a woman or a minority for the court. Without O'Connor, the nine-member court will have only one woman, Ruth Bader Ginsburg. There is only one African-American on the bench, Clarence Thomas, and there has never been a Hispanic justice.

“I think the president himself values diversity on the courts,” says David Leitch, a former deputy White House counsel to Bush and now general counsel at Ford Motor Co. “It will be something that he'll consider. But I don't think it's more or less likely to be a factor because of poll ratings or anything else going on in the short-term news cycle.”

If Bush wants to make the court more diverse, that could enhance the prospects for Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a longtime friend of the president. Gonzales was born in San Antonio to parents whose families immigrated from Mexico.

But Gonzales has a moderate record that has drawn criticism over the years from staunch conservative groups such as the Coalition for a Fair Judiciary. Gonzales has spoken in favor of affirmative action, and as a Texas Supreme Court justice he endorsed the idea of abortion rights.

“Judge Gonzales would be the obvious choice for this next pick, but for the opposition of conservative groups,” says Bradford Berenson, a Washington lawyer who was an associate White House counsel during Bush's first term.

Another candidate for O'Connor's spot could be Larry Thompson, who was deputy attorney general and the highest-ranking African-American law enforcement official in Bush's first term. He is senior vice president and general counsel at PepsiCo in Purchase, N.Y.

Several federal appeals court judges are possible contenders: Samuel Alito of Newark; Janice Rogers Brown of Washington, D.C.; Edith Brown Clement of New Orleans; Emilio Garza of San Antonio; Edith Jones of Houston; Michael Luttig of Alexandria, Va.; Michael McConnell of Salt Lake City; and J. Harvie Wilkinson of Charlottesville, Va.

The president's choice for the O'Connor seat and the resolution of other looming questions will have long-term consequences for the nation's highest court. Rehnquist served 33 years, the last 19 as chief justice. O'Connor is in her 24th year on the bench. Roberts and whoever else is tapped could affect significantly the law for decades to come. This fall, the justices will consider disputes over abortion rights, physician-assisted suicide and campus bans on military recruiting.

Roberts' record generally appears to be in line with Rehnquist's conservative views. Rehnquist presided over a court that curtailed Congress' power in local affairs, reduced protections for criminal defendants and diminished the court's presence in American life, particularly in achieving social goals such as school desegregation and prison reform.

Predicting the high court's decisions in such disputes has become more difficult now that there are two openings. When Roberts was the potential successor to O'Connor, for example, it was easy to see the court taking a slight turn to the right. If Roberts winds up opposing abortion rights, for example, the number of justices in favor of such rights would drop to five.

But if Roberts succeeds Rehnquist — who was a strong opponent of Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision that made abortion legal nationwide — there might be no change in the court's overall stance on abortion. Roberts is 30 years younger than Rehnquist and is in a generation whose members were young adults when Roe was decided, so it is possible that Roberts could favor restrictions on abortion without voting against the basic right to the procedure. If so, he would represent a softening of the chief justice's position on the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0003051

Some Senate Democrats say Roberts should get tougher scrutiny now that he is being nominated for chief justice. “The chief justice is the most important judge in the country, with even more responsibility for the protection of the rights and freedoms of all Americans,” Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said in a statement. “Thus John Roberts bears a heavier burden when he comes before the Senate.”

Marci Hamilton, a law professor at Yeshiva University's Cardozo Law School and a former clerk to O'Connor, says recent events could lead the administration to avoid a nomination fight in the Senate and pick a moderate candidate, someone who could win support from Democrats, to replace O'Connor.

“The poll numbers are bad. Katrina is added to other failures. The moderate choices look better politically,” Hamilton says.

But Leitch, who agrees that a woman or Hispanic jurist is a real possibility, counters that Bush aides “will probably do everything possible to make the best long-term decision, rather than just pay attention to the vicissitudes of the moment. Thirty years from now, you might still have the (new) justice making decisions.”

Roberts's Personal Skills And Political Savvy Seen As Assets (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

On Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's Supreme Court, Justice Antonin Scalia has been the acknowledged intellectual leader of the conservative bloc, a brilliant writer and legal thinker with many followers in legal academia.

Yet when it came time to replace Rehnquist as chief justice, President Bush did not tap Scalia, 69, as some conservatives had hoped. Rather, he reached outside the court and selected John G. Roberts Jr.

Roberts, 50, is not only younger than Scalia, but also mellower, a former law clerk of the easygoing Rehnquist. Roberts became known for his astute political judgments in the Reagan administration and his cordial personal relations with many liberal attorneys during his years as a Supreme Court advocate. In a role in which he will have few means of forging majorities other than persuasion and tact, that could make Roberts an effective force for conservatism on the court.

"A committed conservative with interpersonal skills equal to or superior to Rehnquist's would be a far more effective chief justice than a nominee of equal intellect who lacks those graces," said David J. Garrow, a professor of law at Emory University.

Historians have often labeled different eras at the court for the chief justice who presided at the time. Yet whereas the chief justice runs oral argument and closed-door conferences, he has only one vote and few formal means of control over the court. Rehnquist himself once likened leading the Supreme Court's eight associate justices to controlling "hogs on ice." The court's nominal boss, he said, "may at most persuade or cajole" his independent-minded colleagues.

Thus, the Warren Court's jurisprudence probably owed as much to the thinking and interpersonal skills of Justice William J. Brennan Jr. as it did to the ideas of Chief Justice Earl Warren. Sandra Day O'Connor, an appointee of President Ronald Reagan who often found herself unable to agree with Scalia, was the controlling force of the Rehnquist Court.

Probably the chief justice's principal power is the right to assign the writing of opinions for the court when he is in the majority. Rehnquist was known for the fairness with which he distributed opinions among the associates -- especially in contrast to his predecessor, Warren E. Burger, who often generated ill will by manipulating the process.

Rehnquist also prevented the court's conferences from turning into prolonged debates, which had often led to delays and personal feuding at the court earlier in the 20th century.

Instead, Rehnquist's policy was that every justice would speak at least once, to announce his or her vote and view of the case, before anyone would be allowed to raise an objection.

The Burger period was a time of notorious internal bickering at the court, which Roberts saw first-hand as a law clerk for Rehnquist -- then an associate justice -- during the 1980-1981 term.

As chief justice, Rehnquist would sometimes join a majority he probably did not agree with, so as to reserve the opinion-writing for himself and thus limit the damage to his own legal preferences. But he would also take his share of less-glamorous assignments, such as tax and Indian law cases.

As a young aide in the Reagan administration, Roberts was an advocate of conservative policy positions -- but also a keen student of politics and the media who frequently counseled his superiors how to achieve their objectives without ruffling feathers.

In an Aug. 31, 1982, White House memo, Roberts advised his bosses on relations between the executive branch and the Supreme Court. The document showed great solicitude for the sometimes prickly sensibilities of the justices.

"Any effort to improve relations between the Executive Branch and the members of the Supreme Court must be undertaken with extreme care to ensure that there is no appearance of an effort to affect the deliberations or decisions of the Justices," Roberts wrote. "The dignity of the Court must also be maintained, and the Justices should under no circumstances be made to feel that they are being used as part of any political campaign or an effort to achieve any political end."

DOJ_NMG_0003052

In inviting justices to state dinners, Roberts counseled, "no favoritism should be shown based on the Justice's individual views."

If confirmed by the Senate, Roberts, 50, would be the youngest chief justice since John Marshall took office at the age of 45 in 1801; he would also be taking the helm of a group that has been together for the last 11 years and has known no other chief justice during that time.

Yet few expect either Roberts's age or his newness on the court to be liabilities. That is because he is already so familiar to the current justices, both from his 39 oral arguments before them, and from socializing outside the courtroom.

"He probably knows them as judges and as people better than all but a few other people," said David G. Leitch, a former associate White House counsel in the Bush administration who also served as a law clerk to Rehnquist.

As chief justice, Roberts would also serve as head of the Judicial Conference, which makes policy on behalf of the entire federal judiciary. In this role, Roberts will be expected to represent all federal courts in their efforts to win budget funding and salary increases from Congress, as well as to fend off threats to the judicial branch's independence that might come from the legislative or the executive branch.

There is even a cultural side to the post as chief justice. If confirmed, Roberts would, by law, serve on the boards of the Smithsonian Institution, the National Gallery of Art and the Hirshhorn Museum and Sculpture Garden.

Bush Nominates Roberts As Chief Justice (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

President George W. Bush on Monday nominated Judge John Roberts as Chief Justice of the US, but left open the more difficult question of who should fill the second vacant seat on the US Supreme Court.

The president is faced with a rare opportunity to make two appointments to the Supreme Court at once and shift the Court to the right for decades to come.

Apparently eager to return to the urgent task of repairing his tarnished image after Hurricane Katrina, Mr Bush moved swiftly to fill the first of those seats. He promoted Judge Roberts, 50, who was already in line to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor to fill the seat vacated by the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

The choice is widely viewed as a shrewd one: John Roberts is respected for intelligence, temperament and demeanour. It seems likely he will be confirmed, even by the bitterly divided Senate.

But that leaves Justice O'Connor's seat vacant. She said in July that she would retire, but offered to stay until a replacement could be seated.

Mr Bush said on Monday he would choose a nominee “in a timely fashion”, and a White House spokesman said he called Justice O'Connor from Air Force One to discuss the decision.

But it was not clear whether the announcement would come before or after Judge Roberts' Senate confirmation hearings.

Those hearings, which were to have begun on Tuesday, are expected to be delayed. Much of the groundwork for them has already been done: Judge Roberts's background as a government lawyer, corporate attorney and appeals court judge has already been thoroughly scrutinised, and nothing has yet emerged to fuel enough opposition to defeat him.

Mr Bush urged the Senate to move quickly before the new Supreme Court term on October 3. One prominent liberal group, People for the American Way, immediately came out against him. It said in a statement that Judge Roberts was “unfit to be Chief Justice” largely because of his “hostility to the laws and remedies that protect Americans from discrimination”.

But overall, liberal groups are likely to fight harder over Justice O'Connor's seat. That nominee could go further in shifting the balance on the evenly divided Court.

Democrats Pledge More Intense Scrutiny Of Roberts (WP)

By Jo Becker

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

Senate Democrats yesterday promised to subject John G. Roberts Jr. to an increased level of scrutiny in light of President Bush's decision to nominate the 50-year-old appeals court judge to replace the late William H. Rehnquist as chief justice.

But with conservatives and liberals alike saying that Roberts is on track to be confirmed, the focus was already shifting to what both sides believe will be the real battle: Bush's yet-to-be-named pick to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

O'Connor's seat is critical because she often provided a swing vote on such controversial issues as affirmative action, abortion and prayer in public places. Roberts was initially chosen to replace her, but instead is now poised to succeed Rehnquist, a reliable conservative who died Saturday of thyroid cancer.

DOJ_NMG_0003053

The rare opening of two seats on the nine-member court gives Bush the opportunity to dramatically move the balance of power on the court to the right.

The switch, which comes as the Bush administration struggles to deal with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, had both sides hurriedly recalibrating their strategies. Senate leaders agreed to postpone Roberts's confirmation hearings, which had been scheduled to start today, probably until next Monday.

Bush urged the Senate to quickly confirm Roberts in time for the Oct. 3 start of the new Supreme Court term, saying that the Senate was "well along in the process of considering Judge Roberts's qualifications."

But Senate Democrats said that the move to make Roberts the 17th chief justice of the United States required careful deliberation, particularly given Roberts's relatively short, two-year tenure as a federal appeals court judge.

"The stakes are higher and the Senate's advice and consent responsibility is even more important," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "If confirmed to this lifetime job, John Roberts would become the leader of the third branch of the federal government and the most prominent judge in the nation."

Democrats on the Judiciary Committee plan to renew their calls for the White House to release memos and other documents from Roberts's 1989-1993 tenure as principal deputy solicitor general in the administration of President George H.W. Bush, his highest government posting. "Judge Roberts has a clear obligation to make his views known fully and completely," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y).

Still, even liberal groups opposed to Roberts's nomination said yesterday that the shift is unlikely to alter his chances of being confirmed, given that Republicans are in firm control of the Senate. Some Republicans argued that it will even help his prospects, given that replacing Rehnquist with Roberts isn't likely to change the ideological center of the court.

Kate Michelman, a former president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, said that what senators must do now is highlight Roberts's record on civil rights, his skeptical writings about the legal underpinnings of abortion rights and other stances to "show people what it means to have his views on the court and lay the groundwork for the next nomination fight."

Democrats are already moving to link the two nominations. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said that a review of memos that Roberts wrote while a young lawyer in the Reagan administration shows that Roberts sought to "weaken voting rights, roll back women's rights, and impede our progress toward a more equal nation."

Before the Senate acts on Roberts's new nomination, Kennedy said, the Senate has a right to know whom Bush intends to nominate for O'Connor's position. "The American people care deeply about the overall balance of their highest court."

With President Bush's approval ratings at an all-time low and his administration under fire over its handling of Hurricane Katrina, some conservatives are worried that Bush will forgo the chance to pick another conservative in favor of someone who will not provoke a fight.

Manuel Miranda, former legal counsel to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and the founder of a conservative group that follows judicial issues, said Bush must keep his campaign promise to nominate a justice in the tradition of conservative Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, or risk "sinking even lower in the polls."

"If anything is keeping him afloat right now, it's conservative support," Miranda said.

Meanwhile, Democrats on the Hill are feeling more emboldened by the president's weakened political standing, according to interviews with senior aides and Democratic strategists. Ron Klain, a former aide to President Bill Clinton, said Democrats may be more willing to fight a staunchly conservative second pick.

"As his poll numbers fall, his domestic problems accumulate, and as independent voters increasingly wonder if he is out of touch with what's going on in the country, then Democrats in conservative states have less to fear by crossing him," Klain said.

The question for Democrats is whether the American public, consumed with images of the devastation in the Gulf Coast states, will tune in to the nomination hearings.

Senators are treading carefully. Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said that the Senate looks forward to consulting Bush on a successor to O'Connor, a pick he stressed will "affect all of us, and the generations who follow us."

At the same time, he said, "these are not the only challenges facing the nation at this critical time. Most urgent at this moment is providing the necessary help to Americans still suffering in New Orleans and elsewhere along the Gulf Coast."

Special Interests Gear Up For Fight On Court Vacancy (USAT)

By Mark Memmott

USA Today, September 6, 2005

Now that there are two Supreme Court seats to fill, a relatively quiet debate among interest groups is expected to become the more bitter, multimillion-dollar slugfest opposing sides have long anticipated.

“Watch for World War III,” conservative lawyer John Hinderaker wrote Monday on Power Line, his widely read Web log, or blog.

DOJ_NMG_0003054

Interest groups plan to ramp up their rhetoric, TV ad campaigns and grass-roots lobbying even though Chief Justice William Rehnquist's death may not fundamentally change the court.

If President Bush gets his way in the Senate, Rehnquist will be replaced by another conservative — federal judge John Roberts. “That doesn't turn the court to the right,” said Mark Hurwitz of Western Michigan University.

The vacancy Roberts had previously been tapped to fill, the seat of retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, offers the better opportunity for Bush to at least slightly affect the balance on the court.

O'Connor is a moderate on some social issues. Hers is one of six votes on the nine-member panel to support abortion rights.

Before Rehnquist's death on Saturday, Roberts' nomination to fill O'Connor's seat had generated relatively little heat. Progress for America, a conservative group that pledged to spend up to $18 million to support Bush's nominee, had spent just a few million dollars.

Leading liberal groups such as People for the American Way, Alliance for Justice and NARAL Pro-Choice America had announced their opposition to Roberts' confirmation. But among those, only NARAL had run anti-Roberts TV ads.

Overall, efforts by the White House, Republican Party officials and conservative groups to portray Roberts as a “fair” judge who deserved a “fair,” up-or-down vote in the Senate had dampened debate.

Things changed with the prospect of two court openings:

·Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, said in a statement that Roberts' “hostility” to laws that many in the left view as guarding Americans from discrimination makes him “unfit for the position of chief justice.” Neas promised his group will “vigorously oppose his confirmation.”

In an interview, Neas said stakes are higher now because as chief justice, Roberts, 50, “could have a tremendous impact on the judiciary well into the 21st century.”

·Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, called on the White House to release documents written by Roberts when he was a deputy solicitor general in the first Bush administration. “The American people need to know where this man stands on the issue of privacy,” Keenan said.

As for the O'Connor vacancy, Neas and Keenan called on Bush to choose a moderate, “consensus” nominee. C. Michael Comiskey, political science professor at Penn State Fayette, said that's unlikely. Bush may be riding low in polls, but “I don't think he's afraid of a fight,” Comiskey said. “He's going to nominate the person he wants.”

Interest groups on the right said they are ready to support the president's nominees. “The left is doing its predictable show of hysterical scare-mongering,” said Sean Rushton, executive director of the conservative Committee for Justice.

“We'll defend and promote the nominees,” said Brian McCabe, president of Progress for America.

The groups “have no reason to exist and collect money if they don't fight on this now,” said Hinderaker, the conservative blogger.

Bush Wants Roberts To Be Next Chief Justice (LAT)

By David G. Savage And Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON -- President Bush moved quickly Monday to replace the late William H. Rehnquist on the Supreme Court by nominating Rehnquist's onetime law clerk, Judge John G. Roberts Jr., as the 17th chief justice of the United States.

Bush had nominated Roberts in July as an associate justice to succeed Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. When she wrote Bush about her plans to retire, O'Connor had said she would remain on the court until her successor is confirmed, and she reiterated that sentiment Monday.

The Oval Office announcement of Roberts' new status came less than 36 hours after Rehnquist died at his home in Arlington, Va., and just a day before the Senate Judiciary Committee was to open confirmation hearings on Roberts' nomination as an associate justice. Those hearings were put off, at least until Thursday.

The switch permits Bush to replace the conservative chief justice with a 50-year-old appellate court judge who appears to be an ideological twin. And because the Roberts nomination has been generally well-received, both the White House and Senate Republicans expect he will be confirmed before the first Monday in October, when the Supreme Court begins its new term.

"It is in the interest of the court and the country to have a chief justice on the bench on the first full day of the fall term," the president said. He added that Roberts' "striking ability as a lawyer and his natural gifts as a leader" make him an ideal choice to be chief justice, despite his relative youth.

Indeed, Roberts had been the first choice of White House lawyers earlier this year as a successor to Rehnquist, who had been diagnosed with thyroid cancer last October and was widely expected to retire in June, at the end of the court's 2004-05 term. Roberts was chosen as O'Connor's successor only because she unexpectedly announced her retirement first.

DOJ_NMG_0003055

Now, the intense speculation has focused again on a replacement for O'Connor, the court's swing vote on issues such as religion, abortion and affirmative action. In his remarks Monday morning, Bush said he would choose her successor in a "timely manner."

If the president chooses Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales or Judge Edith Brown Clement from the federal appellate court in New Orleans, the change may not tip the balance of the court to the right. Both are seen as moderate conservatives, somewhat akin to O'Connor.

But Bush could select a nominee with more conservative credentials, such as Judges J. Michael Luttig and J. Harvie Wilkinson of Virginia, Edith H. Jones of Texas or Janice Rogers Brown, the former California Supreme Court justice who was confirmed this summer to the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington. Any of those nominations would set off a political battle in the Senate.

Bush also could turn to Judges Emilio Garza or Priscilla R. Owen, both Texas conservatives, or to Larry D. Thompson, a former deputy attorney general who is highly regarded by Bush insiders and now serves as general counsel to Pepsico.

Gonzales and Garza are Hispanic, and Thompson and Brown are black. Many legal analysts said Monday they expected that Bush would choose a woman or a member of a minority group to fill O'Connor's seat, and not a conservative white male.

"I expect intense pressure on the president from the loyal opposition to nominate as moderate a voice as he can find for the O'Connor replacement," said Pepperdine University law professor Douglas W. Kmiec. That bodes well for the prospects of Gonzales or Clement, he said.

"The realpolitik of the situation is a president who is low in the polls, facing considerable difficulty externally with Iraq and internally with (Hurricane) Katrina will have more difficulty holding his party together than not. That will not augur well for a ... conservative nominee," he said.

But Northwestern University law professor Steven G. Calabresi, a former law clerk to Justice Antonin Scalia and one of the founders of the Federalist Society, a conservative legal group, contended that Bush's political problems with hurricane recovery efforts would not affect his decision.

"I really think the president regards these decisions as among the most consequential of his presidency," Calabresi said. "He will do what he thinks is right for the country regardless of its immediate impact on his political standing. That doesn't necessarily mean he will do something confrontational."

Meanwhile, the new Roberts nomination was praised as a smart move by conservative activists and some independent analysts.

Bush's action Monday "makes a lot of sense. He now knows with near certainty that Roberts is a survivor, who has been vetted by the press and the legal establishment," said Stephen Gillers, a New York University law professor and legal ethicist. "No skeletons have been found, nothing that could possibly derail his confirmation despite some opposition from progressive groups."

Roberts' confirmation "is a virtual shoo-in," he said.

Kmiec predicted that Roberts would exert real influence as chief justice. "He is genial, warm, welcoming, not quick to take umbrage or disagree. He will be very effective by wit, intelligence and the ability to build coalitions for particular points of view," he said.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who was appointed to the court by President Reagan, has infuriated some conservatives by voting to uphold abortion rights and gay rights, and Kmiec suggested that the presence of Roberts as chief justice "may cause Kennedy to be more faithfully conservative."

Liberal groups that were already sharply critical of Roberts said the new nomination raised the stakes in the confirmation hearings.

People for the American Way called Roberts "unfit to be chief justice of the United States." Roberts has shown "hostility to the laws and remedies that protect Americans from discrimination," the group said.

NARAL Pro-Choice America said it was flatly opposed to Roberts, and the National Organization for Woman called him "an anti-women's rights, anti-civil rights judge."

"It is an outrage and an insult to the women of this country that George W. Bush has nominated such as jurist to be chief justice of the United States," said NOW president Kim Gandy.

Duke University's Erwin Chemerinsky, who last week led a group of liberal law professors in announcing opposition to Roberts, said Bush's move Monday "dramatically changes the dynamics of the Roberts confirmation."

Roberts "by all accounts seems to be like Rehnquist ideologically. This means the focus has to be on replacing O'Connor, because it is that seat in the short term that could change the outcome of so many cases," he said. Viewed through this prism, Roberts' path to confirmation could be eased, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0003056

"If Bush tried to replace O'Connor with Jones or Luttig, the Democrats will go to the wall" on both nominees, he predicted. "The flip side is that if Bush picks a more moderate conservative, Democrats will let both go through because it does not change the overall balance of the court. Again, this makes the crucial issue who replaces O'Connor."

Picking Roberts For Court's Top Job Raises Stakes (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush's swift decision Monday to nominate John Roberts as the replacement for Chief Justice William Rehnquist raises the stakes of Supreme Court confirmation hearings as Congress and the White House struggle to cope with anational crisis.

Roberts, 50, whom Bush had previously tapped to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, got the nod after his mentorRehnquist died Saturday following a battle with thyroid cancer.

Bush made the announcement as a helicopter waited to take him on a second tour of the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast.

If confirmed, Roberts would be the youngest chief justice since 1801. That means he could have decades to influence the court's direction. Some Democrats say that argues for tougher hearings.

“Judge Roberts has a clear obligation to make his views known fully and completely,” said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

Roberts, a federal appeals judge, would be the 17th chief justice. Five were promoted from the high court. Eleven came from politics, lower courts and other posts.

Still unresolved: When confirmation hearings should begin. Originally set to start today, they've been postponed until after Rehnquist's funeral Wednesday.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., argued that the nation needs time to cope with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., pushing for confirmation this month, said hearings will start by next week.

The president said he selected Roberts, a former Rehnquist clerk, because of his “natural gifts as a leader” and to ensure the court has all nine justices when its new session begins Oct. 3. O'Connor has said she will remain until her replacement is confirmed.

The chance for two court appointments gives Bush a historic opportunity, but also increases pressure on him.

Conservatives such as James Dobson of Focus on the Family want a like-minded justice to replace O'Connor, a swing vote on abortion and other issues. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., counters: “Justice O'Connor has been a voice of moderation and reason on the court and should be replaced by someone … like her.”

In a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken before Rehnquist's death, 52% said they favored Roberts' confirmation.

Bush Chooses Roberts, Weighs Other Vacancy (AJC/AP)

By Terence Hunt, Ap White House Correspondent

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON — Seizing a historic opportunity to reshape the Supreme Court, President Bush swiftly chose conservative John Roberts as chief justice Monday and weighed how to fill another vacancy that could push the nation's highest court to the right on issues from abortion to affirmative action.

Polished and plainspoken, Roberts had been on a likely track to be confirmed as an associate justice and it appeared Bush turned to him for the top job to avoid an acrimonious fight at a volatile moment. Bush was on the defensive about the administration's sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina and his poll ratings had fallen to their lowest point of his presidency.

"For the past two months members of the United States Senate and the American people have learned about the career and character of Judge Roberts," Bush said. "They like what they see."

Roberts' nomination, just two days after the death of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, raised fears among Democrats about a rightward shift as Bush fills two openings on the nine-member court. Democrats have been frustrated by Roberts' popularity and said the Senate must take a closer look at his new nomination.

"The stakes are higher and the Senate's advice and consent responsibility is even more important," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., expressed concerns about the court's balance.

"Replacing two justices at the same time will have an enormous impact on the court and on the lives and liberties of all Americans for decades," said Ralph Neas, president of the liberal advocacy group People for the American Way, which opposes Roberts' nomination.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said Roberts was "one of the most well qualified candidates to come before the Senate." He said he still expects Roberts to be confirmed before the new court session begins Oct. 3.

DOJ_NMG_0003057

Like Rehnquist, Roberts is deeply conservative. He was nominated in July to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who angered conservatives with her tie-breaking votes on contentious issues like abortion restrictions, campaign finance limits, discrimination laws, and religion.

The Roberts-for-Rehnquist nomination would not affect the balance, but Bush could force an ideological shift by replacing O'Connor with a reliably conservative vote. O'Connor has offered to remain on the bench until her successor is named, and Bush called her Monday to say he would move quickly to find her replacement as well. He is not expected to name a new O'Connor successor this week.

After turning twice to Roberts, Bush faces increasing pressure to name a woman or a minority. Some conservatives fretted Bush would pick Attorney General Alberto Gonzales whose views on abortion and other issues have raised their suspicions.

"The president promised in two campaigns to nominate justices who will faithfully uphold the text and principles of the Constitution," said Wendy Long, counsel for the conservative Judicial Confirmation Network. "One would expect the president to nominate more exceptional judicial conservatives like Judge Roberts for as many vacancies as occur, whether it is two, three, or more."

But Brad Berenson, a former Bush White House lawyer, said, "My own view is that Judge Gonzales would be a more conservative justice" than O'Connor.

Other possible replacements include federal courts of appeals judges Edith Clement, Edith Hollan Jones and Emilio Garza. Also mentioned are judges J. Michael Luttig, Samuel A. Alito Jr., James Harvie Wilkinson III and Michael McConnell, and former Solicitor General Theodore Olson, lawyer Miguel Estrada and former deputy attorney general Larry Thompson.

No president has nominated two newcomers to the Supreme Court at the same time since Richard Nixon filled a pair of vacancies in 1971.

The change in Roberts' nomination scrambled plans for his confirmation hearings, which had been scheduled to begin Tuesday. Instead, the capital prepared for the ritual of honoring Rehnquist. His body will lie in repose in the Great Hall of the Supreme Court on Tuesday and Wednesday and he will be buried at Arlington National Cemetery following funeral services Wednesday.

Moving swiftly, Bush met with Roberts in the private residence of the White House for about 35 to 40 minutes on Sunday evening, then officially offered him the job at 7:15 a.m. Monday when Roberts arrived at the Oval Office. The president announced the nomination during morning television shows in a live appearance from the Oval Office.

The president praised Roberts as a man of fairness and integrity, a natural leader. He said the Senate was well along in the process of considering Roberts' qualifications and "they know his record and his fidelity to the law. I am confident that the Senate can complete hearings and confirm him as chief justice within a month."

In brief remarks, Roberts said he was "honored and humbled at the confidence that the president has shown in me. And I am very much aware that if I am confirmed I would succeed a man I deeply respect and admire, a man who has been very kind to me for 25 years."

Only 50 years old, Roberts could be a conservative legal force for decades — as was Rehnquist, who served 33 years on the court, 19 of them as its leader.

There are striking similarities between the two men. Both were first in their class in law school, enjoyed reputations for brilliance and were known as good writers. As a young man, Roberts clerked for Rehnquist and the justice was one of many influences in Roberts' life and legal career.

Roberts' conservative views have been illuminated in thousands of documents from his time as a lawyer in the Reagan administration and the first Bush administration and as a federal appeals court judge. Many of those stands put him at odds with O'Connor and in line with Rehnquist.

The papers showed Roberts' support for prayer in public schools and national identification cards and how he fretted over extended death penalty appeals. He advocated broad power for the White House and disparaged state efforts to combat discrimination against women.

Roberts referred in one memo to the "abortion tragedy" and helped write a legal brief that argued for overturning Roe v. Wade, the landmark 1973 case legalizing abortion.

Getting a new chief justice of Bush's choosing in place quickly avoids the scenario of having liberal Justice John Paul Stevens presiding over court sessions, leading private meetings of the justices and thereby influencing court deliberations. As the court's senior justice, Stevens would take over Rehnquist's administrative duties until a new chief is confirmed.

Roberts Tapped To Lead Court (DMN)

By David Jackson

The Dallas Morning News, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003058

WASHINGTON – Seeking to put an indelible conservative stamp on the Supreme Court, President Bush said Monday he is nominating John Roberts to replace Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

The sudden move, two days after Justice Rehnquist's death, upped the ante in the battle to succeed Sandra Day O'Connor – often the swing vote on the court's most contentious cases.

"Judge Roberts has earned the nation's confidence," Mr. Bush said during a brief Oval Office ceremony, nearly seven weeks after he had tapped the appeals court jurist to replace Justice O'Connor.

Senate Democrats said they would press for the release of more documents from Judge Roberts' past, though analysts said there is a good chance the federal appeals court judge will be confirmed to replace the conservative Rehnquist.

More intense opposition awaits the proposed successor to Justice O'Connor, often the decisive vote in 5-4 court decisions involving abortion rights, affirmative action and church-state relations.

"These are lifetime appointments that we can expect to extend into the lives of our grandchildren and great-grandchildren," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., top Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

That committee delayed confirmation hearings for Judge Roberts that were set to start today. Members cited the new nomination, as well as Wednesday's funeral for Justice Rehnquist.

Officials said the Roberts hearings would begin later this week or early next.

Given the new opening for the O'Connor seat, Mr. Bush is likely to be under pressure to nominate a Hispanic or a woman. The search could involve such Texans as Attorney General Al Gonzales and federal appeals Judges Priscilla Owen and Edith Jones.

The eventual nominee, and perhaps Judge Roberts, may be more vulnerable to opposition because of Mr. Bush's weakened political state, analysts said, citing the Iraq war and criticism of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina.

"The timing could not be more difficult for the Bush administration," said Kimi Lynn King, associate professor of political science at the University of North Texas.

The question, analysts said, is whether Mr. Bush nominates a second conservative in the mold of Judge Roberts, or goes with a more moderate figure, such as Mr. Gonzales.

While some Democrats said Mr. Bush should make his second pick before a Senate vote on Judge Roberts, the president offered no timetable, saying he would act "in a timely manner."

In reintroducing Judge Roberts, Mr. Bush noted that the Senate has spent weeks reviewing his record and should act before the Supreme Court begins hearing cases again Oct. 3.

If that happens, the court would have a full complement of nine justices. Justice O'Connor reconfirmed in a telephone conversation with Mr. Bush on Monday her earlier stated intention to stay on until her successor is confirmed.

Judge Roberts, who once clerked for Justice Rehnquist, thanked Mr. Bush for giving him a chance to "succeed a man I deeply respect and admire."

It would not be unusual for someone outside the court to become chief justice. Justice Rehnquist was only the third of 16 chiefs to be promoted from associate justice.

The chief justice has no more nominal power than the other eight associates but assigns opinion writing if he or she is in the majority. The chief justice also runs the entire federal court system.

The added responsibilities are among the reasons Senate Democrats cited in calling for release of more Roberts documents.

The administration has resisted requests for papers from Mr. Roberts' years in the solicitor general's office for the first President Bush. They said Mr. Roberts' advice to his client – the government – should remain private just as with any other attorney-client relationship.

Democrats said the government represents the public and it is entitled to know the full range of Judge Roberts' views, especially now that he is in line to become the nation's top judge.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the Senate has been provided with "tens of thousands of pages of documents."

"We'll continue to work to make sure the Senate has what they need to move forward in a timely manner," he said.

The papers that have been reviewed came mostly from Judge Roberts' years as a White House lawyer for President Ronald Reagan.

Liberal interest groups zeroed in on what they called Judge Roberts' hostility to affirmative action, his narrow reading of the Voting Rights Act and opposition to a program designed to equalize pay between men and women.

Conservative groups rallied behind Mr. Roberts, saying he opposed "racial quotas" and believed that the "pay equity" plan involved massive government interference in the economy.

DOJ_NMG_0003059

Before Justice Rehnquist's death, activists who opposed Judge Roberts said they faced an uphill fight, finding it difficult to build much public opposition.

That may still be the case, some of these activists said, especially because the court essentially would be switching one conservative with another.

The politics are different with the O'Connor vacancy, analysts said, given her pivotal role on the court.

There are other pressures at work as well. After Justice O'Connor announced her retirement plans, first lady Laura Bush had asked her husband to appoint a woman.

Mr. Bush is also known to want to nominate the court's first Hispanic member.

Bush supporters urged quick action on filling all Supreme Court vacancies, while critics advised a go-slow approach – and both cited the horrific impact of Hurricane Katrina.

Urging Senate confirmation for Judge Roberts, the conservative group Progress For America cited "this difficult time when Americans need the third branch of the United States government to function at full force."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., who expressed "serious concerns" about the Roberts nomination, said, "The president should take this time to unite and heal the country."

Roberts Picked For Chief Justice (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

President Bush yesterday upgraded his Supreme Court nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. from associate justice to chief justice and called on the Senate to confirm him before the court reconvenes Oct. 3.

"Judge Roberts has earned the nation's confidence, and I'm pleased to announce that I will nominate him to serve as the 17th chief justice of the Supreme Court," Mr. Bush said in an Oval Office appearance with the nominee.

Judge Roberts, originally tapped to replace retiring Associate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, is now slated to succeed Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday.

Judge Roberts' Senate confirmation hearings have been postponed from today until at least Thursday because of Chief Justice Rehnquist's funeral, set for tomorrow.

"I am honored and humbled by the confidence that the president has shown in me," Judge Roberts said. "And I'm very much aware that if I am confirmed, I would succeed a man I deeply respect and admire, a man who has been very kind to me for 25 years."

Judge Roberts, 50, once served as a clerk for Chief Justice Rehnquist and had been looking forward to serving alongside his old boss.

Democrats said the nomination to a higher post justifies a higher level of scrutiny of Judge Roberts' record. Although more than 60,000 pages of documents have been released, liberals want additional papers that the White House deems privileged.

"John Roberts bears a heavier burden when he comes before the Senate," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "Before the Senate acts on John Roberts' new nomination, we should know even more about his record."

Spokesman Scott McClellan said the White House already has "provided them with an enormous amount of information to be able to move forward on his nomination."

After announcing the nomination, Mr. Bush boarded Air Force One to tour the Gulf Coast hurricane damage. En route, he telephoned Justice O'Connor to tell her Judge Roberts no longer would replace her.

Justice O'Connor, who had not seen Mr. Bush's televised announcement minutes earlier, reaffirmed her willingness to remain on the court until a successor is nominated and confirmed, said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino. Mr. Bush is not expected to nominate another justice until Judge Roberts is confirmed.

By tapping Judge Roberts as chief justice, Mr. Bush passed over justices who have been serving on the court for years, including Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. That spares the president from yet another potentially rancorous political battle, because Justice Scalia or Justice Thomas would have had to be confirmed by the Judiciary Committee.

The president always has regarded Judge Roberts as a potential chief justice, White House officials said. The two met in the White House for 30 to 45 minutes late Sunday, with White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. participating in the start of the meeting.

At 7:15 a.m. yesterday, Judge Roberts was summoned to the White House, where the president officially offered the job.

After Judge Roberts accepted and before the 8 a.m. announcement, Mr. Card notified Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat; Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican; Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen

DOJ_NMG_0003060

Specter, Pennsylvania Republican; Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Democrat on the panel; and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican.

Meanwhile, the White House counsel's office alerted Justice John Paul Stevens, the senior and most liberal justice, who otherwise would serve as acting chief justice. The confirmation of Judge Roberts would mean that he, not Justice Stevens, will run the court and assign the writing of decisions.

Yesterday, the president praised Judge Roberts' "natural gifts as a leader." Mr. Bush also expressed confidence that the judge would be confirmed.

"Twenty-five years ago, John Roberts came to Washington as a clerk to Justice William Rehnquist," Mr. Bush said. "In his boss, the young law clerk found a role model, a professional mentor and a friend for life.

"I'm certain that Chief Justice Rehnquist was hoping to welcome John Roberts as a colleague, and we're all sorry that day didn't come," he added. "Yet it's fitting that a great chief justice be followed in office by a person who shared his deep reverence for the Constitution."

Several liberal groups, who had voiced discontent with the Roberts choice, were further enraged by the elevation yesterday.

"America can't afford a Supreme Court justice -- let alone a chief justice -- with Roberts' record of eroding the rights of workers and turning back the clock on civil rights," said Eli Pariser, executive director of MoveOn.org Political Action Committee. "There's no mistaking that he's a stealth right-wing candidate."

Conservative-leaning groups also were quick to reiterate their opinion of Judge Roberts and warned against efforts at stalling.

"Opposition to this nomination will be based on nothing but partisan politics, and would be an unfortunate strategy at a time when the Senate ought to be coming together to get things done for the American people," said Brian McCabe, president of Progress for America Inc.

John Roberts Nominated To The Chief Justice Position (KRT)

Knight Ridder, September 6, 2005

Proving that he intends to move swiftly to fill two vacancies on the Supreme Court, President Bush announced Monday that he will nominate John G. Roberts to be Chief Justice, replacing William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday.

Roberts, already Bush's choice to replace retiring Associate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, would become the nation's 17th high court leader and would be the first to replace his former boss. Roberts clerked for Rehnquist in the early 1980s; the two have had a close personal and professional relationship ever since.

"I'm certain that Chief Justice Rehnquist was hoping to welcome John Roberts as a colleague, and we're all sorry that day didn't come," Bush said. "Yet it's fitting that a great chief justice be followed in office by a person who shared his deep reverence for the Constitution, his profound respect for the Supreme Court, and his complete devotion to the cause of justice."

Roberts' nomination only partially clears the court's clouded future, as the justices prepare to return to business Oct. 3. His confirmation hearings to succeed O'Connor are scheduled to being Tuesday, but would almost certainly need to be delayed.

Senate Democrats said the chief justice seat is fundamentally different, and more pivotal.

"The stakes are higher and the Senate's Advice and Consent responsibility is even more important," said Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.), the minority leader.

"Before the Senate acts on Roberts' new nomination, we should know even more about his record," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) "And we should know whom the president intends to nominate as a replacement for Sandra Day O'Connor."

Some Senate Democratic staffers said hearings might not begin until next Monday.

The Senate is expected to need at least three weeks to work through the Judiciary Committee's confirmation process and the full chamber's vote. That would put Roberts in the seat just days before the new court term begins.

Roberts' elevation to chief also re-opens the O'Connor seat. Bush said he would move swiftly to nominate someone else for it. He's expected to face new pressure to replace O'Connor, the court's first female justice, with another woman. He could also nominate his attorney General, Alberto Gonzales, to the seat, making him the first Hispanic to sit on the court.

It's unlikely that Bush could get anyone confirmed for O'Connor's seat before Oct. 3, though, leaving the opening of the next term in flux.

O'Connor's resignation is technically set to take effect only once her successor is confirmed, so she may be expected to return to the bench while confirmation proceedings take place. But that raises further complications: She can't hear cases in October or November and then have her successor vote on them when they're decided in January or later.

O'Connor's continued service could also be compromised by personal concerns. One of the reasons she retired was to care for her ailing husband, who is stricken with Alzheimer's disease.

DOJ_NMG_0003061

The Roberts nomination to chief justice unfolds as the nation prepares to pay its final respects to Rehnquist. The former chief justice is scheduled to lie in repose in the Supreme Court's great hall Tuesday and Wednesday. Burial at Arlington National Cemetery will follow a funeral Thursday.

O'Connor's Staying On Might Tie Up The Court (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Justice Sandra Day O'Connor reaffirmed Monday that she would remain on the Supreme Court until her successor is confirmed, but her presence is likely to have more symbolic than practical significance.

That is so because a justice's votes really count only when an opinion is issued, not when the court first hears a case. At first glance, O'Connor would look to be a tie-breaker for cases heard in October or November, before President Bush's nominee to replace her is likely to be confirmed by the Senate.

But the opinions in those cases are not likely to be issued until early next year, after O'Connor presumably would be gone. Therefore, her vote would not count, and the court could find itself evenly split 4-4.

In such instances, the justices can order the case to be reargued before the full nine-member court.

When O'Connor sent a retirement letter to the president on July 1, she closed by saying that her retirement would be "effective upon the nomination and confirmation of my successor." She also said she was leaving to spend more time with her husband.

White House aides said Bush called O'Connor Monday morning to tell her he had named Roberts as chief justice. In that call, she reiterated her pledge to stay on the court until Bush could win confirmation for her replacement.

Senate Democrats also cited O'Connor's presence as a reason for not rushing to choose and confirm a second Bush appointee.

Her presence could prove significant if the Senate were to block Bush's choice for her replacement. But if the president's nominees win confirmation by December, she is not likely to cast decisive votes.

On Oct. 5, two days after the court's term begins, the justices are scheduled to hear a major test of the nation's only right-to-die law. Oregon permits doctors to prescribe lethal medication to individuals who are terminally ill and wish to hasten their deaths.

The Bush administration has sought to nullify the law by threatening doctors with a loss of their right to prescribe medication. They rely on federal drug control laws and argue that prescribing lethal medication is not a legitimate medical use of these drugs.

Oregon's officials and two lower courts have said that the state has the power to regulate the practice of medicine.

The White House says it would like to have Roberts confirmed as chief justice by the time the court convenes and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said Monday that he expected to have a confirmation vote before the full Senate by late September. There is little chance, however, that a successor to O'Connor would also be confirmed by the court's opening day.

Two days after the argument in the Oregon case, the justices will meet behind closed doors to vote. If the court splits 5-4 with O'Connor in the majority, her vote would look to be decisive. But since the justices typically work months on their majority and dissenting opinions, the ruling probably would not be announced until early next year, after O'Connor's replacement is confirmed. In such a case, the court would be split 4-4, and it would have to reargue the case to include the new justice.

A Shaky Ethics Charge (WP)

By Ronald D. Rotunda

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

Does John Roberts have an ethics problem?

Three ethics professors argue that Roberts, whom President Bush has just nominated to be chief justice, should have disqualified himself from a case he helped decide earlier this year while serving as a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit.

The case, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which concerns a key issue in the administration's war on terrorism, may be headed for the Supreme Court, and at the time of the appeals court ruling, Roberts was being considered for a vacancy on the high court, though it did not yet exist.

The three professors -- Stephen Gillers of New York University, David J. Luban of Georgetown University and Steven Lubet of Northwestern University -- say that in not disqualifying himself, Roberts violated the "appearance of impartiality." If true, it may become a prominent issue because it offers one of the few arguments against Roberts. In the case at issue, the appeals court upheld the constitutionality of the administration's plan to use military commissions to try terrorist suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0003062

Just a short time ago, Gillers said that he "saw no problem" with the fact that Bush met with Roberts about the Supreme Court vacancy on July 15, the same day the appeals court ruled 3 to 0 in Bush's favor in Hamdan. But Gillers said he changed his mind after Roberts disclosed the White House interviews in his Senate questionnaire. What seems to be crucial is that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales spoke to Roberts on April 1, six days before oral arguments in the Hamdan case.

Gillers and his colleagues conclude that Roberts violated a federal statute that requires what Gillers calls "an appearance of impartiality." The federal statute doesn't put it that way; it says that the judge should recuse himself if his "impartiality might reasonably be questioned." The case law says the issue should be considered from the perspective of a reasonable, objective lawyer fully informed of the facts.

The American Bar Association says the "appearance of impartiality" standard is "question-begging" and leads to "ad hominem attacks."

We sometimes think, loosely, that ethics are good and that more is better than less. But "more" is not better if it exacts higher costs, measured in vague rules that impose unnecessary disqualifications.

Gillers's main source is Scott v. United States , a 1989 case in which a criminal trial judge in the District was discussing a managerial position with the Justice Department while the U.S. attorney's office was prosecuting a criminal case before the judge. Gillers says the judge acted improperly by presiding at the trial during his employment negotiations.

The problem with Gillers's reliance on the Scott case is that he leaves out what the case really said: "By December 23, 1984, when he had decided to accept the position in the Executive Office for United States Attorneys, the judge had a duty to recuse himself from Scott's case."

The Scott case does not support Gillers's argument; it undermines it. What Scott says, at most, is that Roberts had no obligation to withdraw from a case in which the government is a party before he was offered and decided to accept the position. That date could not be before the vacancy existed; in fact, it could not be before July 15, when he met Bush for the first time. By that time, the Hamdan case had already been decided.

Judges are offered other jobs all the time. A Supreme Court justice may become chief justice, or, like Justice Arthur Goldberg, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. Appeals court judges may become Cabinet officers. Trial judges may become appellate judges. Gillers's stance would require judges to recuse themselves in any case in which the federal government is a party.

Gillers's response is that the Hamdan case was "hotly contested." I have never found any case to be "coldly contested," or even "warmly contested."

Do we really want to give the president or attorney general the power to force recusal of one or more judges on a panel simply by asking the judge if he might be interested in a different position that is not yet open but that eventually will be? Should Judge (later Justice) Ruth Bader Ginsburg have recused herself from any case involving the federal government from the time that Justice Byron White announced his resignation until the time President Bill Clinton announced her appointment? What of Judge (later Justice) Stephen Breyer, who was not nominated until a year after his initial interview with Clinton?

The president is not the only person responsible for court appointments. In many states, judicial selection committees present choices to the president. The case law (which Gillers does not cite) has uniformly rejected motions for disqualifying judges from cases in which members of the selection committees are directly involved.

Conflict-of-interest charges should not be raised lightly, and historical precedents and case law show the allegations against Roberts are unfounded.

The writer is a law professor at George Mason University; he rejoined the faculty in June after working at the Defense Department and was not assigned to the Hamdan case. This article is based on an ethics opinion he wrote at the request of Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.).

The Rehnquist-Roberts Court (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

With his nomination yesterday of John Roberts to be Chief Justice of the United States, President Bush moved to fulfill the Supreme Court legacy of the late William Rehnquist, and also took what we hope is the first step toward guaranteeing his own.

Elevating Judge Roberts to Chief was a logical decision, both politically and on the merits. The Senate and media have been investigating the nominee since July, and have found superlatives with nary a negative. The Judge is in a position to be rapidly confirmed and ready to preside by the time the High Court begins its new term on October 3.

More importantly, what we have learned about Judge Roberts suggests that he shares Chief Justice Rehnquist's judicial philosophy. If Mr. Bush now follows with the nomination of an equally distinguished conservative for the Court's second opening, the Roberts Court will be able to continue the legal restoration that the late Chief Rehnquist began but was never able to finish.

DOJ_NMG_0003063

That historic mission is to restore the Court to its proper Constitutional role as a judicial arbiter rather than as an engine of liberal policy-making. Judicial activism was in its heyday in 1972, the year Justice Rehnquist arrived at the Court. In his early years, he earned the nickname the "Lone Ranger" because he was often the only dissenter on the nine-member Court. But after he became Chief in 1986, and with the help of other Reagan appointees, he began to move the Court back toward the center.

He made some progress, notably on limiting federal power over state governments (Lopez in 1995); church-state relations, especially with the 5-4 Zelman decision in 2002 that found private-school vouchers constitutional; racial preferences (Richmond v. Croson, 1989); and property rights (Nollan in 1987). It's a tribute to Mr. Rehnquist's principles that he also upheld liberal precedents if they had become embedded in common practice, such as the Miranda warnings (Dickerson v. U.S., 2000) that he had once opposed as policy. Modern liberals never display such deference to precedent when their policy preferences are at risk.

But the Chief was denied a genuine intellectual majority by the protean quality of some of his colleagues. Justices Anthony Kennedy and Sandra Day O'Connor tapered their views to the Beltway winds, while David Souter repudiated his confirmation testimony and joined the Court's liberal wing. When Bill Clinton replaced Byron White (Justice Rehnquist's partner in dissent on Roe v. Wade in 1973) with Ruth Bader Ginsburg in 1993, most conservative momentum stalled.

The judicial left understands these stakes, which is why they are now ratcheting up their rhetoric against Judge Roberts. People for the American Way yesterday called him "unfit" to be Chief, which is the ultimate compliment. They're afraid he's every bit as smart as he seems. Mr. Roberts will be confirmed in any case, but the real game here is to intimidate Mr. Bush into naming a less conservative nominee for the second opening.

All the more so now that Mr. Bush is on the defensive in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. With a war in Iraq and down in the polls, Mr. Bush will hear from some of his own advisers that he should play it "safe" with his second choice. They'll suggest he avoid another "divisive" battle by selecting someone who will win the acquiescence of Democrats Ted Kennedy or Chuck Schumer.

We hope he rejects such counsel. With two vacancies, Mr. Bush now has a genuine chance to remake the Court. He told voters during two election campaigns that he'd nominate Justices in the mold of Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. Especially with his other troubles, Mr. Bush can't afford to alienate his most loyal supporters in the hope of buying a confirmation truce.

A battle with Senate liberals over a distinguished conservative nominee would probably even help Mr. Bush politically. While the activist left is howling about Judge Roberts, Red State Democrats have kept a studious silence. They know that the "values" issues that so motivate the political left -- abortion, gay marriage, racial preferences -- are far less popular in Nebraska, North Dakota or Florida.

Democrats from these states will need an excuse beyond ideology to oppose a qualified nominee. And Mr. Bush has many such candidates to choose from: J. Harvie Wilkinson, Edith Jones, Ted Olson, Michael Luttig, Sam Alito, Larry Thompson, Michael McConnell or Janice Rogers Brown. The political trap for Mr. Bush would be to choose someone who is less distinguished but is somehow thought to be easier to confirm. The President should be thinking about his Supreme Court legacy for the next 30 years, not the next 30 days.

John Roberts's Rapid Ascension (NYT)

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

President Bush surprised many with his swift decision to nominate Judge John Roberts Jr. to be the next chief justice of the United States. If Mr. Bush thought Mr. Roberts had already impressed both the public and the Senate with his intelligence and sincerity, he figured correctly. But if he regards the judge as a known commodity whose confirmation should be a shoo-in, he is wrong. The Senate did not have enough information to make an informed judgment about Mr. Roberts when he was the nominee for just one of the nine seats on the court. Now it simply becomes more important than ever that he be questioned thoroughly about his views.

Besides his long and stellar résumé, Mr. Roberts, who was appointed to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit less than two and a half years ago, has an extremely short and thin record of actual decisions. Those two attributes may be equally desirable for a Supreme Court nominee these days. The résumé attests to his right to be considered, and the lack of a real judicial record makes it hard for potential critics to guess how he might rule on controversial issues.

Like the president, this page worries about activist judges who might use the Constitution as a cloak for their desires to remake society in the mold of their own political preferences. Unlike Mr. Bush, we believe the record now shows that most of those jurists are conservatives, who strike down laws that do not fit their political philosophies or their extremely narrow view of governmental power.

The Senate has a duty to find out whether Judge Roberts has that kind of mind-set. There are troubling hints that he may. If the coming confirmation hearings were important before, they now become crucial. The chief justice is in many ways positioned to have more long-term influence over the nation than any other person. Given a lifetime appointment, Mr. Roberts, 50, could lead the court through the administrations of a half-dozen presidents.

DOJ_NMG_0003064

The Bush administration could make the Senate's job easier by handing over all the documents Mr. Roberts prepared when he worked for the administrations of Ronald Reagan and George H. W. Bush. And when Judge Roberts is questioned at his confirmation hearing, he should speak candidly and at some length about his views on important legal issues and precedents. The president could also help by giving the country a fuller idea of how he intends to shape the court. Some Democrats have urged that he make his second nomination, for the seat occupied by Sandra Day O'Connor, before the Senate takes up Judge Roberts's nomination. That seems reasonable. Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who died on Saturday, was a very conservative jurist, and from what we know about Judge Roberts, it is clear that President Bush has nominated a very conservative man to take his place. It is also important to know the president's plans for filling the seat held by the more moderate Justice O'Connor.

A Nominee For Chief (WP)

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

President Bush lost no time in naming a successor for Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. If confirmed, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. will bring the same virtues to the job of heading the country's judiciary as he would have brought to the job of associate justice. A highly regarded former appellate lawyer and current appeals court judge, he is a modest, smart lawyer who, unlike some of the president's judicial picks, is generally well regarded across party lines. Mr. Bush deserves credit for acting with dispatch. The Senate should do so as well and, giving a full airing to the issues, should make a point of voting on the nomination before the court reconvenes in October.

In most respects, the change in position ought to signify little in terms of how senators regard Judge Roberts. The difference between the chief justice and the other members of the court, after all, is largely administrative, not substantive; all justices have only one vote. Judge Roberts is, to be sure, on the young side for the job of chief. At 50, he will have, if confirmed, the odd distinction of being the youngest member of the court he heads. On the other hand, his easy manner and collegiality ought to serve him well.

Yet his nomination as chief justice nonetheless raises the stakes in the discussion of what Judge Roberts actually believes -- a subject about which a great deal more has been said than is really known. Liberal groups that feared what a Justice Roberts might do can only fear a Chief Justice Roberts all the more. The hearings will provide an excellent opportunity for the Senate Judiciary Committee to explore -- and for Judge Roberts to address -- a raft of important questions: What is his attitude toward what is called stare decisis , the doctrine of generally letting past cases stand even if wrongly decided? How does he regard the balance of power between the federal government and the states, an ongoing debate in which a new justice could play a dramatic role, either constructive or unfortunate. What does he believe about privacy rights?

Documents from Judge Roberts's service in the Reagan administration -- in the Justice Department and in the White House counsel's office -- have raised fears that he might harbor reactionary views on a range of civil rights questions. Some of this is overblown; opponents have tried to make controversy out of reasonable positions Mr. Roberts took against policies few still advocate today. On the other hand, Judge Roberts opposed changes to the Voting Rights Act that had broad bipartisan support, as well as affirmative action programs and the proposed Equal Rights Amendment. He seemed deeply suspicious of federal review of state convictions. He seems to have objected to decades of Supreme Court rulings restricting the role of religion in public life. Judge Roberts was quite young when these memorandums were drafted, and his views may have evolved as he matured. Which part of this record as a young lawyer does he stand behind now, and which part does he not? All of these questions take on a greater sense of importance -- at least symbolically -- with Judge Roberts now nominated to be chief.

In one critical respect, however, moving Judge Roberts to the chief's slot may actually reduce his impact on the court's ideological balance. Chief Justice Rehnquist, unlike Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, was not often a swing vote on the court. In replacing him, Judge Roberts will be very unlikely to move the court substantially to the right. He would not have to prove all that surprising to move it to the left on certain issues.

This fact, in turn, puts a heavy premium on Mr. Bush's choice regarding a new replacement for Justice O'Connor -- whose decision to stay on the court until a nominee garners confirmation is proving invaluable at a delicate transitional moment. Before nominating Judge Roberts, Mr. Bush consulted widely and emerged with a candidate Senate Democrats have -- by and large, anyway -- treated with respect. As he once again considers a nominee to replace Justice O'Connor, Mr. Bush would do a public service by consulting widely and meaningfully.

How Would Roberts, As Chief Justice, Affect You? (USAT)

USA Today, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003065

By all accounts, John Roberts is the kind of guy you might want your daughter to bring home for dinner: brilliant, personable, possibly destined for greatness. Even the sternest father — if he's not too liberal — would probably grant nodding approval, as the Senate is likely to do in the next few weeks, seating Roberts on the Supreme Court.

The positive reaction to Roberts since President Bush first nominated him to the court in July undoubtedly contributed to Bush's decision to choose him Monday to succeed William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday after nearly 19 years as chief justice.

But as impressive as Roberts has appeared, the most important question about him remains largely unanswered: How would a Chief Justice Roberts affect the country? As the youngest chief justice since 1801, Roberts, 50, would be a potent influence on society for a generation or more.

Would he, for instance, vote to reverse existing law on abortion or, more sweepingly, the right to privacy? His record suggests he might. Would he limit Congress' ability to protect the environment, public health and civil rights? That, too, is open to question.

The Senate Judiciary Committee will plumb for answers in hearings that may begin as early as Thursday, and it needn't linger long on basics. Roberts easily surpasses the threshold qualifications for justices.

By all accounts, he is a brilliant lawyer with a forceful intellect suited to the court. The American Bar Association calls him "well qualified."

Politically, he's conservative but not an outspoken ideologue, with little history of brash pronouncements. But which of the several sharply opposed conservative camps he falls into is in doubt, and the difference stands to affect every American.

Roberts' public record — inconclusive but provocative — raises questions whether he prefers limited government and cautious change, or whether he is an activist who would seek to overturn important Supreme Court precedents and legal protections:

Right to privacy. In memos written when he was in the Reagan administration, he disparaged the notion that there is a constitutional right to privacy. He wrote approvingly of the dissent in the landmark 1965 case that firmly established that right and overturned state laws against birth control. Reversing that decision would reopen the door to government meddling in the most private aspects of life, again criminalizing abortion, gay sex, even contraception.

Abortion. As deputy solicitor general for the first President Bush, he signed a government brief urging reversal of Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision that state laws banning abortion were unconstitutional. The court has since reaffirmed that decision.

Civil rights. Roberts argued for standards that would make it easier for school districts to evade desegregation orders. He also disparaged affirmative action — still sanctioned by the court in some circumstances — as "recruiting of inadequately prepared candidates" and argued that it is unconstitutional. That record raises questions about whether he would restrain the ability of Congress to help those victimized by discrimination.

Powers of Congress. Roberts parted company with the majority of conservative judges on his appeals court two years ago to take a swipe at the constitutional basis of the Endangered Species Act. The narrower interpretation he seemed to suggest could also limit the reach of federal laws regulating health, safety, civil rights, commerce and the workplace.

Freedom of speech. He argued that a federal law prohibiting flag burning did not violate the First Amendment, even after the Supreme Court had already declared a nearly identical state law unconstitutional.

Freedom of the press. Roberts wrote a memo challenging the 1964 Supreme Court decision New YorkTimes v. Sullivan, a cornerstone of the freedom to report aggressively on public officials. He suggested reverting to an earlier standard that gave officeholders greater ability to prevail in libel suits.

Church-state entanglement. He argued for lowering the wall between church and state and allowing officially led prayers at public school graduations. He criticized the Supreme Court's decision in another school prayer case as "indefensible."

Women's rights. Roberts ridiculed the notion that women are subject to workplace discrimination or entitled to constitutional protection. He also argued for narrowing the government's ability to enforce the ban on gender discrimination in education.

Roberts' defenders point out that most of his statements challenging the legal status quo were made while representing either the interests of a private client or the political commitments of an earlier administration. They might not represent his personal views — and many are more than 20 years old.

Both assertions are accurate. Less defensible is that the Bush administration has spurned Senate requests for records later in Roberts career. Senate questioning will have to fill in those blanks.

Much will be made at the hearings of the doctrine that Roberts should not be asked to say how he might rule in cases coming before the Supreme Court. But that should not deter senators from demanding to know how he views issues more generally and cases already decided — and the standards he would use to overturn settled law.

To suggest that the Senate should simply ignore the impact Roberts would have on constituents is to suggest that it stick its collective head in the sand.

DOJ_NMG_0003066

The Next Chief Justice (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 6, 2005

Maybe if there had been no Katrina, and if the Iraqi occupation were proceeding as Pentagon optimists had once envisioned — with the few thousand remaining U.S. troops in the country lolling about in the dozens of Starbucks cafes popping up across Mesopotamia by now — President Bush would have tried elevating Antonin Scalia or Clarence Thomas to serve as the chief justice of the United States. But under present conditions, Bush doesn't need any more trouble than he already has. And so, in the wake of William H. Rehnquist's death, the president has wisely nominated John G. Roberts Jr., a former Rehnquist law clerk, to become the next chief justice.

It's a smart move. Roberts has the intellect and temperament to lead the court and the federal judiciary. It's somewhat counterintuitive that newcomers to the court usually become the chief — Rehnquist was an exception — but that tends to preserve good relations among the nine justices. The elevation of either Scalia or Thomas would have proven highly contentious and divisive in Washington, and maybe even on the court.

The Senate confirmation hearings for Roberts' nomination to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor had been slated to commence today, but there will now be a short delay to honor Rehnquist. But there is no reason for the Senate to avoid taking action well in advance of the Supreme Court's new term on Oct. 3. The suggestion by some Democratic senators that they will need more time to review Roberts' credentials now that he is in line to be chief justice rings hollow. Yes, the chief justice wields a great deal of subtle power by virtue of his authority to control arguments and assign the writing of opinions, but it's not as if anyone was taking the confirmation of an associate justice lightly.

In their questioning of Roberts, senators should focus special attention on his views on the proper deference that courts owe the executive branch in a time of war. Roberts was on a panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia that ruled in July that the Bush administration has virtually unchecked power to try anyone it labels an "unlawful combatant" before a military commission that does not live up to the standards of the Geneva Convention. The extent of presidential power in the war on terror is likely to loom large in the Supreme Court docket for years, and it's a subject that Roberts, a former White House lawyer, should be asked to address in his hearings.

Meanwhile, the president faces a second opening on the court, although O'Connor could still be on the bench on Oct. 3 if her replacement hasn't been confirmed. Many of the candidates reportedly being considered earlier by the White House are radical conservatives who could trigger the kind of opposition we haven't seen to Roberts. Then there is the president's friend and attorney general, Alberto Gonzales, who is not trusted by social conservatives and should be disqualified, in any case, for encouraging the administration to disregard international law in conducting the war on terror.

So, mindful of Bush's other headaches, from Katrina to Iraq, he'd be well served by making another sensible move (is there a surprise candidate up his sleeve?) in replacing O'Connor.

William Rehnquist (WSJ)

By Randy E. Barnett

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

Last December, during my oral argument in the medical marijuana case of Gonzales v. Raich, the center chair normally occupied by Chief Justice William Rehnquist was empty. Without the towering, and sometimes glowering, visage of the Chief, with his no-nonsense demeanor and questioning, there was a palpable void in the courtroom that day. Now, with his passing, there is a void in the Supreme Court itself. Today we mourn the death of William Rehnquist. One day soon we may mourn the death of his legacy -- the jurisprudence of the Rehnquist Court.

Even before becoming chief justice, often in lonely dissents, it was William Rehnquist who was most personally responsible for what is now called "the New Federalism" -- the revival of the ideas that judiciary should protect the role of the states within the federal system and enforce the textual limits on the powers of Congress. Establishing the New Federalism took enormous effort and leadership by Rehnquist over many years. Now that legacy is in jeopardy.

At the founding, and for some 150 years thereafter, the limits on congressional power provided by the Constitution of 1789 -- as modified by the Fourteenth Amendment -- were enforced by the Supreme Court. According to the textual plan, Congress is, with few exceptions, confined to the express powers enumerated in Article One of the Constitution. While these express powers were understood as flexible, they were nonetheless limited. When the federal government was limited to its enumerated powers, the states were left to the exercise of their police powers, subject to the limitations imposed upon them after the Civil War by the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Founders' plan was more or less intact until the 1930s, when President Roosevelt and the New Deal Congress enacted a massive expansion of federal power. By the 1940s, the textual scheme of limited federal powers was effectively swept away by a Supreme Court dominated by appointees of President Roosevelt. In a series of landmark decisions, such as Wickard v. Filburn in 1942, the New Deal Court replaced the Constitution's textual scheme of limited federal power with a policy of judicial deference to any claim by Congress to regulate anything and everything with even a remote connection with the national economy.

DOJ_NMG_0003067

By the early 1990s, even the requirement of a remote connection was giving way, as Congress began to regulate subjects that could only be described as "interstate commerce" by Lewis Carroll's Humpty Dumpty, who asserted (in a rather scornful tone) that: "When I use a word, it means just what I choose it to mean -- neither more nor less." With no judiciary to provide a constitutional compass, Congress passed laws reaching activities such as possessing a gun near a school without even trying to show how the regulated activity had any conceivable connection with "commerce . . . among the several states."

* * *

But William Rehnquist had a constitutional compass. In the beginning, he took what he could get. As an associate justice, his opening strategy for nudging the Court back onto the constitutional path was to carve out of federal power exemptions for state discretion. His first major triumph came in the 1976 case of National League of Cities v. Usery, which established a limit on the powers of Congress to interfere with such "traditional governmental functions" as fire prevention, police protection, sanitation, public health, and parks and recreation. Writing for the Court, then-Justice Rehnquist announced that, "This Court has never doubted that there are limits upon the power of Congress to override state sovereignty, even when exercising its otherwise plenary powers to tax or to regulate commerce which are conferred by Art. I of the Constitution." This sort of reliance upon first principles to draw an outer limit to federal power became his trademark.

Rehnquist's initial victory, however, was short-lived. Notwithstanding the precedent of National League, in 1985 the Burger Court reversed itself in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority. In Garcia, the Court announced that the protection of the states would, once again, solely be a political rather than also a judicial question. In a terse four-sentence opinion, Rehnquist presciently predicted, "I do not think it incumbent on those of us in dissent to spell out further the fine points of a principle that will, I am confident, in time again command the support of a majority of this Court."

With Justice Rehnquist's ascension to chief justice, the Rehnquist Court cabined Garcia's laissez-faire approach toward Congressional power with a series of "Tenth Amendment" cases that aimed at protecting state sovereignty from federal interference in a variety of ways. I put Tenth Amendment in quotes because this jurisprudence was never grounded on the original meaning of the Tenth Amendment, which merely affirms that the Federal government is one of delegated powers, and that all powers not delegated are reserved to the states or to the people. With the post-New Deal judiciary interpreting the delegated powers so as to allow the Federal government to do virtually anything it wants, federal power had completely enveloped any "reserved" powers of states. Instead of directly holding Congress to the powers enumerated in the text, these earliest New Federalism cases attempted indirectly to preserve the underlying "principle" of federalism by carving out islands of state sovereignty in a sea of federal power.

Chief Justice Rehnquist understood this, of course. In 1995, he launched a direct attack on the source of the problem in the case of U.S. v. Lopez, which held unconstitutional the Gun Free School Zone Act because it exceeded the power of Congress to "regulate commerce . . . among the several states." There he wrote, "We start with first principles. The Constitution creates a Federal Government of enumerated powers." For the first time in 60 years, the Court found a federal statute to have exceeded the commerce power of Congress. Rehnquist's opinion in Lopez sent shock waves through the legal academy.

Few thought the Rehnquist Court was serious, however, until 2000, when, in U.S. v. Morrison, it struck down a portion of the Violence Against Women Act that created a federal civil cause of action for "gender motivated violence." Once again, the chief justice affirmed that: "The Constitution requires a distinction between what is truly national and what is truly local. . . . In recognizing this fact we preserve one of the few principles that has been consistent since the [Commerce] Clause was adopted."

Together with the Tenth Amendment cases, Rehnquist's opinions in Lopez and Morrison were the keystones of the New Federalism. Had he been able to marshal a consistent majority for the constitutional "first principles" these cases represented, the Rehnquist Court might have overseen a constitutional restoration as substantial as the constitutional demolition begun by the Roosevelt Court. But both decisions were 5-4, with the five more "conservative" justices in the majority and the four more "liberal" justices in strong dissent. The four adamant dissenters have not relented in their opposition and need only pick off one of the New Federalists to uphold the constitutionality of a claim of federal power.

* * *

Perhaps because his illness prevented him from providing his strong personal leadership, in this the final year of the Rehnquist Court there are signs that his legacy may not endure. In Gonzales v. Raich both principles of state sovereignty and of enumerated powers were put to the test. Rehnquist was one of only three justices who were willing to say that Congress cannot magically transform the noncommercial possession of homegrown marijuana into "interstate commerce." The Chief joined the dissenting opinion written by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Many who now lionize her when discussing her replacement omit mentioning her stalwart support of the New Federalism so strongly advanced by her fellow Arizonian and Stanford classmate.

DOJ_NMG_0003068

Sometime this fall, two of the five votes that made up the Lopez and Morrison majorities will have been replaced. Only Justice Clarence Thomas will be left from the three Raich dissenters. As the new chief justice (assuming he is confirmed), will John Roberts assume the role of his mentor William Rehnquist -- for whom he clerked -- and lead the Roberts Court to enforce the Constitution's original plan of limited federal power? Will President Bush now look for a nominee to replace Justice O'Connor who is as committed to the New Federalism as she was? Given that so many of the New Federalism cases were 5-4, if either of the new justices adopts the mantra of "judicial deference" to congressional power, then Chief Justice Rehnquist's death, along with Justice O'Connor's retirement, may presage the second death of federalism. A judicial withdrawal from enforcing the original limits on the powers of Congress would undo the New Federalist legacy of William Rehnquist.

As the president now decides who next to nominate, he would uphold the Constitution by selecting a person with a firm and demonstrated commitment to the Rehnquist Court's New Federalism legacy. Only such a choice would continue the movement to restore the "first principles" of constitutionally limited government that William Rehnquist affirmed so eloquently. One can hardly imagine a sadder end to the tenure of William Rehnquist than that his most prized and important contribution to constitutional law is aborted by a conservative Republican president and a Republican-controlled Senate.

Mr. Barnett, the Austin B. Fletcher Professor of Law at Boston University, is author of "Restoring the Lost Constitution: The Presumption of Liberty" (Princeton, 2004).

Gentleman Of The Court (NYT)

By Laurence H. Tribe

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

Cambridge, Mass.

In October 1971, the White House tapped Assistant Attorney General William H. Rehnquist to respond to my critique of someone at the top of its short list for one of the two vacancies created by the nearly simultaneous resignations of two justices. I found his tepid apologia underwhelming. Yet within two months, when Mr. Rehnquist took the Supreme Court seat once marked for the target of my critique, I began to see how foolish it would have been to measure him by his defense of a candidate about whom he probably felt lukewarm. While it may be too soon to assess the chief justice's enduring impact, it is not too soon to reflect on why so many who served with him as colleagues, worked for him as law clerks or appeared before him as advocates are already prepared to render a verdict of greatness and to tell the world how deeply his passing is mourned.

Seeing past the chief justice's sometimes abrupt manner in oral argument was eased for me by his willingness to engage me, then an unknown law professor in his mid-30's, in a public debate in 1978 on the role of an active judiciary in a pluralistic democracy, moderated by the legendary Judge Henry Friendly. Charmed by his disarming informality and candor during the debate and at the private dinner that followed, my wife and I emerged with fond feelings toward a man whose warmth and humor within the court were not always evident to strangers.

When I began arguing regularly before the Supreme Court two years later, I felt from the start that I was conversing with a brilliant colleague who always got right to the point. In more than 30 oral arguments over the past 25 years, I never saw him ask questions, as his colleagues sometimes do, to hide the ball, parade his brilliance, show up a colleague, or play to the galleries. When he thought you were approaching a dead end, he told you so, as he did in 1997, when he said I wouldn't "find much disposition on the court to enlarge on" a precedent on which one of my arguments rested. Taking the hint, I shifted to the other pillar on which my case stood (and won the case).

Chief Justice Rehnquist was attentive to legal doctrine but impatient with legalisms that ignored reality. His strong pragmatic streak, differentiating him from those on his right, was manifest. In a case about asbestos litigation that I argued in 1998, the legal issue was the propriety of certifying a particular lawsuit to proceed as a class action, but he insisted on knowing how well those allegedly injured would "fare if they just keep fighting their individual lawsuits," especially if the companies they sue "end up in bankruptcy." Had I not been reminded to paint that larger picture, the case might have come out differently.

That Chief Justice Rehnquist was unlike both puritanical conservatives like Warren E. Burger and movement conservatives like Antonin Scalia was evident in the character of his questions in the two gay rights cases I argued in the mid-1980's, one about firing teachers for "advocating" homosexual activity and the other about prosecuting consenting adults for same-sex intimacy. In neither case did his questions have the "I'm shocked" tenor of Chief Justice Burger's contribution to the dialogue. Justice Rehnquist simply pressed me appropriately on the absence of evidence that the challenged school board regulation had "ever been applied to a single living soul." And when I argued that consenting adults have a fundamental right to engage privately in the sex acts of their choice, while Chief Justice Burger and Justice Byron R. White could barely contain their disgust, Justice Rehnquist calmly pursued the question of just when and how that "fundamental right" arose.

DOJ_NMG_0003069

A dry and gentle wit was among the chief justice's greatest strengths. In a 1991 abortion financing gag order case, I tried to lighten things up by responding, when the chief justice suggested that a State Department press secretary has to toe the government's line, that "some of them don't seem to realize that." Chief Justice Rehnquist let me enjoy the laughter before topping me with a deadpan, "Well, some of them may not realize it, but I think they'll soon learn." In the two cases I argued in which Chief Justice Rehnquist penned a dissent (a freedom of speech case in 1980 and a church-state separation case in 1982), his deliberately playful solo opinions were written with so light a touch that I enjoyed reading them far more than I did the sober 8-to-1 opinions in my favor.

Chief Justice Rehnquist's goal of weakening the checks on presidential power happily met decisive opposition within the court, although I worry that the seeds he planted to that end might yet bear dangerous fruit. No pleasure in argument could overcome my sadness at the Supreme Court's performance in the 2000 election, or my disappointment at how far the chief justice succeeded in his goals of lowering the wall of separation between church and state, shrinking Congress's power and reducing the protections accorded the mostly poor people of color who are suspected or accused of crime.

RECENT events might change the direction of the winds that moved America toward the point Justice Rehnquist comfortably occupied from his earliest days on the court. How the new court will tack with or against those winds will be Topic A at the forthcoming confirmation hearings, as it should be. But Topic B had better be the ability of the new justices to help the court earn the respect of all who take part in its proceedings or are affected by its rulings - which means everybody. Chief Justice Rehnquist was a master at that mission. For that, and for the steadiness of his leadership, I will always remember him with profound gratitude and admiration.

Social Security Waits For Action By Divided GOP (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 5, 2005

House Republican leaders, who weeks ago pledged to take the lead on Social Security, still say they will act this fall, but the party remains divided, as some of their members push for a personal accounts bill, some want a broader package and others don't want to act at all.

"We hope to put a bill together," said House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, describing a likely retirement security package that includes personal accounts.

The Texas Republican, however, said he can't guarantee a floor vote until the Ways and Means Committee approves the bill. His statements were more forceful several weeks ago, when he and other leaders pledged action.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, California Republican, has insisted on his broad retirement package, which emphasizes pension reform and private savings.

It is expected to include a Social Security proposal, introduced by Republican Reps. Jim McCrery of Louisiana and E. Clay Shaw Jr. of Florida, that would use the system's surplus to create voluntary private accounts.

Some Republicans and outside advocates would like a vote on the McCrery-Shaw bill by itself, and a few last week said House leaders have decided unofficially to do that.

"From my conversations, they agree this is the best strategy," said Larry Hunter of the Free Enterprise Fund, arguing that such a tactic would pressure the Senate and give House Republicans a concrete and popular proposal to take to constituents.

But Mr. DeLay said Friday: "If it's done, it will be done as part of the retirement security package."

Supporters of the accounts proposal say Republicans remain divided.

"You still have a lot of members in the House that don't want to pass anything only to have the Senate sit on it," said Rep. Jack Kingston of Georgia, one of the few Republicans to address the issue during the August recess. "You have others who want a vote so they can vote yes, and then blame it on the Senate."

Mr. Shaw said his constituents liked his proposal once he explained it, and that Republicans will decide whether to proceed in the next few weeks, perhaps after a vote behind closed doors.

"We need to take the temperature of the conference," he said.

After talking with Mr. Thomas in July, Mr. DeLay said he expected a Social Security bill ready in late September or October. But members, aides and advocates noted that Social Security action likely will wait so that Congress can deal with relief to survivors of Hurricane Katrina, appropriations, budget reconciliation and immigration.

Opponents of private accounts feel confident.

"We come into the fall in a position of strength. The public has overwhelmingly rejected ... private accounts," said Brad Woodhouse, spokesman for Americans United to Protect Social Security.

DOJ_NMG_0003070

"There are a large number of Republicans who want this cup to pass from their lips, and yet the House Republican leadership seems to be convincing itself that this is an easy vote," said Roger Hickey, co-director of Campaign for America's Future.

Where The Rumsfelds Retreat, The Cheneys Soon Could Follow (WP)

By Dan Morse, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 5, 2005

ST. MICHAELS, Md. -- They've grown used to having a secretary of defense in their midst -- the way his weekend estate is tucked behind a bend in the road, how he takes casual walks tailed by dark SUVs. Now, residents of this Eastern Shore retreat are preparing for someone even bigger to buy a house down the road: the vice president.

"I'd heard it was going to close either Tuesday or Wednesday of this week," Carroll Hurley, a funeral home owner, said Saturday, seated with his breakfast gang at the Carpenter Street saloon and restaurant.

Whether it's true -- that Dick and Lynne Cheney are buying an estate here -- could not be confirmed. Those closest to the deal -- Cheney's office, the purported sellers, the listing agent -- aren't talking. Hurley admits he's not certain: "All I have is hearsay. It wouldn't stand up in court."

Still, a nosy visit here leaves a person with one of two possibilities: Either the Cheneys are coming or a lot of people have bad information. Police Chief Ed Henry -- who breakfasted along with Hurley -- even referred to the lot in question as "Cheney's house."

The house, listed at $2.9 million, backs up in spectacular fashion to an inlet of the Chesapeake Bay. "Right out by [Defense Secretary Donald H.] Rumsfeld's," said Charles Mangold Sr., whose Benson & Mangold agency brokers high-end estates in the area. "It's under contract, but he hasn't settled yet."

Reaction to the two men's presence is embedded into everyday conversation -- even as residents take pride in taking it all in stride. They tick off celebrities who have lived in or visited the area: Margaret Thatcher, Walter Cronkite, James Michener, Yasser Arafat and Vince Vaughan -- the latest during nearby filming of "Wedding Crashers."

Residents joke about the occasional helicopter overhead and what flavor Rumsfeld gets at Justine's Ice Cream parlor. One woman even drew a clear distinction -- pro-Rumsfeld, anti-Cheney.

"Cheney's a politician. He's connected with Bush," said Rhonda Lewis, 58, a bookkeeper at a bike shop in nearby Easton. She has always had a crush on Rumsfeld. "He is just adorable."

She thinks the defense secretary often looks stressed out on TV, and seeing him walk casually through St. Michaels in khakis is comforting. "Bush just dumped all the hard stuff on him," Lewis said.

At Albright's Gun Shop, a highly regarded draw for goose and duck hunters, a photo of the vice president hangs near the counter. "Best Wishes. Dick Cheney," says the autograph.

Near the photo, behind the counter, Jim Kohlhaus remembered a recent day when several security people walked into the store, followed by the vice president. "I'll be . . . ," Kohlhaus said. He recalled telling Cheney he voted for him twice, "and I finally get to shake your hand."

Cheney extended his hand, Kohlhaus said, and bought some shotgun shells.

Rumsfeld bought a weekend house in St. Michaels two years ago, reportedly for about $1.5 million. He gets generally good reviews here for his desire to blend in -- even if that means taking a walk with his wife, Joyce, down a rural stretch of road tailed by SUVs. Residents say he doesn't like to pose for pictures alone, preferring to ask people to stand next to him and have a brief chat.

Lori Cuthbert, who lives nearby, said she met the defense secretary at a neighborhood St. Patrick's Day party. She intends to invite the Rumsfelds to an upcoming barbecue -- despite the Kerry-Edwards bumper sticker on her Honda.

Sue Stockman, an artist who sells jewelry and mosaics, bears witness that different types of people blend together here. Her Volkswagen van parked in her driveway is painted with flowers and sports "Think Peace" and "It Takes a Village to Raise a Child" bumper stickers. She protested the war in Iraq before it started and describes herself as an "environmentalist, holistic thinker and a pacifist."

Stockman reported having a run-in with someone she suspects was part of Rumsfeld's security detail. They argued over the film "Fahrenheit 9/11" at the Blue Crab Coffee shop -- ending with her putting a hand on his shoulder, sending him Reiki energy healing and telling him she had to get going.

A short time later, the man showed up at her house and gave her a small book, Stockman said. She fetched it from inside her house. "The Meaning of Life" is filled with photographs of animals, bits of wisdom and an inscription from the former Marine asking Stockman to accept his apologies and the book "as a token of friendship."

DOJ_NMG_0003071

Cheney seemingly has spent far less time here. He, his wife and the Rumsfelds did dine on April 16 at 208 Talbot, a high-end restaurant in central St. Michaels.

"Cheney had the lamb," said Deborah Miller, seated behind the hostess stand.

She knew something was up that day when security agents showed up in the afternoon to scout out the place. An attache of Cheney's then arrived, saying he'd prefer a table among the regular diners -- rather than in a back room. No one bothered their table, and the foursome couldn't have been more pleasant, Miller recalled. But she didn't know whether Cheney was buying a place.

And the owner of the house in question declined to comment, saying politely from the end of its long driveway that he didn't want to talk about anything.

The estate goes back to 1930 and was said to be built by one of Thomas Edison's daughters, according to Robert Snyder, the Coldwell Banker agent who is listing the property.

The nine-acre lot includes extensive gardens, ornamental pools and spectacular views of the water behind it. Deer and osprey can be seen.

Snyder, who is vice president of the St. Michaels town commission, declined to say when any deal might close and whether the Cheneys were going to move in. "It truly is a magnificent piece of property," he added.

Civil Rights, Terrorism Cases On Circuit Slate (LEGALT)

By Lily Henning, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 5, 2005

The federal appeals court in Washington, where oral arguments resume this week after a nearly three-month summer hiatus, is facing a season of change.

The departure of Judge John Roberts Jr. to Capitol Hill for hearings on his nomination to the Supreme Court and the arrival of Janice Rogers Brown and Thomas Griffith on the circuit court's bench resulted in a reshuffling of panels and argument dates for the fall.

Lawyers with upcoming cases before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit say they've received oral argument dates later than usual. As of late last week, the court had posted its calendar through the end of October.

The court's argument calendar, which continues to take shape, opens with the pleas of Guantánamo Bay prisoners. Over the next two months the court will also hear cases involving immunity and liability for public officials such as police officers and will revisit long-running litigation that pits states and interest groups against the federal government.

The D.C. Circuit begins arguments Sept. 8 with two of its most closely watched cases.

That day, Judges A. Raymond Randolph, David Sentelle, and Judith Rogers—appointees of Presidents George H.W. Bush, Ronald Reagan, and Bill Clinton, respectively—will hear the cases of Guantánamo Bay prisoners challenging their detention.

The arguments were originally scheduled to be heard Oct. 6 by a panel that included the D.C. Circuit's two newest judges, Brown and Griffith. The court did not comment on the changes in the panel, but lawyers for the detainees had requested that the hearing date be moved up so that if necessary, they could file an appeal that would reach the Supreme Court during its upcoming term.

"This must feel gigantic to these judges," says Barbara Olshansky, deputy legal director at the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York. "These are the kinds of decisions that are remembered and cited for centuries."

The learning curve is steep for any judge—regardless of whether he or she is a veteran or new to the bench, says Olshansky, who coordinates dozens of pro bono lawyers representing detainees.

Of the three judges, Randolph likely would be most familiar with the detainees' appeals.

In July he wrote the opinion in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld that upheld the military tribunals set up by the Bush administration to try terrorism suspects for war crimes.

Randolph's presence on the panel could create some "hurdles" for the detainees, says Olshansky, but the questions in the current cases are different. Hamdan challenged the legality of the military commissions to try suspected terrorists. The cases to be heard this week contest the legality of the detention of the prisoners, some of whom were picked up outside of the battlefield.

Lakhdar Boumediene v. Bush and Khaled Al Odah v. USA resulted in dramatically different outcomes in the lower court. In Boumediene in early January, U.S. District Judge Richard Leon, a George W. Bush appointee, held that the detainees have no rights under U.S. or international law that can be asserted in federal courts. Weeks later, Senior Judge Joyce Hens Green, appointed by President Jimmy Carter in 1979, ruled in Al Odah that the detainees do "possess enforceable constitutional rights."

No matter which way the circuit rules, the cases are expected to wind up before the Supreme Court, which last year ruled 6-3 that the detainees have a right to file habeas challenges in federal court.

DOJ_NMG_0003072

"We're hoping for a speedy decision," says Stephen Oleskey, a lawyer with Wilmer Hale in Boston who represents a group of Bosnian-Algerians taken into custody in January 2002 and held at Guantánamo Bay.

CONGRESSIONAL IMMUNITY

Thus far, just two cases are slated for review this fall by all active members of the court. In those, the D.C. Circuit will address the unsettled question of whether members of Congress can be sued for employment discrimination by their legislative staffers.

Lawyers say the decision to hear Fields v. Johnson and Hanson v. Dayton en banc was even more unusual because it was done sua sponte — without a request from any of the parties involved.

"It's very, very rare," says Miller Baker, a partner with McDermott, Will & Emery who litigates at both the trial and appellate levels and is not involved in either case.

At issue is whether federal lawmakers are shielded from employment discrimination lawsuits because of a constitutional clause that broadly protects lawmakers' speech, debate, and other "legislative activities."

The 1995 Congressional Accountability Act, passed shortly after Republicans won control of Congress, subjects Congress to various employment statutes that apply to the private sector. But it also preserves Congress' immunity under the constitutional speech or debate clause.

The question in the cases is whether the Constitution bars employment suits filed by certain legislative staffers.

Judges David Tatel, Harry Edwards, and Randolph heard arguments in April in an age and race discrimination case against Rep. Eddie Bernice Johnson, a Texas Democrat. But shortly before scheduled arguments were to be heard in former Hill staffer Brad Hanson's suit against Sen. Mark Dayton (D-Minn.), the court announced it would hear both cases en banc instead. Arguments are scheduled for Sept. 29.

Hanson says that Dayton fired him after learning the aide, who ran a health care help line for constituents, needed heart surgery. Last year, Leon denied Dayton's motion to dismiss the case. The D.C. Circuit denied a request by Hanson's lawyers that the two cases be consolidated.

A group of Republican lawmakers filed a friend of the court brief in support of Johnson and urged the court to shield federal legislators from such lawsuits.

In October, Edwards and Randolph are scheduled to sit on the same panel in another case involving questions of liability and immunity for public officials.

Joined by Judge Karen LeCraft Henderson, they will decide whether D.C. Metropolitan Police Chief Charles Ramsey can be held personally liable for what plaintiffs say were constitutional violations in the arrests of anti-globalism and anti-war protesters. The trial court found the police did not give an order to disperse before ordering the mass arrests in September 2002 in Northwest Washington's Pershing Park.

Ramsey was in command of the police department's operation plan and handling of the demonstrations while Assistant Chief Peter Newsham ordered the Pershing Park arrests.

In September 2004, Judge Emmet Sullivan ruled the two did not have qualified immunity, which shields officials from liability for damages so long as their actions were "objectively reasonable." Ramsey and Newsham, a lawyer and member of the Maryland Bar, filed an emergency appeal.

Mara Verheyden-Hilliard, a lawyer with the Partnership for Civil Justice, which is representing the class, says the question of Ramsey's liability is critical to a wider battle about how police restrain protesters.

"Personal liability is a very important mechanism in making sure that this doesn't happen again," Verheyden-Hilliard says.

LONG HAULS

Key cases in two long-running court battles are also scheduled to come before the court.

Nearly a decade after they started, challenges to the federal government's handling of billions of dollars in assets belonging to Native American heirs and held in trust for more than a century return to the D.C. Circuit.

The main body of the Cobell v. Norton suit, a class action first filed in 1996 against Clinton administration Interior Department Secretary Bruce Babbitt, is pending in federal district court before Judge Royce Lamberth in Washington.

For years, Lamberth has ordered the Interior Department to implement plans to correct past accounting failures and fix the way the agency accounts for the management and dispersal of the trust money in the future.

The case, which is scheduled to be heard by the D.C. Circuit on Sept. 16, is the government's appeal of Lamberth's latest injunction requiring accounting remedies.

Among the disagreements between the government and the class of trust beneficiaries is the scope of the fix. The plaintiffs say that the government needs to remedy its errors reaching as far back as 1887, the year the trust was created. The Department of Justice lawyers handling the case, however, say that the cutoff should be 1938, when another law concerning the management of the accounts was enacted.

DOJ_NMG_0003073

In an added twist to an already dizzyingly complex struggle, Justice Department lawyers made the unusual request on Aug. 15 that Lamberth be removed from the case, claiming that the harsh language in Lamberth's rulings creates an appearance of bias. That question could come before the panel, which includes Senior Judges Laurence Silberman and Stephen Williams and Judge Merrick Garland. The plaintiffs have contested the motion.

On Oct. 18, another appeal in the decades-old fight over plans for a permanent repository for the nation's nuclear waste in Yucca Mountain, Nev., comes before Edwards, Henderson, and Randolph.

The latest iteration of litigation that Nevada Senior Deputy Attorney General Marta Adams calls "tortured" involves the state's protest of a proposed railroad that would transport nuclear waste to Yucca Mountain.

"We sue them over pretty much everything," Adams says. "I think the powers-that-be are surprised that Nevada has put up the argument that it has."

The state contends Congress did not entrust the Department of Energy with the authority to construct a railroad for the project and that, among other things, the agency did not do adequate studies of the environmental impact of the project.

The Nuclear Energy Institute Inc., in an amicus brief filed in support of the government's plans, wrote that Nevada's "dire predictions" about the dangers of transporting the waste by rail through the state do not "square with reality."

Lily Henning can be contacted at lhenning@alm.com.

Alphabet Soup: New Judges Griffith, Brown To Tackle ADA, FDA Cases (LEGALT)

By Lily Henning, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 5, 2005

Nothing says welcome to Washington to a new judge like a case full of acronyms that only wonkish Beltway dwellers can appreciate.

That's how Janice Rogers Brown and Thomas Griffith will be initiated into the complex but largely nonideological work of refereeing federal agencies on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit.

Before Brown this month will be a dispute over a plan that would create a hunting season for the trumpeter swan, and Griffith will hear an appeal involving the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration.

But in other cases, the judges could have the opportunity to place a personal stamp.

In Gregory Thomas v. George Washington University, Brown will hear the case of a man with a paralyzed leg who is appealing a lower court decision that threw out a favorable jury verdict. Gregory Thomas, a medical resident at GW who lost his position, sued the university for race and disability discrimination. The school claims his performance was poor and that he has an impairment, as opposed to a disability covered by the Americans With Disabilities Act.

As a California Supreme Court justice, Brown had been at odds with colleagues on questions of discrimination and disability. In a 2001 case, Brown split from the majority by advocating for a more limited legal recourse for a disabled worker whose employer did not accommodate her disability.

Brown and Griffith are scheduled to hear seven cases together this fall. On Sept. 16 the judges will hear M.K., et al. v. Porter Goss, a class action filed by Central Intelligence Agency staffers who say the government obstructed their efforts to obtain effective counsel in employment cases. According to court records, one appellant claims they were told that "national security was more important than her right to an attorney."

An unusual question at the intersection of government regulation and medical ethics will come before Griffith. The Washington Legal Foundation wants the Food and Drug Administration to allow medicines in early stages of clinical trials that haven't yet been deemed safe by the agency to be made available to terminally ill patients.

But the clearest signs of where Brown and Griffith stand—and the degree of independence they will hold from their colleagues—will likely be in dissents, which have been rare on the D.C. Circuit.

Because of the workload, "writing a dissent on the appeals court takes a lot of effort," says Frank Cross, a professor at the University of Texas School of Law. "So dissents often tell you which judges are really ideologues."

Lily Henning can be contacted at lhenning@alm.com.

Report: Education Dept.'s PR Funds Need Oversight (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, September 6, 2005

Federal investigators probing the Education Department's public relations contracts have found a pattern of deals in which advocacy organizations received grants totaling nearly $4.7 million to promote Bush administration education priorities in newspaper columns and brochures, but didn't disclose that they received taxpayer funds, as required by law.

DOJ_NMG_0003074

The department's inspector general says he detected no "covert propaganda," but he told administration officials to consider asking for some of their money back.

The report, released on the Education Department's website Thursday night, said the department needs to do a better job monitoring how millions of dollars in grants are spent. More than $1.7 million, for example, went to outside public relations contracts that officials said resulted in no visible media products.

The report comes nearly five months after the inspector general criticized the department for its $240,000 contract with commentator Armstrong Williams. That contract called for him to promote President Bush's 2002 No Child Left Behind education reform law in newspaper columns and on his syndicated TV show, and to encourage others to do the same.

After USA TODAY first reported on the Williams deal, several other agencies revealed that freelance commentators wrote pieces promoting Bush administration policies on marriage and on the environment without disclosing they'd received government funds either to write the pieces or to support their interest groups.

In the new report, Inspector General John Higgins found that more than $7.7 million in grants and contracts were either properly notated with government disclaimers or hadn't been disseminated to the public. He also found that Education Department personnel in several instances told groups that the disclaimers were required.

Higgins found that in 10 of 11 cases examined, groups didn't disclose — in print, on radio or in other media, such as brochures or handbooks — that taxpayer funds were used.

"The Department of Education is trying to define itself out of trouble by setting the bar very high for what constitutes covert propaganda," said Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., who requested the probe.

"But this report shows that, in case after case after case, grantees — without disclosing who was paying them — took taxpayers' money and used it to promote controversial policies," Miller said. "Either the department is grossly incompetent when it comes to awarding grants and contracts, or it is misleading investigators and engaging in a coverup of the misuse of taxpayer dollars."

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings' response, filed with the report, agreed with most of the investigators' findings.

OTHER NEWS:

U.S. Appears To Have Avoided Massive Oil Supply Problems (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

As Americans began heading home from the Labor Day weekend, gasoline stations today continued to report spot shortages, but the country appeared, at least as of this afternoon, to have avoided the massive supply problems that some had feared.

Throughout the weekend, station attendants and analysts said they saw unrelenting demand from drivers who were worried they would find themselves stranded, were panicked by rumors about service stations closing early, or both.

Officials said they continued to make progress in resuming the production and distribution of gasoline and other fuels, which was severely disrupted by Hurricane Katrina last week. But they noted that most refineries and oil production in and along the Gulf of Mexico remained shut down for the seventh day in a row.

Gasoline demand was heaviest along busy thoroughfares between big population centers and vacation destinations, often knocking out several gasoline stations along heavy traffic routes for hours to days at a time.

"It could three or five stations on one stretch running out, that's a fairly real situation that is happening," said Justin McNaull, a spokesman for AAA, formerly known as the American Automobile Association.

Mr. McNaull added that his group had not received any reports of motorists stranded in tourist destinations unable to return home because they could not refuel. "The challenge that gas station operators are having now is not knowing when the next shipment is coming and how much they will be getting," he said.

Rauf Baber, manager of a BP Amoco station in Coney Island, Brooklyn, said he was able to get a special delivery of gasoline late Sunday night after running out earlier in the day. Though he had 6,000 gallons of gasoline this morning, he was still expecting another load this evening.

"People went crazy to fill up, that's why we ran out," Mr. Baber said. "The BP company, they have plenty of gas."

Another Amoco station in Bronx was not quite so lucky. "We ran out about half an hour ago, and people are still coming in looking for gasoline," an attendant who would only give his first name, Jose, said this morning. "We ran out for a while last week, too. We're hoping to get a delivery today."

DOJ_NMG_0003075

Rumors that service stations were closing at 4 p.m. or 5 p.m. appeared to have needlessly sent many motorists on refueling trips, said John Felmy, chief economist at the American Petroleum Institute. "It wasn't as good as I hoped, but it wasn't as bad as I feared," he said about the weekend.

Another key test may come this afternoon and evening as the biggest crush of vacationers begin their voyage home, Mr. McNaull said.

"There certainly will be another push on the demand side there as people make those return trips and potentially as people gas up cars for the Tuesday back-to-work commute," he said.

Nationally, the average retail price for gasoline was $3.057 a gallon this morning, up from $2.867 on Sunday and $2.307 a month ago, according to AAA.

In the New York region, prices seemed to range from $2.95 a gallon to $3.75 a gallon, according to a spot survey done by the staffs of Senators Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, and John Corzine, Democrat of New Jersey. Both politicians called on the Federal Trade Commission to investigate gasoline price increases and suggested it might help to lift the federal gasoline tax at least temporarily.

Gasoline supplies will likely remain tight through much of the coming week if not longer, industry officials and analysts said, as refiners slowly resume operations in the gulf region. It can take several days to restart those facilities, because of the danger of explosions and other accidents.

Of the 10 refineries that were shut down by the storm initially, eight have not resumed operations, two are restarting and hope to be operational in the coming days, and three still do not have electricity, the Energy Department said on Sunday.

At least four refiners that produce about 5 percent of the nation's gasoline and other oil-based fuels have sustained significant damage and could be out of commission for a month or more for repairs, officials and analysts said. Among them are ConocoPhillips' Belle Chase, La. facility; Exxon Mobil's Chalmette, La. plant; and ChevronTexaco's large refinery in Pascagoula, Miss.

Officials at the largest of the four, ChevronTexaco, said they still do not have power or phone service at their plant, where the company is building temporary housing for up to 1,500 employees and their families. It may be days before the company can say how long it will take to restart the plant, which has a capacity to process 325,000 barrels of oil a day.

"There is a cogeneration unit with Mississippi Electric there that needs to get up and running," said Michael Barrett, a company spokesman. "We need to get natural gas there. We are putting generators in there right now. The truth is we don't have telephone lines" working at the refinery.

Of the two major pipelines that bring gasoline, diesel fuel and jet fuel to the eastern half of the United States from Texas and the gulf, the smaller one, the Plantation pipeline, said it was operating at 100 percent. The other, the Colonial pipeline, was at 73 percent as of Saturday and hoped to be at full capacity by the end of the holiday weekend.

Also, the federal government and members of the International Energy Agency, a 26-nation organization created after the 1970's oil crisis, have started releasing crude oil and some gasoline to energy companies in an effort to ease supply constraints. Those moves helped push down crude oil prices 2.1 percent in London tradingtoday. The New York Mercantile Exchange was closed for the Labor Day holiday.

The United States Department of Energy has already agreed to loan 12.6 million barrels of oil to refiners so they can keep producing gasoline and other fuels as production facilities in the gulf recover. This weekend, the government went even further and said it would sell 30 million barrels or more of oil in addition to the loans, which companies have to replace when conditions improve.

But with so much refining capacity out of service, analysts said gasoline prices would remain high in spite of the crude oil that the federal government and its allies are unleashing.

"Some of these refineries will not be back to full operation perhaps well into next year," said Paul Horsnell, an analyst at Barclays Capital in London.

A spokesman for BP, formerly British Petroleum, Scott Dean, said the company was shipping gasoline from Europe to East Coast port to help alleviate shortages but it may take some time for the current supply crunch to wind its way out of the system.

"We are making fuels, we are distributing fuels," he said. "Fuels are arriving at the terminals and going out on trucks and arriving stations, but there are still disruptions."

Average Gas Prices Pumped Past $3 (USAT)

By Chris Woodyard, Dennis Cauchon and Sharon Carty

USA Today, September 6, 2005

The national average price for gasoline crossed the $3-a-gallon mark for the first time Monday in the latest AAA survey, tying the record for highest ever on an inflation-adjusted basis.

DOJ_NMG_0003076

Although motorists in hurricane-whipped areas along the Gulf of Mexico faced gas lines, some resorts across the nation reported strong Labor Day crowds despite soaring fuel prices.

A gallon of regular-grade gas hit $3.057 a gallon Monday, up 19 cents from $2.867 earlier in the weekend, the AAA said. On an inflation-adjusted basis, that's equal to the peak of $1.417 set in March 1981.

Thirty-five states and the District of Columbia had prices averaging $3 or more for regular. Highest: Maryland, $3.26.

Supply disruptions caused by the hurricane are almost sure to raise prices further before settling down in about two weeks, says Tom Kloza of the Oil Price Information Service, which compiles the AAA survey.

Barring another unforeseen event like a new hurricane, “I think the highest prices you may see until February are over the next 15 days,” Kloza said .

One good sign: Shortages feared in the upper Midwest didn't appear, though open gas stations were scarce in hurricane-ravaged areas. “We avoided a widespread panic,” says Dan Pickering of Pickering Energy Partners. There were “spot shortages but nothing on a broad basis, which is the best we could have hoped for.”

Spot shortages are still possible. Although major pipelines have been restored to service, some gulf-area refineries are still not operating. Tankers full of gasoline from Europe are headed to the USA, but it could take a couple of weeks for their cargoes to make a difference.

“There is probably enough (refinery) capacity in Europe to bail us out for awhile,” says Harry Quarls, a managing director for Booz Allen Hamilton.

About a dozen gas stations were open Monday in two hard-hit cities on the Mississippi coast, Gulfport and Biloxi. Police stood guard.

“People get crazy about gasoline when we're not here,” said Gulfport police officer Travis Sheaffer at a gas station near Interstate 10. “They were cutting in line, pulling guns — all types of insanity.”

A few stations have raised prices above $4 a gallon, but most have kept them at about $2.50 a gallon, the price charged before the hurricane. Stations generally limited customers to 10 gallons of gas.

“Some people pushed their cars here for gas,” said Fallon Demoruell, a gas station worker. “A lot of them haven't been too polite.”

Elsewhere, some gas station owners were nervous about supplies. Dawn Baker, manager of a CITGO station in Illiopolis, Ill., 200 miles southwest of Chicago, says she fears that she might not get a full supply when a new tank of gas arrives today. “More than likely it'll be a half load, and we'll have to make do with that,” she says.

Some commuters are saying that $3 is the breaking point for them. Now they're ready to reduce their driving.

Rodolfo Palma, who lives in Saline, Mich., 50 miles west of Detroit, bought a bicycle at the beginning of the summer and used it to run errands instead of taking his car. He even started driving part way to work and riding his bike the rest of the way. He plans to keep doing both.

“Now, after the hurricane, it's going to be a permanent change,” Palma says.

It Won't Be Cheap, But Gas Is To Be Had (NYT)

By By Vikas Bajaj And Richard Pérez-peña

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

Most American travelers managed to avoid any serious gasoline supply disruptions over the holiday weekend, officials said yesterday, but analysts and industry executives warned that fuel prices were likely to remain high and that the nation's oil supply system might not return to normal operations for several weeks, perhaps longer.

Even as the federal government and other nations started releasing crude oil and gasoline into a thirsting world market and pipelines resumed sending supplies from the Gulf Coast, specialists said there were few quick fixes for the biggest remaining bottleneck: refining.

"Some of these refineries will not be back to full operation, perhaps well into next year," said Paul Horsnell, an analyst at Barclays Capital in London, who also said that it would take longer for refiners to turn their attention to producing heating oil for the winter as they struggled to catch up with lost gasoline output.

As many as four refineries, processing about 4 percent of the nation's oil supplies, might stay out of service for weeks or months. Of the remaining six refineries that shut down last week because of Hurricane Katrina, several were starting to resume production over the long weekend, but it will take them several days to get back to full speed.

Oil prices fell about 2 percent in European and Asian trading, and the New York Mercantile Exchange was closed for the Labor Day holiday. Retail prices for regular gasoline appeared to be settling at an average of roughly $3.20 a gallon yesterday, almost a full dollar above what consumers paid a month ago.

DOJ_NMG_0003077

Throughout the weekend, station attendants and analysts said they saw unrelenting demand from drivers who were worried they would find themselves stranded or were panicked by rumors about service stations closing early.

Prices, they said, were being largely determined by suppliers and retailers that were hoping to limit the risk of running out of fuel, and groping to find a balance in various markets between uncertain supplies and skittish demand. Gasoline-buying over the weekend was heaviest along busy highways connecting major population centers with nearby vacation destinations.

"It could be three or five stations on one stretch running out - that's a fairly real situation that is happening," said Justin McNaull, a spokesman for AAA.

Rauf Baber, manager of a BP Amoco station in Coney Island, Brooklyn, said he was able to get a special delivery of gasoline late Sunday night after running out earlier in the day. "People went crazy to fill up, that's why we ran out," he said. "The BP company, they have plenty of gas."

BP indeed has plenty of gasoline but it, like others, could not assure that ample fuel supplies would soon be where they were wanted most. A company spokesman, Scott Dean, said tankers were making their way from Europe to ports along the East Coast. He said that the company's refineries were already processing everything they had on hand.

"We're still working to get the ripples out of the system," he said, "but it's still going to take several days."

On Friday, the Energy Department and the International Energy Agency, a 26-nation consortium established after the 1970's energy crisis, said they would together release 60 million barrels of oil and gasoline reserves at a pace of 2 million barrels a day, helping to bring down soaring prices in futures markets.

But Mr. Horsnell said the oil releases would not be enough to ease gasoline prices or supplies. Among I.E.A. members, only the Europeans have spare gasoline to ship to the United States, and they are already sending all they can. They will struggle to ship more because there are few spare tankers available and East Coast ports are not sitting idle.

"The maximum amount of oil product that can be managed into the U.S. is two million barrels a day," Mr. Horsnell said. "Logistically, it's quite challenging."

About 70 percent of the gulf's offshore crude oil production of 1.5 million barrels a day was still shut down yesterday, as was half of its natural gas production of 10 billion cubic-feet per day.

Most of last week, energy officials focused on restoring power to pumps on two major pipelines that bring gasoline, diesel fuel and jet fuel to the eastern half of the country from Texas and the Gulf of Mexico. Plantation, the smaller of the two, said it was operating at 100 percent capacity yesterday. Colonial, the larger pipeline, was at 73 percent as of Saturday, and its operators said they hoped for it to be at full capacity by the end of the holiday weekend.

Rick Rainey, a spokesman for Kinder Morgan, the energy company that owns Plantation, said the pipeline carried a full load of gasoline and other fuels to the East Coast over the weekend. But volume on the pipeline was beginning to drop off, he said yesterday, "as the backlog has begun to deplete at terminals."

Exxon Mobil's refinery in Baton Rouge, La., the nation's second-largest, is the only one that has continued to supply fuel to the pipeline since the hurricane, Mr. Rainey said.

According to the Energy Department, three Louisiana refineries still did not have power over the weekend: the ConocoPhillips facility in Belle Chasse; the Exxon Mobil plant in Chalmette and the Murphy Oil refinery in Meraux.

A fourth, ChevronTexaco, said that its large refinery in Pascagoula, Miss., was still without electricity or phone service; the company said it could take days before it could even say when operations could resume. A company spokesman, Mickey Driver, said it was still trying to locate all of its 4,400 employees in the region.

Closer to the retail end of the energy pipeline, politicians across the country were talking about how to deal with consumer complaints. State attorneys general threatened to crack down on price gouging and Congressional leaders asked for federal investigations.

Two senators - Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, and Jon S. Corzine, Democrat of New Jersey - said that their staffs had surveyed gas stations and found prices ranging from $2.95 to $3.75 a gallon at stations within a few miles of one another.

Mr. McNaull of AAA said retail prices swung widely last week and were starting to converge in many cities. But retailers in the same area could still have widely different costs, depending on whether they bought gas on contract from a single major supplier or on the spot market from the cheapest provider that day or week.

"The challenge that gas station operators are having now," he said, "is not knowing when the next shipment is coming and how much they will be getting."

Rising Gas Prices May Force States To Suspend Tax (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003078

To soften the blow of higher fuel prices and disrupted supplies, the federal government took steps to increase the supply of diesel fuel as some states moved to suspend gasoline excise taxes.

The Internal Revenue Service said it will temporarily allow all vehicles, including commercial trucks, to use dyed diesel fuel without being subject to a penalty. Dyed diesel usually is restricted to farming and government activities that aren't subject to excise taxes. Under the IRS easing, the usual diesel tax still will be owed when dyed diesel is used in nonexempt ways, but an additional penalty will be waived. California and Michigan also lifted state penalties on the use of dyed diesel fuel.

States that suspend gas taxes stand to lose millions of dollars in revenues that are usually used for road and other highway projects. Even states that don't suspend gas taxes could see revenues drop if drivers cut back on gas purchases due to rising pump prices.

Late last week, Georgia suspended its 7.5 cents-a-gallon gas tax and 4% sales tax on gasoline purchases until Oct. 1. State lawmakers in Oklahoma, Connecticut and Massachusetts have proposed measures to suspend gas taxes, which could reduce the cost to consumers by 12 cents to 20 cents per gallon. Meanwhile, Rep. Steve Pearce (R., N.M.) said he plans to introduce legislation to suspend the federal gas tax, which is 18.4 cents a gallon.

The disruption of gas supplies, coupled with panic buying, has pushed prices to an average of about $3.06 per gallon, according to AAA. In some areas, gas prices have nearly doubled, prompting lawmakers to scramble to show voters that they are trying to ease the pain.

"I think it is important because we need to recognize that gas has gone up 70 cents to a dollar in just a matter of days," said Brad Jones, a Republican state legislator in Massachusetts. He wants to suspend his state's 21-cents-per-gallon gas tax for three months.

Georgia's one-month suspension of its gas tax and sales tax on gasoline is expected to cost the state $75 million, according to state officials. If Mr. Jones's bill is passed in Massachusetts, that state would lose an estimated $175 million. Oklahoma would see a $103 million decline in revenues under one state senator's proposal to suspend its 17 cents-per-gallon tax on diesel fuel.

All 50 states levy a flat-rate tax, usually 10 to 20 cents, on each gallon of gas sold. Most states also apply a sales tax, usually 2% to 5%, on gas purchases.

Most money collected from gasoline taxes is earmarked for state and local road projects, and used as matching funds to win federal money. States with lower matching funds could end up with fewer federal highway dollars.

But analysts say states are unlikely to be badly hurt by a decline in gas-tax receipts because many are showing surpluses due to robust local economies. "It's more symbolic," said Nicholas Jenny, senior policy analyst for the Nelson A. Rockefeller Institute of Government, the public policy research unit of the State University of New York.

In the first eight months of the year, Georgia collected $75 million more in revenues than had been expected, due to an increase in sales-tax receipts resulting from climbing gas prices. The extra money will be offset by the one-month tax suspension. "We expect this to be revenue-neutral," said Shane Hix, a spokesman for Georgia's governor.

Generally, the tax on gasoline is an excise tax that is a fixed amount instead of a percentage. Many states haven't raised the gas tax over the past decade. California, for example, has charged motorists the same excise tax -- 18 cents a gallon -- since 1994.

"A lot of these states have seen the money coming from these taxes go down anyway because of inflation," said Mr. Jenny of the Rockefeller Institute.

This isn't the first time that states have weighed suspending gasoline taxes in the face of sharp price increases. In 2000, Indiana suspended its 5% sales tax on gasoline, resulting in a drop of seven cents to 10 cents a gallon and a $12.6 million decline in state receipts.

Katrina And The Gas Pump (NYT)

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

In Katrina's wake, gasoline prices are rising faster than oil prices - an odd, but explicable, phenomenon. Enough crude oil is being produced to meet global demand, but the ability of the Gulf Coast's many refineries to turn the oil into gasoline has been devastated, as has the ability to transport the gasoline that does become available. Those supply bottlenecks are chiefly responsible for this past week's higher prices at the pump.

President Bush's immediate response is to lend oil from the government's Strategic Petroleum Reserve to refineries and to streamline the refining process by temporarily relaxing environmental standards - sound stopgap measures to help ensure a steady supply of gasoline. The International Energy Agency, whose members are 26 rich nations, has also made a big contribution, pledging on Friday to supply world markets with an additional 60 million barrels of oil and gasoline over the next 30 days, half of which would come from the United States' emergency stockpiles.

DOJ_NMG_0003079

But it would be wrong to think - and act - as if this crisis is fundamentally a supply shock. Rather, it is a supply shock on top of blatantly excessive demand. The near-term responses from Mr. Bush and the international agency, welcome as they are, will not solve the larger problems laid bare by Katrina. Worse, Mr. Bush's record on energy issues does not suggest that he is up to that task.

Gasoline prices seem destined to stay elevated until at least next spring. Even if the damage in the Gulf Coast is repaired soon - a big if - oil producers and refiners will require a premium to compensate for the risk that another killer storm could further disrupt operations in this hurricane season. Moreover, Katrina is causing refineries to draw down oil stockpiles that would have been used to produce home heating fuel for use this winter. That makes for a very thin supply cushion in the months ahead - not to mention high home-heating bills on top of high gasoline prices.

But even before the hurricane hit, oil producers were pumping all-out to meet demand. Driven mainly by gasoline consumption in the United States and industrialization in China and India, the world's consumption of oil is 85 million barrels a day. That is just short of the maximum that can be pumped, and leaves only about 1 million barrels a day in spare capacity, the lowest level in three decades. As with gasoline, the thinner the cushion, the higher the price.

Mr. Bush, who has a wildly overconfident view of how much oil could be pumped if American drillers were given a freer rein, refuses to see the overarching problem as one of excessive demand. Americans' gas-guzzling ways keep prices up, threatening the nation's economic well-being and creating windfall profits for foreign oil producers, some of which are used to finance terrorism.

So it is up to Congress to grapple with the big picture - now, before another disaster strikes. The Senate energy committee is scheduled to meet today, and much of the attention will naturally be devoted to the current problems in the refining process. Those issues must obviously be addressed, including ways to help municipalities overcome the "not in my backyard" obstacles to building state-of-the-art refineries.

But the focus must be - finally - on reducing oil consumption. The lawmakers should call for a rapid, mandatory increase in automobile mileage standards. And they must resist measures that would encourage only more consumption, like temporarily suspending gasoline taxes.

This is the moment to gather the political will to do what should have already been done. If the lawmakers don't act, they are courting problems that may be even harder to solve later on.

Economy Shows Resilience In Face Of Massive Jolt (WSJ)

By Jon E. Hilsenrath and Grep Ip

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

The U.S. economy's shock absorbers kicked in within days of one of the worst natural disasters in its history, offering hope that the massive jolt to the country's energy and transportation systems won't produce a long-lived, serious economic contraction.

The release of emergency oil and gasoline from global stockpiles, created in the 1970s to counter supply interruptions, sent crude-oil prices down to about pre-hurricane levels in European trading. Long-term interest rates fell despite the prospect of higher inflation, cushioning home buyers and businesses. Temporary-help agencies began to place some workers displaced by the storm. New Orleans's main newspaper, the Times-Picayune, kept publishing on the Internet when printing on paper was impossible. Computerized logistics enabled railroad CSX Corp. to reroute freight normally exchanged with Western railroads at New Orleans to be sent north.

Hurricane Katrina is the biggest test in years of the economy's resilience. But recent history offers encouraging, though by no means definitive evidence of the U.S. economy's ability to bounce back from shocks. Economic growth has become significantly less volatile during the past two decades, a trend some economists dub "the Great Moderation."

The past five years have witnessed a burst stock bubble, terrorist attacks, corporate scandals, wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and a doubling in crude oil prices. Yet the economy, after a mild recession in 2001, has embarked on a solid expansion with little inflation. Katrina came at a time when the economy was in solid shape. In August, the unemployment rate fell to 4.9%, a four-year low, from 5% in July, and nonfarm payrolls grew a respectable 169,000, the Labor Department said Friday.

"We expect the trend in growth will prove more resilient than is now widely feared," UBS Securities analysts told clients Friday.

Employment and output are likely to take a sizable hit in the next few months; the question is the duration and severity of the blow. Economists surveyed last week by Macroeconomic Advisers LLC, a St. Louis forecasting firm, said the storm would result in growth of only about 3.5%, at an annual rate, in the second half of the year, down from pre-storm expectations of 4%. It grew 3.6% in the first half.

DOJ_NMG_0003080

And the economy does have some worrisome vulnerabilities. The storm hit when world oil producers and U.S. refiners were operating near capacity and they remain highly sensitive to any loss of supply. Higher gasoline prices will act like a tax on consumers who are already stretched: In July their saving rate turned negative as spending exceeded income. Spending might be further hurt if consumer confidence erodes.

As a result, some analysts still believe the economic impact might be severe. "What we're witnessing now is going to turn out to be a really huge shock," said Stephen Cecchetti, an economist at Brandeis University. Businesses may also find it hard to adapt to shifts in spending caused by higher energy prices, much as Detroit found it hard to shift to smaller cars in the 1970s.

But there are several factors in the economy's favor. It's more energy-efficient: The gross domestic product has more than doubled since 1979, but petroleum consumption has risen just 9%, according to the Energy Department. Policy makers have reduced, rather than increased, regulatory constraints on supply. In the 1970s, gasoline price caps and other regulations created shortages and waiting lines. Last week, the federal government temporarily eased environmental and transportation regulations so existing gasoline inventories could reach U.S. customers more easily.

The release of oil and gasoline from the U.S. Strategic Petroleum Reserve and similar stockpiles in Europe has helped contain the rise in oil prices. Benchmark Brent crude oil for October delivery fell $1.22 in London yesterday to $64.84, around where it stood before Katrina. U.S. markets were closed for Labor Day. Wholesale gasoline prices fell sharply Friday from midweek peaks though they remain well above pre-storm levels due to Gulf Coast refinery closures.

The growth of the temporary-staffing industry has helped redeploy workers displaced by both economic and weather events. Terri Blue Edwards, 41, stayed behind in New Orleans with a sister who refused to leave. By Thursday, she says, she, her 23-year old son and her sister waded out of a building in chest-high water, wandered along a scorching-hot highway and found their way to an abandoned dairy truck, which they and more than two dozen others, packed shoulder-to-shoulder, and rode to Austin.

Another son raised money to fly her to Huntsville, Ala., she says, to be reunited with her husband, Leon, who had left New Orleans with elderly parents before the storm. Mr. Edwards was a maintenance engineer in a municipal building, earning $13 an hour. Ms. Edwards didn't work. She says she has health problems but she's going to work now to make ends meet.

By Saturday, Mr. and Mrs. Edwards had landed $7-an-hour jobs at a Huntsville manufacturer through Adecco SA, a Swiss-based temporary staffing company. Mr. Edwards says he was making nearly twice as much in New Orleans. But the job "came right on time," he says. "You need a job to survive."

The transportation system is proving to have some flexibility. The storm wiped out large sections of CSX's tracks and bridges along the Gulf Coast. But within a couple of days, the railroad, based in Jacksonville, Fla., was rerouting freight north, thanks to advances in information technology and deregulation that enable it to reroute shipments in a quarter of the time it would have taken two decades ago. Separately, the lower Mississippi's maritime hub continued to recover as the Coast Guard reopened its main shipping channel to ocean-going vessels Saturday.

The development of new financial instruments has ameliorated the risk that regional stresses could trigger local bank failures. In Baton Rouge, American Gateway Bank, a small regional lender, sells about three-quarters of the mortgages it underwrites to larger banks like J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. or Bank of America Corp., who package the loans into larger, diversified pools of credit sold to investors around the world. That has helped keep credit flowing to real estate even after disaster struck less than 80 miles away.

Oil shocks in the 1970s became embedded in wages and prices, eventually requiring the Fed to raise interest rates dramatically, triggering deep recessions. But those drastic actions eventually cemented its credibility, and in recent years workers and companies haven't responded to higher oil prices or easy money by immediately pressing for higher prices and wages. "One of the benefits of having that credibility is it increases [the Fed's] ability to...stabilize the economy and insulate it from major shocks like this," said J. Alfred Broaddus, former president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, Va.

While the Fed is unlikely to cut rates, it may choose not to raise them at its Sept. 20 meeting as had been previously expected. The Fed has raised its short-term-rate target to 3.5% from 1% in the past 14 months.

Fed officials say it's too soon to assess the storm's impact on interest-rate moves. Even so, long-term interest rates have declined in anticipation that the Fed will raise rates more slowly or not as high. By keeping mortgage rates down, that, in turn, offered support to the still-strong housing market.

Economic Impact Will Be Widespread Katrina's Costs Will Be Shared By Cities Far Beyond Storm's Path (USAT)

By Del Jones, Dan Reed And Jayne O'Donnell

USA Today, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003081

As New Orleans deals with the storm waters that broke its levees last week, dozens of Southern cities from Baton Rouge to Pensacola are coping with a displaced populace numbering in the hundreds of thousands and awaiting the spillover of billions of dollars in disaster aid.

Natural disasters whipsaw local economies as they move from devastation and into rebuilding. That's nothing new. But this time, the disaster was a coiled snake that has lashed out at the nation. Gasoline prices soar, transportation snarls. Hurricane Katrina has already influenced most lives in small ways, but it could have a major influence to those along the migration path of a city of evacuees looking for family, friends and 275 stranger-filled shelters in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee and Texas.

How it will play out is anyone's guess. But in the short run, people and their pets are washing up on doorsteps everywhere. New Orleans hotel and spa owners Keith and Andre West-Harrison fled to family in Evansville, Ind., a 16-hour drive, with six dogs and a cat. Distant places such as Evansville might be able to absorb a few evacuees, but an overwhelmed Houston Astrodome is flashing the no-vacancy sign, sending 25,000 to Reunion Arena in Dallas, another 25,000 to a San Antonio warehouse that was once an Air Force base.

Some companies are erecting their own shelters. Chevron this past weekend planned a 500,000-square-foot tent city in Pascagoula, Miss., to house 1,500 employees and their families who were left homeless by the storm.

Katrina and the flooding triggered by levee failures will have a total economic cost of $100 billion, Risk Management Solutions, a catastrophe-risk-modeling firm, said Friday. Most of the damage done by the levee break is likely not insured. Still, bond-rating company Fitch said Friday that the insured portion of losses could go above $25 billion, surpassing the Sept. 11 terror attack ($20.1 billion in 2004 dollars) and Hurricane Andrew ($20.5 billion) as the largest insured loss in history.

The strain is everywhere. New Orleans had 32,400 school-age children in 2004 who will be landing somewhere. The Greater Houston Partnership, the city's primary business advocate, is calling Houston “the city of hope,” and spokesman Charlie Savino says it is bracing for 150,000 temporary residents, comparable to absorbing the population of Chattanooga, Tenn. Providing for them will cost $6 million a day, assuming $40 a day is spent on each person for food, housing, health care and schooling.

Congress has approved $10.5 billion in emergency disaster relief, and much more is likely on the way. Private donations are rolling in. Need gives berth to opportunity, especially when mixed with money, yet little if anything about this disaster smacks of a windfall. There might be tens of thousands arriving in Texas cities, but, “It's certainly not going to be like (hosting) the Super Bowl,” says Bill Gilmer, a senior economist at the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas and an expert on the Gulf Coast economy.

For example, Fiesta Mart is within walking distance of the Astrodome, but it's not stocking up on food and staples, says CEO Louis Katopodis. Everyone will be fed three meals a day plus 24-hour snacks on the Dome's concourses. Papa John's is giving away 10,000 pizzas. Aramark, providing the primary concessions, said it isn't yet certain how it will be paid, but it doesn't seem overly worried.

Near Fiesta Mart is a Target store. But most evacuees are low on cash and are getting comfort kits that include soap, a toothbrush and other toiletries. Target won't get swarmed by displaced children in search of school supplies, either. Houston public schools require uniforms, which will help the evacuees fit in, says Houston Independent School District spokeswoman Adriana Villarreal. Businesses are lining up to donate uniforms, and Wal-Mart has pledged any school supplies necessary, Villarreal says.

Houston charter bus company Sierra Trailways owns 13 of the 650 buses contracted by the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) to transport evacuees from New Orleans to Houston. They get paid a flat fee per mile, says Sierra President Patrick Conner, which will boost revenue during a slow time of year. But it's not about the money, says Conner, who was caught in Hurricane Alicia when it hit Houston in 1983, and there was “never a question” that his company was going to help New Orleans.

“But for the grace of God, this could be us,” Conner said.

La Quinta's hotels from Texas to Arkansas were so filled that last week it phoned those who long ago booked Labor Day reservations and told them not to come because the company will not evict evacuees. Many evacuees can't afford their rooms, and the company is starting to turn to insurance companies, FEMA and the Red Cross for payment. La Quinta also faces losses from eight properties damaged and closed in New Orleans.

Like many companies, La Quinta doesn't know if it will make money or lose it in the disaster. “It's a wait-and-see thing,” spokeswoman Teresa Ferguson says. “We're more worried at this point about doing what's right. It's right to take care of our employees and our guests.”

La Quinta could well be a microcosm of the area's overall business community. It's difficult to tell which force is greater, the gain or the strain, economist Gilmer says.

DOJ_NMG_0003082

Absorbing waves of new and primarily poor people is nothing new to Houston. The city has grown by 1 million people in a decade, 100,000 a year — and 60,000 of those move in from elsewhere, 47,000 from other countries.

"It's an immigration hub from Latin America," Villarreal says, a regular challenge to the school system.

What is new, however, is Houston's role as New Orleans' knight in shining armor. The two cities have been economic rivals for decades, economist Gilmer says, and since the 1950s, Houston has been the clear winner as the energy industry concentrated into Texas with well-paid engineering jobs. The poverty rate is 28% in New Orleans, vs. 19% in Houston, according to 2000 census data compiled by the Urban Institute. Houston, less than half the size of New Orleans in the 1920s, has grown to become the nation's fourth-largest city, while New Orleans has dropped to 37th.

Gilmer predicts Hurricane Katrina will accelerate Houston's relative dominance over New Orleans as companies that relocate employees to temporary offices decide to make the moves permanent.

When a Popeyes Chicken & Biscuits franchisee in California said it could use a couple of managers and assistant managers, it wasn't long before several who were washed out of New Orleans volunteered to relocate, says CEO Ken Keymer.

Houston already has the NFL's Texans, so New Orleans doesn't have to fear the city stealing the Saints. But the Saints can't play in the Superdome, so they're considering playing home games at Louisiana State University's Tiger Stadium in Baton Rouge or San Antonio's Alamodome.

Vacuum manufacturer Oreck, with headquarters in New Orleans, is moving 100 to 150 people to Dallas, mainly executives, staff and those who process orders, says Oreck CEO Tom Oreck. Another 40, mainly from the call center, are heading for Denver.

Hunter Blanks, head of office space leasing for CB Richard Ellis' Dallas office, has been fielding preliminary inquiries from companies in New Orleans looking for temporary office space. "This is going to have a very wide impact on commercial real estate," he said.

Gardere Wynne & Sewell, a law firm that specializes in oil and petrochemical law at its Houston office, has been working to find temporary office space and spare computer equipment for New Orleans law firms. Managing partner Steve Good says he doesn't expect to take clients away from New Orleans firms, but demand for legal services related to oil and petrochemical insurance claims will jump, he said.

Low-paid service workers from New Orleans might also stay away as they find opportunity. La Quinta has bused 250 now-homeless employees to Arlington, Texas, where they're staying in a corporate-owned conference center. Corestaff, a temporary employment company with headquarters in Houston, is encouraging those who have dispersed from New Orleans to apply with them or with state unemployment offices.

The headquarters of Popeyes is in Atlanta, but its heart is in New Orleans, where the chain began in 1972, says CEO Keymer. The storm closed 250 company-owned restaurants employing 800, plus many more owned by franchisees. About 150 have reopened, but some in the flooded area might be closed a long time. The company has created a database so a New Orleans employee who surfaces with relatives in Tennessee can see if Popeyes has something available there.

Information is a scarce commodity. Keymer says he has no idea how many Popeyes restaurants are in the flood zone and destined to remain closed. The Port of Houston Authority expects to absorb cargo that will be diverted from the Port of New Orleans and the Port of South Louisiana, the largest and fifth-largest ports by ton in the USA. But Port of Houston Authority Executive Director Thomas Kornegay says he still has no clue how much extra demand to expect, nor how much extra Houston can absorb. The Houston port already handles far more capacity than it was designed for, yet it figures out how to increase volume by 10% a year anyway, Kornegay said.

"The truth of the matter is, nobody knows where it's going to go. It's a big problem," Kornegay said.

Houston engineers will be so busy fixing the damage in the gulf, they'll be diverted from oil exploration for some time, Gilmer says. Houston will be overtaxed in more ways than one. But it will emerge stronger, while "New Orleans will be out of the game," he says.

The West-Harrisons were taking in $1,000 a day at their small hotel and spa in the French quarter. In Evansville, they are trying to figure out how to start a new business.

They have no money and one change of clothes. Last week, they stopped off at the local Red Cross office looking for a little money for food and clothing. While they were waiting to see someone, five donors dropped off checks. The West-Harrisons got tired of waiting and left with nothing.

States Gear Up To Provide Jobless Benefits (USAT)

By Stephanie Armour

USA Today, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003083

Thousands of employees are finding themselves suddenly without paychecks after Hurricane Katrina. Some are rushing to get state aid while others are looking for new jobs.

Some states are reporting an increase in residents requesting benefits.

·In Louisiana, those who are not getting paid because of the hurricane can file for disaster unemployment assistance or unemployment benefits, says Ed Pratt, a spokesman with the Louisiana Department of Labor. They are eligible for up to $256 a week and can find out more at www.laworks.net or by calling 866-783-5567.

"People are applying right now. We're getting thousands," Pratt says. "We're going to go to shelters (to help people) apply."

One challenge: Many applicants no longer have mailing addresses. Between 100,000 and 300,000 people may have to re-establish mailing addresses. Officials are still working out how to handle that, but some applicants are using relatives' addresses.

· Mississippi workers are eligible for unemployment or disaster unemployment assistance of up to $210 a week. Further information is available on its website, mdes.ms.gov, or by calling 888-844-3577.

·Alabama residents are eligible for unemployment or disaster assistance and can apply through call centers. They can get up to $220 a week and can apply toll free at 866-234-5382. Evacuees from Louisiana and Mississippi who are staying in Alabama can also apply through that toll-free number: Their information will be transferred to their home state's unemployment agency.

"We're gearing up for (this) week," says Phyllis Kennedy, director of the state's Department of Industrial Relations.

Although the government reported Friday that the U.S. unemployment rate dipped to a four-year low of 4.9% in August, economists expect employment to drop this month due to jobs lost to Katrina.

"Next month, payrolls will plunge," Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. Economist at High Frequency Economics said in a recent note to clients.

Adecco, a staffing firm, is seeing a surge in applicants displaced by Katrina looking for short-term work. "We've been inundated," says Tammy Rhodes, the branch manager in Shreveport, La. Many have high-level skills, such as accounting.

Mary Gordon, 54, who left her home in Harahan, La., a suburb of New Orleans, does outside sales for commercial buildings and is now seeking a temporary job. Although still getting paid by her regular employer, she doesn't know how long that will last and has scant savings to fall back on.

"I have to have something to do, but my dream would be to go home," Gordon says.

The Lagging Poor (WP)

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

The poverty level edged up last year, to 12.7 percent -- the fourth straight annual increase. Overall median income remained flat at $44,389, down 3.8 percent from its peak in 1999. This is a robust economic recovery?

The Census Bureau's annual report on income, poverty and health insurance in the United States is not alarming -- but neither is it cheering, or even reassuring. Rather, the numbers underscore the lagging and uneven nature of the economic recovery since the 2001 recession. According to the new data, 4 million more people were living in poverty in 2004 than in 2001, and 4.6 million more people lacked health insurance.

Administration officials counsel patience, pointing to the downturn of the 1990s, when it took several years for the poverty rate to start to fall. "The last, lonely trailing indicator of the business cycle," Commerce Department official Elizabeth Anderson said of the poverty rate.

This has about it more than a whiff of wishful thinking. For one thing, the increase in poverty between 2003 and 2004 is in fact out of the ordinary; such a rise hasn't happened between the second and third years of an economic recovery since the federal government began collecting poverty data in 1960. For another, the poverty rate may be a lagging indicator, but in this case it's not lonely: See, for example, the median income of working-age households, which declined 1.2 percent.

Another ominous signal involves health insurance coverage. Although the percentage of people with coverage remained unchanged from 2003 to 2004, that masked a shift from employer-provided insurance to government coverage. The percentage of people with employer-based health insurance fell for the fourth year in a row. Most of this slack has been taken up by Medicaid, the shared federal-state health program for the poor and disabled. But with state budgets under increasing strain from Medicaid costs and with Congress poised to make cuts in the program, it's not at all certain that states will be willing or able to maintain coverage for working Americans hovering at the edge of poverty.

In the wake of this data and the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) was wise to postpone this week's planned vote to repeal the estate tax. Lawmakers need to remember in the weeks to come that this is an economic recovery that continues to leave too many Americans behind.

Russia Rejects Reporting Iran To Security Council (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0003084

By Stefan Wagstyl And Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

Russia on Monday ruled out an early decision to report the Iran nuclear controversy to the United Nations Security Council, undermining US and European efforts to build international consensus for a diplomatic reprimand this month.

A senior Kremlin official said Iran had not violated the rules of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. Its nuclear programme, he said, should continue to be dealt with at the governing board of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN's nuclear watchdog, without involving the Security Council.

Vladimir Putin, the Russian president, adopted a more cautious approach in a meeting with foreign journalists and academics. He did not exclude a future referral to New York, though not at this point, and said it would have be done "in a very precise form".

The international divisions over Iran surfaced as the US and Europe launched a diplomatic campaign to step up the diplomatic pressure on Tehran when the governing board of the IAEA meets on September 19. The IAEA has been investigating Iran's nuclear programme for the past two years without reaching a conclusion on Tehran's intentions.

Until recently European governments had been reluctant to escalate the dispute and involve the Security Council, which would raise the diplomatic stakes. But they joined the US in calling for a referral after talks between Tehran and the so-called EU3 – the UK, France and Germany – broke down last month. The talks were aimed at persuading Tehran to give up all activities related to the enrichment of uranium, which produces the fuel for nuclear reactors or atomic bombs.

The negotiations collapsed after Iran rejected a European proposal and resumed the production of uranium hexafluoride, a nuclear feedstock, at a plant in Isfahan – a process it had agreed to suspend.

European diplomats insist they would not seek economic sanctions against Iran at the UN but are looking for a Security Council statement that would encourage Tehran to resume the suspension of the Isfahan plant.

Diplomats acknowledge they face an uphill battle to win the support of Russia and China. "Both [Russia and China] are reserved and cautious at this stage and seeking to know what will happen in the Council," said a European diplomat.

The US and Europe could secure a vote at the IAEA through a simple majority. But their aim is to win a broad consensus, particularly including the support of Russia and China. The two countries are permanent members of the Security Council, with veto power, so forcing the dispute to New York without their approval could produce deadlock rather than stronger diplomatic action.

Iran Changes Tack In Nuclear Standoff (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, September 6, 2005

ISTANBUL, TURKEY - Iran's first fear about its controversial nuclear program has long been that it could provoke a US or Israeli military strike.

And a close second, until now, has been concern in Tehran that Iran could be referred to the United Nations Security Council for violations of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

But even as Western diplomats begin to step up efforts to go after Iran at the UN - canvassing began in Vienna Monday, in the wake of the latest Iran report by the UN's International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) - Iran appears to be changing tack.

Tehran is minimizing the risk of Security Council sanction, which in turn is undermining the carrot-and-stick approach used by the EU and Washington in recent years to convince Iran to end all nuclear efforts.

"To a certain extent, [Iranian officials] have lost their fear of the Security Council," says Davoud Hermidas Bavand, a professor of international law at Alameh University in Tehran. "Some even say that Iran should take the issue to the Security Council, against the IAEA," he says, because a technical issue has become "politicized."

Shortly after the hard-liner Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was sworn in as president a month ago, Iran took a long-anticipated step of breaking IAEA seals at its Isfahan plant, ending a unilateral suspension of uranium-conversion activities.

The US says those activities - which the IAEA reports have converted seven tons of raw uranium into gas that can be enriched - are aimed at producing nuclear weapons. Iran denies the charge, saying it needs nuclear power, and that its right to master nuclear fuel technology is enshrined in the NPT.

The suspension was part of an earlier deal between Iran and Britain, France, and Germany, which sought to make it permanent in August by offering modest incentives. Iran rejected the proposal, which included no guarantees from the US of safety or waiving of current sanctions, prompting the Europeans to cancel meetings set for late August.

The confidential report, released Friday, found that 2-1/2 years of "intensive inspections and investigation" have not clarified outstanding issues, and that "Iran's full transparency is indispensable and overdue."

DOJ_NMG_0003085

Still, the IAEA reported "good progress" in resolving a string of issues since 2003, and confirmed that traces of weapons-grade uranium found on centrifuge parts - held up by some US officials as evidence of a clandestine bomb effort - originated in Pakistan, as Iran has claimed.

Iran's new nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, said IAEA criticism was politically motivated, and that violations were "neither legal or technical."

"The tide of opinion in Tehran seems to have shifted," says Gary Samore, a nonproliferation official during the Clinton administration and vice president of the MacArthur Foundation in Chicago.

"Over the last two years, Iran's policy has been dominated by the desire to avoid referral to the Security Council, and Iran has been prepared to accept limits on its nuclear program in order to achieve that," says Mr. Samore, who is releasing an Iran dossier Tuesday under the auspices of the International Institute of Strategic Studies in London. "It does appear that Iran feels it's in a much stronger position."

High oil prices may give Tehran confidence that the council would not jeopardize the flow of Iran's petroleum into the market, says Samore. Other factors include American preoccupation with Iraq, and the decisive victory of Mr. Ahmadinejad at the polls last June.

Likely allies of Iran on the council include China and Russia, which is building a nuclear-power plant at Bushehr. Over the weekend, Russian officials made clear they saw "no reason" to send Iran to the council. Mr. Larijani is due to arrive in Pakistan Wednesday, after visits to China and India to galvanize non-Western support.

"The belief that [the US and EU] can weaken the will of this great nation with the baton of the Security Council is mistaken logic, and they are only losing their dignity," Larijani told Iranian state TV.

"Gone is the time when they could deny Iran its rights by threatening it," Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi, said on Sunday. "It is our legitimate right to have peaceful nuclear technology, and we will not give that up."

Europeans hope for a shift during talks between Ahmadinejad and other world leaders, including Russia, at the UN General Assembly in New York next week. The IAEA board of governors meets on Sept. 19 to consider the case.

"Ahmadinejad, and [Iran] in general, feels less threatened by the possibility of sanctions - they perceive they are stronger, and much more in control," says Hadi Semati, a political scientist from Tehran University, who is currently at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington. "Domestically in Iran, it's going to be very hard for anyone to come out and say: 'OK, we're going to get rid of our [nuclear] fuel cycle' to get a few promises. That is political suicide.

"They know the Europeans are terrified to take Iran to the Security Council, because then the question is: 'What next?' " says Mr. Semati. And "down the line, [they feel] the US is bent on regime change anyway, even if it's not declared policy - so why bother?"

But such conclusions in Tehran are a high-stakes gamble, as is likely to be any Security Council response. Numerous safeguard violations over the past 20 years means that "until Iran restores confidence in its nuclear program, it should accept limits on activities that are dual use, and have military applications," says Samore. "There is a very strong legal case, [but] Council members are going to be very reluctant to impose significant sanctions on Iran."

A tough stance could prompt Iran to relaunch uranium enrichment, kick out inspectors, or - as some hard-liners have demanded - pull Iran out of the NPT.

"I think the council will react very cautiously, very incrementally," adds Samore. "It will take time, but there is no urgency. Iran is still a couple of years from having a nuclear-weapons capability, and there are some pretty significant technical problems."

Palestinian Forces Tour Evacuated Area (USAT)

USA Today, September 6, 2005

Palestinian security forces on Monday got their first look at Jewish settlements razed during Israel's withdrawal from Gaza. They toured the area before the formal hand-over in mid-September. The tour of the settlements in southern Gaza by Palestinian commanders and Israeli military officials was the first time Palestinian officials had been allowed into the communities. Israel removed all 8,500 settlers from Gaza last month.

International mediator James Wolfensohn has been meeting with both sides on unresolved issues, including who will control Gaza's border with Egypt. Israel wants some control over the border to prevent arms from being smuggled into Gaza and used against its people.

9 killed in Austrian ski resort accident

Nine Germans were killed when a helicopter dropped a 1,500-pound chunk of concrete on a cable carrying gondolas at the Soelden ski resort near Innsbruck, Austria.

Police official Edelbert Kohler said the helicopter was carrying material to a mountaintop construction site when it dropped the block, knocking one car off its wires and leaving others swinging so violently that their passengers were thrown out.

DOJ_NMG_0003086

Up to 10 people had been seriously injured, according to the Red Cross.

Nuclear sub collides with ship in Gulf

The nuclear submarine USS Philadelphia, traveling on the surface in the Persian Gulf, collided with a Turkish cargo ship, but no one was hurt, and damage was minor, the 5th Fleet headquarters in Bahrain said. It was the U.S. Navy's second collision with a civilian vessel in the Gulf in 14 months.

Cmdr. Jeffrey Breslau said damage to the sub was “superficial.” He said the Turkish ship Yaso Aysen suffered minor damage to its hull. It was not known which vessel was at fault.

Afghan, U.S. forces kill suspected militants

Two hundred Afghan police, supported by U.S.-led coalition forces, killed 13 suspected Taliban fighters and detained 44 in a bid to curb militancy before elections Sept. 18, Kandahar Gov. Asadullah Khalid said. He said coalition and government forces suffered no casualties in the fighting Sunday in Kandahar province.

Congo hosts conference on saving apes

Governments and conservationists opened a week of talks in Congo's capital, Kinshasa, to study ways to save endangered apes from extinction. Great apes — gorillas, chimpanzees and orangutans — are threatened by logging, poaching and conflict worldwide. There are about 400,000 left in Africa and Asia, according to the United Nations. Representatives of 23 governments — most of them in Africa, plus Indonesia and Malaysia — are attending the meeting.

Egypt Vows To Build A Palestinian Gaza (WT)

By John Phillips

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

CAIRO -- Egyptian Prime Minister Ahmed Nazif has pledged to help make the Gaza Strip the foundation of a Palestinian state "in every sense" and urged other countries to join Cairo in the push for Middle East peace.

"If we want Gaza to be the basis for a new Palestinian state long term, we have to provide [the residents] with homes and jobs, with security," Mr. Nazif told The Washington Times.

"A lot of effort has to go into rebuilding the infrastructure, not just in the political but in the economic sense."

Mr. Nazif said Cairo will make sure that Gaza has access to the outside world through Egyptian seaports and airports "to prevent the strip of territory being a prison" for its residents.

Egypt, which holds a presidential election tomorrow, also will provide technical support to develop the banking structure, the prime minister said Sunday during an interview at the high-rise office he maintains in a booming technology zone on the edge of the capital.

Egypt will use its knowledge of the Gaza Strip, which was once administered by Cairo, to develop economic assistance, he added. At the same time, it will press the Palestinians "to ensure that the Israelis don't see [Gaza] as a place for attacking them."

"Gaza has to be the beginning of a real state in every sense," Mr. Nazif said.

Other nations should support Egypt's efforts in the region, said the prime minister, 52, who has been credited with bringing a more dynamic style to Egypt's government since his appointment by President Hosni Mubarak last year.

"We have been actively seeking the resolution of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict in the past year and a half. We were almost working alone," he said.

"It culminated in the Sharm el Sheik meeting [between Israeli and Palestinian leaders], which had a calming-down role. ... We have been able to build the bridges that were required."

But now, Mr. Nazif said, "this will have to be followed by others to support and sustain these political gains."

Egypt and Israel have agreed that Israel will withdraw its troops from the Gaza-Egypt border -- to be replaced by 750 Egyptian troops charged with preventing arms smuggling into Gaza.

The Israeli Defense Ministry said yesterday that the Egyptians would begin taking up positions along the border in the coming days.

The forces are to patrol along a volatile corridor on the Gaza side of the border, where Israeli-Palestinian fighting has been particularly intense because of the arms smuggling.

Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas said yesterday that he and the Israelis remain at odds over other details of the border arrangement, but he hoped to conclude a deal "very soon."

The crossing into Egypt is the Gazans' most important link to the outside world. The Palestinians say free passage to Egypt will be essential for reviving the territory's economy after a 38-year occupation. But Israel wants to maintain some control over the border, fearing weapons could be smuggled into Gaza.

Mr. Nazif dismissed speculation that Egypt could become involved in a power struggle in Gaza between the Palestinian Authority and the hard-line Hamas movement, which some Egyptian journalists have idolized.

DOJ_NMG_0003087

"I believe that if you ask the average Egyptian today he would support the moderate [Palestinian] factions," the prime minister said.

"You can't leave any faction out. It is important that the Palestinian security forces are organized and are not some kind of militia. The Palestinians understand that. We should not underestimate them."

Egyptian security forces, meanwhile, have concluded an investigation into the July 22 bombings at Sharm el Sheik resort, which killed 56 persons, and have excluded outside involvement in the attack.

"We know who did it, and that takes us a long way to knowing how to prevent it happening again," Mr. Nazif said.

Tourism to Egypt's constellation of dazzling Red Sea and Mediterranean resorts will continue to expand notwithstanding sporadic terrorist attacks, he predicted.

Mr. Nazif said Mr. Mubarak's pledge to achieve 4.5 million jobs over the next six years is feasible given Egypt's oil and gas resources, tourist attractions and economic reforms to encourage investment by cutting taxation and customs duties.

"We have computed that 1 million tourists creates 200,000 jobs a year. We are attracting 1 million more tourists a year. We have started to create a business environment in Egypt [that is] supportive of investment," he said.

Voters Reverse Islamists' Rise In Pakistani Politics (CSM)

By Ashraf Khan

The Christian Science Monitor, September 6, 2005

KARACHI, PAKISTAN - Voters in Pakistan have dealt a surprising blow to religious extremists, bucking the rise in recent years of radical Islam in politics here.

Countrywide elections for local governments, which were held on August 18 and 25 in over 100 districts, reversed the gains made by radical Islamists who came to power in two out of the country's four provinces in 2002. They had played a strong opposition role in the federal parliament and posed a formidable challenge to President Pervez Musharraf's vow to bring "enlightened moderation" to Pakistani society.

The absence of full elections at the federal level has enhanced the importance of Pakistan's local and city government as a political bellwether. Observers here point to a number of reasons for the poor showing for the religious parties, including internal divisions; changes to the ballot; as well as a cooling off of tensions caused by the government's reorientation following Sept. 11, 2001.

"It apparently seems that the establishment has laid their hands off the Islamists and radicals' influence has faded all over the country," says Jaffer Ahmed, chairman of the Pakistan Study Centre at the University of Karachi. "But we can't say that their downfall has started," he hastened to add.

President Musharraf was jubilant the day after the polls closed. "Local body elections have resulted in the victory of moderates and defeat of extremists everywhere in Pakistan," he said.

The unexpected defeat of the Islamists came in the North Western Frontier Province (NWFP), which neighbors Afghanistan. The province had been ruled since 2002 by the Muttahida Majlis-e-Amal (MMA), an umbrella group of six religious parties, including the vanguard radical party Jamaat-e-Islami.

The MMA had emerged as a powerful political force in the October 2002 national elections, riding popular anger at Pakistan's support for the US ouster of the Taliban across the border in Afghanistan. The alliance also used a book as its symbol on the ballot, telling voters that the book represented the Koran, and that a vote for the MMA was a vote for Islam.

Once in office, the religious alliance continued to defy Musharraf's war on terror at home and abroad. Police began waging a Talibanesque antivice drive that included bans on music and attacks on billboard advertisements depicting women.

However, heading into the August vote, differences cropped up in the MMA and the alliance subsequently broke down on the local government level. With some distance from Sept. 11 and without the benefit of the book as its ballot symbol, the religious parties lost their majority to the Awami National Party (ANP), a secular Pashtun party.

"I am more than 100 percent satisfied, says Asfandyar Wali, chief of the ANP, which emerged as the single largest party in the province according to informal results. "We are very much able to head governments in all major cities including Peshawar [the provincial capital]."

When the MMA splintered, intriguing and odd political alliances came to the fore to win over the city governments. Jamaat-e-Islami chose to join hands with ANP, though they have diametrically opposed ideological positions with the ANP, a party formed in 1986 by the merger of several left-leaning parties.

"These are the dynamics of the politics and these are only election alliances not an ideological merger," says Mr. Wali, who pledged to carry on a secular vision of government in the cities.

Waning influence of Islamists, who have given way to secular and moderate parties, makes many believe the wave of fundamentalism could be forestalled effectively in the frontier province and at the polls in the next national elections in 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0003088

But the MMA could yet regroup, especially if outside engagement with Pakistan wanes, says Mr. Ahmed. "It would all depend on the US and Western countries' attitude towards Pakistan, whose role seems to be diminishing now for them," he says.

After New Talks, India Says It May Pull Troops From Kashmir (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

NEW DELHI, Sept. 5 - India will pull back troops from the disputed territory of Kashmir if militant infiltration and violence ends, the prime minister's office announced Monday evening after a rare meeting with Kashmiri separatists.

The meeting, between Prime Minister Manmohan Singh and the All Parties Hurriyat Conference, a coalition of moderate separatists from Kashmir, came barely a week before the leaders of India and Pakistan are to meet during a United Nations General Assembly session in New York. Pakistan has expressed growing frustration with what it calls New Delhi's reluctance to tackle the problem of Kashmir.

The region is the only Muslim-majority state in Hindu-dominated India, and it is at the heart of a half-century conflict between the two South Asian neighbors. Since 1989 Kashmir has been roiled by an anti-Indian insurgency that India blames Pakistan for, and that Pakistan says it supports only by moral and political means. The Hurriyat leaders recently met with President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan.

In the statement, the prime minister's office said it would also review the cases of all those held under special preventive detention in Kashmir and take steps to "safeguard against human rights violations."

The most far-reaching pledge was on pulling out troops, whose presence across Kashmir is an enduring source of anger and alienation among many Kashmiris.

"The prime minister said that if there is a cessation of violence and an end to infiltration, conditions will be created for the reduction of armed forces," the statement read. "It was agreed that the only way forward is to ensure that all forms of violence at all levels should come to an end."

In an interview with the private New Delhi television station NDTV, the leader of the separatist coalition, Mirwaiz Umar Farooq, heralded the talks as the start of a credible conversation. "For first time, there seems to be a realization in Delhi that we need to have a solution in Kashmir, an honorable solution," he said. "It was definitely a very good beginning."

Insurgency May Not Be Based On Islamic Militancy (WT)

By Shaikh Azizur Rahman

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

NEW DELHI -- The killing last month of a Hindu militant and the arrests of two others are raising doubts about the government's assertion that the bloody insurgency in Kashmir is being fought simply in the interests of Islamic militancy.

Indian forces killed Uttam Singh, 23, and three Muslim jihadis on Aug. 19. The night-long gunbattle came during an attempt by a group of militants to kill or abduct an Indian Muslim soldier from his house in the border region of Kashmir. Police later discovered that Mr. Singh, alias Saifullah, was one of two Hindu sector commanders in Hizbul-Kashmir, a rebel group that seeks to include all of Kashmir in Pakistan.

Police said that five years ago, Mr. Singh crossed into Pakistan, where he was trained in the use of arms and explosives. In 2003, he returned to India and was made commander of his group in Kashmir's southern Doda region, leading about 120 militants, including seven Hindus.

Just three days after his death, police announced the capture in New Delhi of Virender Singh, a 25-year-old Hindu. Police said he was a Hizbul operative in charge of supplying arms and funds to his jihadi colleagues on missions across the country.

On Aug. 24, Hindu Hizbul militant Chattar Singh was arrested in Doda while carrying a pistol and grenades.

A senior officer at the Defense Ministry in New Delhi subsequently acknowledged that four other Hindu militants had been killed fighting alongside the Kashmiri jihadis in the past three years.

However, he would not accept the notion they might have been willing combatants.

"We have information that about a dozen Hindu militants are still active in Kashmir. We believe they were all forced to join militancy at gunpoint," the officer said.

"Being Hindus, they could never subscribe to the religious or political faith of the jihadis who are fighting for Kashmir's separation from Hindu-majority India."

At least 45,000 people have died in a struggle that India's Hindu political leaders say is purely religious in nature, but that many former and present militant leaders describe as political.

DOJ_NMG_0003089

"Fifteen years ago -- when we started the movement against Indian occupation in Kashmir -- during curfew, our cadres carried rice and vegetables first to the Hindus in Srinagar, before Muslims got them," said Yasin Malik, chairman of the Jammu and Kashmir Liberation Front, the first militant group to fight New Delhi's rule in the region.

Some 125,000 people have fled the Kashmir Valley since the insurgency began in 1989, but Mr. Malik said that "more than 6,000 Muslim families, too, ran away from the valley fearing the guns of the militants. Falsely, we were branded communal and anti-Hindu."

Shakeel Wani, a former Hizbul militant who lost an eye while training at a camp in Pakistan and now sells fruits in Srinagar, said that at least 100 Hindu Kashmiri boys had fought alongside the Muslim jihadis.

"They embraced Islam and touched the Koran before they touched an AK-47 [rifle]. You cannot call them Hindus anymore. Despite being Hindu, on jihadi missions here often they fight more fiercely than their Muslim counterparts, probably to prove their loyalty," he said.

Suresh Yadav, an Indian Border Security Force battalion commander who served in Kashmir for three years, said poverty -- caused in part by the insurgency itself -- was the key factor behind young Hindus joining the militants.

"Hindu boys from poverty-stricken families in the border districts have joined the Islamic rebel groups who offer good [pay] packages to them while they fight, and also to their families in case of their deaths," he said.

Lebanon's President Facing Growing Pressure To Resign (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Sept. 5 - Pressure has been mounting in recent days for the resignation of President Émile Lahoud, who has clung to office even as his Syrian backers have been forced to withdraw from the country.

Lebanon's recently elected prime minister and his cabinet are avoiding Mr. Lahoud, and his influence is hard to detect in most government offices.

He keeps a low profile, rarely making public appearances or giving interviews. But as hard as he may try to remain out of sight, he has been on many minds here in recent days, as Lebanese have taken to predicting his imminent political demise.

Things appeared to come crashing down on Mr. Lahoud last week, when four senior security men, including his current head of security, Mustafa Hamdan, were cited as suspects by a United Nations investigation into the assassination of a former prime minister, Rafik Hariri.

"It is all but sure now that he will have to step down - the question is when," said Fares Boueiz, a lawyer who is a former minister of foreign affairs and the environment. "The man is no longer able to rule the country, and I don't think this can last another two months."

The suspects - Jamil al-Sayyed, former chief of general security; Ali Hajj, former chief of the Lebanese police; Raymond Azar, a former military intelligence chief; and Mr. Hamdan - were charged with murder, attempted murder and carrying out a terrorist act. The men, once feared as Syria's proxies in Lebanon, faced formal proceedings before a Lebanese investigative judge over the weekend.

Mr. Lahoud is not a formal suspect in the investigation, for which a report is expected to be issued next month, and has been cooperating with investigators, Detlev Mehlis, the chief United Nations investigator, said last week. But Mr. Lahoud's close ties to the suspects and his unusual step of arguing Mr. Hamdan's innocence with the investigators only deepened the suspicion of him.

"They are the president's men, his collaborators, and even though they are not indicted yet, Lahoud is politically isolated," said Nawaf Salam, professor of political science at the American University in Beirut. "The closer we are to the date of the release of Mehlis's report, the more isolated Lahoud will become."

In a defiant statement last week, Mr. Lahoud insisted that he intended to complete his term in office, which ends in 2007. "I will continue to fulfill my responsibilities to safeguard the Constitution, Lebanese laws and the integrity of Lebanese territory," the statement said.

Mr. Lahoud served under the nationalist general Michel Aoun during the final years of the civil war of the 1970's and 80's, then crossed over into Syrian-controlled west Beirut when the war ended, breaking with General Aoun. Mr. Lahoud made his name by uniting and leading the Lebanese Army for almost a decade, then ran for the presidency and won in 1998. His popularity reached a nadir, though, when Syria helped force through a constitutional amendment extending his term last September, which became a touchstone for the political turbulence of the past year.

So far, he has survived thanks to the same force that has kept most other Lebanese bosses in power: sectarianism. He has appealed to fellow Christians who may despise his politics, but would hesitate to bring down one of their own. Earlier pressure to oust him failed because Cardinal Nasrallah Sfeir, the influential Maronite prelate, intervened and because of international pressure on the government not to do anything that would destabilize the country.

DOJ_NMG_0003090

But much has changed. The government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora has sought to prove its mettle and build legitimacy, encouraging Lebanon's judiciary to take a leading role in the investigation of Mr. Hariri's killing.

The formal charges placed against the four men on Thursday sent another significant message.

"Pointing to the security chiefs as suspects may have put Lebanon on the track of stability and ended the cycle of assassinations and explosions," said Mr. Salam, the American University professor. "Now people realize that they are held accountable for any act of terror they might commit."

Many government figures have begun publicly demanding Mr. Lahoud's resignation.

"These are the people who worked for Mr. Lahoud," said Nayla Mouawad, minister of social affairs.

Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the leader of the militant Hezbollah organization and a traditional ally of Mr. Lahoud who had opposed his ouster, acknowledged over the weekend that the president was in an "uncomfortable" position.

Perhaps the biggest factor standing in the way of Mr. Lahoud's ouster is the difficulty of impeaching him. The Lebanese Constitution has little mechanism for impeachment, short of treason. Legal experts say the only way to remove Mr. Lahoud would be through a constitutional amendment.

With a requirement since the settlement at the end of the civil war that the president be a Christian, there is also the problem of a lack of an acceptable alternative to Mr. Lahoud. While many Christian figures have expressed interest in the job, none has the consensus or voting base to take over. Walid Jumblatt and Saad Hariri, son of the assassinated former prime minister, lead the largest voting bloc in Parliament, and are determined to keep General Aoun, who returned from 15 years of exile to a substantial victory in the parliamentary election, out of that position. Christian leaders, meanwhile, are determined that they will not allow the ruling bloc to dictate to them.

"What is keeping him right now is the lack of an agreement between the different powers controlling Lebanon," Nawaf Kabbara, professor of political science at Balamand University in Beirut, said of Mr. Lahoud. "But such an agreement will be reached by the time Mehlis releases his report."

Business Chiefs Give Blunt Warning On Doha Talks (FT)

By Alan Beattie

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

The Doha round of global trade talks may be “on the verge of failure”, an association of global business leaders warns on Tuesday.

A blunt statement from six business associations, including the US Business Roundtable, an association of chief executives of leading corporations, says delay in the agricultural talks is holding up progress in goods and services liberalisation, which is economically far more significant.

“Only a few months remain for World Trade Organisation member governments to save the Doha development agenda,” the statement says. “The great hopes for global economic growth and development promised by this trade round are now at serious risk.”

The warning comes as the WTO returns to work after its summer break, with four months remaining before December's ministerial meeting in Hong Kong. Progress in the talks has been slow. Pascal Lamy, the WTO's new director-general, said last week the director-general “does not have a magic wand” to conjure up a deal.

Without a significant breakthrough in the agricultural talks and, particularly, a commitment from the EU and US to cut farm tariffs rather than the lesser goal of ending export subsidies, the big emerging markets such as India and Brazil are unlikely to agree radical liberalisation of their goods and services markets.

In August, for example, India announced a more ambitious offer to liberalise its service industries, making it easier for foreign architects and life insurers, among others, to set up in India. But officials stressed the offer would merely legally bind the liberalisation the government had already carried out unilaterally rather than allowing fresh business opportunities.

Tuesday's statement says goods tariffs should be cut to zero in sectors where industry demands it. But that request has been rejected by India, which maintains significant tariffs on many of its manufactured imports.

The statement is signed by the Japanese Nippon Keidanren, the European Round Table of Industrialists and by business associations in Australia, Mexico and Canada. Businesses have been accused of directing too much of their lobbying effort into bilateral and regional trade deals rather than into the WTO talks.

Peter Mandelson, trade commissioner, recently complained of a lack of business support for the Doha round.

Guy Sebban, secretary-general of the International Chamber of Commerce, told the FT last week that governments, not businesses, had led the drive towards bilateral deals. ”The sum of all bilaterals is nothing like as good as a far-reaching multilateral deal." Harold McGraw, CEO of publisher McGraw-Hill and chairman of the Business Roundtable's trade task force, said: "It is vital that WTO members not lower expectations."

DOJ_NMG_0003091

www.trade.businessroundtable.org.

EU And China Near Textile Deal (FT)

By Ben Hall And George Parker

Financial Times, September 6, 2005

China and the European Commission struck an eleventh-hour agreement on Monday to end their dispute about imports of cheap Chinese textiles, but EU member states have yet to approve it.

After marathon talks in Beijing stretching into the early hours of Monday morning, Peter Mandelson, EU trade commissioner, and Bo Xilai, his Chinese counterpart, agreed to release Chinese garments impounded at Europe's ports "as soon as possible".

Mr Mandelson said the two sides had agreed to "sensible, reasonable, burden-sharing" regarding the fate of 77m Chinese sweaters, trousers and bras impounded at the EU's borders.

The Commission proposes to wave through half of the impounded garments. China accepted that the rest would be deducted either from its 2006 textile quota, or switched to other unfilled-quota categories.

The decision marked a softening of China's stance. Trade officials from the EU's 25 member states will on Tuesday consider whether it goes far enough.

Mr Mandelson hopes the agreement will be approved by EU textile producing countries such as France, Spain and Italy, even though it means allowing into the shops 38m unlicensed Chinese garments, ordered by retailers "in good faith" but which fell foul of quotas agreed on June 10.

The EU has already allowed in 135m Chinese pullovers given import licences in a frenetic period between June 10 and July 12, when the new quotas came into force. The agreed pullover quota for 2005 was 69m.

The textile dispute overshadowed an EU-China summit in Beijing, where Tony Blair, who holds the rotating EU presidency, argued the west should welcome China's economic rise.

After talks with Hu Jintao, China's president, and Wen Jiabao, Chinese premier, Mr Blair said further trade liberalisation was inevitable and that Europe should see China's booming economy as an opportunity not a threat.

"There is of course a case for managing change," the prime minister said. "What there is not a case for is resisting change."

Mr Blair and his Chinese counterparts characterised the textiles dispute as a minor irritant in a flourishing EU-China relationship.

But it reflects Europe's difficulty in developing deeper political ties with the emerging superpower, notwithstanding an agreement to co-operate more closely on climate change reached yesterday.

Mr Mandelson, who resisted reintroduction of quotas on China in June, said that this time the EU needed to take greater care in managing the textile quotas and would have to step up contact with importers and producers. The measures were aimed at "smoothing a transition to a period when there are no quotas at all". Sir Digby Jones, director general of UK employers organisation the CBI, said borrowing from next year's quota to satisfy consumer demand was no long-term solution.

"The real answer is to allow access to the EU for goods produced in China and for EU producers to adapt to the competitive challenge," he said. "Quotas, agreed or otherwise, are not the way for the developed world to deal with globalisation."

EU Eases Quotas On China Trade, Breaking Logjam (WSJ)

By Andrew Browne, Federica Bianchi, Juliane Von Reppert-Bismarck And Marc Champion

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

China and the European Union reached an agreement to end a trade spat yesterday that had left millions of Chinese-made sweaters, bras and trousers stranded at European ports, threatening to sour a meeting of Chinese and European leaders in Beijing.

Both sides hailed the textile accord, which still needs the approval of EU member countries, as a fair compromise.

Tensions over the textiles have been an embarrassment to the EU, which has been courting China as a trade partner and rising strategic power. The standoff also was a setback for the top EU trade official, Peter Mandelson, after a quota system he championed in June to hold back a surge in Chinese textiles ended up creating chaos at European ports and causing division in the 25-nation EU. European importers had rushed to beat deadlines resulting from the June agreement, and in a matter of weeks the annual allotments filled up, leaving the excess clogging European docks.

DOJ_NMG_0003092

Under the June quota system, growth in 10 categories of goods was capped at between 8% and 12.5% until 2008. Now, under yesterday's deal, Europe will ease quotas to admit half of the surplus. China agreed for the remaining half to be deducted from next year's quotas, or from quotas for other types of textiles, said Simon Fraser, a senior aide to Mr. Mandelson. China also agreed not to issue any more export licenses for textiles that have exceeded their European quota, the official said.

EU officials and diplomats expect European governments to approve the agreement today.

"The result was fair and equitable for both sides," Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao said at a news conference after the summit, which focused on issues such as the environment and security as well as trade.

The U.S. also is bogged down in a trade dispute with China over its textile exports, which have rocketed since the demise of a global quota system in January. Just last week, Chinese and U.S. negotiators failed to reach agreement on a comprehensive plan to restrain the overall growth of Chinese textile exports to replace piecemeal U.S. curbs, most recently on bras and synthetic fabric.

Industry analysts said the EU agreement didn't presage a similar breakthrough with the U.S. "They're completely separate," said Paul MacKenzie, head of consumer research at Hong Kong-based CLSA Asia-Pacific Markets. He said the EU deal was aimed at resolving a particular mess that both sides had created by failing to put in place a system to monitor textile trade volumes that is transparent enough to show the rate at which quotas were filling up.

However, Chinese Commerce Minister Bo Xilai, at a separate news conference with Mr. Mandelson after the summit wrapped up, said he expected a textile deal with the U.S. "quite soon." He complimented his EU counterpart, saying that in comparison with U.S. officials, "Mr. Mandelson was more active."

Yesterday's agreement was clinched just in time to lift a cloud over a China-EU summit attended by José Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission, and Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, which holds the six-month rotational EU presidency. The textile row had become a test of the strength of the EU-China relationship and the ability of both sides to handle even more contentious issues, like whether to lift a ban on EU arms exports to China.

As he sought to extricate the EU from its predicament, Mr. Mandelson was caught in the crossfire between retailers in countries like Britain and Sweden, anxious to stock their shelves before winter with Chinese-made warm clothes, and producers in countries like France, Italy and Spain who fear inexpensive Chinese imports will devastate their industry.

Chinese industry players welcomed the EU agreement, which focuses on unblocking 48 million sweaters, 18 million trousers and more than 11 million Chinese-made brassieres.

"It may save losses and mend reputation for both Chinese and European companies," said Cao Xinyu, vice chairman of the China Chamber of Commerce for the Import and Export of Textiles. Mr. Cao said he was confident the standoff was a one-time problem caused by poor implementation of the quota agreement.

European textile producers were less pleased. "This deal has been reached at the expense of industry," said Francesco Marchi, legal adviser at European textile-maker lobby Euratex in Brussels. Admitting half the surplus is "a free gift," he added, "and there is no compensation at all for us."

The EU looks to China as a huge market for its exports. China overtook Japan to become the EU's second largest trading partner in 2003, behind the U.S., and Mr. Blair is just the latest in a string of major European leaders -- including French President Jacques Chirac and German Chancellor Gerhard Schröder last year -- to visit China at the head of a large business delegation in search of contracts.

Unlike Washington, the EU has no significant military presence or ambitions in the Far East or Pacific Ocean, and it has no commitment to aid Taiwan in the event of its attack by Chinese forces. As a result, EU leaders -- and Mr. Chirac in particular -- have seen China as an opportunity to boost job creation in their own high-unemployment economies while at the same time building a strategic partnership not dependent on the U.S.

But this year, the budding EU-China partnership has hit speed bumps. EU leaders had planned in June to lift an embargo on arms sales to China that was imposed after the 1989 Tiananmen Square crackdown, replacing it with a code of conduct that wouldn't be specific to China. But a sharp and ill-timed Chinese declaration on Taiwan, combined with ferocious opposition to lifting the embargo from the U.S. Congress, led the U.K. to force a delay. The EU remains committed in principle to lifting the arms embargo, but with Mr. Blair setting the agenda as the EU's rotating president, the embargo is unlikely to return for debate until next year.

China Oil Firm Refines Kazakh Deal (WSJ)

By Jason Singer and Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003093

China National Petroleum Corp., which last month triumphed in a bidding war to buy a strategically important oil company with operations in neighboring Kazakhstan, is in talks to sell as much as half of the $4.18 billion acquisition to Kazakhstan's state-owned oil firm even before the first deal is closed, according to people familiar with the matter.

A deal by CNPC, as China National Petroleum is called, to sell a 33% to 50% stake in PetroKazakhstan Inc., a Canadian company with operations in the oil-rich central-Asian state, to KazMunaiGaz, the state-owned oil company, is expected to be sealed in the next few weeks, these people said. The price tag on such a deal with KMG, as the state firm is known, wasn't clear.

The move would be the latest example of a petroleum-rich country exerting more influence on its natural resources during a period of sky-high oil prices. Other oil-exporting nations, from Venezuela to Nigeria, recently have been seeking to claim a larger share of the wealth extracted from oil buried under their land. Russian authorities, too, have been trying to tighten their grip on the country's energy sector.

Kazakhstan is a nation of 15 million people on China's western border that is strategically important because of its proximity to China.

PetroKazakhstan is based in Calgary, Alberta, and analysts say it has promising stores of reserves. However, it is considered a relatively small player in the industry. Its production is estimated to be equivalent to a little more than 1% of China's daily oil needs.

PetroKazakhstan Vice President and Treasurer Jeffrey Auld said he hadn't heard anything about talks between KMG and CNPC. KazMunaiGaz declined to comment. Wang Hongtao, a spokesman for CNPC, said "there are no such talks happening."

For CNPC, selling a stake in PetroKazakhstan to the state-run company would smooth its original $4.18 billion agreement to buy the Kazakh oil assets. In the past, other Chinese firms have tried to buy assets in the oil-rich region only to be blocked by the Kazakh government, which said it wanted them.

CNPC won an auction for PetroKazakhstan in August, beating out a competing bid by a joint venture between ONGC Videsh Ltd., the international arm of India's state-controlled Oil & Natural Gas Corp., and an investment company owned by London steel tycoon Lakshmi Mittal. The losing consortium has said it is still considering making a higher counterbid.

By selling a stake in PetroKazakhstan to the state-run Kazakh firm, CNPC would remove a potential legal hurdle to its acquisition. A new Kazakh law gives the state-owned oil company an option to purchase, pre-emptively, any major oil-and-gas venture put up for sale.

Officials are debating whether the law applies to CNPC's efforts to buy PetroKazakhstan. Some argue it does apply because all of PetroKazakhstan's operations are in Kazakhstan. Others argue it doesn't apply because PetroKazakhstan is based in Canada. In either event, selling a stake to the government could appease both sides.

If it is cleared to go through, CNPC's agreement to buy PetroKazakhstan is scheduled to close in October.

It isn't clear if KMG would buy the stake from CNPC after the closing or, if an agreement can be reached earlier, KMG might pay PetroKazakhstan's shareholders directly for the holding.

It's Time To Calm Down About The China 'Threat' (WSJ)

By George Melloan

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

The Katrina disaster offered the White House a plausible reason to postpone tomorrow's planned visit from Chinese President Hu Jintao, but the delay was unfortunate. President George W. Bush needs to discuss some important issues with Mr. Hu.

The U.S. wants Mr. Hu to improve human rights, cool down the cross-strait feuding with Taiwan and do more to persuade North Korea that nuclear blackmail is a dangerous game. Mr. Bush, for his part, could try to stop spurious attacks on China for sins it hasn't committed, like currency manipulation. In America's overheated politics, there are far too many ill-informed attempts to paint China as an economic aggressor.

It would be unfortunate if U.S.-China relations, despite years of nurture, descended into a Cold War. But wars, hot and cold, are often provoked by misjudgments, misinformation or mistrust. There's plenty of all three in the current relationship. The U.S., which even China itself recognizes as the senior partner because of its economic and political power, has a global obligation to behave with sufficient maturity to reduce the danger of mischance.

Mr. Hu had planned a speech at Yale and visits to Microsoft and Boeing in Seattle as part of what was billed as a goodwill tour. These were also postponed at last report. He and Mr. Bush will meet on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly summit in New York next week. But that won't be an ideal venue for serious talks, given distractions that will include questions about the future of the scandal-ridden U.N. itself.

DOJ_NMG_0003094

The issue that has aroused U.S. politicians is whether China's economic growth and arms buildup pose a threat to U.S. interests. One of Mr. Hu's key advisers, Zheng Bijian, assures us that they don't in the lead article in the latest Foreign Affairs. He writes that China is committed to a "peaceful rise" to great power status.

Mr. Hu, at a ceremony Saturday in the Great Hall of the People commemorating the formal Japanese surrender 60 years ago, declared: "China did not seek hegemony in the past, and it will never seek hegemony in the future." This is the promise Mr. Hu will bring on his first U.S. visit as China's president to Americans fearful of Chinese aggression.

Politicians of course make promises they don't keep and this doesn't denote a fundamental change in Chinese internal politics. The ruling Communist Party Mr. Hu heads is allowing more economic policy debate internally, but it has become more rigid of late on how much political debate it will permit. The party is very much aware of the tensions building up as the greater wealth and privileges of the party elite generate resentments among the broad masses.

Chinese leaders know they can't afford U.S. enmity while they face unrest at home. China has followed the Japanese, South Korean and Taiwanese models of export-led growth, so its continued economic development, and political stability, is heavily dependent on exports. Its foreign trade now totals $851 billion, the highest in the world, Mr. Zheng points out.

Yet he also notes that despite average economic growth of 9.4% a year for the last 27 years, since it opened its doors wide to foreign investment, its economy is only one-seventh the size of the U.S. economy and only one-third the size of Japan's. It is relatively short of arable land, water and natural resources. And ". . . it will take another 45 years -- until 2050 -- before it can be called a modernized, medium-level developed country." Among the problems "is a lack of coordination between economic and social development."

That seemingly anodyne last comment actually carries a world of meaning, especially when you consider that Mr. Zheng may be voicing a major concern of China's leaders. It is quite evident to close observers that a Communist Party that has introduced private capitalism so successfully still is perplexed about how to deal with the social conflicts brought about by increased wealth. Thousands of protests and demonstrations around the country by people demanding their legal rights are broken up by the security police, sending the message that the party is above the law. Falling back on Communist ideology as a unifying force doesn't work.

The U.S. has its own problems. Mr. Bush's political opponents, frustrated by their failures, have resorted to frenzied accusations that he is guilty of everything from Hurricane Katrina to a shortage of condoms in Uganda. This frenzy is feeding on the New Orleans tragedy and what is sure to be a big fight over his Supreme Court nominees.

The self-appointed leader of the China-bashing pack is Democratic Senator Chuck Schumer of New York. He attacked China's trade "unfairness" last month in a paper that among other factual errors claimed that direct investors in China must have Chinese partners. That is no longer true and the report cards of most independent groups say that China has done well in complying with World Trade Organization rules. But in response to such agitation, the U.S. has just reversed itself on the lifting of textile quotas, re-imposing them on some Chinese apparel items.

There is risk inherent in the grandstanding of U.S. politicians on such issues, particularly ones where China is essentially blameless such as currency management or textile exports. The Chinese leadership may fail to manage a transition to more democratic rule, something they clearly aren't handling well at this point. If China falls into chaos, Chinese politicians are just as capable as their American brethren of seeking scapegoats. Given the antipathy towards the American president that has been drummed up from places like Berlin, Paris and the salons of Georgetown, what better scapegoat than George Bush?

That's why Mr. Bush and Mr. Hu need to come to a better understanding, setting aside spurious issues and dwelling on ways the two countries can cooperate to keep China on the course it desires, to become a "modernized, medium-level developed country." Mr. Bush can offer wise counsel: To do that, it will have to become more democratic.

Ukrainian Official Resigns In Protest (WT/AP)

By Natasha Lisova, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 6, 2005

KIEV -- A close aide to President Viktor Yushchenko who was a chief organizer of the "Orange Revolution" protests said yesterday he had resigned from the government because of systemic corruption around the Ukrainian leader.

Oleksandr Zinchenko, who resigned Saturday, said the situation had grown "even worse" than under former President Leonid Kuchma.

Mr. Zinchenko accused Petro Poroshenko, the head of Ukraine's Defense and Security Council, of being one of the most corrupt members of the government. He also criticized Oleksandr Tretyakov, a top aide to Mr. Yushchenko, and Mykola Martynenko, who heads the president's faction in parliament.

Mr. Poroshenko attended the press conference, which was broadcast live, and stood in the back frowning as Mr. Zinchenko spoke. When Mr. Zinchenko completed his prepared statement, lengthy applause broke out in the room.

DOJ_NMG_0003095

Mr. Zinchenko's departure as state secretary is the first major resignation since Mr. Yushchenko took office in January, after last year's bitter and prolonged campaign in this former Soviet republic.

Mr. Zinchenko said he decided to make such a "sharp public announcement" to ensure that Ukrainians and Mr. Yushchenko understood the extent of the problem. He said he had repeatedly called on Mr. Yushchenko to fire Mr. Poroshenko.

"With my resignation, I am trying to sharply convey this danger to the president and his team," Mr. Zinchenko said.

Mr. Poroshenko took the podium and said it was "the hardest day" of his life. Clearly angry, he accused Mr. Zinchenko of trying to "explode [Mr. Yushchenko's] team from the inside" and challenged him to find evidence to back up his charges.

"He didn't look in my eyes the entire time he was reading his statement," Mr. Poroshenko said of his former ally.

Mr. Zinchenko, who had served as deputy speaker of parliament, was initially aligned with Mr. Kuchma. He was a senior party official in the Ukrainian Socialist Party (United), headed by Mr. Kuchma's former chief of staff, Viktor Medvedchuk.

Experts Find Reduced Effects Of Chernobyl (NYT)

By Elisabeth Rosenthal, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 6, 2005

ROME, Sept. 5 - Nearly 20 years after the huge accident at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant in Ukraine, a new scientific report has found that its aftereffects on health and the environment have not proved as dire as scientists had predicted.

The report was prepared by a panel of more than 100 experts convened by United Nations agencies.

It says huge compensation programs for people in the Chernobyl region have become "a major barrier to the region's recovery," both by creating a culture of dependency and by soaking up a high percentage of the region's resources. It recommends that the compensation programs be cut back.

The report, "Chernobyl's Legacy: Health, Environmental and Socio-Economic Impacts," says 4,000 deaths will probably be attributable to the accident ultimately - compared with the tens of thousands predicted at the time of the accident.

Only 50 deaths - all among the reactor staff and emergency workers - can be directly attributed to acute radiation exposure after Chernobyl's Reactor No. 4 exploded in April 1986, the panel found. The rest will be from cancer at a higher rate than would otherwise be expected in people exposed to radiation near Chernobyl in the wake of the accident.

But for millions of people who were subjected to low levels of radioactive particles spread by the wind, health effects have proved generally minimal, the report found.

The powerful explosion that rocked Chernobyl sent chunks of the reactor core into the surrounding fields and clouds of radioactive particles into the air. The fire burned for 10 days and released radioactive particles that were carried by the wind to large rural swaths of what was then the Soviet Union. The particles settled in human bodies and homes and contaminated fields, forests and livestock.

The report acknowledged that there was a core of people, probably 100,000 to 200,000, who continued to be severely affected by the disaster.

But seven million people in what are now Russia, Ukraine and Belarus still receive some kind of Chernobyl benefits, from monthly stipends to university entrance preference to therapeutic annual vacations. In Ukraine, the number of people designated as permanently disabled by the Chernobyl accident (and their children) increased from 200 in 1991 to 64,500 in 1997 and 91,219 in 2001 - even though the effects of radiation decline over time, the report noted. Both Ukraine and Belarus still spend about 5 percent of their annual budgets on Chernobyl victims.

The panel found that contrary to previous forecasts, there had been no observed rise in the incidence of leukemia, a blood cancer widely associated with radiation exposure - except for a small increase among workers who were in the contaminated plant. Nor has there been the expected detectable decrease in fertility or increase in birth defects.

Indeed, the report concludes that "the largest public health problem unleashed by the accident" is "the mental health impact." Residents of the region, who view themselves as victims of a tragedy they poorly understand, are still haunted by anxiety that has prevented many from restarting their lives.

In the immediate aftermath of the disaster, the Soviet Union declared an 18-mile "exclusion zone" around the reactor, which still exists, and resettled hundreds of thousands of people. Agriculture was forbidden in contaminated areas, as was the collection of forest products like berries and mushrooms. A host of compensation schemes were established.

"People have developed a paralyzing fatalism because they think they are at much higher risk than they are, so that leads to things like drug and alcohol use, and unprotected sex and unemployment," said Dr. Fred A. Mettler, leader of the team analyzing health effects for the Chernobyl Forum, a research group comprising United Nations agencies and representatives of affected countries.

The only concrete health impact in the region has been thyroid cancer in people who were young at the time of the accident and drank contaminated milk from cows that ate grass contaminated with radioactive iodine dispersed during by the accident. Radioactive iodine, which is short-lived, concentrates in the thyroid gland. Because the disease is generally treatable, only 9 of the 2,000 who have come down with the disease have died.

DOJ_NMG_0003096

Other than the thyroid cancer cases, other cancers and adverse health effects, when they occur, may be particularly difficult to link to the Chernobyl accident, because life expectancy dropped dramatically in the region after the fall of the Soviet Union. "The effect may be difficult to detect against the background noise," Dr. Mettler said.

"Early on, there were all sorts of claims being made because people didn't have much accurate information," said Dr. Mettler, a University of New Mexico expert on the effects of radiation exposure. "Now, at last, we have the eight U.N. agencies and the three governments involved coming to a consensus about the effects and what needs to be done."

Although five million people live in areas still classified as contaminated by Chernobyl, a vast majority are exposed to very low doses of radiation, the study found, with levels no higher than in large areas of China, Brazil or Britain, where naturally occurring background radiation in soil is relatively high.

"People were evacuated from areas that now have dose levels lower than where I live in New Mexico," Dr. Mettler said.

Although there is still a strong stigma against growing or eating agricultural products from anywhere in the area, concentrations of radioactivity "in agricultural food products produced in areas affected by the Chernobyl fallout are generally below national and international action levels," the report found.

Those who continue to be affected by the accident include poor rural dwellers who live in the few severely contaminated areas, those with thyroid cancer and those who were resettled after the disaster but who had never found a new life or employment in their new communities.

"A small but important minority, those caught in the downward spiral, need substantial material assistance to rebuild their lives," the report said. But for the millions of others designated as victims, it said, the priority should be to encourage self-reliance, providing them with realistic information about the minimal risks they face.

Noting that the collapse of the Soviet Union - and the end of Soviet-era benefit programs - worsened the poverty of the region, the researchers said its people should now be provided with incentives to develop small businesses, for example.

"The extensive system of Chernobyl-related benefits has created expectations of long-term direct financial support and entitlement to privileges, and has undermined the capacity of the individuals and communities concerned to tackle their own economic and social problems," the report concluded.

Chernobyl's Harm Was Far Less Than Predicted, U.N. Report Says (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, September 6, 2005

MOSCOW, Sept. 5 -- The long-term health and environmental impacts of the 1986 accident at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant in Ukraine, while severe, were far less catastrophic than feared, according to a major new report by eight U.N. agencies.

The governments of Ukraine, Belarus and Russia, the three countries most affected by radioactive fallout from Chernobyl, should strive to end the "paralyzing fatalism" of tens of thousands of their citizens who wrongly believe they are still at risk of an early death, according to the study released Monday.

The 600-page report found that as of the middle of this year, the accident had caused fewer than 50 deaths directly attributable to radiation, most of them among emergency workers who died in the first months after the accident. In the wake of the world's largest nuclear disaster, there were numerous predictions of mass fatalities from radiation.

The report said that nine children had died of thyroid cancer, but that the survival rate among the 4,000 children in the region who had developed thyroid cancer has been 99 percent. An expected spike in fertility problems and birth defects also failed to materialize, the study found.

"The health effects of the accident were potentially horrific, but when you add them up using validated conclusions from good science, the public health effects were not nearly as substantial as had at first been feared," Michael Repacholi, manager of the World Health Organization's radiation program, said in a statement.

U.N. scientists predicted about 4,000 eventual radiation-related deaths among 600,000 people in the affected area, including emergency workers and residents. That is consistent with predictions in the aftermath of the accident by scientists in the Soviet Union, of which Ukraine, Russia and Belarus were then a part.

But the vast majority of residents and emergency workers received relatively low doses of radiation, comparable to naturally occurring levels of exposure, the report said.

Officials said that the continued intense medical monitoring of tens of thousands of people in Ukraine, Russia and Belarus is no longer a smart use of limited resources and is, in fact, contributing to mental health problems among many residents nearly 20 years later. In Belarus and Ukraine, 5 percent to 7 percent of government spending is consumed by benefits and programs for Chernobyl victims. And in the three countries, as many as 7 million people are receiving Chernobyl-related social benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0003097

"The monitoring of people with incredibly low doses uses huge amounts of resources and does more psychological harm than good," said Fred Mettler, a professor of radiology at the University of New Mexico who chaired one of three health groups in the study, titled "Chernobyl's Legacy: Health, Environmental and Socio-Economic Impacts." The study, involving more than 100 scientists, was compiled by U.N. agencies, including the International Atomic Energy Agency, and representatives of the governments of Ukraine, Russia and Belarus.

Shortly after midnight, on April 26, 1986, after a complex chain of events at the Chernobyl plant, the water coolant vaporized and an explosion destroyed the reactor. The plant caught fire and plumes of radioactive material were released. Soviet authorities at first did not report the accident, but radioactive material was quickly detected in Scandinavian countries. Radioactive material continued to be released for another 10 days, spreading across Europe.

Over the next four years, a massive cleanup operation involving 240,000 workers ensued, and there were fears that many of these workers, called "liquidators," would suffer in subsequent years. But most emergency workers and people living in contaminated areas "received relatively low whole radiation doses, comparable to natural background levels," a report summary noted. "No evidence or likelihood of decreased fertility among the affected population has been found, nor has there been any evidence of congenital malformations."

In fact, the report said, apart from radiation-induced deaths, the "largest public health problem created by the accident" was its effect on the mental health of residents who were traumatized by their rapid relocation and the fear, still lingering, that they would almost certainly contract terminal cancer. The report said that lifestyle diseases, such as alcoholism, among affected residents posed a much greater threat than radiation exposure.

The report said that an immediate priority is to re-secure the reactor. After the disaster, a concrete sarcophagus was built over the plant, but it was hastily constructed and is showing signs of wear. "The main potential hazard of the shelter is a possible collapse of its top structures and release of radioactive dust into the environment," the report said.

David Zhania, emergencies minister in Ukraine, said last week that a new steel shelter for the plant would cost nearly $2 billion and that the country hoped to have it built by 2008 or 2009. About 28 foreign governments have already agreed to contribute more than $750 million to the project.

The report also found that except for a nearly 20-mile exclusion zone around the reactor, radiation levels have returned to acceptable levels in many areas where land had been abandoned for fear of contamination. "By radiological criteria alone a significant part of the abandoned agricultural lands (more than 70 percent) could be returned to economic use," the report said.

The abandonment of large tracts of land, combined with a ban on hunting, has led to a dramatic increase in wild animals and birds, including wolves, elk, wild boars, white-tailed eagles, owls, cranes and black storks.

"Without a permanent residency of humans for 20 years, the ecosystems around the Chernobyl site are now flourishing," the report said. "It looks like the nature park it has become."

U.N. Report Calls Chernobyl Dangers Overstated (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, September 6, 2005

A team of United Nations researchers said the health dangers from the 1986 Chernobyl nuclear accident were vastly overstated, resulting in a "paralyzing fatalism" among the 350,000 evacuees that proved to be the "largest public health problem."

The team, drawn from eight U.N. agencies, prepared the report in cooperation with the Russian Federation, Belarus and Ukraine, where the accident occurred. The results will be discussed at a special meeting in Vienna, where health experts continue to track medical and mental-health problems caused by the event.

"There are a bunch of lessons in this for the United States, for handling homeland-security events and for terrorism," said Fred Mettler, one of the researchers who prepared the report. He is a professor at the medical school at the University of New Mexico.

The Chernobyl accident spurred a mass evacuation after the nuclear reactor caught fire and began spewing a cloud of radioactive debris. The report notes that the radiation threat was vastly exaggerated and that many evacuees from the area shouldn't have been moved.

While some experts and authorities predicted tens of thousands of deaths, the report notes that so far there have been 59. An additional 3,940 victims, mainly emergency workers and people who lived close to the reactor, are expected to die prematurely as a result of cancers caused by radiation exposure.

DOJ_NMG_0003098

"This was still an horrific accident, but one of the messages here is that events like this are not totally devastating and are manageable," said Dr. Mettler. He said the radioactive doses experienced by many victims were relatively harmless, but because they were evacuated and given long-term aid and frequent medical attention, many still fear their lives will be shortened. Over the years, Dr. Mettler said, the evacuees have absorbed a lot of scarce medical resources that could have been used on more-serious public-health problems in the region.

A lot of the report's recommendations, he said, are designed to get managers of future accidents and natural disasters to focus more on "people who really do have problems and to get other people into a mode where they have more self-confidence."

The 600-page report said that almost 99% of children diagnosed with thyroid cancer after the incident survived. It found "no convincing evidence" that the incidence of leukemia rose among the population exposed to radiation in Russia and Ukraine.

DOJ_NMG_0003099

McDowell, Cynthia

From: McDowell, Cynthia
Sent: Tuesday, September 06, 2005 10:14 AM
To: Andrea Bottner; Andrew Emrich; Brad Schlozman; Brent McIntosh; Bruce Mcdonald; Carl Nichols; Carl Peed; Cheri Nolan; Clifford White; Crystal Roberts; Cybele Daley; Dan Meron; Dana Boente; Deborah Rhodes; Deborah Spagnoli; Domingo Herraiz; Donald Gambatesa; Edward McNally; Elizabeth Kessler; Greg Harris; Gregory Katsas; James Clinger; Jeffrey Bucholtz; Jeffrey Clark; Jeffrey Taylor; John Richter; Jonathan Cohn; Joseph Bianco; Kelly Johnson; Kristi Macklin; Kyle Sampson; Laura Parsky; Lily Swenson; Luis Reyes; Matthew Friedrich; Michael Battle; Monica Goodling; Neil Gorsuch; Nicholas Tzitzon; Pat O'Brien; Patrick Hofer; Patrick Philbin; Rachel Brand; Raul Yanes; Rebecca Seidel; Richard Hertling; Richard Morrison; Robert Flores; Sean McLaughlin; Sharee Freeman; Steve Bradbury; Steven McFarland; Stuart Nash; Tasia Scolinos; Theodore Ullyot; Thomas Barnett; Tracy Henke; Uttam Dhillon; Wan Kim; Alex MacLean; Andrew Ames; Andrew Beach; Angela Williamson; Asheesh Agarwal; Ben Curtis; Beth Collins Cook; Brian Cohen; Bruce Taylor; C. Kevin Marshall; Candice Chiu; Carrie Nelson; Chris Gober; Connor Flaherty; Courtney Elwood; Cynthia Magnuson; Cynthia McKnight; Deborah Underhill; Ebony Lee; Elizabeth Apisson; Eric Akers; Eric Holland; Gordon Todd; Grant Nichols; Jaclyn Lesch; James OConnell; Jan Williams; Jana White; Janet Potter; Jason Torchinsky; Jennifer Korn; Jessica Gavora; John Irving; John Nowacki; Julie Warren; Kerri Strug; Kiahna Sellers; Kimberly Smith; Lara Reynolds; Laura Keehner; Lindsey de la Torre; Mark Metcalf; Mary Neumayr; Matt David; Matt Robinson; Matt Roper; Matthew Miranda; Michael Costigan; Miriam Moore; Molly Donlin; Natalie Voris; Neal Jungeblut; Omar Vargas; Patrick McArthur; Payson Peabody; Price Roe; Raquel Sours; Rena Comisac; Ryan Bounds; Sandra Malloy; Shane Chambers; Theodore Cooperstein; Tim Racicot; Timothy Hagle; Trent Luckinbill; Tucker McNeil; Wanda Martinson; William Otis; William Woodruff
Subject: INFO: Chief Justice William Rehnquist

Dear Political Appointees,

As you may know, The Supreme Court announced Sunday that the public will be invited to pay its respects to Chief Justice Rehnquist on Tuesday and Wednesday, September 6 and 7, 2005. A brief prayer service is currently underway at the court and began at 10:00 a.m. The flag-draped coffin of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's body will lie in repose in the Great Hall of the Supreme Court from 10:30 a.m. EDT until 10:00 p.m. on Tuesday and from 10:00 a.m. until 12:00 noon on Wednesday.

Funeral services will be held on an invitation basis to friends and family on Wednesday at 2:00 p.m. at St. Matthew's Cathedral in Washington, D.C. He will be buried at Arlington National Cemetery following funeral services Wednesday. The burial at Arlington will be private.

Rehnquist was a World War II veteran, entitling him to burial at Arlington. His wife, Natalie Cornell Rehnquist, was buried there in 1991. Rehnquist's two immediate predecessors, Warren E. Burger and Earl Warren, also lay in repose in the Supreme Court building before they were laid to rest at Arlington. (The Washington Post, 9-6-05)

The DOJ Office of White House Liaison
Jan Williams, Cynthia McDowell
~

Cynthia R. McDowell
Internal Communications Coordinator
U.S. Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., Room 5317
Washington, D.C. 20530
Tel: (202) 514-9376, Fax: (202) 514-3546

McKenzie, Peggy (CIV)

From:	McKenzie, Peggy (CIV)
Sent:	Tuesday, September 6, 2005 2:03 PM
To:	/o=USDOJ/ou=CIVIL/cn=Recipients/cn=Mailboxes/cn=CLynch; Agarwal, Asheesh; Allen, Gary (CIV); Bahr, Dorothy (CIV); Baxter, Felix (CIV); Bordeaux, JoAnn (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Calvert, Chris (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Eubanks, Sharon (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Fishback, David (CIV); Fisher, Barbara (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Fowler, Liane (SMO); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Goldberg, Arthur (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gray, Towanda (CIV); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jennings, Geraldine (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keener, Donald (CIV); Kent, Alexander (CIV); Kohl, Christine (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Liner, Linda (CIV); Lloyd, Shirley (CIV); Lucas, Regina (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Miller, Charles S; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Shaw, Aloma A; Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Williams, Angela (CIV); Williams, Toni (CIV); Willis, Kerry (CIV); Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject:	9/6 CIV Weekly Report to the AG
Attachments:	CivDivWkly0906.wpd

U.S. Department of Justice

Civil Division

Assistant Attorney General Washington, D.C. 20530

September 6, 2005

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ACTING DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL

FROM: Peter D. Keisler
Assistant Attorney General
Civil Division

SUBJECT: Civil Division Weekly Report to the Attorney General

A. NEXT WEEK

- Seventh Circuit to Hold Oral Argument in Case Challenging Activities of Director of White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives
  Freedom From Religion Foundation v. Chao [7th Cir.; Western District of Wisconsin]. On September 13, the Seventh Circuit will hold oral argument in this case, in which plaintiffs allege that the Director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives and the Directors of several Agency Faith-Based Centers have violated the Establishment Clause by making speeches or sponsoring conferences that endorse religion. The district court dismissed the action because it held that plaintiffs lack taxpayer standing under Flast v. Cohen. The Department will argue that the dismissal was proper because the complaint, at its heart, challenges executive action unrelated to the administration of a congressional program authorized by the taxing and spending clause of the Constitution.

- D.C. Circuit to Hear Argument on Government's Challenge to Structural Injunction Issued in Indian Trust Funds Class Action Litigation
  Cobell v. Norton [District of Columbia Circuit; District Court for the District of Columbia]. On September 16, the D.C. Circuit (Silberman, Williams, Garland) will hear argument on the government's appeal from a structural injunction entered by the district court in the class action litigation seeking accountings of funds held in trust for individual Indians. The structural injunction purports to assume responsibility for all of the government's accounting-related activities and would require the government to spend billions of dollars to account for funds totaling $400 million. The government has asked the court of appeals to vacate the structural injunction and to reassign the case on remand to a different district judge.

B. THIS WEEK

- Oral Argument Set for September 8 in D.C. Circuit Guantanamo Detainee Cases
Al Odah v. United States; Boumediene v. Bush [District of Columbia Circuit; District Court for the District of Columbia]. In the habeas cases brought by the detainees held at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base, two district courts reached opposite results. In Al Odah, Judge Green ruled that the detainees have due process rights and that the process afforded in determining their enemy combatant status was inadequate. In Boumediene, Judge Leon held that the detainees, as aliens outside the United States, cannot invoke rights of the United States Constitution. Both orders were appealed to the District of Columbia Circuit and were briefed on an expedited basis. The cases were consolidated for argument and are now set for oral argument on September 8 before Judges Randolph, Sentelle, and Rodgers.

- Justice Department to File Reply Brief Opposing Disclosure of 9/11 Video
Bingham v. United States Department of Justice and Federal Bureau of Investigation [District of Columbia]. On Friday, September 9, defendants will file their reply brief in further support of their motion for summary judgment. Plaintiff, a private citizen, filed a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request seeking any videotapes in the possession of the Federal Bureau of Investigation that may have captured the impact of Flight 77 into the Pentagon on September 11, 2001. The Federal Bureau of Investigation withheld one videotape responsive to plaintiff's request. In consultation with the United States Attorney's Office for the Eastern District of Virginia, defendant has argued that production of this videotape, retained for law enforcement purposes, could reasonably be expected to interfere with the penalty phase of United States v. Zacarias Moussaoui (Eastern District of Virginia), and therefore should be temporarily protected from disclosure under FOIA Exemption 7(A).

C. LAST WEEK

- Ninth Circuit Rules Sexual Battery in Violation of California Law Is an Aggravated Felony
  Lisby v. Gonzales [9th Cir.]. On August 22, the Ninth Circuit held that the crime of sexual battery under California Penal Code § 243.4(a) constituted an aggravated felony offense. Focusing on the wording of the statute, which requires the intimate touching of another person while that person is under unlawful restraint, the Court determined that the offense involved a "substantial risk" that physical force against that person may be used within the meaning of a crime of violence.

- Eleventh Circuit Holds Aggravated Battery Is a Crime Involving Moral Turpitude
  Sosa-Martinez v. Gonzales [11th Cir.]. On August 22, the Eleventh Circuit upheld the Board's determination that the alien's conviction for aggravated battery was a crime involving moral turpitude. The Court held that an intentional battery that included, as an element of the offense either: (1) great bodily harm, permanent disability, or permanent disfigurement, or (2) the use of a deadly weapon, constituted a crime of moral turpitude, and dismissed the petition for lack of jurisdiction.

- Fourth Circuit Concludes Fraudulent Use of Credit Card Is Not a Theft Offense
  Soliman v. Gonzales [4th Cir.]. On August 22, the Fourth Circuit reversed the Board's holding that the alien had been convicted of a theft offense qualifying as an aggravated felony. The alien was convicted under a Virginia statute for fraudulent use of a credit card, after using someone else's credit card to obtain over $1,400 in goods or services. The Court disagreed with the Board's conclusion that the common definition of the term "theft" included fraud, and held that the Board's interpretation would render "superfluous" a separate statutory provision specifically addressing fraud, as it would transform all fraud offenses into theft offenses.

- $23 Million Collected for Mariner Health Care Fraud Settlement
  On August 22, 2005, $23 million was transferred from the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) to the Department of Justice in final settlement of the United States' fraud claims against Mariner Post-Acute Network, Inc. and its affiliates in bankruptcy. The transferred funds represent payments otherwise due to Mariner which CMS withheld in offset against our fraud claims.

- Eighth Circuit Applies the One-Year Asylum Bar and Denies Relief to Colombian Aliens
  Bernal-Rendon, et al. v. Gonzales [8th Cir.]. On August 23, the Eighth Circuit affirmed the Board's denial of asylum, withholding of removal, and protection under the Convention Against Torture. The Court declined to adopt the Ninth Circuit's position that the one-year asylum filing deadline does not apply to minors, and held that it lacked jurisdiction to review the aliens' asylum claim because they failed to file within one year of their arrival in the United States.

Moreover, although a nuclear family can constitute a particular social group for asylum purposes, the aliens failed to demonstrate persecution on that basis.

- District Court Orders Government to Submit Plan for Timely Issuance of Green Cards to Aliens Who Win Permanent Residency In Immigration Court
  Santillan v. Gonzales [Northern District California]. Plaintiffs are a nationwide class of aliens who have sued to compel the government to issue proof of lawful permanent resident status immediately upon request made by an alien with an order from an Immigration Judge granting such status. On August 24, 2005, the Court issued summary judgment for the plaintiff class. The Court rejected the government's national security-based arguments defending delays in order to run background and security checks prior to issuance of any documents. The Court ordered the government to submit, within 60 days, a proposal for timely issuance of evidence of status.

- United States Awarded Costs in Defense of Uruguay Round Agreements Act
  Golan v. Gonzales. On August 24, Chief Judge Lewis T. Babcock of the U.S. District Court for the District of Colorado awarded the government $10,767.77 in costs. The Court dismissed the case on summary judgment in April 2005, upholding the constitutionality of Section 514 of the Uruguay Round Agreements Act, which restored copyright to original works of foreign origin whose authors had previously lost their U.S. copyrights due to eligibility requirements or for failure to comply with U.S. copyright formalities.

- Second Circuit Determines That Immigration Proceedings Commence When the Charging Document Is Filed with the Immigration Court
  Arenas-Yepes v. Gonzales (2d Cir.). On August 25, the Second Circuit affirmed the Board's denial of the alien's application for suspension of deportation. The alien was served with an Order to Show Cause on March 28, 1997, but that document was never filed with the immigration court. Following the 1996 amendments to the immigration statute, the alien was served with a Notice to Appear, which was filed with the immigration court. The Court rejected the alien's claim that his proceedings began when the Order to Show Cause was served, holding that proceedings do not commence until the charging document is filed with the immigration court.

- Seventh Circuit Rejects Adverse Credibility Determination of Chinese Alien's Testimony

Chen v. Gonzales [7th Cir.]. On August 25, the Seventh Circuit reversed the Immigration Judge's denial of asylum, withholding of removal, and protection under the Convention Against Torture. The alien claimed that he had been detained and beaten on account of his activities on behalf of an unauthorized Christian church. The Court held that although significant discrepancies among different versions of an alien's statement are generally a permissible basis for an adverse credibility decision, the inconsistencies cited by the Immigration Judge were too speculative and conjectural to support that conclusion.

- Second Circuit Rules Alien Demonstrated "Extraordinary Circumstances" for Not Appearing at Hearing
  Sun v. Gonzales [2d Cir.]. On August 25, the Second Circuit held that the Board abused its discretion in denying the alien's motion to reconsider by simply citing a regulation that required appeals to be filed within a certain period of time, without acknowledging the existence of any basis on which an untimely filed appeal may be excused. The alien filed his appeal the day before the filing deadline by an overnight express delivery service, but the service did not deliver the appeal until five days after the deadline. The Court concluded that this was an extraordinary circumstance warranting reopening of his hearing.

- Eighth Circuit Affirms Denial of the Alien's Request for Withholding of Removal and for a Continuance Salkeld v. Gonzales [8th Cir.]. On August 25, the Eighth Circuit affirmed the denial of withholding of removal to a Peruvian alien who claimed that his homosexuality would subject him to persecution. The Court held that homosexuality was not penalized by the Peruvian government, that specific instances of violence toward homosexuals were relatively sporadic, and that there were locations within Peru in which homosexuals may live safely. The Court also affirmed the Immigration Judge's denial of the alien's motion for a continuance, holding that pursuant to the REAL ID Act, it had jurisdiction to consider constitutional claims and questions of law relating to the denial of the continuance, but that there was no constitutional violation as the Immigration Judge's denial of the continuance was not arbitrary.

- Federal Circuit Affirms Judgment in Government's Favor, Rejecting Regulatory Takings Claim Involving Repeal of Peanut Quota Program
  Members of Peanut Quota Holders Association, Inc. et al. v. United States (Judge Lourie, Judge Bryson, Judge Gajarsa). On August 25, 2005, the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit affirmed a decision of the United States Court of Federal Claims that granted summary judgment in favor of the government upon a regulatory takings claim. Appellants are individuals who owned farms to which peanut quotas had been allocated under farm bills, but who leased the quotas and did not produce peanuts. The Farm Security and Rural Investment Act of 2002 repealed the peanut quota program. Disagreeing with the trial court, the Federal Circuit held that appellants did possess a property interest in peanut quota allotments because the quota allotments were transferable and exclusive. The court held, however, that the peanut quota is not compensable under the Fifth Amendment because the property right was a privilege extended by Congress through statutes that were not intended to provide irrevocable benefits.

- Fourth Circuit Rejects First Amendment Challenge to Provision of Social Security Act
  United Seniors Association v. Social Security Administration [4th Cir.; Social Security Administration]. On August 25, the Fourth Circuit (Williams, Shedd, and Hamilton) affirmed the Social Security Administration's determination that certain mailing envelopes distributed by petitioner violated Section 1140 of the Social Security Act. That provision prohibits communications that use the term "Social Security" in a manner that could reasonably be construed as falsely conveying that the communication is approved, endorsed, or authorized by the SSA. The court rejected petitioner's claims that the statute is unconstitutionally vague or overbroad.

- District Court Dismisses Case Seeking To Modify A Trust Created By The United States

  Barbara King, et al. v. United States of America, Civil No. SA-04-CA-747-OG [Western District of Texas] (District Judge Orlando Garcia). On August 25, Judge Garcia dismissed plaintiff's case, which sought to modify the terms of a medical benefits trust created by the United States in settlement of a medical malpractice claim. Plaintiff, a minor, originally filed an FTCA claim in 1995, asserting severe brain injury resulting from medical malpractice by government employees. The case was settled in 1997 for a total amount of $1,310,000, of which sum $690,000 was paid into an irrevocable reversionary medical trust. In the ensuing years, plaintiff sought reimbursement from the trustee for educational and computer expenses necessary for the minor, but the request was denied by the trustee because the trust did not provide for such expenses. On May 27, 2004, plaintiff filed a petition in the Probate Court of Bexar County, Texas, seeking to modify or reinterpret the terms of the trust such that expenses for the minor's education and computer expenses would be paid from the trust. Plaintiff argued that modification of the trust was permitted pursuant to the Texas Property Code § 112.054, which permits modification of an irrevocable trust due to "changed circumstances not anticipated by the grantor." On August 20, 2004, the United States removed the case to the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Texas and then filed a motion to dismiss based on lack of subject matter jurisdiction (FRCP 12(b)(1)) and failure to state a claim (FRCP 12(b)(6)). The court assigned the motion to a magistrate judge, who agreed with both arguments, finding that it did not have jurisdiction to reopen a final settlement and, in the alternative, there was no basis in the law for modifying the clear terms of the trust agreement. The district court judge overruled plaintiffs' objection to the magistrate's recommendation finding that, while there was subject matter jurisdiction for the claim because the trust was a federal contract, the matter would be dismissed for failure to state a claim, as there was no legal basis that would permit the requested modification.

- United States Files Statement of Interest Opposing District of Columbia Hazardous Materials Transportation Act

  CSX Transportation, Inc. v. Williams [District of Columbia]. On August 26, the United States filed a Statement of Interest, an action challenging the District of Columbia Terrorism Prevention in Hazardous Materials Transportation Temporary Act of 2005 as preempted by the Federal Railroad Safety Act, 49 U.S.C. 20101, et seq., and the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act, 49 U.S.C. 5101, et seq., and as a per se violation of the Commerce Clause. The United States contends that the District of Columbia Circuit's decision in CSX Transportation, Inc. v. Williams, 406 F.3d 667 (District of Columbia Circuit 2005), reversing the district court's denial of a preliminary injunction, compels that judgment be entered in defendant CSX's favor. The District of Columbia Circuit held that it was likely that a 2003 Department of Transportation regulation covered the same subject matter as the District of Columbia Act, and that the Act did not satisfy any of the three conditions for exception from Federal Railroad Safety Act preemption. Consistent with its position that this lawsuit can be decided as a matter of law, the United States also moved on August 29 for a protective order barring all discovery propounded upon the United States.

- Seventh Circuit Rejects Board's Denial of Asylum to Ugandan National

  Nakibuka v. Gonzales [7th Cir.]. On August 26, the Seventh Circuit reversed the Board's denial of asylum and withholding of removal. The alien alleged that, as the housemaid of a politically active Ugandan family, she was tied up, beaten, and threatened with death. The Court held that because neither the Immigration Judge nor the Board considered the severity of the attack against the alien or the escalating nature of the events that followed it, the Board's decision was not supported by substantial evidence. The Court vacated and remanded the Board's decision.

- Seventh Circuit Reverses Immigration Judge's Denial Of Alien's Motion To Rescind In Absentia Removal Order
  Sabir v. Gonzales [7th Cir.]. On August 26, the Seventh Circuit ruled that the Immigration Judge properly concluded that adequate notice of the hearing had been provided, but abused his discretion in denying the alien's motion to reopen. The Court determined that the relevant question was not whether the notice was "adequate," but whether it was actually received. The Immigration Judge denied the alien's motion to reopen in the face of conclusive proof that the alien did not receive notice of his hearing.

- Court of International Trade Holds Principals Liable for Duties Unpaid as a Result of Agent's Fraudulent Customs Violations
  United States v. Pan Pacific Group (Senior Judge Goldberg). On August 26, 2005, the United States Court of International Trade granted, in part, the government's motion for partial summary judgment. Beginning in 1993, a freight forwarder, which became the importer of record for defendants and was assigned power of attorney, submitted entry documents to the Customs Service that misdescribed defendants' tracksuits as plastic bags and wooden patio furniture – classifications which carried lower duty rates and were not subject to quota restrictions. In deciding the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment, the court determined that, as a matter of law, a principal may be held liable pursuant to the fraud provisions of 19 U.S.C. § 1592 for a customs violation committed by an agent acting within its proper scope of authority. The court held that defendants are liable for unpaid customs duties, regardless of whether the principal authorized the agent's specific unlawful conduct constituting the customs violation. The court further held that disputes of material fact regarding defendants' culpability precluded it from granting summary judgment as to the amount of the penalty to be assessed.

- Court of International Trade Upholds Department of Commerce Methodology for Imposing Countervailing Duties Based Upon Findings that Private Financial Contributions were "Entrusted or Directed" by a Foreign Government
  Hynix Semiconductor Inc. v. United States (Senior Judge Goldberg). On August 26, 2005, the United States Court of International Trade upheld the Department of Commerce's methodology for imposing countervailing duties upon a South Korean semiconductor producer that received subsidies from non-government sources at the direction of the South Korean government. Commerce determined that Hynix Semiconductor had received a countervailable subsidy through a government-orchestrated bail-out of the high technology manufacturer. This is the first case to review Commerce's application of the countervailing duty law to a private restructuring "entrusted or directed" by a foreign government. While upholding Commerce's methodology, the court remanded the case to the agency for further explanation of the South Korean government's involvement in the bailout.

- Third Circuit Holds State-Created Danger Doctrine Inapplicable in Immigration Context, but Remands Case to Determine Whether Rebel Leaders Constitute "Public Officials"
  Kamara v. Attorney General [3d Cir.]. On August 29, the Third Circuit remanded the case to the Board. The alien alleged persecution if returned to Sierra Leone from both the government and the rebel organization and a violation of substantive due process under the state-created danger doctrine if returned. The Court held that the state-created danger doctrine has no place in immigration jurisprudence. It determined the Board's decision to be otherwise adequate but held that, if rebel leaders were found to be "public officials," the Board had to consider the danger to the alien from the government and from the rebel organization in the aggregate, not separately, and remanded with those instructions.

- Court of Federal Claims Awards Approximately $48 Million as Just Compensation to HUD Project Owners
  Cienega Gardens, et al. v. United States; Chancellor Manor, et al. v. United States (Judge Lettow). On August 29, 2005, the United States Court of Federal Claims issued an opinion after trial, awarding $48 million in just compensation to eight plaintiffs, in two separately captioned cases, for the temporary taking of their right to prepay their HUD-insured mortgage. The court concluded that Congress' passage of statutes in 1988 and 1990, which altered the plaintiffs' ability to prepay their mortgages and leave the HUD program, effected a temporary taking of the plaintiffs' contractual rights. The court concluded that the character of the government's action, its economic impact, and its significant interference with plaintiffs' investment backed expectations amounted to a taking. The court based the award of compensation upon a lost-rents model and awarded compound interest upon the award. The court also stated that it would award attorney fees and expenses to plaintiffs pursuant to Section 304(c) of the Uniform Relocation Assistance and Real Property Acquisition Act, 42 U.S.C. § 4654(c).

- Federal Circuit Denies Petition for Rehearing and Issues Mandate Reversing Court of Federal Claims Decision in Favor of Contractors in DOD Jet Fuel Case
  Tesoro Hawaii Corp. v. United States (Judge Radar, Judge Bryson, Judge Gajarsa). On August 29, 2005, the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, having denied rehearing, issued the mandate for its April 25, 2005 decision rejecting a fuel supplier's claim that DOD fuel contracts used an illegal pricing mechanism. This is one of 28 similar cases pending before the United States Court of Federal Claims, in which contractors collectively seek more than $3.5 billion. The parties must advise the trial court how they wish to proceed. Plaintiffs will pursue other damages theories, but we believe the Federal Circuit's decision vitiates all causes of action.

- Court of International Trade Dismisses Action Brought by Public Interest Organizations Seeking an Embargo Upon Cocoa from Cote D'Ivoire for Lack of Article III Standing International Labor Rights Fund v. United States (Judge Barzilay). On August 29, 2005, the United States Court of International Trade dismissed the complaint of three public interest organizations seeking the imposition of an embargo upon cocoa from Cote D'Ivoire based upon alleged forced child labor in cocoa production in that country. The court concluded that the plaintiffs lacked Article III standing because 19 U.S.C. § 1307 – the statute that provides for embargoes upon merchandise produced by forced labor – contains an exception that allows entry of such merchandise in cases where domestic production does not meet domestic demand. Because there is no domestic cocoa industry, the court reasoned that plaintiffs had not established a redressable injury-in-fact necessary for Article III standing.

- Plaintiff Voluntarily Dismisses Challenge to Treasury Terrorist Financing Regulations
  Awadallah v. Snow, [Middle District of Florida]. On August 29, plaintiff voluntarily dismissed, with prejudice, an action challenging the constitutionality of Department of the Treasury regulations that authorize the blocking of any property interest of a Specially Designated Terrorist and Specially Designated Global Terrorist. Plaintiff specifically challenged, under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and the Federal Tort Claims Act, the blocking of his $5000.00 wire transfer to his mother's account at Al Aqsa Islamic Bank, an entity that had been designated an Specially Designated Terrorist and Specially Designated Global Terrorist. Several weeks before Plaintiff filed his action, the Department of the Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control unblocked his wire transfer and authorized his bank to release the funds to Plaintiff. Plaintiff failed to disclose this fact in his Complaint.

- Sixth Circuit Affirms Denial of all Compensation to Attorney for Bankruptcy Trustee
  Schilling v. Smith [6th Cir.; Western District of Kentucky]. On August 30, the Sixth Circuit in an unpublished opinion (Nelson, Batchelder and Collier (sitting by designation)), affirmed a bankruptcy court's decision to deny all compensation to J. Baxter Schilling, attorney to an individual debtor's bankruptcy trustee. The court of appeals held that the bankruptcy court did not commit clear error when it found that Mr. Schilling had acted out of self-interest and had breached duties owed to parties with an interest in the bankruptcy estate. The court also concluded that the court had not abused its discretion in holding that Mr. Schilling's breaches of fiduciary duty justified the withholding of all compensation.

- Third Circuit Accepts Views of the Copyright Office in Private Dispute
  Kay Berry, Inc. v. Taylor Gifts, Inc. [3d Cir.; Western District of Pennsylvania]. On August 30, the Third Circuit (McKee, Van Anwerpen, and Weis) held that a Garden Accent Rock -- a decorative, cement-cast, outdoor sculpture with verse inscribed on its face -- was protected by copyright law. After oral argument in this case, the Third Circuit solicited the views of the United States on several copyright issues, including whether the Garden Accent Rock was properly registered and whether the "group registration" procedures apply to sculptural works. The court accepted our view that the group registration procedures do not apply, and, consistent with our views, ordered the case remanded to the district court for consideration of whether the Garden Accent Rock was "first" published in the registered materials.

- District Court Dismisses Tort Suit Based on Accident in Kenya; Remands Case to

United States Agency for International Development (USAID) for Further Administrative Proceedings

Leslie Fair-Gray, et al. v. Dirk Dijkerman, et al. [District of Columbia] (Judge Emmet G. Sullivan). After two years of litigation and extensive discovery, the district court ordered substitution of the United States in place of a USAID official involved in a car accident in Nairobi, Kenya. Upon substitution, the court dismissed all counts pursuant to the FTCA's foreign country exception. Plaintiffs had also alleged a variety of "headquarters claims" against the United States, but those claims were dismissed earlier, in light of the Supreme Court's repudiation of that doctrine in Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692 (2004). Plaintiff's claims were remanded to USAID for consideration pursuant to Section 636(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act, under which USAID considers overseas claims for relief.

Contact: COL Sharon E. Riley, Counsel, 514-3886

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent: Wednesday, September 07, 2005 8:30 AM
To: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject: Attorney General's News Briefing 9/7/05
Attachments: agnb050907.pdf; agnb050907.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 2005 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Captured Iraq Terror Suspect Had Thumb Drive Containing London Bombings Information. 4
British Home Secretary To Call For Increased Scrutiny Of Traveler Data. 4
California Man Pleads Not Guilty To Terror Plot Charges. 4
Judge Denies Bail For Florida Doctor Accused Of Taking Al Qaeda Loyalty Pledge. 4
Psychiatrists Disagree On Alleged Ohio Bombing Plotter's Mental State. 4
US Resident Released From Military Detention In Iraq. 4
WPost Says Guantanamo Bay Tribunals Should Be Modeled After Courts-Martial. 4

Homeland Response:

Coast Guard Raids In California Raise Concerns. 5
First Phase Of Rebuilding After 9/11 Begins In Manhattan. 5

War News:

US Strikes Insurgent Targets In Western Iraq. 5
Sunnis Refuse US Military Order To Leave Tall Afar. 5
US Transfers Security Of Najaf To Iraqis. 6
Top Iraqi Bomb Expert Killed By Insurgents. 6
Attacks On Contractors Slow Iraqi Reconstruction. 6
Saddam Reportedly Confesses To Ordering Execution Of Kurds. 6
Volcker Report To Criticize Annan, UN For Lax Oversight Of Oil-For-Food Program. 7
US Resident Detained In Iraq Released Before Hearing. 7
WSJournal Suggests Bolton Lead Effort To Pressure Arab Governments To Support Iraq. 7
Political Tensions Threaten Nascent Iraqi Baseball League. 8
Al Qaeda Militants Killed By Saudi Security Forces. 8
First Afghan Cadet At West Point Eager To Help Country's Reconstruction. 8

DOJ:

Gonzales To Award Medal Of Valor To Families Of 9/11 Victims. 8

Corporate Scandals:

Enron Defendants Claim Prosecutors Are Scaring Off Witnesses. 8
Former Skandia CEO To Be Charged. 9
Lawyers Says Misconceptions About Audits Lead To Counterproductive Reforms. 9
Morgan Director's Resignation Is Omen Of Reorganization. 9
Investment Firm Sues To Stop Spitzer Fee Inquiry. 9
Delaware Settles With Morgan Stanley Over Trading Complaint. 9

Criminal Law:

Prosecutors Could Employ Little-Used Provision In Plame Case. 10
Former Houston Official Sentenced For Corruption. 10
Dallas Planning Commissioner Resigns Amid FBI Probe. 10
Nigerian Official Meets With FBI About Nigerian Corruption Investigation. 10
Court-Appointed Monitor Finds Chicago Hiring Still Based On Politics. 11
Tennessee Transportation Officials Inspect Guardrails Amid Contract Probe. 11
Suspect Arraigned In Murder Of Convicted Washington Sex Offenders. 11
Jurisdiction In Moving Bus Killing Could Mean Life Or Death. 11
Judge Dismisses Lawsuit Against FBI Over Bungled Massachusetts Surrender. 11
SCOTUS Asked To Rule On Sleeping Jurors. 12
US, Taiwan Make Additional Counterfeit Seizures In Operation Royal Charm. 12
Federal Prosecutor Says Sliwa Kidnapping Shows Gotti Remained Gambino Boss. 12

Value Of Online Gambling Site Declines. 12

Civil Law:

New Jersey Lawmakers Try To Bar Base Closing. 13
General Dynamics Loses Breach Of Contract Suit Brought By Former Partner. 13
5th Circuit Rules Attorney-Client Privilege No Shield For Company In Whistleblower Suits. 14

Civil Rights:

Opponents Of Georgia Voter ID Law To Monitor Elections. 14
DOJ Officials To Tour Baltimore Juvenile Justice Center. 14
California Assembly Passes Gay Marriage Bill. 15
Ohio Ballot Initiative Would Strip GOP Officials Of Control Over Redistricting. 15

Antitrust:

Unipol Gets Italian Antitrust Nod For BNL Bank Acquisition. 15
Gas Natural's Endesa Takeover Bid Spurned. 15
Court Cases Haven't Reduced Music File Sharing. 15
Columnist Bearish On Refinery Merger. 16

Environment:

EPA To Bar Use Of Children, Pregnant Women In Pesticide Studies. 16
Illegal Off-Road Vehicles Destroying Parkland, "Serious National Problem. 16
Bonilla Takes Aim At Eminent Domain. 16
LATimes Urges Congress To Support Coastal Restoration. 17

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Code Provision Has Been Used Against Government Leakers. 17
Medical Marijuana Does Not Influence Teen Use, MPP Study Suggests. 17
"Jury Is Still Out" On Methadone Dependency Risk. 18
Guilty Plea In Texas Drug Money Trafficking Case. 18
Fox Challenges Drug Kingpins To Take On Security Forces In Nuevo Laredo. 18
Spain Leads World In Cocaine Use. 18

Immigration:

Tax:

Twelve More May Be Indicted Over KPMG Shelters. 19
Thousands Not Taking Advantage Of Higher Education Tax Break. 19

Congress-Administration:

Bush Mentions Gonzales As Possible O'Connor Replacement. 20
Bush Announces Inquiry Into Government's Response To Katrina. 24
Bush To Ask Congress For $40 Billion In Hurricane Relief. 27
Federal Relief Effort Now In Full Swing. 27
FEMA Director Brown Said To Have "Big Target On His Back. 29
Blanco Indecision Said To Have Delayed Federal Relief Efforts. 31
Congress To Probe Federal Response To Katrina, With Focus On FEMA. 32
Federal Officials Warn Of Post-Katrina ID Theft Threat, Relief Scams. 34
FEMA, HUD Seek Temporary Housing For Evacuees. 34
FEMA Bureaucracy Said To Be Delaying International Aid. 35
Bush, Spellings Offering Help To Students, Schools Affected By Katrina. 36
Pentagon Defends Katrina Response. 37
IRS Expands Tax Relief For Hurricane Victims. 37
Private Donations To Charities Setting Records. 37
Katrina Expected To Have Big Negative Effect On US Economy. 38
New Orleans Law Firms Struggle To Survive In Katrina's Wake. 39
Senators Say Action On Social Security Is Unlikely This Year. 39
IG Finds Opinion Columnists Paid By Education Department Failed To Disclose Funding. 39
Hastings, Mollohan Face Questions About Ethics Panel Staffing. 39

Other News:

Gulf Repairs, Saudi Cut Lead To Lower Oil, Gas Prices. 40
IAEA Report Says Iran Could Develop Nuclear Weapons In Five Years. 41
Bolton Offers Compromise On UN Reforms. 42
State Department Raises Concerns About Israeli Plans For Construction In West Bank. 42
Poll Shows US, Europe Remain In Agreement On Major Policy Issues. 42
US, China Discuss Future Of Korean Peninsula. 43
Mubarak Expected To Win Presidential Election. 43
German Voters Leaning Right In US-Style Campaign. 43
Heinz Plant Seized By Venezuela. 43
Dominance Of One-Party Rule Seen As Stifling Democracy In Japan. 43
Seriousness Of Chirac Illness Remains Unknown. 44
WPost Criticizes Turkey Over Outspoken Writer's Arrest. 44

DOJ_NMG_0003115

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington. 44

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages. 47

DOJ_NMG_0003116

TERRORISM NEWS:

Captured Iraq Terror Suspect Had Thumb Drive Containing London Bombings Information. The Washington Times (9/7, Hess) reports a US military officer has said that a terrorist connected to al-Qaeda, who was captured near the Syrian border in Iraq last month, "had a computer 'thumb drive' that contained planning information about the July 7 suicide bombings in London." The news "fits with other evidence of a growing presence in Iraq by al Qaeda, which has taken responsibility for the British attacks."

British Home Secretary To Call For Increased Scrutiny Of Traveler Data. The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Daniszewski) reports, "Britain's chief law enforcement official will call on European leaders today to put biological data into passports, visas and identity cards, share airline passenger lists and retain telecommunications records to help fight international terrorists and organized crime." Home Secretary Charles Clarke "said he was seeking to strike the right balance between preserving civil liberties and protecting the public. 'It seems to me we have to give the same rights to those humans who want to be able to travel without being blown up on an underground train…as we do to the defendants,' he said."

California Man Pleads Not Guilty To Terror Plot Charges. The AP (9/7, Blood) reports, "One of four men indicted in an alleged terror plot against California targets pleaded not guilty to federal charges Tuesday. Hammad Riaz Samana, a 21-year-old Pakistani national, said only a few words as he appeared with hands shackled to his waist before U.S. Magistrate Judge Arthur Nakazato." The AP notes, "Outside court, defense attorney Timothy Lannen described Samana as a hardworking, upstanding person. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Kevin Smith said that 'the indictment speaks for itself' and that the investigation was continuing. He said he expected the other men to be arraigned later this month." KNBC-TV Los Angeles (9/6) also reports on Samana's plea, noting, "Authorities are not aware of any current threat based on what was learned during the investigation, said Randy Parsons, acting assistant head of the FBI's Los Angeles office."

Judge Denies Bail For Florida Doctor Accused Of Taking Al Qaeda Loyalty Pledge. The Miami Herald (9/7, Benn) reports US District Judge Loretta Preska "denied bail Tuesday for a Boca Raton doctor charged with conspiring to support al Qaeda." Rafiq Sabir "will continue to await trial in a maximum-security prison, his attorney, Ed Wilford, said. … Wilford said he will appeal the decision." The Herald notes, "An undercover FBI agent posed as an al Qaeda recruiter and secretly recorded Sabir and" codefendant Tarik Shah " reciting an alleged oath of allegiance" to al Qaeda in May.

Psychiatrists Disagree On Alleged Ohio Bombing Plotter's Mental State. The AP (9/6) reports, "Mental health experts who examined a Somali man accused of plotting to bomb a shopping mall have concluded he was faking when he became a wild-eyed defendant who tapped his head on a table, mumbled and giggled in court. Documents made public last week from two analysts at the Federal Medical Center in Rochester, Minn., said Nuradin Abdi was pretending to be mentally ill. … However, another psychiatrist requested by Abdi's defense attorney because the first report came from a federal agency said it's possible that Abdi has a 'legitimate psychosis.' Abdi's lawyer, Mahir T. Sherif, said Tuesday the second analysis was done by forensic psychiatrist Dr. Robert Phillips, who previously testified in the case of President Reagan's shooter, John Hinckley Jr."

US Resident Released From Military Detention In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Weinstein) reports, "More than two months after authorities cleared him of suspicion in a mortar attack on a United States base in Baghdad, an Iraqi man was released Tuesday from military custody, just days before government lawyers were due in court to answer questions about his captivity. Tuesday's release of Numan Adnan Al-Kaby, a longtime lawful U.S. resident, from a military prison outside Baghdad marked the second time in two months that authorities freed a captive in Iraq within a week of the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California filing a federal lawsuit in Washington."

WPost Says Guantanamo Bay Tribunals Should Be Modeled After Courts-Martial. The

DOJ_NMG_0003117

Washington Post (9/7, A24) editorializes that changes to the military tribunals that are being set up at Guantanamo Bay, announced last week by the Pentagon, "improve the system in subtle but important ways, moving it closer to the system of courts-martial by which the military tries its own soldiers. But they don't entirely fix the problems." The Post states that "the more the commissions come to resemble courts-martial, the less sense it makes for the military to create a justice system from scratch rather than using the one it already has -- in which Americans and the international community have high confidence."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Coast Guard Raids In California Raise Concerns. The Montery (CA) Herald (9/7, Hennessey) reports, "The Coast Guard boarded and inspected close to 30 vessels, many of them docked, in Monterey Bay over the Labor Day weekend in a operation that raised the eyebrows of some local boaters and the ire of one." The Herald continues, "The operation -- conducted in conjunction with the Monterey County Sheriff's Office, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration -- netted one arrest in Moss Landing Harbor and terminated the voyages of five vessels that were deemed unsafe." The Herald adds, "In all, 28 boats, many of them live-aboard vessels that were moored in the harbors, were boarded and 31 citations were issued. One angry boater said Coast Guard officers came aboard his boat in Moss Landing Harbor late Friday citing authority under the Patriot Act. … In an e-mail to The Herald, Lowell Jones of Moss Landing said the Coast Guard did a 'blanket boarding' in the harbor, "searching boats, and invading people's privacy at 10:30 p.m. They justified this intrusion by citing the Patriot Act. … Coast Guard officials said the operation was not in response to any particular law enforcement report and that search warrants are not required for such inspections."

First Phase Of Rebuilding After 9/11 Begins In Manhattan. The Washington Post (9/7, A2, Garcia) reports, "The first phase of rebuilding on the 16 acres of Lower Manhattan leveled by the Sept. 11 attacks began yesterday with a ceremonial groundbreaking for a new $2.2 billion transportation hub, highlighted by the release of two doves representing 'peace and rebirth.'" The new hub "will link commuter trains from New Jersey, ferries and the city subway system. Officials estimate 250,000 people a day will stream through the transportation hub after its scheduled completion in 2009."

WAR NEWS:

US Strikes Insurgent Targets In Western Iraq. The US launched two attacks against insurgents near Kalibah along the Syrian border. The AP (9/7, Reid) reports, "The airstrikes occurred about six miles east of the border city of Qaim, major parts of which have fallen under control of al-Qaida-linked foreign fighters." Local Iraqis "say al-Qaida in Iraq, led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, took over parts of Qaim after residents fled fighting between tribes supporting and opposing the insurgents." US troops maintain "a presence in the area, but U.S. officers have complained privately that they don't have enough American and Iraqi troops to secure Qaim."

The Washington Post (9/7, A20, Sarhan, Fekeiki) adds, "U.S. Marines have a force of about 5,000 to cover the province's 24,000 square miles. American officers in Anbar say the Marines are too few to bring the province under control, but U.S. and Iraqi officials say the U.S. raids have helped disrupt the flow of bombs and recruits into the rest of Iraq." The New York Times (9/7, Oppel Jr.) notes that "In contrast to the military's normally more upbeat assertions about progress curbing the insurgency, the first statement noted that western Anbar residents have 'experienced an increased level of violence at the hands of Al Qaeda in Iraq terrorists.'"

Sunnis Refuse US Military Order To Leave Tall Afar. The refusal of Tall Afar residents to leave the city while the US military hunts for insurgents has complicated the mission. The Washington Post (9/7, A20, Finer) reports, "Fighting has been sporadic so far. One U.S. soldier has been killed, along with at least 200 suspected insurgents, said Col. H.R. McMaster, commander of the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, which is leading the assault." The "small-scale raids and house-to-house searches have allowed troops to encircle Sarai, where commanders here believe insurgents have massed." But Iraqi officials have "asked the military commanders to minimize civilian casualties in this highly volatile region."

DOJ_NMG_0003118

US Transfers Security Of Najaf To Iraqis. As one of the first steps for the withdrawal of thousands of US forces from Iraq by next spring Iraqi security forces were given responsibility for security in the city of Najf. The Washington Post (9/7, A20, Sarhan, Fekeiki) notes that it "marked the first transfer of an entire city from U.S. to Iraqi military responsibility this year. The raising of the Iraqi flag at a former U.S. base was 'pretty much putting the city of Najaf in Iraqi control,' Lt. Col. Steve Boylan, spokesman for the U.S. military, said in Baghdad." The city "has been the scene of relatively few insurgent attacks."

The New York Times (9/7, Oppel Jr.) reports, "American commander, Brig. Gen. Augustus L. Collins, said the 'Iraqi Army in Najaf can control the area,' according to a pool report of the ceremony. But the general also emphasized that a contingent of American troops would remain based nearby in case the Iraqi forces needed help."

The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Khalil, Sanders) says, "Najaf's hand-over scarcely could have been imagined last summer, when thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops fought a pitched, three-week battle in the city against the militia forces of radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr after the rebels seized control of several shrines. Hundreds died and much of the Old City was destroyed."

Top Iraqi Bomb Expert Killed By Insurgents. As one example of recent success by insurgents targeting Iraqis assisting the US, USA Today (9/7, Jervis) reports Haqy Asaad was recently gunned down because he was adept at helping disarm IEDS and suicide bombers. Asaad "earned the nickname 'Robot' from U.S. advisers for his dogged disarming of insurgents' bombs." The US military is "working to hand over security responsibilities to Iraqi units such as Asaad's. An increasing number of Iraqi troops are manning checkpoints, policing streets, leading raids on suspected insurgent hide-outs and disarming roadside bombs." But unlike US troops "many Iraqi security personnel return home each night to regular neighborhoods, leaving them susceptible to attacks from guerrillas."

Attacks On Contractors Slow Iraqi Reconstruction. Contractors on US projects to help reconstruct Iraq were increasingly targeted in August. They were mainly Iraqis. USA Today (9/7, Jervis) reports U.S. Project and Contracting Office director of programs Karen Durham-Aguilera said, "August was real bad. … We've had to stop projects because of it." Rebuilding Iraq's infrastructure is a key part of the US strategy "of winning over Iraqis and undermining the insurgency. But insurgents are interfering with this by targeting contractors." And funding for security has "chewed away at the $18.4 billion appropriated by Congress last year for reconstruction in Iraq. Last year, $5 billion of that was redirected to training and equipping Iraq's security forces, a move that resulted in the cancellation of some projects and scaling back others." Yet, "reconstruction projects continue. The Army Corps of Engineers says more than 1,700 projects have been completed since June 2004."

US Strategy To Rebuild Sadr City Seen As Model For Success. In a lengthy article, the Los Angeles Times (9/7, Miller) examines the reasons behind the US success in helping reconstruct Sadr City. The US military's decision to provide sustained, focused attention on the city is credited with the success. The Times describes the rebuilding of Sadr City as "an impressive, if imperfect, accomplishment in Iraq, where many projects remain incomplete and U.S. promises unfulfilled." The US military's strategy "provided the oversight needed to coordinate the military's efforts with those of the U.S. Agency for International Development and the Pentagon's Project and Contracting Office." The reconstruction "also held more immediate significance among mid-level commanders in the field than among higher-level Pentagon officials preoccupied with fighting the war. The field officers focused on short-term, high-visibility projects such as cleaning up trash and digging wells, instead of massive new water treatment plants or power stations that take years to build. They also hired local Iraqi contractors, who in turn employed many of the militia members who had once battled U.S. troops."

Saddam Reportedly Confesses To Ordering Execution Of Kurds. CNN's The Situation Room (9/6, Verjee) reported Iraqi President, Jalal Talabani is saying "that Saddam Hussein has apparently confessed that he gave orders to execute thousands of Kurds back in the 1980s. He gave an interview to a state-funded broadcaster where he said that he had spoken to one of the Iraqi special tribunal judges that was involved in the investigation. Apparently the judge told Talabani that, quote, 'he said he was able to take important confessions from Saddam Hussein,' and that Saddam has signed these confessions, and there is video and audio recordings of these confessions as well. Talabani said that the judge told him Saddam confessed that he gave orders for the executions and the military operations that were directed against the Kurds in the late 1980s."

DOJ_NMG_0003119

The Washington Post (9/7, A20, Sarhan, Fekeiki) in an article on recent US military activity in Iraq briefly notes Talabani said, "Saddam deserves a death sentence 20 times a day because he tried to assassinate me 20 times." USA Today/AP (9/7) adds, "Talabani said that some of the confessions involved cases under investigation but he gave no specifics."

But according to the New York Times (9/7, Oppel Jr.), Abdel Haq Alani, an attorney for Hussein, "dismissed the statement as a 'fabrication.'" Alani said reports "of a confession 'comes to me as a surprise, a big surprise," and he "said Mr. Hussein had made no mention of a confession during a meeting with his Iraqi lawyer on Monday."

Volcker Report To Criticize Annan, UN For Lax Oversight Of Oil-For-Food Program. The Washington Post (9/7, A20, Lynch) reports, "The U.N. Security Council and Secretary General Kofi Annan failed to adequately manage and police the $64 billion U.N. oil-for-food program, creating a permissive environment that enabled Saddam Hussein's government in Iraq to take billions of dollars in illicit kickbacks, according to the findings of a U.N. investigation to be released Wednesday." Volcker's report "will portray a largely dysfunctional, leaderless international effort to operate the humanitarian relief effort for Iraq from December 1996 until the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003. Volcker will urge world leaders attending a Sept. 14 summit on U.N. reform to support steps to strengthen the quality of independent oversight of the organization's spending."

The Washington Times (9/7, Pisik) notes that while the "Independent Inquiry Committee (IIC) is expected to formally absolve U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan in the awarding of a key contract to his son's former employer," Volcker's report "will not spare Mr. Annan's administration from a harsh assessment of its management capabilities." The report will also address "the political sensitivities that compromised the Security Council's ability to make important decisions; the 'grievous absence' of effective auditing and management controls; and the inability to track expenditures across agencies and programs."

The New York Times (9/7, Hoge) reports, "The general conclusion of" Volcker's latest report "is that the United Nations is inefficient, over-politicized, corrupt and in desperate need of immediate repair."

The New York Sun (9/7, Clyne) reports that some U.N. critics have made an hour-long documentary film entitled "Broken Promises: The United Nations at 60." The Sun says the film chronicles "the organization's failings since its inception," and raises "questions about whether the world body should perpetuate itself for another 60 years." The documentary is set to be released nationwide later this month. It "is the brainchild of...actor and activist, Ronald Silver, and the president of the Citizens United Foundation, David Bossie." Silver said "that he hoped a broadly accessible film would heighten public interest as debate over the" UN "escalates in coming weeks, with the imminent release of a [high-profile] report…on the oil-for-food investigation."

US Resident Detained In Iraq Released Before Hearing. The Washington Post (9/7, A6, Leonnig) reports, "An Iraqi-born U.S. resident was released from a U.S. military prison in Baghdad yesterday, two days before a scheduled hearing on why the U.S. government had continued to detain him after clearing him of involvement in a mortar attack." The "decision to free Numan Adnan Al-Kaby comes less than a week after lawyers filed suit demanding his release. A federal judge had scheduled a hearing on Al-Kaby's case for Thursday afternoon, but the government yesterday asked that it be canceled and the complaint be dismissed as moot."

WSJournal Suggests Bolton Lead Effort To Pressure Arab Governments To Support Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (9/7) editorializes, "One of the world's unremarked scandals is how little help Iraq's new government is getting from its fellow Arabs. And now Iraq's elected leaders are becoming increasingly vocal about that fact. On Monday Iraq President Jalal Talabani scored Arab leaders for their minimal-to-nonexistent diplomatic presence in Baghdad." The Journal concludes, "Encouraging Arab help in Iraq would seem to be a job for the State Department. But if Foggy Bottom isn't up to it, perhaps the White House should authorize U.S. Ambassador John Bolton to inform Arab nations…that their relations with the U.S., and especially future economic and military assistance, depend on it."

DOJ_NMG_0003120

Political Tensions Threaten Nascent Iraqi Baseball League. The Iraqi national baseball league, according to the New York Times (9/7, Semple), was founded in 2003 and "has grown to 26 full-fledged baseball teams in 18 provinces stretching from Nineveh in the north to Basra in the south." Yet, "like Iraq since the American invasion, the league, after less than two years in existence, has itself been torn by political infighting and charges of malfeasance that have cast its future into doubt."

Al Qaeda Militants Killed By Saudi Security Forces. The New York Times (9/7, Fattah) reports, "Saudi security forces finally overwhelmed a cell of militants holed up in a house in the Persian Gulf city of Dammam on Tuesday, ending a three-day siege. The bloody firefight was the latest in a string of confrontations between militants and security forces throughout the country." On Monday "the Interior Ministry announced that security forces had killed two militants on Sunday, including the No. 3 most-wanted militant in Saudi Arabia, Zaid Saad Zaid al-Samari, who was sought in connection with numerous attacks." Recently "Saudi security forces have found themselves in almost weekly confrontations with militants."

Economic Progress May Help Reduce Attraction Of Al Qaeda For Saudi Youth. The Washington Times (9/7, Abou-Alsamh) reports, "Record oil prices have sent Saudi revenues soaring and contributed to a sixfold increase in stock prices, but ordinary citizens are just beginning to feel the benefits, financial analysts say." Experts "hope that in time the surge will produce more and better jobs for young Saudis, reducing their interest in joining al Qaeda-linked terrorist groups that have been battling the government."

First Afghan Cadet At West Point Eager To Help Country's Reconstruction. USA Today (9/7, Brook) reports, "The U.S. Military Academy accepted its first cadet from Afghanistan last month as that country takes its initial steps toward building a professional military after decades of war and unrest." Cadet Shoaib Yosoufzai, "who grew up under harsh Taliban rule, wants to learn to build bridges, dams, power plants and roads for his ravaged country."

West Point Cadets Undeterred By Dangers Of Service. USA Today (9/7, Brook) reports Geryah White "and the 1,200 other members of the West Point class of 2009 have the grades and test scores to get into almost any top school -- one that wouldn't bring compulsory military service after graduation. Instead, they accepted this challenge, their eyes wide open to the dangers as American soldiers return home in flag-draped caskets or maimed by roadside bombs." USA Today notes, "The Army and Army National Guard are expected to miss their 2005 recruiting goals by several thousand new soldiers, but interest in West Point hasn't flagged. Applications reached 12,692 in 2003. They're down to 10,733 this year but still high by historical standards, says Lt. Gen. William Lennox, West Point's superintendent."

DOJ:

Gonzales To Award Medal Of Valor To Families Of 9/11 Victims. The Staten Island Advance (NY) (9/7, Kivlan) reports, "Dozens of Sept. 11 family members are expected to travel here Friday to receive the Congressional Medal of Valor on behalf of the more than 400 firefighters and police officers killed at the World Trade Center. … The medals will be awarded by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez in a ceremony at the Justice Department." The Advance continues, "Relatives of the fallen first responders were notified of the event by Justice Department officials by telephone late last week. Free air fare was made available for the family members through a travel agency in the city. … Among the relatives planning to attend was Joanne Barbara of West Brighton, whose husband Gerard, a battalion chief, was among the 343 firefighters who died at Ground Zero." The Advance adds, "She said in an interview that she had mixed feelings about the event. … 'Of course, it will be an honor to accept the Medal of Valor for my husband,' she said. … But Mrs. Barbara said the Justice Department should have informed the families of the ceremony much sooner. 'Our weekend is going to be very emotional as it is,' she said, referring to the 9/11 anniversary. 'And they just added another event to it that we didn't know about.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Defendants Claim Prosecutors Are Scaring Off Witnesses. The Washington Post (9/7, Johnson) reports, "Defense lawyers for former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling have complained for years about the government's hard-nosed tactics in pursuit of their clients." The Post continues, "Now they are hoping for support from an unlikely source: the federal judge overseeing next year's fraud trial against the two. … U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III has scheduled a hearing in Houston for tomorrow to examine why only four former Enron employees have agreed to meet with the defense team. The judge has raised the prospect, employed in other cases, that he could privately inform a limited number of potential witnesses that they have nothing to fear by speaking with Lay's and Skilling's lawyers." The Post adds, "The judge's action comes in response to defense claims, made public yesterday in court filings, that prosecutors abused their power by warning Enron employees that it was not a 'good idea' to help Skilling and Lay. A government lawyer also advised a critical, unidentified witness to 'get rid' of his or her lawyer if the lawyer continued to talk with the defense, the brief said. … A grand jury continues to investigate misconduct at Enron, and prosecutors have said in court papers that they consider 114 people 'unindicted co-conspirators.' … Lake has not ruled that prosecutors at the Justice Department's Enron Task Force acted improperly. Even so, the judge said last week, Lay and Skilling had identified 'a problem I am persuaded exists' in advance of a trial only four months away."

DOJ_NMG_0003121

Former Skandia CEO To Be Charged. The Wall Street Journal (9/7, C3, Akerhielm, Nordstrom, Pfalzer) reports that Lars-Eric Petersson, former chief executive officer of insurer Skandia AB, will be prosecuted "for two cases of 'severe' breach of trust." He was "fired by Skandia in 2003 for his involvement in the lifting of a cap on a bonus-payment program to executives. The charges against him won't have any bearing on the 44.9 billion kronor ($6.02, or €4.83 billion) takeover bid for Skandia filed last week by Old Mutual PLC." The first charge against Petersson deals with that decision. "The second charge against Mr. Petersson relates to retirement payments … Without approval from Skandia's board, he added retirement benefits under which his own benefits would always reach at least 97.1 million kronor."

Lawyers Says Misconceptions About Audits Lead To Counterproductive Reforms. Clare Canning, head of commercial litigation, and James Roberts, associate, in the commercial litigation team at Barlow Lyde & Gilbert, who currently act for Ernst & Young in the Equitable Life litigation, in an op-ed in the Financial Times (9/7) reports, "There is a danger that misconceptions about the audit's role will lead to counterproductive attempts to bolster the robustness of the audit opinion … Some of those expressing concerns appear to expect the audit to function like a form of commercial guarantee; a bastion against corporate scandal and a blanket protection for the company and its directors against their own commercial mismanagement." An audit is "an opinion that a company's financial statements show a true and fair view at a particular point in time." Any reform towards "rules-based audit processes" or creating "a criminal offence of 'recklessly' giving an audit opinion" will only "create irresistible pressure towards form over substance" and "frustrate swift and effective operation of the regulatory regime and civil litigation."

Morgan Director's Resignation Is Omen Of Reorganization. The New York Times (9/7, Thomas) reports, "Michael A. Miles, a Morgan Stanley director with close ties to the former chief executive, Philip J. Purcell, has resigned from the board … The move, which was expected, is the latest signal that the new chief executive, John J. Mack, intends to reorganize a board that during the battle over Mr. Purcell's leadership became a lightning rod for criticism and remains the target of several shareholder lawsuits."

Investment Firm Sues To Stop Spitzer Fee Inquiry. The New York Times (9/7, Atlas) reports, "J.& W. Seligman & Company, a New York investment firm, sued the state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, yesterday, asserting that he had overstepped his authority in his investigation of improper trading in Seligman's mutual funds" and "seeks to suspend Mr. Spitzer's ability to investigate 'allegedly excessive advisory fees paid to Seligman.'" All of Spitzer's "settlements with fund companies to date" required "a third party to review how fees are set," but "the fee reductions…have been criticized by officials at the S.E.C., who have said it is not the role of the government to set prices."

Delaware Settles With Morgan Stanley Over Trading Complaint. The AP (9/7) reports, "Morgan Stanley Inc. has agreed to pay $700,000 to settle a complaint brought by the state Department of Justice regarding improper trading in a Delaware couple's brokerage account, officials said Tuesday." The AP continues, "The bulk of the settlement will be paid to the Wilmington couple to reimburse them for losses incurred, authorities said." The AP adds, "The Division of Securities filed a formal complaint in 2003 against the brokerage firm and two brokers, George Coughlin and Argie Economou who worked in a Morgan Stanley branch office in Burlington, Vt. … The complaint alleged that Morgan Stanley, through Coughlin, executed more than 500 unauthorized transactions and more than 70 'unsuitable' transactions in the couple's account. The complaint also alleged that Morgan Stanley and Economou, who was Coughlins immediate supervisor, failed to properly supervise Coughlins trading activities, in violation of Delaware securities laws."

DOJ_NMG_0003122

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutors Could Employ Little-Used Provision In Plame Case. Convictions for leaking sensitive government information to the media are rare, and according to the Washington Post (9/7, A23, Lee), "legal experts say prosecutors will have a hard time putting away anyone in the administration for violating the Intelligence Identities Protection Act in the revelation of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity in 2003." However, some legal experts say it is not out of the question for prosecutors to use Section 641 in Title 18 of the US Code, which "nominally deals with prohibitions on the embezzlement of public money, property or records for private use. It typically would be used to go after a federal employee who, say, absconds with government laptops. … The statute 'is used by the government from time to time in lieu of not having a criminal prohibition on leaking classified information, generally,' said William Banks, a national security law expert at Syracuse University."

Former Houston Official Sentenced For Corruption. The Houston Chronicle (9/7, Rice) reports, "A former Houston city official was sentenced to two years and six months in federal prison today for accepting cash and gifts from businesses seeking her influence in gaining lucrative city contracts." The Chronicle continues, "The sentencing of Monique McGilbra, former head of the city Building Services Department, follows a three-year sentence she received Friday in Cleveland, Ohio, for accepting bribes from a Cleveland businessman. … McGilbra, 41, is the second Houston city official to plead guilty in a continuing investigation that began in Cleveland and expanded to include Houston and New Orleans." The Chronicle adds, "Oliver Spellman, 51, chief of staff to former Mayor Lee Brown, received probation and a $10,000 fine Friday in Cleveland federal court for taking a $2,000 bribe from a Cleveland consultant. … U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore said McGilbra's Houston sentence will run at the same time as the Cleveland sentence, meaning she will spend no more than three years in prison." The Chronicle notes, "U.S. marshals took McGilbra into custody on orders from Gwin, but Gilmore said McGilbra could be released until ordered to report to prison if Gwin agreed to reconsider his order. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Edward Gallagher and Mary Butler, a prosecutor with the Department of Justice's public integrity unit, told Gilmore McGilbra was cooperating in an ongoing investigation."

Dallas Planning Commissioner Resigns Amid FBI Probe. The Dallas Morning News (9/7, Ramshaw) reports, "Embattled City Plan Commissioner D'Angelo Lee stepped down over the holiday weekend, more than two months after he fell under scrutiny in a far-reaching FBI investigation and days before a second City Council vote over whether to remove him." Mayor Laura Miller "said Tuesday that the resignation should have occurred 'a few months ago.' … 'He has now stepped down, and that's a really good step forward,' Ms. Miller said." WFAA-TV Dallas-Ft. Worth (9/6, Heinbaugh) notes, "Lee's business interests and activities as a City Plan Commissioner have been at the core of the FBI investigation. … Many Council members said they were pleased that Lee's decision will avoid another potential fight."

Nigerian Official Meets With FBI About Nigerian Corruption Investigation. The Nigeria Daily Independent (9/7, Eluemunor, Aruna) reports, "Economic and Financial Crimes Commission…chairman, Nuhu Ribadu, has been holding meetings with the United States Federal Bureau of Investigation…to intensify the search for corrupt Nigerian public officials. He was in the U.S. last week to meet with senior government and FBI officials and to exchange information on the activities of Nigerian politicians, especially governors being investigated for corrupt practices. Ribadu, according to sources, was sighted in Maryland and Washington D.C. where he had meetings with U.S. officials…to obtain additional information on the property deeds of some governors and pass details to the INTERPOL. He also used the visit to obtain more information on the raid the FBI carried out last month on the property of Vice President, Atiku Abubakar."

DOJ_NMG_0003123

Nigerian Vice President Releases List Of Items Seized In FBI Raid. Nigerian news Web site This Day (9/6, Akogun) reports, "The Office of Vice President Atiku Abubakar yesterday released a list of items taken away from Maryland, US home by operatives of the Federal Bureau of Investigation…during their August 3 raid. … According to the statement, the document containing the report of FBI search was jointly signed by the FBI officials and a representative of the Atiku family." The Day adds, "The statement from the Vice President's office quoted Atiku's family lawyers and added that the content of the FBI document was made public to reassure members of the public and disabuse their minds of what it called 'the fabrication of falsehood'."

Court-Appointed Monitor Finds Chicago Hiring Still Based On Politics. The AP (9/7, Robinson) reports, "Chicago officials have been basing hiring decisions on political clout and not merits, defying a court-ordered ban on patronage employment, a federal monitor said Tuesday. Court-appointed monitor Noelle Brennan urged sweeping changes at City Hall, including requiring top officials to swear under penalty of perjury that hirings aren't based on politics. Brennan made the recommendations in an 11-page report to U.S. District Judge Wayne R. Andersen on how to enforce the decades-old Shakman Decree that bans the use of patronage." The AP notes, "The mayor's office of intergovernmental affairs-- the political high command-- has been excessively involved in the hiring process, Brennan said. She said unqualified applicants who have political clout often get consideration for jobs."

Tennessee Transportation Officials Inspect Guardrails Amid Contract Probe. The Tennessean (9/7, Craig) reports, "The Tennessee Department of Transportation said yesterday that it spent $478,385 to inspect every inch of guardrail across the state for evidence of improper installation, but the state won't say what was found." The Tennessean adds, "Some of the state's guardrail companies are under scrutiny by the FBI, the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Transportation Department and the state on suspicion of installing guardrail posts shorter than required lengths. Evidence began to surface in January after an anonymous tip from a guardrail employee. As additional evidence came to light, TDOT deployed teams in May to inspect more than 4,000 miles of state highway guardrails.

Suspect Arraigned In Murder Of Convicted Washington Sex Offenders. The New York Times (9/7, Marshall) reports, "A man who told the police that he had found his victims on a sheriff's department Web site was arraigned yesterday in the killings of two convicted sex offenders in Bellingham, Wash. Investigators said the man, Michael A. Mullen, was upset by a child abuse case in Idaho that involved a repeat sex offender. They said Mr. Mullen, 36, telephoned the 911 center in Bellingham on Monday to confess to a double killing in which a man posing as an F.B.I. agent visited the home of three known sex offenders and told them they were on a hit list and in danger." The AP (9/7, Blankinship) notes Mullen "tried to plead guilty Tuesday before he had even been formally charged. … 'Can I have a speedy trial?' Mullen asked a court official, via closed circuit television from jail, during a preliminary hearing Tuesday. 'I would like to plead guilty.'"

The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Tizon) also reports on Mullens' arraignment and confession.

Jurisdiction In Moving Bus Killing Could Mean Life Or Death. The Baltimore Sun (9/7, Goldberg) reports that Kevin G. Johns Jr. has been "charged in Baltimore County with murder," for killing Philip E. Parker Jr. However, as Parker was killed on a bus that moved through several jurisdictions, the choice of venue is important because "Baltimore County seeks the death penalty much, much, much more frequently than any other venue," according to Byron L. Warnken, a University of Baltimore law professor. The standard when dealing with murders in moving vehicles, as set by "a reported opinion by the Court of Special Appeals," only requires the state "to show that the crime occurred 'close enough to the county boundary' when the evidence is ambiguous," and in this case there is a "lack of certainty about the most basic of details."

Judge Dismisses Lawsuit Against FBI Over Bungled Massachusetts Surrender. The Boston Globe (9/7, Murphy) reports US District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay "ruled yesterday that the FBI can't be sued over a clerk's bungling of a call from Gary Lee Sampson when the killer offered to surrender on bank robbery charges, just a day before going on a murderous rampage four years ago." Lindsay "dismissed a $10 million lawsuit filed by the family of one of Sampson's three victims, 69-year-old Philip McCloskey, of Taunton." Lindsay "wrote that federal law protects the government from being sued for negligence because former FBI clerk William H. Anderson was exercising his discretion when he disconnected Sampson's call to the FBI's Boston office on July 23, 2001, and failed to tell anyone about it. ... McCloskey's son, Scott, said it was ridiculous that the FBI has no legal responsibility, even though Anderson was sentenced to six months in prison for lying under oath when he initially denied taking Sampson's phone call." The AP (9/7) notes, "Sampson waited several hours for the FBI to arrest him outside a convenient store a day before his rampage."

DOJ_NMG_0003124

SCOTUS Asked To Rule On Sleeping Jurors. The New Jersey Law Journal (9/7, Gallagher) reports, "New Jersey's public defender wants the U.S. Supreme Court to issue a bright-line rule that a defendant's due process right to a fair trial is violated when jurors fall asleep during testimony." The Journal continues, "Several jurors allegedly dozed off during Roy Higinia's October 1996 drug-possession trial in Essex County, N.J. The transcript shows that Assistant Deputy Public Defender Rafael Gomez, at a sidebar just prior to cross-examining a police detective, told the judge that four or five jurors were 'deep asleep' and some were 'falling asleep' during his opening. … Superior Court Judge Julius Feinberg said he had not noticed and the case would continue but he would 'wake them up, if necessary.' He then asked the jurors if the room was too hot and when one answered 'a little bit,' he had the windows opened. … The trial proceeded and Higinia was convicted and sentenced to five years in jail." The Journal adds, "The Appellate Division rejected the argument that the defendant was entitled to jurors who have heard all the evidence. In State v. Higinia, A-5515-02, decided March 21, Judges Francine Axelrad and Rudy Coleman said Feinberg took 'proper remedial measures' by opening the windows after surveying the jury. Further, since defense counsel did not request anything more at the time, the issue could not be raised on appeal. … They also found no prejudice because the alleged napping occurred during direct testimony by a prosecution witness and the jurors were awake for the cross-examination. The New Jersey Supreme Court denied certification on May 25."

US, Taiwan Make Additional Counterfeit Seizures In Operation Royal Charm. The AP (9/7) reports that since the arrests of 87 alleged counterfeit smugglers in Operation Royal Charm "authorities seized an additional $1.8 million worth of cigarettes in southern New Jersey on Aug. 21, followed by a seizure of $2.7 million worth of cigarettes the next day at Port Elizabeth, according to the FBI. On Aug. 23, approximately $2 million in counterfeit U.S. currency, commonly referred to as 'super notes,' were seized by Taiwanese and American authorities in Kaohsiung, Taiwan, authorities said. And on Aug. 24, more cigarettes worth more than $500,000 were seized in northern New Jersey."

Federal Prosecutor Says Sliwa Kidnapping Shows Gotti Remained Gambino Boss. The New York Times (9/7, Preston) reports John Gotti "ordered the 1992 kidnapping of the Guardian Angels founder, Curtis Sliwa, because he regarded himself as 'the street boss of his own government,' a federal prosecutor said yesterday in his closing argument in Mr. Gotti's racketeering trial." Assistant US Attorney Joon Kim "pointed to corroboration in testimony about the attack by two former Gambino members, Michael DiLeonardo and Joseph D'Angelo." The Times adds that Charles Carnesi, attorney for codefendant Louis Mariani "said the turncoat witnesses had all shown they were liars. 'They spit out a story and the prosecutors and the F.B.I. decide not to check the story and it becomes the truth,' Mr. Carnesi said. 'The game is rigged.'"

Newsday (9/7, Hurtado) reports Kim said that "Gotti's claim that he retired from mob life after his 1999 guilty plea is 'ridiculous and sounds like a way to get a pass for a lifetime of crime.'" Kim added "that while Gotti pleaded guilty to federal racketeering charges in April 1999, he never stopped committing crimes as Gotti lawyer Jeffrey Lichtman asserted. … 'In Gotti's mind he was not a normal citizen obliged to obey the law,' Kim said." The AP (9/7, Weissenstein) notes, "Gotti continued to meet with gangsters, take their tribute money and plot crimes in the years after his purported renunciation of the mob life, Kim said. 'You've seen no evidence of withdrawal,' he told jurors." Reuters (9/7, Kearney) also report on the prosecution's closing arguments.

Value Of Online Gambling Site Declines. Bloomberg News (9/7) reports, "Shares of PartyGaming Plc, the online poker operator that sold $1.9 billion of stock in a June initial public offering, fell as much as 37 percent to below the IPO price after the company said revenue growth is slowing." Bloomberg continues, "The stock dropped as much as 58.75 pence to 98 pence in London, wiping about 2.4 billion pounds ($4.4 billion) from the company's market value. The shares, which were sold to the public at 116 pence each, were at 105 pence at 12:50 p.m. local time. Stock of competitors including Sportingbet Plc also fell. … PartyGaming's share sale was more than three times subscribed by investors on expectations that the increased popularity of online poker will spur growth in an industry that's expanded 10-fold in three years. The company's revenue gains are slowing as more operators seek to enter the market, adding to competition. … 'There were some clear dangers in relation to the valuation of this company and our concerns have been realized,' said Henk Potts, a London-based fund manager at Barclays Private Clients, which manages the equivalent of $45 billion. 'PartyGaming is all about its growth potential, and some investors decided to bet on the growth rather than consider the potential slowdown.'" Bloomberg adds, "Profit rose 25 percent in the first half, PartyGaming said today in a statement, as revenue gained 81 percent. The company incurred costs of $62.3 million related to its stock sale. … Revenue, 92 percent of which comes from fees for poker games played on the company's Web site, increased to $437.4 million, PartyGaming said. Sales in the U.S. gained 77 percent, while growth outside the U.S. more than doubled. … The company makes 87 percent of its revenue in the U.S., where the Justice Department considers online gambling illegal."

DOJ_NMG_0003125

Bloomberg News (9/7) reports, "In April 2003, Deputy Assistant Attorney General John Malcolm told the Crime, Terrorism and Homeland Security Committee of the U.S. House of Representatives that if online gambling companies accept bets from customers in the U.S., they are violating federal laws. … 'While the United States can indict these companies or the individuals operating these companies, it may be difficult to bring them to trial in the United States,' Malcolm said. … In his testimony, Malcolm referred to the 1961 Federal Interstate Wire Act. The act states that it's illegal to use a 'wire communication facility,' referring to a telephone, to transmit bets across state borders. Congress developed the act to stop organized crime involvement in sports gambling, says Lawrence Walters, a lawyer at Weston, Garrou, DeWitt & Walters in Altamonte Springs, Florida, who has advised the online gaming industry. … 'The government has used the Wire Act as a threat against anyone providing services such as payment processing or advertising to the online gaming companies,' Walters says. 'Even if they are empty threats, public companies are not going to take a chance.'"

CIVIL LAW:

New Jersey Lawmakers Try To Bar Base Closing. WINS, 1010 AM, New York (9/7) reports, "Lawyers for several New Jersey politicians made their plea Tuesday for a judge to issue a ruling that could keep Fort Monmouth open despite a federal commission's recommendation to close it." WINS continues, "U.S. District Judge Mary L. Cooper told them that she would rule quickly _ but did not specify exactly when. … Timing may be of the essence for the judge, who could order the base removed from the list of installations be closed, keep it on the list or set up future hearings on the matter. … By federal law, a list of recommendations for which military installations to close must be submitted to President Bush by Thursday. Bush has pledged to pass the list on to Congress without making any changes." WINS adds, "A lawyer for the government argued in a hearing Tuesday that if there is a time for the court to intervene in the Base Realignment and Closure Commission's process, it is not now. … Justice Department lawyer Carl Nichols said it's too early for those who believe Fort Monmouth should not be shuttered to make their case, in part because the president and Congress have not approved the closures. … 'At that point, and at that point only, would we know Fort Monmouth would be closed,' Nichols said."

General Dynamics Loses Breach Of Contract Suit Brought By Former Partner. The Washington Post (9/7, Merle) reports, "A federal jury in Greenbelt yesterday ordered General Dynamics Corp. to pay $129.9 million to its onetime partner, Final Analysis Communication Services Inc., a small satellite firm, according to officials for the two companies." The Post continues, "The verdict concluded a seven-week trial in U.S. District Court that included appearances by some of the defense industry's biggest players, including Nicholas D. Chabraja, General Dynamics' chief executive; and Gordon R. England, the former General Dynamics executive who is now acting deputy secretary of defense." The Post adds, "The case centered on whether General Dynamics violated agreements to help Lanham-based Final Analysis develop a $400 million project to launch low-flying satellites for data transmissions, including paging and text message services. … James J. McGuire, attorney for Final Analysis, said the jury ordered General Dynamics to pay a total of $137.9 million but also ordered Final Analysis to pay $8 million under a counterclaim, netting $129.9 million for the smaller company." The Post notes, "General Dynamics is awaiting a final decision by the court, said spokesman Kendall Pease. The judge has asked for briefs from both sides, he said. General Dynamics argued in court that a power struggle between the company's founders contributed to the problems, according to the transcripts."

DOJ_NMG_0003126

5th Circuit Rules Attorney-Client Privilege No Shield For Company In Whistleblower Suits. The Texas Lawyer (9/7, Council) reports, "For years, it has been nearly impossible for in-house counsel at Texas companies to bring whistleblower suits against their employers, because companies could claim that the attorney-client privilege protected important evidence from disclosure in such litigation. But a recent 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decision changes all that." Texas Lawyer continues, "The Aug. 24 ruling concerns an appeal of an administrative dismissal of a whistleblower complaint filed by an in-house lawyer. The 5th Circuit held in Willy v. Administrative Review Board, U.S. Department of Labor that the U.S. Department of Labor's Administrative Review Board incorrectly dismissed the in-house lawyer's complaint, after the board determined that a key piece of evidence needed to prove his allegations could not be disclosed because of the attorney-client privilege between the lawyer and the company." Texas Lawyer adds, "The 5th Circuit remanded the case to the Administrative Review Board, noting that the case had 'endured an odyssey through administrative and judicial tribunals' including four appeals to the 5th Circuit. … Coastal Corp. fired Donald J. Willy, then an in-house environmental attorney with the Houston-based company, after a series of events in 1984, according to the 5th Circuit opinion. Willy wrote two reports in 1984, referred to in the opinion as the Belcher Report, in which he concluded that one of the company's subsidiary oil companies was exposed to liability for allegedly violating several federal environmental statutes. Willy's supervisors disagreed with some of his conclusions in the Belcher Report and asked him to delete references to some of the alleged violations, which he refused to do, according to the opinion." Texas Lawyer notes, "Coastal fired Willy after his supervisors accused him of contacting state regulatory officials about environmental matters at a Corpus Christi refinery owned by Coastal, the opinion noted. … In October 1984, Willy filed a complaint with the U.S. Department of Labor, alleging that Coastal violated federal whistleblower laws by firing him in retaliation for writing the Belcher Report -- allegations the company denied."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Opponents Of Georgia Voter ID Law To Monitor Elections. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/7, Campos) reports, "Several groups opposed to a new law requiring voters to show state-issued photo ID at the polls announced Tuesday plans to monitor local elections on Sept. 20." The AJC continues, "The Rev. Joseph Lowery, head of the Coalition for the People's Agenda, said monitors will 'make sure there's no abuse of citizens who want to exercise their right to vote.'" The AJC adds, "Thirty-three Georgia counties and two cities are holding elections Sept. 20. Most are referendums for special purpose local option sales taxes, including one in Cobb County, but some include races for city council posts. Augusta voters will select a replacement for Democratic state Sen. Charles Walker, convicted earlier this year of federal fraud charges. … Volunteers plan to conduct exit polls asking people if they were denied the opportunity to vote due to a lack of photo ID. The Mexican-American Legal Defense Fund has set up a toll-free hotline to field voter complaints: 1-877-462-5333. … Opponents maintain the law will make it harder for poor people, the elderly and college students to vote. And they allege the law violates the Voting Rights Act, though it has received approval from the U.S. Justice Department."

DOJ Officials To Tour Baltimore Juvenile Justice Center. WJZ-TV, CBS 13, Baltimore, MD (9/7) reports, "Continuing troubles and constant complaints about the Juvenile Justice Center bring federal investigators to Baltimore today. … Federal investigators from the Department of Justice will spend nine days inside the Juvenile Justice Center downtown." WJZ-TV adds, "The state run facility is under scrutiny after a series of complaints of youths being mistreated among other issues. .. Meantime, a report on the Justice Department's visit this fall -- should be ready by early next year."

DOJ_NMG_0003127

California Assembly Passes Gay Marriage Bill. On a 41-35 vote the California Assembly passed a bill legalizing same-sex marriage. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger reportedly opposes the bill, but is expected to let the courts decide the issue. The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Vogel) reports the legislature "made history" as it "became the first in the United States to act without a court order to sanction gay unions. The measure was approved after three Democratic lawmakers, who abstained on a similar proposal that failed in June, changed their minds under intense lobbying by bill author Assemblyman Mark Leno (D-San Francisco) and gay and civil rights activists." The legislation, "which would change California's legal definition of marriage from 'a civil contract between a man and a woman' to a 'civil contract between two persons,' now goes to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger. The governor has signaled that he will veto it."

The Washington Times/AP (9/7, Lawrence) notes, "The bill's supporters compared the legislation to such earlier campaigns as women's suffrage and the eradication of slavery." Yet "opponents repeatedly cited the public's vote five years ago" by 61 percent "to approve Proposition 22, an initiative to keep California from recognizing same-sex 'marriages' performed in other states or countries."

The New York Times/AP (9/7) reports a spokesman for Gov. Schwarzenegger said he "believes the issue should be decided by the courts, not by his signature on legislation. A state appellate court is considering appeals of a lower court ruling that overturned California laws banning recognition of gay marriages." Spokeswoman Margita Thompson said, "He will uphold whatever the court decides."

Ohio Ballot Initiative Would Strip GOP Officials Of Control Over Redistricting. The New York Times (9/7, Murphy) reports, "The Ohio secretary of state announced yesterday that a series of election-related constitutional amendments had qualified for the November ballot, including one intended to strip Republican elected officials of their control over drawing legislative districts." One GOP-backed lawsuit to disqualify the amendments was rejected by the Ohio Supreme Court, but a second by former Republican state senator Richard Finan "is to be heard tomorrow in an appeals court in Columbus." He "has said the redistricting measure, if approved, could cost Republicans in Ohio 6 of their 12 seats in Congress and would probably inspire similar Democratic-backed efforts in other states dominated by Republicans."

ANTITRUST:

Unipol Gets Italian Antitrust Nod For BNL Bank Acquisition. The Boston Globe/AP (9/7) reports, "Unipol Assicurazioni SpA said Tuesday it had received the necessary antitrust regulator authorization for its $6.12 billion bid to take over Banca Nazionale del Lavoro SpA." The AP continues, "The bid is pending approval by insurance regulator Isvap and the Bank of Italy." The AP adds, "Italy's market watchdog Consob approved Unipol's prospectus last week but asked the insurer for further information regarding the nature of the agreements with Deutsche Bank. … The German bank has a call option on nearly 5 percent of BNL but is not a member of the shareholder pact led by Unipol that is launching the takeover bid for the Rome-based bank. … Unipol filed the final version of a 400-page document with conditions for its BNL bid to Consob on Friday."

Gas Natural's Endesa Takeover Bid Spurned. The Wall Street Journal (9/7, A3, Johnson, Singer) reports, "Spanish power utility Endesa SA rejected the unsolicited bid of €22.55 billion ($28.27 billion) from Gas Natural SDG SA…setting the stage for a hard-fought takeover battle as the European energy industry undergoes a bout of frantic consolidation." Endesa hired J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., Deutsche Bank AG and Citigroup Inc. "to help it craft its takeover defense … A flurry of deal making is taking place in the European energy sector," spurred "by both the European Union-mandated liberalization of the continent's energy markets and volatile commodity prices."

Court Cases Haven't Reduced Music File Sharing. USA Today (9/7, Graham) reports, "Despite two huge court losses for file-sharing firms, unauthorized online song and movie swapping is at an all-time peak, says Internet measurement company BigChampagne." While "an Australian federal court judge ruled that Sharman Networks, Kazaa's parent firm, must install filters to prevent its software from being used for unauthorized sharing," Kazaa's "popularity already had faded." BigChampagne CEO Eric Garland said "A judgment might have been more meaningful a few years ago, when Kazaa was more popular," and that "the industry should spend less time fighting the online pirates and more time turning them into paying customers."

DOJ_NMG_0003128

Columnist Bearish On Refinery Merger. In his Washington Post column (9/7), Steven Pearlstein writes, "Last week, as supply shortages sent the price of a gallon of gasoline as high as $6 in some markets, federal officials charged with protecting consumers quietly approved yet another oil industry merger, this one creating the nation's largest oil refiner. … Because of the rush of Katrina news, the merger earned hardly a mention in the general press. And yet by giving its blessing to Valero's $8 billion purchase of Premcor, the Federal Trade Commission not only reinforced its reputation as a patsy for the energy industry but demonstrated a stunning lack of political sensitivity." Pearlstein continues, "Although the FTC and its staff never seem to make the link between industry consolidation, rising energy prices and record profits, Wall Street investors surely can. Over the past year, shares in Valero are up 226 percent, which, as the Financial Times pointed out last week, makes Google (only 186 percent) look like a laggard. … Listen to what Valero's chief executive, Bill Greehey, had to say Thursday in announcing that the deal had closed: 'We are in a new era for refining where I believe you will continue to see higher highs and higher lows for both product margins and sour crude discounts. And now, with 18 refineries, no one is better positioned to benefit from this than Valero.' … Translation: This deal will do nothing for consumers, but it's a home run for investors." Pearlstein adds, "Here's the situation, as far as I can make it out. Refineries in the United States produce about 18 million barrels of refined product a day for an economy that consumes about 21 million. A completely new refinery hasn't been built in this country in nearly 40 years. And although Valero and others have spent $47 billion over the past decade to expand existing capacity by 13 percent, demand has grown even faster. … The reason that supply has not kept up in this industry, as in others, is simple: The industry makes more money that way. And one way the industry is better able to enforce this gentleman's agreement against investing too heavily in new capacity is by reducing the number of players and making entry into the industry even more difficult than it is already." Pearlstein concludes, "Valero is a great company and a real success story. … But what the country needs isn't a bigger Valero -- it's more Valeros, challenging the majors, investing heavily in new capacity and competing for market share. By approving the merger with Premcor, the FTC has reduced the chance of having that kind of full-throttle competition in an industry that desperately needs it."

ENVIRONMENT:

EPA To Bar Use Of Children, Pregnant Women In Pesticide Studies. The EPA plans to propose regulations for human testing of pesticides which will bar the inclusion of children and pregnant women in studies examining the effects of the chemicals. The New York Times (9/7, Janofsky) reports, "The regulations, to be proposed on Wednesday, would also establish an independent oversight panel to ensure that all studies submitted to the agency were conducted ethically and followed internationally accepted protocols for human testing. Agency officials discussed the new regulations with reporters on Tuesday. They declined to make copies of the proposal available, leading at least one major critic of the agency, Senator Barbara Boxer, Democrat of California, to suggest that a close examination of the regulations might reveal weaknesses identified in an earlier version.'

Illegal Off-Road Vehicles Destroying Parkland, "Serious National Problem." The Christian Science Monitor (9/7, Clayton) reports, "Unauthorized off-road vehicles are buzzing through nearly one-third of America's national parks, according to a recently released internal National Park Service (NPS) survey. In one-fifth of the parks, they have damaged natural environments that by law must be preserved for future generations." While the Parks Service "downplay the challenge" of dealing with the problem, "critics say the problem is acute and growing," and "other branches of the Department of Interior…say illegal motorized vehicles are a serious national problem. The chief of the National Forest Service…called it one of his top four management problems."

Bonilla Takes Aim At Eminent Domain. Legislation authored by Rep. Henry Bonilla would deny federal funding to any state or local government that employs the right of eminent domain to transfer property from one private owner to another, The Hill (9/7) reports. Agriculture Committee Chairman Bob Goodlatte "characterized the legislation as the strongest response yet to the Supreme Court's June ruling in Kelo v. City of New London, Conn., which affirmed governments' rights to seize property from landowners for private development deemed by elected officials to be in the community interest. The Agriculture Committee, which will hold a hearing on the Bonilla bill today, has been given primary jurisdiction on the issue."

DOJ_NMG_0003129

LATimes Urges Congress To Support Coastal Restoration. The Los Angeles Times (9/7) editorializes, "For the next several weeks, and possibly months, the Army Corps of Engineers will pump the water out [of New Orleans]. Meanwhile the Corps, Congress and the Bush administration need to figure out how to avoid a repeat of last week's disaster." The Times goes on to say "the very levees and canals that protect New Orleans and provide navigation divert replenishing sediment. Louisiana loses about 24 square miles of this land barrier each year." This is land that could "present hurricanes with a formidable…barrier to cross before reaching New Orleans. A plan backed by environmentalists, industry and the Corps of Engineers would spend $2 billion to dredge sediment from the Gulf to be used in rebuilding the land, and divert some river sediment toward the marshland. Congress should not only approve that project but should start giving serious consideration to the rest of a $14-billion coastal restoration project supported by 11 state and federal agencies."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Code Provision Has Been Used Against Government Leakers. The Washington Post (9/7, A23, Lee) writes that convictions for "leaking sensitive government information to the media are almost as rare as sightings of the ivory-billed woodpecker." But while there have been few convictions under the Intelligence Identities Protection Act, there is "another statute that federal officials have used to go after government leakers. … The provision, Section 641 in Title 18 of the U.S. Code, nominally deals with prohibitions on the embezzlement of public money, property or records for private use. It typically would be used to go after a federal employee who, say, absconds with government laptops." Prosecutors used the statute against Jonathan Randel, "a former Drug Enforcement Agency intelligence research specialist who in 2003 was sentenced to a year in prison for selling restricted information." Randel "provided information from a DEA database to the Times of London newspaper indicating that the name of Lord Michael Ashcroft -- a dual citizen of Britain and Belize who was treasurer of the Conservative Party -- was in agency files used in investigations of drug trafficking. The newspaper cited the information in stories on Ashcroft and his business dealings in Belize, stories that Ashcroft complained falsely suggested that he was a target of DEA investigations into drug trafficking. (After Ashcroft filed a libel suit, the paper published a statement saying there was no evidence he had been suspected of any drug-related crime.) Prosecutors said Randel was paid $13,000 for the information, which was sensitive but not classified. The newspaper said the money was to cover Randel's expenses and time when he traveled to Britain to help the newspaper prepare a defense to Ashcroft's libel suit." Prosecutors are considering using the provision in any case against a suspect in the Valerie Plame name-leak probe.

Medical Marijuana Does Not Influence Teen Use, MPP Study Suggests. UPI (9/6, Zwillich) reports that, according to a study "funded and released by the Marijuana Policy Project," teenagers in state that allow medical marijuana "are no more likely to use the drug than those in other states." The study "shows widespread reductions in marijuana use have occurred generally at the same rate among all the states, including those allowing medical use. … The group said its findings belie Bush administration claims that medical-marijuana laws send youth a mixed message that helps to encourage drug use. Ten states currently allow patients with certain medical conditions to use marijuana under the supervision of a physician." The US has seen an overall "decrease in marijuana's popularity among teenagers since 2000, after a prolonged increase in use during the 1990s. For example, compared with 1996, about 43 percent fewer 8th graders and 9 percent fewer 12th graders reported they had used the drug in the past 30 days in 2003. California became the first state to permit medical-marijuana use in 1996. At the same time, past-month use dropped by half among the state's 9th graders and by one-quarter among 11th graders, according to the report, which analyzed federal and state statistics. Approximately one-fifth of California's high school juniors now acknowledge using marijuana within the last month. Other states with medical-marijuana laws also saw varying reductions in youth marijuana use. Past-month use by 12th graders in Washington state was down 32 percent since a medical-marijuana law was enacted in 1998, though rates dropped only 12 percent among Maine's high school seniors since a similar law was passed there in 1999."

DOJ_NMG_0003130

The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Bailey) reports that "Tom Riley, of the president's Office of National Drug Control Policy, said the drop in teen drug use across the nation is attributable to the federal anti-drug advertising campaign in recent years, including $125 million spent during the federal fiscal year that ends Oct. 1. Medical marijuana has only clouded that pitch, he said. 'It's foolish to give kids a message that marijuana can be helpful to them,' Riley said, adding that all Americans 'should be glad that teen drug use is going down. If the drug legalizers are recognizing that, too, I think that says something.'"

"Jury Is Still Out" On Methadone Dependency Risk. The Boston Herald (9/7, Wedge) reports, "Seen by many as a miracle cure for heroin addiction, the jury is still out on whether methadone can itself impair users or create a long-term dependency. 'There still appears to be some controversy about it,' said Jim Ross, a counselor at Taunton's Community Partnerships, which specializes in helping heroin addicts. 'Although it is supposedly not addictive, we've seen firsthand some people do not use it as a stepping stone (toward recovery) and they end up being dependent on methadone their whole life. And that could be a good or a bad thing.' The White House Drug Policy Information Clearinghouse supports methadone programs, saying the drug 'does not impair cognitive functions' and 'is not sedating or intoxicating.' The federal clearinghouse also says the drug does not 'interfere with ordinary activities such as driving a car or operating machinery.'" In addition to "possible side effects, Ross said addicts sometimes stockpile methadone to sell. 'Methadone has been a great saving grace for many heroin addicts,' he said. 'We need to be as supportive as we can to help addicts, but sometimes we need to ask questions to assure we're taking care of public safety as well.'"

Guilty Plea In Texas Drug Money Trafficking Case. The Lufkin (TX) Daily News (9/7, Cook) reports tractor-trailer driver Juan Castanon of Mission, Texas, "pleaded guilty Friday in federal court to trafficking close to $3 million in drug money through Nacogdoches County, according to plea papers filed in court." Castanon "could face up to five years in federal prison on the charge. Details of his plea agreement with the U.S. Attorney's Office remained sealed in court documents. Texas Department of Public Safety Trooper Ryan Koonce found the stash of cocaine-tainted cash during a Feb. 8 traffic stop. The money was hidden in a secret compartment in Castanon's trailer. A drug-sniffing dog alerted Koonce to the bundled and wrapped money, which later tested positive for traces of cocaine."

Fox Challenges Drug Kingpins To Take On Security Forces In Nuevo Laredo. Reuters (9/6) reports that Mexican President Vicente Fox "challenged drug barons" to "take on security forces in a notorious city on the U.S. border where troops and police are locked in a war with traffickers. Fox said in an interview that federal forces were in control of Nuevo Laredo, across from Laredo, Texas, despite more than 100 drug-related murders there this year." Fox said, "We are going to win this battle. We'll see who is tougher, we'll see who is more stubborn." The "explosion of violence among drug gangs vying for control of a cocaine, heroin and marijuana smuggling route into the United States has drawn an influx of Mexican troops to Nuevo Laredo and strained relations with Washington. The murder rate has soared with killings practically every day, and residential neighborhoods have seen shootouts with heavy weaponry, at one point prompting the U.S. Embassy to close a consulate in Nuevo Laredo. But Fox said his government has taken control of the sweltering city, which also is a hub for legitimate trade." Fox said, "Nuevo Laredo now has much less criminal activity from these kingpins than it did two months ago. I can tell you that we have the city under control and from there we will put things in order." But as the "death toll rises, with 15 police officers among those killed by gunmen this year, residents and local activists are skeptical about authorities' ability to stem the tide of violence. Critics say very few cartel henchmen have been put behind bars and there is no evidence the tighter security will curb the flow of drugs across the border."

Spain Leads World In Cocaine Use. The British newspaper the Guardian (9/7, Tremlett) reports, "Spaniards are the most prolific users of cocaine in the world, according to a report from state prosecutors obtained by El País newspaper yesterday. Spain has overtaken the US and left Britain and Ireland behind, with the proportion of people who use the drug rising to more than one in 40. 'Spain occupies the top place in the world,' the report said, citing United Nations figures on cocaine use around the globe. The reason for such a high rate in Spain is that much of Europe's cocaine is unloaded on to Spanish beaches." In 2004, 33 tons of cocaine "were seized by Spanish police, much of it being handled by the smuggling clans in the north-western region of Galicia who turned to the lucrative cocaine trade more than 10 years ago. The smugglers offer their services to traffickers from around the world who want to get the drug into Europe. Often cocaine is unloaded from merchant ships into trawlers and then, once near the Spanish coast and under the cover of darkness, into speedboats that land it on Galicia's rugged beaches. The Galician smugglers store it then hand it back to the traffickers. They take a cut of the cocaine as payment. More than 50% of cocaine found by police in Europe is discovered by Spanish officers, who arrested about 600 suspected traffickers from Colombia last year, and 150 from Britain. Spanish police were also reported yesterday to have been behind the discovery of 4.6 tonnes of cocaine unloaded in Rotterdam at the weekend."

DOJ_NMG_0003131

IMMIGRATION:

TAX:

Twelve More May Be Indicted Over KPMG Shelters. The Wall Street Journal (9/7, C1, Weil, Scannell) reports that assistant U.S. Attorney Justin Weddle, lead prosecutor in the KPMG LLP tax-shelter investigation, said "the government expects to seek indictments against at least 12 more" as yet unnamed "individuals in the coming weeks, on top of the nine people who were arraigned yesterday … The additional defendants will be named as part of a superseding indictment" that "likely would include obstruction of justice, as well as tax evasion, in addition to the existing conspiracy count that the government unsealed last week." While "prosecutors asked for three months to seek the superseding indictment, citing Justice Department procedures for tax-fraud prosecutions," Judge Lewis A. Kaplan denied the motion, saying, "'You're going to have to move a lot faster. It's not clear to me why you can't.'" The government has an Oct. 17 deadline to file its superseding indictment. Reuters (9/7, Graybow) also reports on the arraignment.

Proceeding Could Be "Unwieldy," Judge Lays Down Rules. The New York Times (9/7, Glater) adds, "The proceedings yesterday offered a hint of how unwieldy the case against the nine executives, let alone against as many as 21 possible defendants, could be." Judge Kaplan "warned prosecutors against lengthy proceedings" and "advised lawyers for both sides to prepare as clear a presentation for jurors as possible, using video presentations, for instance, and avoiding cumbersome binders full of copies of exhibits."

Lawyer-Client Privilege Being Pared Back. The New York Times (9/7, Glater) reports that lawyer-client "privilege has been weakened…as more individual defendants try to argue that their actions were blessed by a lawyer and that, as a result, they did not know they were doing anything wrong." Some "powerful forces have put in play the privilege protecting communications, as well as the so-called work product privilege covering documents and other work by a lawyer in anticipation of litigation." William Ide III, a lawyer at McKenna Long & Aldridge in Atlanta and also chairman of an American Bar Association committee on lawyer-client privilege "and other lawyers say they worry that when prosecutors insist on a waiver, they are essentially making corporations an offer they cannot refuse." Robert S. Bennett, of Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom," said "'In today's climate, in order for a company to avoid an indictment, it must cooperate with the government. And today, cooperation…as a practical matter often requires companies to waive the attorney-client privilege.'" With this erosion, "companies may have difficulty conducting internal inquiries if employees do not talk because they know their statements may end up being handed over to the government; executives may decide not to consult lawyers before making critical business decisions; and lawyers may temper their advice if they know it may one day be exposed."

Thousands Not Taking Advantage Of Higher Education Tax Break. The number of Americans who claimed a federal higher education tax break in 2002 was more than double the number who did in 1996. USA Today (9/7, Marklein) reports that while nearly 10 million Americans claimed the tax break last year, "hundreds of thousands of families who may be eligible for such breaks aren't taking advantage of them, a federal report says." A report issued last week by the GAO, "found that filers of 27% of the 1.8 million returns it analyzed appeared eligible but did not claim either a tuition deduction or tax credit.'

DOJ_NMG_0003132

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Mentions Gonzales As Possible O'Connor Replacement. The AP (9/7, Holland) reports President Bush "said the list of possibilities for his second Supreme Court nomination was 'wide open' Tuesday as Senate Republicans urged him to consider a woman and Democrats pressed him to consult with them before making his next pick." The Washington Post (9/7, A9, Baker, Becker) adds Bush "playfully hinted he could choose his friend Alberto R. Gonzales, a prospect that reignited consternation among conservative groups skeptical of the attorney general's politics."

The Washington Times (9/7, Sammon) also reports Bush "reignited speculation that he would nominate" Attorney General Gonzales. Bush "made his comments at a Cabinet meeting, adding that his words 'should create some good speculation here in Washington. And make sure you notice when I said that I looked right at Al Gonzales, who can really create speculation.'" The Times adds, "Although the remark drew chuckles from Cabinet members and journalists, Bush aides said he is seriously considering Mr. Gonzales. That prompted a fresh round of grumbling from conservatives, who fear that Mr. Gonzales would not vote to overturn Roe v. Wade, the 1973 high court ruling that legalized abortion."

The New York Times (9/7, Stevenson, Stolberg) says Bush's "mention of Mr. Gonzales as a possibility, in comments to reporters at the end of a cabinet meeting, fueled concern among conservatives, who were already mobilizing against the attorney general. Conservatives say that Mr. Gonzales has not shown himself to be sufficiently opposed to abortion rights and that nominating him would miss an opportunity to move the court fundamentally to the right."

NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 17, 2:00, P. Williams) reported that "as far as a successor for Justice O'Connor, President Bush suggested today he will not send up a name for another week or so." President Bush: "I want the Senate to focus not on who the next nominee is going to be, but the nominee I got up there now. And it's important for the country that they complete the work."

The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Reynolds) reports Democrats "urged the president to move quickly to fill the vacancy, saying it would be easier for them to support Roberts' nomination if they knew the name of the second nominee." Judiciary Committee member Sen. Richard Durbin said, "If we had an idea of who might fill the other vacancy, it would help put (Roberts' nomination) in perspective. This court is very closely divided, and if the president's next nominee is too extreme, it will worry us that the court is going to change for generations to come." The Times adds Sen. Russell D. Feingold "said it was now more important for the White House to release 16 case files from Roberts' service in George H.W. Bush's administration that the current White House has withheld."

The Roberts story appeared almost universally in local television news broadcasts across the nation. In many newscasts, there were comments about how Robert's new nomination could change the tenor of his confirmation hearings. For example, WFLA-TV Tampa (9/6, 11:10 a.m.) reported, "President Bush's decision to nominate John Roberts as the nation's 17th Supreme Court Chief Justice raises the stakes of the upcoming Senate confirmation hearings." KCNC-TV Denver (9/6. 5:04 a.m.) added, "The legal wrangling from both parts could make the hearings pretty interesting. They are going to say they want an up or down vote before the President has to make his other selection, and the Democrats are going to say 'whoa, we want it as a package deal. We want to know when the other shoe falls before we make a decision on John Roberts.'"

Meanwhile, KONG-TV Seattle (9/6, 7:37 a.m.) said Roberts "may be a better fit to succeed his mentor Rehnquist than to succeed Sandra Day O'Connor, more of a somewhat moderate Republican and swing vote on the Supreme Court. That may now be the big fight for the next Supreme Court nomination after weeks and weeks of trying to dig up things on John Roberts, not much has been found, although Democrats and others have indicated that the questioning will be tougher now because, after all, he is being nominated for Chief Justice of the Supreme Court."

Republicans were portrayed as optimistic as the hearings draw near. KUSA-TV Denver (9/6, 4:10 p.m.) reported, "Republican's expect he'll be approved," while KPRC-TV Houston (9/6, 4:23 p.m.) said "Bill Frist says they hope to have a Chief Justice in place by the end of the month."

Gonzales Possible Supreme Court Nominee, Again. Alberto Gonzales was named as a possible nominee for the Supreme Court by a few stations: WGN-TV Chicago (9/6, 6:44 a.m.), WMAQ-TV Chicago (9/6, 11:16 a.m.), KCCI-TV Des Moines (9/6, 7:11 a.m.), and KAIT-TV Jonesboro (9/6, 5:30 a.m.)

DOJ_NMG_0003133

Katrina Increases Gonzales' Chances. WNBC-TV New York (9/6, 6:36 a.m.) reported, "What the American people have seen in the aftermath of Katrina, probably elevates the imperative on the White House to try to demonstrate to Americans that George Bush is the president of all Americans, that probably helps Alberto Gonzalez, the attorney general, who would be the first Hispanic elevated to the court if chosen."

Terror Policies, Centrism, Gender Work Against Gonzales. KSFY-TV Sioux Falls (9/6, 6:33 a.m.) reported, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales seems to have dropped off because of opposition to him because of the War on Terror policies he's advocated and because many conservatives see his as too centrist."

KRDO-TV Colorado Springs (9/6, 6:06 a.m.) also reported this in much the same words.

WSPA-TV Greenville (9/6, 5:15 a.m.) reported, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is mentioned as a candidate, but analysts say the president is under pressure to nominate a woman."

Key Republicans Said To Be Pressing Bush To Nominate A Woman. The Hill (9/7, Bolton) reports, "Key Republicans and conservatives are pressing President Bush to nominate a woman to replace retiring Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor." It "may suggest that, with the president faltering in opinion polls, the right believes it needs the sop of liberal identity politics to get a second conservative justice confirmed. Priscilla Owen, Edith Jones and Edith Brown Clement, all three from the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, and Janice Rogers Brown, of the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, are considered by conservatives to lead the list of potential female nominees."

Alito Mentionied As Possible Nominee. The AP (9/7, De La Cruz) reports, "A second opening on the U.S. Supreme Court is bringing renewed interest in Samuel A. Alito Jr., a federal judge from New Jersey who used to serve as the state's federal prosecutor." The AP continues, "Alito, who sits on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers the Garden State, is among several people mentioned by court observers as being on a "short list" of candidates for associate justice to succeed Sandra Day O'Connor. She is retiring but remaining on the bench until her replacement is confirmed. President Bush's original choice for that position, John Roberts, has been nominated to become chief justice following the death Saturday of William H. Rehnquist. … The other possible nominees include U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, former U.S. Solicitor General Theodore Olson, and former deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson." The AP notes, "Alito, 55, has been dubbed 'Scalito' or 'Scalia-lite' by some lawyers and political pundits because of a reputation as a strong, conservative jurist that often brings comparisons to conservative Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia. But Alito, 55, also has a reputation as being scholarly and quiet, rarely asking questions during oral arguments."

Judiciary Committee To Vote On Roberts By September 26. The Wall Street Journal (9/7) reports Senate leaders "said the Judiciary Committee will vote no later than Sept. 26 on the nomination of Appeals Court Judge John Roberts to become the next U.S. chief justice." Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter said that "the committee will begin confirmation hearings on Monday. The hearings are expected to run a week. Although Republican and Democratic leaders said they are working together to move Mr. Roberts's nomination quickly, the full Senate might not hold a final vote on Judge Roberts until just before the high court convenes for its new term on Oct. 3." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "said Democrats plan to work with Republicans to move ahead on the hearings. But he said his party remains largely uncommitted on how it will vote."

NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 17, 2:00, P. Williams) reported Judge Roberts' "'hearings have been put off due to the funeral, but even the Democratic Senate leader predicted a prompt confirmation." Sen. Harry Reed (D) Nevada: "We're going to do everything we can so that we do have a full court by the beginning of term."

Roll Call (9/7, Kane) reports the Senate Judiciary Committee "will kick-start hearings on Judge John Roberts' nomination to be chief justice of the United States on Monday, a six-day delay allowing for the funeral and burial services this week for the late William Rehnquist. The delay, however, still leaves plenty of time for the committee to hold a week's worth of hearings, as originally scheduled, and send the nominee to the full Senate for a vote by the final week of September — the timetable originally laid out by Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.)."

The Washington Times (9/7, Hurt) reports Majority Leader Bill Frist said, "The schedule allows us both to pause to pay appropriate respect to Chief Justice Rehnquist and to complete floor action on the nomination of Judge Roberts as chief justice by October 3, the start of the Supreme Court's new term."

DOJ_NMG_0003134

Specter Quizzes Roberts On Hot-Button Issues. The Washington Post (9/7, A9, Babington) reports Judiciary Chairman Specter invited Roberts "to his Senate office shortly after Roberts helped carry William H. Rehnquist's coffin into the Supreme Court, where the late chief justice lay in repose. In an interview, Specter said he asked Roberts, an appeals court judge, a range of questions, including, 'How are you going to handle guys like Scalia? He's a lot older than you.'" Roberts "replied somewhat indirectly, according to Specter, by saying he considers it 'a dialogue among equals' when lawyers argue cases before the Supreme Court." Specter "said he also raised concerns about recent court rulings that he considers confusing and inexplicable. They include two 5 to 4 decisions regarding public displays of the Ten Commandments that in some ways seemed contradictory." But when Specter asked if Roe vs. Wade was a "super-precedent," Roberts "didn't say."

Democrats Plan To Step Up Questioning Of Roberts On Civil Rights. The Washington Post (9/7, A9, Baker, Becker) reports some "influential Democrats signaled that Roberts's ascension" to the chief justiceship "increased their eagerness to press him on his record -- particularly on civil rights, which they said has taken on new salience in the wake of Hurricane Katrina." Sen. Edward Kennedy said, "What the American people have seen is this incredible disparity in which those people who had cars and money got out and those people who were impoverished died." He said the "question for Roberts, he said, is whether he stands for 'a fairer, more just nation' or for 'narrow, stingy interpretations of the law to frustrate progress.'" Democrats will "make that argument in part through their witness list, which includes Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), a leader in the 1960s civil rights movement who plans to note that courts historically have led the way in guaranteeing rights for the disenfranchised." Rep. Lewis said, "New Orleans is just a symbol. We are still a nation divided by race and class, and I don't see [Roberts] being an advocate for those who were left out and left behind." Reuters (9/7, Ferraro) reports Democrats are "vowing to take as long as needed to question" Roberts, "who could lead the Supreme Court for decades."

Knight Ridder (9/7, Kuhnhenn) reports that by "opening questions about poverty, race and government policies, Hurricane Katrina has made landfall on Washington's deliberations over vacancies on the U.S. Supreme Court and threatens to make John Roberts' confirmation hearings for chief justice a contentious test of conservative thought." Democrats and liberal groups "say Roberts' past opposition to expanded affirmative action and voting rights laws should get extra scrutiny, especially in light of the disproportionate suffering by poor black residents of New Orleans." Despite the "stepped up scrutiny, Roberts' confirmation still appears likely."

The Legal Times (9/7, Mauro) reports, "By today, Supreme Court nominee John Roberts Jr. was supposed to be answering the questions of Senate Judiciary Committee members as part of his confirmation hearing to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Instead, because of the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist on Saturday, and the swift decision by President George W. Bush to put Roberts in the chief justice's spot instead, the Roberts hearing has been put off until Monday. … But when the hearing finally gets underway, the questions will likely be the same, and the dilemma for Roberts will be the same, though possibly more urgent: how candid should he be about his views on the law? It's a crucial decision for Roberts to make. Senate Democrats will be insisting on as much candor as possible, while Republicans hope and expect Roberts will stay out of trouble by invoking a previously unheard of doctrine called the 'Ginsburg precedent.'" The Times continues, "In anticipation of a reticent Roberts, conservatives offered evidence of what the Federalist Society said was the 'vast number' of times Clinton nominee Ruth Bader Ginsburg declined to answer substantive questions during her 1993 confirmation hearing. Liberal groups including the American Constitution Society fired back, documenting all the moments when Ginsburg actually answered questions 'candidly and at length.' … Sen. Charles Schumer, D-NY, gave a speech last week debunking the conservative version of the Ginsburg precedent, warning that if Roberts invokes it, it will sound more like taking the Fifth. On the other side, former Republican Attorneys General Edwin Meese III, Dick Thornburgh and William Barr, among others, wrote to the Judiciary Committee reminding members that Ginsburg said during her hearing that she would give 'no hints, no forecast, no previews' of how she might vote on future cases."

Trivia About Roberts. People (9/12) publishes ten trivia facts about John Roberts, ranging from his taste in music, his handedness (ambidextrous), to anecdotes about his childhood, to how he met his wife and adopted their children. Roberts "has argued 39 cases before the Supreme Court – more than nay of the current justices," and "writes his courtroom speeches in longhand." Roberts "became a first-time parent at 45," and he and his wife have "hinted they would like some more." Documents "released to date show [Roberts is] worth $5.3 million."

DOJ_NMG_0003135

Bork Backs Roberts For Chief Justice. The Washington Times (9/7, Harper) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Robert H. Bork, the Reagan-era Supreme Court nominee rejected by the Senate after his 1987 confirmation hearings devolved into public spectacle, says he wants Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to be confirmed as the next chief justice. Speaking at the National Press Club yesterday, Mr. Bork suggested it's unlikely Supreme Court confirmation hearings ever again will resemble 'any dignified process.'"

Chief Justice Rehnquist Mourned At Supreme Court. NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 17, 2:00, Williams) reported, "There was a rare and dramatic sight today at the US Supreme Court. Chief Justice William Rehnquist, laying in repose: One of the pallbearers was the man nominated to replace him as chief justice." NBC (P. Williams) added, "It was, as far as the experts could remember, unprecedented, a pallbearer helping to carry the casket of a Supreme Court justice he's been nominated to succeed. John Roberts was one of the eight pallbearers, mostly former Rehnquist law clerks, as the chief justice arrived for the final time at the building where he served for more than three decades."

ABC World News Tonight (9/6, story 4, :30, Gibson) reported, "Six justices paid their respects. Among them, a visibly moved Sandra Day O'Connor. President Bush came later in the day. Rehnquist will lie in repose, until his funeral tomorrow afternoon." The CBS Evening News (9/6, story 8, 0:40, Schieffer) reported, "In Washington, the casket of Chief Justice William Rehnquist was carried today to the Supreme Court. Among the pallbearers, was federal judge John Roberts, who was once a law clerk for Rehnquist, and now the nominee to replace him as chief justice. The current justices waited tearfully."

The Washington Post (9/7, A8, Levine, Lane) reports "few gathered in the morning crowd outside the Supreme Court missed the most telling moments: When John G. Roberts Jr., the man nominated to succeed Rehnquist, walked solemnly with the other pallbearers toward the hearse bearing his body, and when an emotional Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, on the eve of her own planned farewell, wiped away tears as the plain white pine coffin passed and entered the building's Great Hall." USA Today (9/7, Biskupic) reports the "moment seemed to symbolize a transition of sorts, and with Roberts facing confirmation hearings in the Senate on Monday it was a reminder of a question that will be part of the backdrop to the hearings: how Roberts' style and brand of conservatism compares with that of the man he would succeed."

USA Today (9/7, Kiely) reports Roberts "was one of eight ex-Rehnquist aides who served as pallbearers. President Bush later paid a solemn visit to the court, a day after nominating the federal appeals court judge to become the nation's 17th chief justice."

USA Today (9/7, Biskupic) reports one "of the most compelling images was the distraught, tear-streaked face of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Her public sadness was a reminder of all that Rehnquist and the nation's first female justice had been through together. They met in law school at Stanford University in the late 1940s. The World War II veteran was nearly six years her senior, but they developed a bond that endured through the years. They dated briefly, but then married other college sweethearts. Their families became close as Rehnquist and O'Connor walked remarkably similar paths."

The New York Times (9/7, Greenhouse) reports President Bush "and his wife, Laura, made an unscheduled visit on Tuesday to the Supreme Court to pay their respects to Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, whose flag-draped coffin lay in the 'great hall' that leads to the courtroom." During their "brief midafternoon visit, the president and first lady walked together to the coffin, and then examined the portrait in the company of Justice Antonin Scalia and Sally Rider, the chief justice's administrative assistant."

The Washington Times (9/7, Mansfield) reports, "Solemn and respectful they stood, single file, and at times the line snaked around the block in the September sunshine: congressional staffers, college kids in baseball caps, tourists, Capitol Hill groundskeepers, many on their lunch break."

Rehnquist's Legacy Noted. USA Today (9/7) says in an editorial, "Chief Justice William Rehnquist was that rarity among public officials: one who worked to make his office less powerful. From his days as a Supreme Court clerk a half-century ago until his death Saturday after 33 years on the court, Rehnquist argued for leaving important decisions to state legislatures or, if necessary, Congress — not the courts. The result was a career that foreshadowed much of today's political debate, and one that helps to focus it."

In a USA Today op-ed (9/7), Tom Mauro says, "It is sad but unsurprising that Chief Justice William Rehnquist's death came at a most inopportune time, full of ironies. Many of the ironies of his death were personal. But it also was remarkable that Rehnquist died at a moment when the nation was completely distracted by a crisis that relates significantly to his judicial legacy. The finger-pointing between state and federal officials over the handling of Hurricane Katrina's awful devastation is a debate that Rehnquist would have found familiar."

DOJ_NMG_0003136

The New York Times (9/7) says in an editorial that it is "a moment to honor one of the vital but less celebrated hallmarks of Chief Justice Rehnquist's 33-year service on the court: his proud record of defending the independence of the federal judiciary against attacks by politicians. Those attacks, as Chief Justice Rehnquist noted last January in his 19th and final report on the state of the federal courts, have taken a troubling new turn in recent years. Without singling out individual members of Congress by name, he made clear his disapproval of some conservative Republicans, like the House majority leader, Tom DeLay, and others. He disapproved of their moving beyond the normal criticism of judicial decisions to try to bully and intimidate individual judges, strip federal courts of jurisdiction to decide certain constitutional challenges, and otherwise undermine the constitutional separation of powers and checks and balances."

Bush Announces Inquiry Into Government's Response To Katrina. Political fallout from the government's response to Hurricane Katrina was fast and furious yesterday. The President, who met with congressional leaders, announced a review of the Federal response, and said he was sending Vice President Cheney to the affected region to evaluate the damage. As NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 4, 2:05) White House correspondent David Gregory reported, "At the White House, a series of appearances were designed to help the President reassert control over the catastrophe. The message, that hurricane relief is now the top priority for a White House still reeling from criticism it responded too late." Yet even as Bush sought to focus attention on relief and recovery efforts and promised an investigation into what went wrong, congressional Democrats blasted the Administration for the delay in Federal relief. Other members of Congress, such as Sens. Trent Lott and Hillary Clinton, called for taking the Federal Emergency Management Agency out of the Department of Homeland Security.

NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 4, 2:05, Williams) reported Bush "clearly seemed to be trying to get out ahead of this crisis." NBC (Gregory) added, "Stung by blistering criticism of the government's response to Katrina, the President for the first time today promised accountability." Meanwhile, "top Democrats" are "calling for an immediate, independent, 9/11-commission style investigation as troubling questions are raised in Washington about the government's ability to secure Americans after another major storm or worse, a massive terror attack."

ABC World News Tonight (9/6, story 3, 2:35, Moran) reported the White House "was both the hub of a lot of Federal activity aimed at helping people affected by Katrina and a battleground over who should be held accountable for the catastrophic failure to respond last week." Bush told the Cabinet "recovery is their top priority" and he "announced he was sending Vice President Cheney to the Gulf Coast on Thursday to assess the progress on the relief efforts." The President "promised a thorough review of the government's failures," but "all day today the White House refused to discuss holding anyone accountable." On Capitol Hill, "there was scorn." House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi: "The President said he's going to lead the investigation into what went wrong. He need to look only in the mirror." Moran: "But others argue that Congress itself is to blame, for downgrading the Federal Emergency Management Agency after 9/11, placing it under the control of the Homeland Security secretary."

The CBS Evening News (9/6, lead story, 1:30, Schieffer) led its broadcast by contrasting statements made by President Bush with those of Jefferson Parish executive Aaron Broussard, who said, "Bureaucracy has murdered people in the greater New Orleans area and bureaucracy needs to stand trial before Congress today." Schieffer: "Back in Washington, the President said there will be time enough to pass judgment later."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/6, Blitzer) reported, "The White House knows what happens when Congress comes back to town and that is: The criticism that already has been going on gets louder and louder, closer and closer to the White House. So, it was obvious that the President wanted to try to head that off."

Much of the print coverage this morning suggests the White House's efforts to regain its political "footing" have so far been unsuccessful. The AP (9/7, Loven) reports, "The Bush White House is known for its ability to remain in control of its message and image, sliding out of crises with barely a scratch. Not this time." Despite "day after day of appearances by…Bush aimed at undoing the political damage from a poor response to Hurricane Katrina, the White House has not been able to regain its footing, already shaken by the war in Iraq and a death toll exceeding 1,880." The administration yesterday "struggled to deflect calls for an accounting of who was responsible for a hurricane response that even Bush acknowledged was inadequate." White House counselor Dan Bartlett "said the president and his aides are unconcerned for now about the unrelenting criticism. 'Emotions are running high. People are tired,' Bartlett said. 'If we focused more of our attention on decisions that have already been made, rather than on those before us, there's potential for making far greater mistakes. ... We really don't have time to play the political game right now.'"

DOJ_NMG_0003137

Reuters (9/7, Holland) adds "partisan tempers flared" yesterday, and "much anger from Democrats and Republicans alike has been directed at Bush for a slow federal response to a catastrophe that may have killed thousands in New Orleans and along the Gulf coast." Along the same lines, the Washington Post (9/7, A19, Balz) runs a story titled, "For Bush, A Deepening Divide; Katrina Crisis Brings No Repeat of 9/11 Bipartisanship." The Post says, "The starkly different verdicts on Bush's stewardship of the two biggest crises of his presidency underscore the deepening polarization of the electorate that has occurred on his watch." This "gaping divide has left the president with no reservoir of good will among his political opponents at a critical moment of national need and has touched off a fresh debate about whether he could have done anything to prevent it." The Post adds, "To his critics, Bush is now reaping what he has sown. Their case against him goes as follows: Facing a divided nation, the president has eschewed unity in both his governing strategy and his political blueprint."

USA Today (9/7, Benedetto) reports Bush "met with his Cabinet, education officials, congressional leaders and the heads of charities involved in the recovery. Afterward, he said the relief effort is improving, more supplies are en route, schooling is being arranged for thousands of displaced children and that he will make sure the recovery continues."

The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Gold, Hart) says Bush "sought to short-circuit congressional criticism by declaring that he will investigate the federal relief effort. … 'What I intend to do is to lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong,' he said."

The New York Times (9/7, Kornblut, Hulse) adds Bush is acting under "relentless political fire," and that he "met with leaders from both parties, capping a day of constant political attention to a crisis that has exposed fault lines within the Republican Party and threatens to overtake the entire Congressional agenda."

The Washington Post (9/7, A18, Weisman, Fletcher) says the President was "stung by criticism" as he "vowed to 'find out what went right and what went wrong.'" Meanwhile, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld "said that the military already has begun a 'lessons-learned' assessment of its coordination with state and local governments. Nine Cabinet members briefed Senate and House leaders last night on the federal response, and key senators pushed for changes that would allow Third World relief efforts to be emulated in the United States."

The Washington Times (9/7, Curl, Scarborough) reports, "Republicans tried to limit the political damage from the botched federal response to Hurricane Katrina – with…Bush, members of Congress and military leaders yesterday all promising to look into the failures." Republicans "said they have received the message that there is frustration over the federal response." But "even as Republicans promised investigations, they made it clear that the first failure was at the state and local levels, where governments are charged with preparation and the first response to disasters."

Whether Bush bounces back from the current crisis, USA Today (9/7, Page) says Katrina has already done much damage to his ambitious domestic agenda, writing, "His plan to overhaul Social Security? Forget it. Repeal the estate tax? Postponed. Make the 2001 tax cuts permanent? Tougher to finance. Stay the course in Iraq? Questions about the deployment of U.S. resources and National Guard troops for the war have been sharpened." The New York Times (9/7, Andrews) runs a similar story under the headline "Hurricane's Toll Is Likely To Reshape Bush's Economic Agenda." The Times reports, "Katrina is about to blow a hole in the federal budget, and it is already jeopardizing President Bush's agenda for cutting taxes and reducing the deficit."

Bush Resists Calls For FEMA Chief's Ouster. The New York Times (9/7, Kornblut, Hulse) reports Bush "resisted renewed calls to fire Michael D. Brown, the director of FEMA, who became a lightning rod for attacks last week when he said he was unaware of a crisis at the New Orleans convention center, news of which had been televised for days." Instead, Mr. Bush accused critics of playing the 'blame game' and said he would remain focused on the immediate crisis as evacuees fanned out across the country."

DOJ_NMG_0003138

On the CBS Evening News (9/6, lead story, 1:30, Schieffer), Bush was shown saying, "I think one of the things that people want us to do here is to play a blame game. We've got to solve problems. We're problem solvers. There will be ample time for people to find out what went right and what went wrong."

Bush Meets With Faith-Based Charities. The Washington Times (9/7, Curl) says "Bush met in the White House with faith-based and community groups, including representatives from the African Methodist Episcopal Church, the Southern Baptist Convention, the Salvation Army, the American Red Cross, the United Way of America, the YMCA, Catholic Charities USA and several others."

Bush Objects To Term "Refugees." The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Gerstenzang, Curtius) notes that last Monday, "during his second trip to the region in a week, Bush heard one of the storm's victims complain about the use of the term 'refugees.' At the end of the meeting in the White House Roosevelt Room, Bush addressed that issue. 'Let me tell you my attitude and the attitude of people around this table: The people we're talking about are not refugees. They are Americans, and they need the help and love and compassion of our fellow citizens.'"

Poll Finds Public Not Blaming Bush Or Federal Government. USA Today (9/7, Welch) reports on a poll of 609 people Tuesday that "asked who was to blame the most for problems after the hurricane. Twenty-five percent said state and local officials; 18% said the federal government, 13% blamed Bush. But the majority, 38%, said no one is to blame."

Morris Says Bush Will Obtain Political Dividends From Katrina Relief. Dick Morris writes in his column for The Hill (9/7), "Make no mistake about it: Every day for the next year, voters will see nonstop scenes of federal relief, rebuilding, renovation and reconstruction along with the empathy, sympathy and compassion these efforts imply in the heart of George W. Bush. He may have had a terrible first week, but he will rebound big time in the months to come." Morris adds that "in a year, Katrina and the relief and rebuilding efforts that are about to follow will be seen as having imparted a new and crucial momentum to an administration that was obviously increasingly running out of ideas, out of steam, and -- like its nation -- out of gas." Katrina "has the capacity to shape the second Bush term in the same way Sept. 11 shaped his first term."

LATimes Says Katrina Will "Haunt" Bush Presidency. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/7) is critical of Bush's response to Hurricane Katrina, stating that "the overriding fact on the ground -- both in Washington and along the Gulf -- is this: Too many people died needlessly because their governments were too concerned about the threat of terrorism to pay attention to the threat posed by Mother Nature." The Times argues that the "human tragedy [resulting from the crisis] will haunt the remainder of the Bush presidency."

Bush Criticized. Columnist David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (9/7, A25), "There were two levee breaks last week: The natural disaster of Katrina ravaged New Orleans and left behind thousands of victims, but there was also a political catastrophe that breached the Bush administration's containment walls and exposed fundamental weaknesses in how this White House makes decisions." Ignatius adds, "The political damage may be harder to repair than the flooded infrastructure. The management flaws that have been so obvious over the past week go to the heart of how President Bush runs the government."

In his Washington Post column (9/7, A25), Harold Meyerson writes, "The world looks on in stunned amazement, unable to understand how a once great nation has grown so indifferent not just to its poor and its blacks but even to the most rudimentary self-preservation. Some of it is institutional racism," but "the primary culprit is the economic libertarianism that the president still espouses whenever he sells his Social Security snake oil. It's that libertarianism, more than anything else, that has transformed a great city into an immense morgue."

Thomas L. Friedman writes in the New York Times (9/7), "An administration whose tax policy has been dominated by the toweringly selfish Grover Norquist…doesn't have the instincts for this moment." Norquist "is the only person about whom I would say this: I hope he owns property around the New Orleans levee that was never properly finished because of a lack of tax dollars. I hope his basement got flooded. And I hope that he was busy drowning government in his bathtub when the levee broke and that he had to wait for a US Army helicopter to get out of town."

Maureen Dowd says in her New York Times (column 9/7, Dowd), "Maybe Mr. Cheney is going down to New Orleans to hunt looters. Or to make sure that Halliburton's lucrative contract to rebuild the city is watertight. Or maybe, since former Senator John Breaux of Louisiana described the shattered parish as 'Baghdad under water,' the vice president plans to take his pal Ahmad Chalabi along for a consultation on destroying minority rights."

DOJ_NMG_0003139

The Washington Post's Jim Hoagland (9/7) writes that Katrina "left its marks on President Bush's ambitious foreign policy agenda as well. Overcoming these setbacks will require a demonstration that the United States under Bush is not an irrevocably weakened and divided nation about to turn inward on its own problems. … European embassies in Washington are already reporting back to their capitals on how the disaster may further impair Bush's effectiveness as he slips toward lame-duck status."

Bush To Ask Congress For $40 Billion In Hurricane Relief. ABC World News Tonight (9/6, lead story, 3:50, Gibson) reported, "President Bush said today he wants another $40 billion -- $40 billion -- to cover the next phase of recovery. And some in Congress say it's going to cost $150 billion before it is all over." NBC Nightly News (9/6, lead story,4:05, Williams) added "that is just one step the President is now taking after the unrelenting criticism of how the Bush Administration and for that matter state and local government responded to this crisis."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/6, Velshi) reported, "Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid has suggested, after meeting with the President, that there will be a bill, a request emerging for a bill to authorize $40 to $50 billion in emergency hurricane aid. … This substantially ups the estimate of what this hurricane is going to cost. And some of these are direct costs, obviously. We know what the indirect costs are in energy, because we have seen gasoline go to above $3" per gallon. But "there are a whole set of costs beyond that that are going to affect those people hurt by the hurricane and spread across the country. We are now looking at estimates well in excess of $100 billion to the economy, enough to actually start taking the annual growth rate of the economy down."

The Wall Street Journal (9/7, McKinnon, Rogers, Searcey) adds "that will be only a down payment on a federal tab that all now agree is going to reach more eye-popping levels." Reid "was the first to go public, predicting a government commitment of $150 billion. Top Republicans bridled initially, saying any such estimates at this time translated into playing 'political games.'" But GOP Sen. Judd Gregg "subsequently used an even higher $200 billion estimate, and defended Mr. Reid's figure." The Journal adds, "Some of the ideas being discussed on Capitol Hill involved relief far beyond the disaster area. For example, Sen. Charles Grassley, the Iowa Republican, said he wants loan relief for farmers whose crops might not reach market on schedule due to disruption at the New Orleans port. Sen. Ted Stevens, the Alaska Republican, said he favors tax relief for airlines hit by higher fuel costs."

Black Activists Seek Set Asides As Part Of Rebuilding Effort. USA Today (9/7, Leinwand, Eversley) reports, "After accusations that many New Orleans hurricane victims were not evacuated or rescued because they were black and poor, civil rights advocates Tuesday shifted their focus to making sure poor blacks aren't left out of the city's rebuilding. Jesse Jackson, at the Louisiana state emergency center in Baton Rouge, said Hurricane Katrina is an opportunity for the federal government to lift a community out of poverty. New Orleans' impoverished black residents 'should be first in line to get the jobs to clean up their own neighborhoods,' he said. Rep. Mel Watt, D-N.C., head of the Congressional Black Caucus, said the caucus would support any effort to make sure New Orleans residents were part of rebuilding."

Federal Relief Effort Now In Full Swing. The rescue and relief effort in New Orleans has made significant progress since the aftermath of Katrina reached crisis proportions last week. Aid is now readily available, and the Army Corps of Engineers has begun the long process of pumping out the water that is inundating the city. However, the relief effort was still characterized as belated, and as some diehard residents refuse to leave the city, public health officials have grown increasingly worried over the possibility of water-born disease.

In a typical report, the CBS Evening News (9/6, story 4, 3:55, Roberts) reported, "There's a lot of things that are working right in terms of the relief efforts. The problem is that it all got here too late. For example when the National Guard set up a feeding station outside the convention center, the next day people were gone, they had been starving for four days. The USS Iwo Jima is here now, with its big hospital, but it's empty because there's nobody left to treat. They're still trying to get all of those people out of the floodwaters, but it's like they took a canon here and are firing it down the street and there's nothing to hit."

DOJ_NMG_0003140

NBC Nightly News (9/6, lead story,4:05, Williams) reported there are "more Blackhawk helicopters in the air, more ships docked in the harbor, more of a military district, really, than a city. US Army regulars and National Guard have indeed taken up positions, the streets, for the most part are safe, but they are also desolate. New Orleans has been through so much in these eight days and tonight, there are predictions that might have been the easy part for this metropolitan area. While the water is on its way out and some pumps are running, today, an estimated 60% of this city was still under water. Officially, there are now 60,000 troops here, according to the Department of Defense. They have restored order, they've brought food and water, all three of those elements that were so sorely missing last week."

Mayor Authorizes Forced Evacuation Of New Orleans. The AP (9/7, Burdeau) reports New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin "authorized law enforcement officers and the US military to force the evacuation of all residents who refuse to heed orders to leave the dark, dangerous city. … While acknowledging the emergency declaration, police Capt. Marlon Defillo said late Tuesday that forced removal of citizens had not yet begun. He said that officers who were visiting homes were still reminding people that police may not be able to rescue them if they stay."

Many New Orleans Residents Refuse To Evacuate. ABC World News Tonight (9/6, story 10, 2:20, Woodruff) reported, "We met a lot of people over this past week that said they'd rather endure hell or high water, rather than leave their homes." NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 2, 3:35, Williams) reported, "With conditions the way they are, and we're talking about the toxic water, lack of food and water and electricity, the fact that the city is now a waterlogged ghost town, it is hard to believe, having said that, that anyone would choose to stay here. But as you know, we keep on finding more and more stories of the diehards here, survivors, who won't leave." NBC (Teague) added, "Rescuers tell us there are hundreds of people still in their homes here, but they won't show themselves because they are afraid of being rescued."

New Orleans Levee Breaches Repaired, Some Pumps Operating. Bloomberg (9/7) reports, "Engineers repaired a ruptured levee in New Orleans and began pumping water from the flooded city. … Engineers are pumping water from the flooded areas of New Orleans back into Lake Pontchartrain after patching the levee at the city's 17th Street Canal yesterday, said Jason Binet, a civil engineer with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. Today, the repaired breach will be fortified with layers of stone and asphalt, Binet said. About 60 percent of the city is still under water, Corps of Engineers officials said today at a press conference. They estimate it will take 24 to 80 days to drain the city." USA Today (9/7, Eisler) and the New York Times (9/7, Longman, Chan), among other sources, run similar stories this morning.

Tenor Of Network TV Coverage Of Katrina Changing. The tenor of the network coverage of Katrina's aftermath has changed significantly this week. There is a greater focus on refugees dislocated by the disaster and the political "blame game" over the inadequacies of the responses by Federal, state, and local governments. There is a corresponding decrease in air time given to scenes of human pathos, and such stories tend to focus more on less concrete issues, such as the health threat posed by the floodwater in New Orleans. In addition, the networks paid little attention to the situation outside of New Orleans, with only two stories on recovery efforts in Biloxi, Mississippi.

On ABC, roughly one-third of the newscast was devoted to the political fallout from Katrina, while a second third was devoted to scenes of human suffering, devastation, and health threats, and slightly more time was spent covering the plight of the refugees. On CBS, about 25% of the hurricane zone coverage was spent on refugees, 50% was spent on human suffering, and another 25% was devoted to the political situation. On NBC, which ran an hour-long newscast last night, about 15% was spent on the political aspects, while about 40% each was devoted to human suffering and refugees.

Meanwhile, local TV from the Gulf Coast area were split, with half of the stations in the area leading their broadcasts with stories assessing the physical damage the storm has caused, and the rest focusing on the political issues that have emerged in Katrina's wake. Typical of coverage assessing Katrina's destruction was a report from WIAT-TV Birmingham (9/6, 4:58 pm) that "the full extent of the horrors left behind by Hurricane Katrina sits beneath the water that fills the streets of New Orleans. While the water is being pumped out the mayor says it'll take at least three weeks before all of its removed."

WAFF-TV Huntsville (9/6, 4:59 pm) added that de-watering New Orleans is "expected to take two to three months. Thousands have joined the search for the victims and the survivors."

While a majority of stations focusing on the damage Katrina has caused continued to lead with reports from New Orleans, some led with stories from Mississippi or with local reports. WCFT-TV Birmingham (9/6 4:58 pm) reported, "Plenty of Alabamians are on the Gulf-Coast tonight as they begin a gruesome recovery-effort. They're digging through tons of debris left behind by Katrina. That rubble could…hide the remains of people who didn't survive." Meanwhile, WAKA-TV Montgomery (9/6, 5:59 pm) reported, "Hurricane Katrina remains evident in Biloxi and Gulfport. More than a week after Katrina hit the Gulf Coast, slabs of wood and piles of rubble are all that are left of some homes."

DOJ_NMG_0003141

Stations that led with Katrina's political aftermath focused on investigations into the Federal government's response. Typical of coverage was a report from WPMI-TV Mobile (9/6, 5:00 pm) that, "Both President Bush and Congress are pledging separate investigations into the federal response after Katrina." The President "says he himself will lead an investigation into what happened in the aftermath of Katrina." WSFA-TV Montgomery (9/6, 5:01 pm) noted that "Congress plans to investigate what it calls the government's 'woefully inadequate' response to Katrina. The Governmental Affairs Committee will get a closed briefing tomorrow from FEMA. WVTM-TV Birmingham (9/6, 5:58 pm) added that the President is "also sending Vice President Dick Cheney to the Gulf Coast to find out if the government is doing all it can."

A minority of stations also picked up on House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's criticism of FEMA's Brown, noting, as on WBRC-TV Birmingham (9/6, 9:46 pm) that Pelosi "emerged from a White House meeting with the President calling for heads to role." Pelosi was shown saying, "If Michael Brown brings nothing to the table, then he should not continue in that job, unless we want a continuation of the shortcomings that we have had in the response."

A majority of local TV stations nationwide spent an extensive amount of time dealing with the political aspects of the story. For example, WWOR-TV New York (9/6, 10:00 p.m.) reported, "President Bush said he will lead an investigation into finding out what went wrong." The station added, "There's more anger and finger pointing tonight over Hurricane Katrina, and most are pointed straight at the disaster agencies." WFLA-TV Tampa (9/6, 5:02 p.m.) added, "Members of Congress are promising a Federal investigation into the response for help following Hurricane Katrina. President Bush said he will personally head up this investigation."

Fewer stations, meanwhile, chose to focus on continued efforts help speed the recovery process. KDAF-TV Dallas (9/6, 9:33 p.m.) reported, "President Bush is asking for another $40 billion in Hurricane Katrina relief. The President met with lawmakers and his Cabinet today to discuss recovery and rebuilding. During the meeting, the President outlined what needed to be done in the affected areas, saying bureaucracy should be pushed aside to speed up the recovery." Meanwhile, KHOU-TV Houston (9/6, 12:08 p.m.) aired a positive report, noting that "there is a bit of good news today. Half of the Gulf Coast refineries damaged by Hurricane Katrina plan to restart production this week. Eight major refineries that produce gasoline, diesel, jet fuel and heating oil were knocked out of commission."

More Tropical Storms May Be On Way. The CBS Evening News (9/6, story 11, 0:25, Roberts) reported, "Even as the country is dealing with the Katrina disaster, the busiest part of the hurricane season may be just starting. There are three storms now in the Atlantic. Ophelia, a tropical depression, is expected to be a tropical storm when it reaches Florida tomorrow with heavy rain."

NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 5, 0:25, Williams) reported, "We know the last thing this area needs is another hurricane. All eyes are on the Atlantic now that we are at the height of hurricane season. The largest concern out there is something called Tropical Depression 16. It is off the Florida coast, it is likely to strengthen into something called Tropical Storm Ophelia. There are two other storms out there, Nate and Maria, but they, luckily, are not threatening land."

FEMA Director Brown Said To Have "Big Target On His Back." FEMA Director Michael Brown is the focus of much of the criticism over the Federal Government's response to the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. On the CBS Evening News (9/6, story 4, 3:55), Gloria Borger said, "I think FEMA Director Michael Brown has a big target on his back. There are lots of Democrats today calling for his removal. And I think they're going to hear a lot more of that. Republicans were kind of holding back a little, but they're not too fond of him either these days."

NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 4, 2:05, Gregory) reported, "Top Democrats are calling for the firing of FEMA Director Michael Brown and Administration sources say questions are being raised about whether Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff should continue to oversee the government's Katrina response."

DOJ_NMG_0003142

Meanwhile, ABC World News Tonight (9/6, story 6, :30, Gibson) reported, "A correction on a report last night about FEMA Director Michael Brown. We and other news organizations reported that Brown was college roommates with a man who recommended him for the job, former FEMA Director Joe Allbaugh. Allbaugh told us that was not correct. They were friends, but not roommates. Although Allbaugh said he is a registered lobbyist for Halliburton on disaster relief, he has not lobbied FEMA directly for Halliburton contracts."

USA Today (9/7, Lawrence) reports that in his "online résumé, Michael Brown touts his experience dealing with hurricanes and wildfires. He talks of being a state legislative committee director and an assistant city manager. He doesn't mention the decade he spent as chief rules enforcer for the Arabian Horse Association." The horse job, "which he left in 2000, is now fodder for critics who say Brown" has "botched the Katrina relief operation. Those critics include Republicans, Democrats and newspapers." President Bush "appointed a FEMA director who had 'absolutely no credentials' for the job, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said Tuesday." Brown says he has "led the federal government's response to more than 160 disasters and emergencies."

The New York Times (9/7, Shane) reports Brown "has faced two simultaneous challenges - coordinating 14 federal agencies with state and local counterparts under grueling conditions, and fending off criticism from those who say that FEMA has failed and put the blame squarely on him." By "all accounts, it was not experience in managing disasters that brought Mr. Brown, 50, a lawyer from Oklahoma, to FEMA in 2001 as general counsel. It was his 30-year friendship with" Allbaugh. But when "pressed yet again to give his qualifications at a news conference on Monday, Mr. Brown gave a practiced answer, running through his learning curve as general counsel, then deputy director and finally, since 2003, director of FEMA. He has overseen the response to 164 presidentially declared disasters, he said, including California wildfires, a rash of tornadoes in the Midwest several years ago and the four Florida hurricanes last year." Brown's "friends say they have cringed watching the criticism of a man they describe as compassionate and dedicated to difficult work."

On CNN's Paula Zahn Now (9/6, 8:39 pm), Mississippi Rep. Bennie Thompson (D) said, "FEMA is clearly is flying by the seat of their pants. What we need is a professional in there trained to run disaster preparedness operations who can make quick decisions, cut through the red tape, and get the job done."

FEMA Sends Evacuees To Wrong Charleston. CNN.com (9/7) reports, "A South Carolina health official said his colleagues scrambled Tuesday when FEMA gave only a half-hour notice to prepare for the arrival of a plane carrying as many as 180 evacuees to Charleston. But the plane, instead, landed in Charleston, West Virginia, 400 miles away. It was not known whether arrangements have been made to care for the evacuees or transport them to the correct destination."

ABC World News Tonight (9/6, lead story, 3:50, Avila) reported, "There are still communication problems between the states affected and FEMA. Today, in Charleston, South Carolina, ambulances were standing by. Shelter arranged for evacuees who never arrived. Why? The plane went to the wrong Charleston. It went to the one in West Virginia. In Wisconsin, the Governor says he was told to expect hundreds of evacuees. None has shown up."

Chertoff Tasks Allen With "Bailing Out" Brown. The Washington Post (9/7, A23, White) reports that with Brown "taking harsh criticism for the slow federal response to Hurricane Katrina, the secretary of homeland security this week assigned a top Coast Guard official to help bail him out." Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, the Coast Guard's chief of staff, "was assigned on Monday to be Brown's deputy and to take over operational control of the search-and-rescue and recovery efforts along the Gulf Coast. The unprecedented task of coordinating the massive effort was handed off to a leader and expert who was described by colleagues as unflappable, engaging and intensely organized."

Brown Waited Five Hours To Request Personnel From Chertoff. The AP (9/6, Bridis), in a widely distributed article, reported that internal government documents show that Brown asked Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to send Homeland Security workers into the Gulf Coast region "roughly five hours after Katrina made landfall on Aug. 29." The Director's "memo to Chertoff described Katrina as 'this near catastrophic event' but otherwise lacked any urgent language. The memo politely ended, 'Thank you for your consideration in helping us to meet our responsibilities.'"

Private Relief Efforts Taking Up Slack For FEMA In Mississippi. The CBS Evening News (9/6, story 3, 2:15, Schieffer) reported, "In a major disaster," FEMA "is supposed to move quickly to coordinate aid for victims. But for countless survivors of Hurricane Katrina, that never happened. So private citizens are taking up the slack as best they can." CBS (Bowers) added, "It took eight days for FEMA to open its first Mississippi-based disaster response center, here in ocean beach." But "what nobody expected was how quickly and completely everyday people would fill the gap. Big church groups are cooking up three meals a day for thousands of hungry souls. And all across the Gulf Coast good Samaritans are on the ground are getting places the government has yet to find." FEMA "told us today it is no where near ready to start handing out checks. In fact, it can't even get its disaster center up and running in this hard hit city until sometime next week."

DOJ_NMG_0003143

Blanco Brings Former FEMA Director Witt On Board. The Hill (9/7, Kaplan) reports it "didn't take long for James Lee Witt, the former head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), to throw his weight around in hurricane-ravaged Louisiana." Witt "has been hired by Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D) to help coordinate state and federal responses to the natural disaster." Blanco "introduced Witt to President Bush on Monday, according to a source who has spoken with Witt. Bush promised Witt whatever support he needed and said that Mike Brown, FEMA's embattled director, is his man in charge."

Witt Says FEMA Must Retool Response Plan. In a USA Today op-ed (9/7), Witt says, "I witnessed the incredible abilities and dedication of our nation's emergency response personnel, of which we have the best trained and best equipped possible. Despite their skills, ability and technology, we must do more to be better prepared and protected in the case of such a catastrophe. Our financial recovery mechanisms, which rely primarily on the private insurance market, federal assistance in the form of low-interest loans and a handful of state catastrophe funds, need to be retooled so that they are capable of meeting the immeasurable costs of a catastrophe."

WTimes Says Brown, FEMA Performance Dysfunctional. The Washington Times (9/7) says in an editorial that Brown "confirmed the dysfunctional performance of his organization throughout the first three or four days following Hurricane Katrina's assault on New Orleans. In an interview on CNN's 'Paula Zahn Now,' three-and-a-half days after Katrina made landfall, Mr. Brown insisted that the federal government in general and FEMA in particular had no idea until that very day that tens of thousands of New Orleans residents and tourists had assembled at the city's convention center."

NYTimes Says Brown Should Be Replaced. The New York Times (9/7) says in an editorial, "It's obvious…that Michael Brown has met the expectations of those who warned that he would be a terrible director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. This is no time to be engaging in a wholesale change of leadership, but in Mr. Brown's case there seems to be precious little leadership to lose. He should be replaced with someone who can do the huge job that remains to be done. But the questions go way beyond Mr. Brown - starting with why federal officials ignored predictions of a disastrous flood in New Orleans - and the answers can come only from an independent commission."

WPost Says DC-Area Should Not Count On FEMA In Disaster. The Washington Post (9/7, A24) says in an editorial, "The District's mission to the storm survivors encountered widespread confusion, made worse by governmental red tape and indecision. Surveying the federal response to Hurricane Katrina and observing that the Washington region itself could be subject to a disaster or terrorist attack, Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) said yesterday on WTOP Radio's 'Ask the Executive' program that area officials "need to know what we can count on and not count on from FEMA." That observation is aptly borne out by the District's experience in New Orleans and other flood-ravaged communities."

Congress Said To Share Blame For FEMA Problems. Norman Ornstein writes in his column for Roll Call this morning (9/7), "When the Department of Homeland Security bill came to Congress, it ended up facing one and only one serious area of controversy and deliberation: the question of sweeping civil service changes to eliminate many of the regular protections for the 70,000 DHS employees. That issue became a political tool — a major campaign point in the 2002 elections — even as the larger and important questions of what kind of department, and how to fulfill all the real and serious government functions, was ignored. The result was, as we now see in embarrassing fashion, a downgrading of FEMA and confusion about its mission." Much "of the failure to implement the changes needed over the past four years can be laid at the feet of Congress and its leaders."

Blanco Indecision Said To Have Delayed Federal Relief Efforts. The Washington Times (9/7, A1, Lakely) reports that while Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco "has been critical of the Bush administration's response to the disastrous aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, but, according to the mayor of New Orleans, her indecision when President Bush offered help delayed rescue efforts and cost lives." New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin told CNN "he met with Mr. Bush and Mrs. Blanco on Air Force One on Friday and implored the two to 'get in sync.' 'If you don't get in sync, more people are going to die,' Mr. Nagin said." The Times adds Bush "met privately first with Mrs. Blanco, then called Mr. Nagin in for a meeting." Nagin said, "'He said, 'Mr. Mayor, I offered two options to the governor.' I was ready to move. The governor said she needed 24 hours to make a decision." The Times adds that "decision was a request by Mr. Bush to allow the federal government to take over the evacuation of New Orleans, which had been marked by chaos for days. The Democratic governor, who has clashed behind the scenes with the Bush administration since the storm hit, refused."

DOJ_NMG_0003144

ABC World News Tonight (9/6, story 5, 2:35, Harris) reported, "FEMA says Gov. Kathleen Blanco failed to ask for help in a timely manner. Shortly before Katrina hit, the Governor sent the President requests for food and provisions, but made no specific request for help with evacuations. One aide to the governor told us today she thought city officials were taking care of the evacuation. Nonetheless, the Federal Government might have been more pro-active." Jerry Hauer, former FEMA official: "If the city and the state are stumbling, or in over their head, then it's FEMA's responsibility to show some leadership."

The Financial Times (9/7, Alden, Swann, Dinmore, Chaffin) says Gov. Blanco "insisted on CNN on Tuesday that 'I asked for everything that we had available from the federal government...and the federal effort was just a little slow in coming. I can't understand why.'" But "at the same time she said that co-operation had improved dramatically in recent days. 'We are parties in this effort. We are a team,' she told a news conference in Baton Rouge, the state capital."

New Orleans Officials Failed To Implement Own Disaster Relief Plan. ABC World News Tonight (9/6, story 5, 2:35, Woodruff) reported, "In New Orleans, both those in peril and those in power have pointed the finger squarely at the Federal Government." But "experts say when natural disasters hit, it is the primary responsibility of state and local governments, not the Federal Government, to respond. New Orleans' own comprehensive emergency plan raises the specter of 'having large numbers of people stranded.' And promises the 'city will utilize all available resources to quickly and safely evacuate threatened areas.'" When Katrina hit, "however, instead of being evacuated, people were told to go to the Superdome or the convention center, where no one provided sufficient sustenance or security." Bob Williams "dealt with emergency response issues after the eruption of Mount St. Helens in Washington state." Bob Williams: "If the plan had been implemented, particularly the early evacuation plan, thousands of lives would have been saved."

NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 6, 2:35, Myers) reported, "Some 200 New Orleans school buses sit underwater in a parking lot, unused, enough to have evacuated at least 13,000 people. Why weren't those buses sent street by street to pick up people before the storm?" A "draft emergency plan obtained by NBC News calls for 400 buses to be prepared to evacuate victims, yet some 200 buses were left abandoned in Katrina's path."

Congress To Probe Federal Response To Katrina, With Focus On FEMA. The CBS Evening News (9/6, story 4, 3:55, Borger) reported, "Official Washington began its angry and accusatory finger pointing." Sen. Patrick Leahy: "Where in God's name were the people who are supposed to give water? Support? People were dying there." Congress "wants answers, and today opened its own investigation." GOP Sen. Susan Collins was shown saying, "If our system did such a poor job, when there was no enemy, how would the Federal, state and local governments have coped with a terrorist attack?"

Reuters (9/7) says Collins "said her Senate Homeland Security Committee would begin its investigation this week into the relief efforts." FEMA "has been a focus of much of the criticism, which has also targeted President George W. Bush." USA Today (9/7, Stone) adds others "called for a 9/11-style commission to investigate failures in responding to the disaster. 'It's hard to untangle all of the causes,' said Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., who will introduce a bill that would create such a commission." She "said cutbacks in funding and personnel at the Federal Emergency Management Agency, as well as unclear lines of command that appear to have bogged down the response, 'have to be thoroughly investigated.'" Clinton also "introduced a bill to separate FEMA, which she and others say bungled the initial response to Katrina, from the Department of Homeland Security." USA Today adds that "some Republicans agreed. Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., who lost his home in Pascagoula, said it was "a mistake" to take away FEMA's independence. But he warned against finger-pointing while hundreds of thousands of people are homeless."

DOJ_NMG_0003145

The Dallas Morning News (9/7, Gillman, Dodge) reports that yesterday, "lawmakers couldn't find enough ways to express their disgust for the planning and response to the disaster." It is "a frenzy President Bush hasn't faced from a Congress controlled for most of his tenure by allies. Through terrorism, war and the occasional scandal, they have protected his administration from the sort of pointed grilling lawmakers are planning over the coming days and weeks. … This time, GOP lawmakers have rushed to the microphones."

The Washington Post (9/7, A19) reports in its "Washington Sketch" column, "As horrendous as the death and dislocation have been in and around New Orleans, the government's 'woefully inadequate' response there, as Collins put it, has left Americans far from the disaster area to assume that, if a terrorist's nuclear bomb goes off on K Street or smallpox is released in Times Square, it will be every man for himself. " On the Hill, "outraged lawmakers launched a bipartisan investigation and demanded to know what good had come from all that homeland security spending. At the White House, the president was still operating in the conditional. 'If things went wrong, we'll correct them,' he said. 'And when things went right, we'll duplicate them.'" Bush, adds the Post, "was in no hurry to probe. … The mood was more urgent on the Hill, where a bipartisan group of lawmakers in the House was preparing legislation to separate FEMA from the Department of Homeland Security."

The Hill (9/7, Kaplan, O'Connor, Tiron) adds "the House and Senate government-oversight committees will hold hearings into the widespread criticism of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina. The hearings are just part of Republicans' response to the public-relations fallout over the administration's admitted mishandling of the devastation in the immediate aftermath of the hurricane." Even though "several GOP leaders pleaded for increased civility, Congress plunged immediately into bitter partisanship as lawmakers returned to work yesterday, with the two parties arguing over blame for the death and destruction left in Hurricane Katrina's wake." Under the headline "Parties Divided Over Katrina Response," Roll Call (9/7, Pierce, Pershing, Billings) adds "the Democrats' proposals and demands for "immediate" Congressional action were received somewhat skeptically by Republicans."

Collins, Lieberman "Stop Short" Of Calling For Resignations. PBS's Newshour With Jim Lehrer (9/6, 7:15 pm) reported that in announcing that the Governmental Affairs Committee would hold investigative hearings into the response to Hurricane Katrina, Sens. Collins and Joseph Lieberman, the ranking member, "stopped short" of calling for the dismissal of Michael Chertoff or Michael Brown. Lieberman said, "Obviously what Michael Chertoff and Michael Brown did in this circumstance would be of great interest in our inquiry, but we want to go at this in a way that's credible and legitimate and open minded. Therefore, I think the last thing we'd want to do right now is to reach judgments about who should stay and who should go."

Lawmakers Chide Chertoff, Other Cabinet Members Over Katrina Response. CNN's NewsNight With Aaron Brown (9/6, 10:00 pm) reported, "At a meeting on Capitol Hill tonight, members of Congress took cabinet officials to task," concerning government response to Hurricane Katrina. The meeting was reported to have been rough not only on Michael Chertoff, but also on a slew of Bush cabinet secretaries who "started out by giving rosy reports about how things are turning out for the better." NewsNight reported that the first question came from a Republican who said, "All of you deserve failing grades, despite what you're saying right now. The response was a disaster."

GOP Wants Congressional Review To Look Beyond Perceived FEMA Failures. CNN's The Situation Room (9/6, Henry) reported that "the bottom line is that Republicans here on the Hill privately feel that Democrats have been beating up on FEMA solely to score political points against this White House. That's a charge that Democrats up here flatly reject. But earlier on Capitol Hill, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, in fact, tried to spread the blame a little bit here and say that congressional review should focus not just on the federal government, but the local and state government."

Katrina Scrambles Congressional Calendar. Roll Call (9/7, Pershing) reports, "The aftermath of Hurricane Katrina has scrambled Congress' post-recess agenda and calendar, as leaders are frantically reordering their legislative priorities and pushing the anticipated adjournment date back weeks, and possibly more than a month." Both the House and Senate "were already resigned to missing their original departure target of Oct. 1. And with an enormous new set of challenges to tackle in the coming days, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) said Tuesday: 'It's obvious that we're going to be here until Thanksgiving.'"

DOJ_NMG_0003146

Federal Officials Warn Of Post-Katrina ID Theft Threat, Relief Scams. The AP (9/7, Kerr) reports the FTC on Tuesday warned "Social Security cards, driver's licenses, credit cards and other personal documents are literally floating around New Orleans, raising the prospect some hurricane survivors could be victimized again -- this time by identity thieves." The AP notes, "The FBI also warned people wanting to donate money for Katrina survivors to beware of scammers who solicit online donations to lure victims into giving up credit card numbers and other sensitive information. 'There are people out there who are willing to stoop so low as to scam people who are willing to open their hearts and wallets to people in need,' said FBI spokesman Paul Bresson. He said the bureau has identified about 2,000 Web sites related to the Katrina relief effort. Most are legitimate, Bresson said, but the FBI is investigating about a dozen for possible fraud."

Reuters (9/7, Hurdle) notes, "After last year's Asian tsunami…the FBI investigated more than 170 Web sites that were preying on donors by mimicking the sites of well-known charities, according to Patrick Meehan, U.S. district attorney for Eastern Pennsylvania. While no evidence has emerged of criminals attempting to divert money destined for hurricane victims, Meehan said authorities were on high alert."

Four Charged In Virginia Aid Scam. The Washington Times (9/7, Emerling) reports, "Fairfax County police arrested four persons on Sunday for operating a roadside scam claiming to collect money for victims of Hurricane Katrina." Joseph J. Murphy Jr., Isaac M. Beavers, Marie S. Golden, and Nicholas P. Flint have been "charged with misdemeanor solicitation violations and released on a summons to appear in court." They "told motorists in the 12100 block of Sunset Hills Road in Reston they represented charities helping hurricane victims and asked for cash donations."

FEMA, HUD Seek Temporary Housing For Evacuees. USA Today (9/7, Hall) reports, "The federal government is pushing ahead with plans to offer makeshift housing -- in cruise ships, abandoned military houses and recreational vehicles — to tens of thousands of Gulf Coast evacuees. Housing and Urban Development (HUD) Secretary Alphonso Jackson said Tuesday that the government is cobbling together enough housing to take care of the hundreds of thousands of people who were displaced by Hurricane Katrina and have nowhere to go as they rebuild their lives. … HUD and the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) initially looked for temporary housing within a 500-mile range of the devastation along the Gulf Coast. FEMA spokesman James McIntyre said the agency has ordered 70,000 small recreational vehicles, each of which can sleep five. In areas without flooding, the trailers can be parked on people's property." The Washington Times/AP (9/7, Burdeau) reports, "A plan to move thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees from the Astrodome to cruise ships was put on hold yesterday after many objected, some because they were terrified by the thought of living on the water." The Washington Post (9/7, A1, Williams) and USA Today (9/7, Cauchon) both carry profiles of families that evacuated the New Orleans area and are now attempting to secure housing, employment and schools for their children.

Barbara Bush's Comments On Evacuees Provoke Controversy. The New York Times (9/7) reports, "As President Bush battled criticism over the response to Hurricane Katrina, his mother declared it a success for evacuees who 'were underprivileged anyway,' saying on Monday that many of the poor people she had seen while touring a Houston relocation site were faring better than before the storm hit. 'What I'm hearing, which is sort of scary, is they all want to stay in Texas,' Barbara Bush said in an interview on Monday with the radio program 'Marketplace.' 'Everyone is so overwhelmed by the hospitality.' 'And so many of the people in the arena here, you know, were underprivileged anyway,' she said, 'so this is working very well for them.'

Evacuees Displaced To 21 States So Far. Evacuees displaced from the Gulf Coast have now been relocated to 21 states, and nine more have offered assistance. ABC World News Tonight (9/6, lead story, 3:50, Gibson) reported, "With approximately one million refugees, the logistical problems are overwhelming. States are stepping up. California and Colorado, taking 1,000 refugees, each. Texas, of course, taking the most, 230,000. Tennessee is next, and Arkansas. … Thirty states in all are accepting evacuees. But many, when they get on planes, don't know where they're going." ABC (Avila) added, "Where do one million evacuees go when their cities, towns and homes are left in ruins? In the aftermath of Katrina, the answer seems to be everywhere and anywhere. Today, 200 arrived in faraway Washington, D.C., 1,100 miles from home. Same story for these evacuees in Salt Lake City." The CBS Evening News (9/6, story 10, 2:45, Roberts) reported, "The hurricane disaster has resulted in mass relocations of Americans from three Gulf coast states, the biggest migration in decades. 21 states, Texas in particular, are already housing evacuees. And nine more say they are prepared to take in the homeless." CBS (Strassmann) added, "At this bus depot in Baton Rouge, evacuees fill every outbound seat. 3,000 people a day, heading to Texas, Florida, anywhere."

DOJ_NMG_0003147

Influx Of New Orleans Residents Leaves Baton Rouge Uneasy. The New York Times (9/7, Applebome) reports, "Last week came the rumors -- of riots at Wal-Marts, of break-ins at homes, of drug gangs from New Orleans roaming the streets of" Baton Rouge. According to the Times, "the overwhelming response of people in Baton Rouge to Hurricane Katrina has been one of compassion and sacrifice. … But there have also been runs on gun stores, mounting frustration over gridlocked roads and an undercurrent of fear about crime and the effect of the evacuees."

Military, Church Groups Play Key Roles In Biloxi Relief Efforts. NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 3, 1:20, Teague) reported, "Since Sunday, the beach here in Biloxi has been turned into a mini military camp." This "is an L-cat, what they call a landing craft air cushion. And it has been bringing heavy equipment onto the beach to help out with cleanup efforts." The CBS Evening News (9/6, story 3, 2:15, Schieffer) reported that in Biloxi, Mississippi, "What nobody expected was how quickly and completely everyday people would fill the gap" left by the federal response, as "big church groups are cooking up three meals a day for thousands of hungry souls. And all across the Gulf Coast good Samaritans are on the ground are getting places the government has yet to find."

DC Welcomes Nearly 300 Evacuees. The Washington Post (9/7, A1, Labbe, Montgomery) reports, "One by one, the New Orleans survivors of Hurricane Katrina arrived in Washington yesterday, welcomed with smiles and applause from emergency workers and District leaders. … A total of 295 evacuees were flown from New Orleans to Dulles International Airport on two commercial aircraft, and more may arrive here over the next several days."

Up To 20% Of Flood Victims May Suffer Post Traumatic Stress Disorder. NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 12, 2:15, Bazell) reported, "In such a massive tragedy, there is no way of knowing will suffer long-term mental effects, but studies of previous disasters show that 20% of victims end up with post-traumatic stress disorder. At the FEMA emergency medical centers, mental health counselors are well aware of the danger."

FEMA Bureaucracy Said To Be Delaying International Aid. The Washington Post (9/7, A1, Williamson) reports in a front page story, "Offers of foreign aid worth tens of millions of dollars -- including a Swedish water purification system, a German cellular telephone network and two Canadian rescue ships -- have been delayed for days awaiting review by backlogged federal agencies, according to European diplomats and information collected by the State Department." Since Hurricane Katrina, "more than 90 countries and international organizations offered to assist in recovery efforts for the flood-stricken region, but nearly all endeavors remained mired yesterday in bureaucratic entanglements, in most cases, at the Federal Emergency Management Agency."

US Not Accepting All International Offers Of Aid. The Washington Times (9/7, Kralev) reports the US" has accepted help from about 40 countries for the victims of Hurricane Katrina -- fewer than half of those that offered -- including high-speed water pumps, food, cruise ships and more than $400 million in cash, U.S. officials said yesterday." Although "no offer has been rejected officially, proposals from Cuba and other countries to send doctors or nurses have not been accepted because there is enough U.S. medical personnel to deal with the crisis for now, the State Department said."

International Media Portray Katrina Disaster As US Shortcoming. NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 16, 2:25, Williams) reported, "A lot of nations around the world are fascinated by the seeming powerlessness of the most powerful, the richest nation on Earth, to handle relief supplies in the immediate aftermath." NBC (Miller) added, "Germans today loading 25 tons of food rations heading to the US just one of 60 nations reacting to America's call for help: The disturbing images from an American city so heartbreaking that the world has reacted with both kindness and shock." Here "in Britain and elsewhere, newspaper editorials are asking why the world's only superpower appears so helpless, 'The Independent' declaring on its front page, people died because they were poor. In the Middle East, Katrina has dominated evening newscasts." Arab networks "claiming Americans can't fight a war in Iraq and battle storm damage at home. Egyptian newspapers called it shocking that America was incapable of handling the disaster." But "rich or poor, nations are lining up to help. Afghanistan pledged $100,000. Singaporians are flying rescue missions. Even tsunami-ravaged Sri Lanka pledged $25,000, all it could afford: Shocked nations offering aid in recognition of America's own tradition of generosity in times of need."

DOJ_NMG_0003148

USA Today (9/7) says in an editorial, "To believe some commentary in countries from Europe to Asia to the Middle East, the world's wealthy superpower has, in Katrina's wake, been exposed as a vulnerable supermonster. In this view from abroad, the USA is a place that is callous toward its poor and black. A Pakistani newspaper wrote, for example, of how the U.S. government 'for three days sat smugly apathetic to the people's plight.' It's a place where the early looting reflects a culture of violence and selfishness: 'The darker side of the American dream' was how a columnist for London's Daily Mail put it. And it's a place where a focus on the Iraq war has starved it of resources to deal with natural disasters — a favorite topic in the Arab media. The comments, which contain both distortions and grains of truth, are a jolting reminder that the U.S. image in the world has been in a tailspin since the start of the Iraq war — fueled by anger and frustration over the go-it-alone U.S. approach that has too often disregarded others' opinions or interests."

Bush, Spellings Offering Help To Students, Schools Affected By Katrina. The AP (9/7) reports President Bush says that "the administration is looking at ways to help schools absorb students displaced by Hurricane Katrina." In a meeting with U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings, he said that "local school districts are extending 'extraordinary efforts' right now to help kids learn." And he "promised that Washington is ready to show flexibility when it comes to college loans."

The New York Times (9/7, Dillon) reports, "School districts from Maine to Washington State were enrolling thousands of students from New Orleans and other devastated Gulf Coast districts yesterday in what experts said could become the largest student resettlement in the nation's history. Schools welcoming the displaced students must not only provide classrooms, teachers and textbooks, but under the terms of President Bush's education law must also almost immediately begin to raise their scholastic achievement unless some provisions of that law are waived. Historians said that those twin challenges surpassed anything that public education had experienced since its creation." So far, "the total number of displaced students is not yet known, but it appears to be well above 200,000." President Bush said that Education Secretary Spellings "was working on a plan to help states absorb the educational costs but gave no hint of what kind of assistance might be provided. The Department of Education set up a Web site to coordinate private donations to schools enrolling displaced students." Spellings "has invited 40 education groups, including the P.T.A. and teachers unions, to meet at the Department of Education today to discuss disaster recovery efforts."

KYW-TV Philadelphia, Pennsylvania (9/6, 4:06 p.m.) reported, "President Bush met today with Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to talk about assistance for displaced students and closed schools in the disaster area. Tens of thousands of students, public and college students, were displaced by Hurricane Katrina."

WTAE-TV Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania (9/6, 5:03 p.m.) reported "Margaret Spellings will meet with education leaders from around the country to come up with a plan to help schools absorb students who have been displaced by the hurricane." WBAL-TV Baltimore, Maryland (9/6, 6:00 p.m.) also reported this story.

Districts Welcome Students. The AP (9/7, Lewan) reports, "Refugee students are getting a tough crash course in adjustment." School districts "have begun hastily enrolling these students, even embracing them" but "the influx is putting a logistical and financial strain on schools at a time when many are grappling with budget and program cuts, soaring gas prices, and the pressure of satisfying the No Child Left Behind Act."

The AP (9/7, Bluestein) reports, "Some 350 evacuees have already enrolled in Georgia public schools." And "although education officials are uncertain how the influx will strain schools throughout the state, the priority now is to 'put them in a classroom and we'll work out the details later,' said spokesman Dana Tofig."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/7, Wascoe) reports, Metairie, Louisiana high school senior Johnathan Smith has enrolled at Minneapolis' Southwest High and "as word spread of the New Orleans emigre's arrival, Johnathan was treated 'like a rock star,' said Josh Collins, a Minneapolis schools spokesman."

The Dallas Morning News (9/7, Booth) reports, "More than 6,100 students fleeing Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath have enrolled in Texas public schools so far…and state education officials promise to release money immediately to help affected districts cope. Officials expect 50,000 to 60,000 new students to enroll in Texas schools."

DOJ_NMG_0003149

The Washington Times (9/7, Wagner) reports, "Public schools in Maryland and Virginia are enrolling Katrina victims under the federal McKinney-Vento Act, which provides for the enrollment of homeless students without immediately obtaining birth records or requiring the children to receive necessary immunizations."

Pentagon Defends Katrina Response. USA Today (9/7, Kelley) reports the Pentagon's top officials "said Tuesday that the military responded quickly to Hurricane Katrina, although it took nearly four days for troops to begin delivering large amounts of food and water to storm victims." Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said, "Not only was there no delay, I think we anticipated in most cases — not in all cases, but in most cases — the support that was required." USA adds storm victims "in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama complained bitterly that the military didn't start large-scale delivery of provisions until Friday. Some military helicopters began search-and-rescue operations Aug. 30."

NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 6, 2:35, Myers) reported, "On the Federal level, clearly the arrival of the military has helped. But why did it take so long? On Wednesday, an Army officer said the nation's elite rapid deployment group, the 82nd Airborne, had 3,500 soldiers and 30 helicopters ready to be in New Orleans within hours. Yet they arrived only yesterday. Today, the Pentagon was defensive." General Richard Myers, Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: "Not only was there no delay, I think we anticipated in most cases, not in all cases, but in most cases, the support that was required, and we were pushing support before we were formally asked for it." Myers: "A persistent unanswered question, why didn't the military just drop pallets of water to those stranded in various locations."

Parallels Between Katrina, Iraq Planning Failures Noted. The Wall Street Journal (9/7, A4, Jaffe) reports, "Military officials surveying the slow federal response to Hurricane Katrina say the problems that hindered early relief efforts along the Gulf Coast are eerily similar to those that have dogged relief and reconstruction efforts in Iraq." The crises "spotlight the inability of disparate departments within the government to plan together before a catastrophe and work quickly together once one hits." Michele Flournoy, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said, "Clearly we didn't get a coordinated governmental response in the case of Katrina. The same thing happened in Iraq. The mechanisms to integrate efforts across the government were just lacking." The Journal adds, "Some senior Pentagon officials, however, dispute that analysis. Rather than lack of coordination, they blame the magnitude of the disaster, which wiped out state and local emergency-response efforts."

Two Navy Pilots Reprimanded For Rescuing Hurricane Victims. The New York Times (9/7, Cloud) reports, "Two Navy helicopter pilots and their crews returned from New Orleans on Aug. 30 expecting to be greeted as lifesavers after ferrying more than 100 hurricane victims to safety." Instead, "their superiors chided the pilots, Lt. David Shand and Lt. Matt Udkow, at a meeting the next morning for rescuing civilians when their assignment that day had been to deliver food and water to military installations along the Gulf Coast."

IRS Expands Tax Relief For Hurricane Victims. The Wall Street Journal (9/7, Herman) reports in its "Tax Report" column that the federal government "has greatly expanded the number of areas eligible for special tax relief and is taking other steps designed to ease pressures on taxpayers in the storm-ravaged region. Areas eligible for relief include 64 Louisiana parishes, 52 Mississippi counties and six Alabama counties, the Internal Revenue Service said. Also on the list are three Florida counties: Broward, Miami-Dade and Monroe. Early last week, the IRS initially singled out only 31 Louisiana parishes, 15 Mississippi counties and three Alabama counties."

Private Donations To Charities Setting Records. USA Today (9/7, Koch) reports, "Private fundraising for Hurricane Katrina victims — from bake sales, to carwashes, to football games — has topped a half billion dollars and is outpacing U.S. donations for tsunami relief. The American Red Cross has raised more than $409 million, abetted by corporations, Texas businessman T. Boone Pickens as well as schoolchildren emptying their penny jars. Half of the total has arrived online. … The intensity is expected to continue as schools hold fundraisers, former presidents Bill Clinton and George H.W. Bush plead for donations and entertainers host a TV benefit concert, 'Shelter From the Storm,' Friday." USA Today (9/7, Cava) reports, "While bake sales and food collections have sprung up in countless towns, some cities are giving more. Much more. Partly because they're asked to, by both city officials and fate. But mostly because they want to. Such is the case with" San Antonio."

DOJ_NMG_0003150

Government Warns About Katrina Relief Scams. NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 8, 0:30, O'Donnell) reported, "The Red Cross estimates more than $400 million in gifts and pledges so far to date. But we have to give you a warning tonight, to look out for charity scams because the government has warned us. For tips on steering clear of these Katrina schemes, log on to our website, the information is there the address is nightly.msnbc.com. Part of the information has to deal with those scam computer addresses."

Some Charitable Organizations Have Trouble Delivering Aid. The Washington Post (9/7, B9, Trejos) reports, "The Rev. William Finch, pastor of St. Raphael's Catholic Church in Rockville, arrived [in Houston] Tuesday ready to sell Montgomery County as a haven for 50 hurricane evacuees living in the Astrodome. … Since deciding to go after watching television coverage of Katrina's catastrophic aftermath last week, Finch has contacted the Red Cross and Texas officials for help identifying evacuees. He said he has not been able to reach anyone who can help. Others who want to assist have been rebuffed. When the D.C. government sent 10 buses to New Orleans to pick up storm victims Friday, people reportedly refused to leave." The Washington Post (9/7) reports, "A convoy of buses that set out Friday to rescue New Orleans evacuees is scheduled to return this morning largely empty-handed. … By the time they made it to New Orleans, though, crowds at the convention center and Superdome had been evacuated, city officials said."

Katrina Expected To Have Big Negative Effect On US Economy. The Christian Science Monitor (9/7, Trumbull) reports this morning that "Katrina has packed an unusually big punch to the United States economy. Though the full impact of the Aug. 29 superstorm is still being assessed, the economic brunt differs in at least three major ways from a typical recovery led by armies of insurance adjusters bearing clipboards and checkbooks." They are, "A region's major city has been entirely displaced, throwing hundreds of thousands of people out of work and casting doubt on the financial future of New Orleans itself. The movement of goods through America's heartland has been disrupted, with key ports still closed and the channel of the Mississippi narrowed by the storm. Oil and gas drilling platforms, refineries, and pipelines are damaged, and some will take months to bring back on line." The result "is a barrage of challenges likely to affect everything from the US unemployment rate to winter heating costs for months to come . The typical forecast now is for slowing growth rather than outright recession."

The Washington Post (9/7, D1, Pressler, Blustein) says "the long-term economic impact of Hurricane Katrina will hinge in large part on how US consumers react to the disaster and resulting surge in gas prices. … Even before Katrina laid waste to the central Gulf Coast, gas prices were dampening consumption, according to a survey in early May for the National Retail Federation. People with low incomes are those most likely to economize when gas prices rise. That is one reason Wal-Mart Stores Inc. reduced its earnings forecast for the third quarter."

Moreover, says the Wall Street Journal (9/7, Barta, Walker, Hilsenrath), "the economic waves from Hurricane Katrina are being felt not just in the US, but around the globe, particularly in countries such as Indonesia and Italy that already were straining from soaring oil costs before the storm disrupted energy supplies. … Few economists expect the global economy to grind to a halt because of the storm alone. Just as the US has become more resilient to energy shocks in the past two decades, so have many of its trading partners." But "given the US role as the world's economic locomotive, the likely slowing of growth and employment here in the months ahead is likely to restrain growth elsewhere." The Financial Times (9/7, Giles, Editor) adds that "the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development on Tuesday urged the world's central banks to adopt a relaxed attitude to interest rates in the wake of surging oil prices and Hurricane Katrina."

Katrina Could Cause Increase In Steel Prices. The Wall Street Journal (9/7) reports, "The price of steel used to make cars and industrial equipment is expected to rise by as much as 20% in coming months because New Orleans flooding has limited the supply and distribution of raw materials such as liquid hydrogen and scrap steel." The increase "would be in addition to roughly 20% price increases by steelmakers including Pittsburgh-based US Steel Corp. and Nucor Corp., of Charlotte, N.C., that became effective on Sept. 1 for shipments of key products like hot-rolled coil."

DOJ_NMG_0003151

Insurance Industry Expected To Survive Katrina Aftermath. The Washington Post (9/7, D1, Crenshaw) reports, "Katrina seems likely to become the most expensive natural catastrophe in US history, but unless insured damages go far higher than the current high-endestimate of $35 billion, the insurance industry should be able to pay the claims without threat to its own solvency, industry experts said yesterday." However, "taxpayers, insurance ratepayers and others are likely to be feeling the economic effect of the giant storm for years to come," and some risk experts are starting to raise the question of how -- or if -- houses or other buildings in low-lying areas such as New Orleans should be rebuilt."

Stocks Rally. The Financial Times (9/7, Schurr) reports, "If muted activity last week in the face of Hurricane Katrina was an exercise in restraint, yesterday's market performance could be called a return of animal spirits. Stocks rallied solidly and broadly, with every sector in the S&P 500 posting gains." The S&P 500 rose 15.38 points, or 1.3 per cent, to 1,233.40, the biggest percentage gain since the recent bottom on April 21. The Nasdaq Composite added 25.79 points, or 1.2 per cent, to 2,166.86 and the Dow Jones Industrial Average increased 141.87 points, or 1.4 per cent, to 10,565.12. The Wall Street Journal (9/7) and USA Today (9/7, Shell), among other sources, also report the stock numbers.

New Orleans Law Firms Struggle To Survive In Katrina's Wake. The National Law Journal (9/7, Jones) reports, "Much of the New Orleans legal community is in shambles following the devastation from Hurricane Katrina. … Attorneys and staffers at some law firms were still unaccounted for last week, and office buildings and courthouses -- and the documents inside -- remained soaking under water." The Journal continues, "Legal professionals said that they thought they had planned for the worst, but until some levees collapsed flooding almost 80 percent of the city after the hurricane hit, they believed they had escaped much of the damage predicted from the massive storm. … 'We have never dealt with something of this magnitude, but we're going to have to,' said Gregory Bodin, president of the Baton Rouge Bar Association. With offices at the Louisiana State Bar Association and the New Orleans Bar Association flooded, the Baton Rouge organization is serving as the headquarters for the other groups." The Journal adds, "The New Orleans area was home to about 7,500 lawyers, Bodin said, which equals about one-third of the state's attorneys. 'Most of the lawyers lost their homes, jobs and maybe their practices,' he said. … As most phone and electronic communications remained useless after the barriers protecting the low-lying city failed, law firm leaders and court personnel were struggling to find offices and even housing for their workers."

Senators Say Action On Social Security Is Unlikely This Year. In what the Washington Times (9/7, Fagan) calls the "final blow to President Bush's signature domestic issue," senators "said they don't think they will act on Social Security legislation this year. … 'It's off the radar,' said Sen. Gordon H. Smith, Oregon Republican, adding that hurricane relief is much more important now, and Social Security is an issue 'we'll eventually deal with' down the line, though not likely this year. 'Social Security? I think not much is going to happen there this year,' agreed Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican. 'I can't imagine President Bush is going to go back to it,' Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, said of Social Security." The Times adds that some Senate Republicans, including Sens. Orrin Hatch and Craig Thomas, "still say action is possible in their chamber this year."

IG Finds Opinion Columnists Paid By Education Department Failed To Disclose Funding. The Dallas Morning News (9/7, Hillman) reports the U.S. Department of Education "paid education advocacy organizations to submit opinion pieces to newspapers and produce other ads, brochures and postcards -- and many did not disclose their government ties, the department's inspector general has concluded." But department spokeswoman Susan Aspey "cited a letter to the inspector general from Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, who said she agreed with most of the findings and that the department already had moved to 'strengthen the grant-making and contracting processes.'"

Hastings, Mollohan Face Questions About Ethics Panel Staffing. Reps. Doc Hastings and Alan Mollohan, the two top members of the house ethics committee are facing questions on when they will finish hiring staff for the panel. Roll Call (9/7, Bresnahan) reports, "Hastings and Mollohan, chairman and ranking member of the committee, hope to select a new chief counsel/staff director by the end of September or early October, according to sources close to the panel. Mollohan also wants to hire at least two additional investigators before initiating any inquiries, and Hastings is expected to accede to that request. But the slow pace of hiring signals that the committee will likely not have completed a preliminary investigation of House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) over his dealings with former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff by the end of this year. DeLay then faces the possibility of a second straight election cycle in which the ethics committee releases findings on an investigation of him before voters go to the polls, a daunting challenge for even the most politically astute Member."

DOJ_NMG_0003152

OTHER NEWS:

Gulf Repairs, Saudi Cut Lead To Lower Oil, Gas Prices. The Wall Street Journal (9/7, Hotter) reports, "Petroleum futures on the New York Mercantile Exchange fell 2.4% as Gulf of Mexico oil production continued to recover in the wake of Hurricane Katrina." The "massive government response to the supply disruptions caused by the storm eased traders' concerns about curtailed US production. October crude fell $1.61 to $65.96 a barrel."

The Financial Times (9/7, Flood) reports, "The price reduction on its heavy crude is likely to lead to a production increase by the world's largest exporter. This may be confirmed this weekend when the kingdom nominates its October oil export programme." The move "comes ahead of the meeting of the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries later this month, when Saudi Arabia may push for an increase in the Opec quota from its current level of 28m b/d in an effort to stem the rise in global oil prices."

The Wall Street Journal (9/7, Herrick, Gold, Fialka) adds "the Gulf Coast network of production platforms, pipelines and refineries hammered by Hurricane Katrina last week took a step toward normalcy yesterday, helping to temper the price of crude oil and offering hope that the worst of the current energy crunch may have passed." As a result, "the US average retail price for unleaded gasoline -- having matched an all-time high Monday -- eased about a cent to $3.04 a gallon yesterday, according to AAA, formerly the American Automobile Association, as Labor Day marked the end of the summer driving season."

The New York Times (9/7, Bajaj, Mouawad) also runs a story titled "Gas Prices At Pumps Show Signs Of Easing." USA Today (9/7, Healey), under the headline "Gas Prices Ease As Gulf Production Up," reports "most Americans -- eight of 10 -- told USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup pollsters Monday and Tuesday that gasoline suppliers are taking advantage of the hurricane to charge unfair prices. Prices zoomed past $6 a gallon in some areas after Katrina, and average more than $3 currently."

Network coverage of gas prices was markedly negative and didn't note prices had gone down. ABC World News Tonight (9/6, story 7, :15, Gibson) reported, "The government reported today that gasoline prices have soared to an average of $3.07 a gallon. That is a record 46 cent increase in just one week, since Hurricane Katrina knocked out eight major refineries." The CBS Evening News (9/6, story 9, 0:20, Roberts) reported, "In the week since the hurricane struck, gasoline prices have been rising nearly seven cents a day."

Senators Suggest Raising Fuel Economy Standards. Key senators said yesterday that Congress should consider raising fuel economy standards for all vehicles, citing gasoline shortages and spike in gas prices caused by Hurricane Katrina. The Washington Times (9/7, Hill) reports that Sen. Pete Domenici, chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said, "I believe we must take another look at the CAFE standards," adding, "We looked at that before, and it was not politically possible. I'm not sure that will be the case after Katrina." Sen. Jeff Bingaman, the committee's ranking member, "said he also hopes Congress will revisit whether to require cars, trucks and sport utility vehicles to give better mileage than the current standard, which is 27.5 miles per gallon on average for cars."

Lawmakers Also Accuse Oil Companies Of Profiteering. The New York Times (9/7, Kirkpatrick) reports 'the Senate energy committee also "vented bipartisan wrath Tuesday over accusations of energy-company profiteering after the Gulf Coast was struck by a hurricane. 'Hurricane Katrina exposed the harsh reality that we have been skirting and skating on thin ice when it comes to this country's energy concentration on the Gulf Coast,' said Senator Pete V. Domenici, the New Mexico Republican who is chairman of the panel. 'Why are the oil companies making record profits, and what are they doing with them?' he asked." Lawmakers "of both parties were eager to warn oil producers to watch their prices. Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, said: 'The distrust is enormous. I hope somebody out there is listening who controls these prices.'" The Times adds, "Several senators from both parties called for the Federal Trade Commission to vigorously investigate charges of price gouging."

DOJ_NMG_0003153

The AP (9/7, Hebert) reports, "Senators, both Republicans and Democrats, said Tuesday that they suspect price gouging as gasoline costs soared in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina but complained that the government doesn't have the ability to investigate or prevent such market abuses. … 'The American people are being victimized more than any free market would warrant,' said Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., at Senate hearing on the impact of the hurricane on energy prices." The AP continues, "Smith and other senators said regulators, including the Federal Trade Commission, are not aggressively pursuing price gouging and other market manipulation by energy companies reaping huge profits. … Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., chairman of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, which held hearings into the recent price spikes, said Congress needs to give agencies the tools to investigate price-gouging complaints. … Sen. Jon Corzine, D-N.J., said that even as crude prices were declining, gasoline prices at the pump soared by 25 percent. … Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., said he will introduce legislation for a windfall profits tax on oil companies, with the proceeds used to rebate consumers who have paid huge prices at the pump." The AP notes, "Twenty-three states have price-gouging statutes, but Domenici acknowledged they are 'all over the waterfront' as to how they are used. In Virginia, a government must declare an emergency for the law to be used. … The FTC does not have authority over price gouging unless it involves an antitrust or market monopoly issue. … The afternoon of testimony demonstrated that one person's price gouging may be another person's justified price response to changing conditions of supply and demand."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (9/7) defended the oil companies in an editorial this morning. Says the Journal, "Let's explain why prices have been rising. Katrina has knocked out about 90% of Gulf crude oil production and about 80% of natural gas output." That" translates into about two million barrels a day that are not available to consumers, an 11% decrease in supply. This means that in the near term Americans are going to have to consume two million fewer barrels of gas every day, at least until the refineries are brought back on line and increased output and supplies from other nations arrive. The way the market achieves this reduction in consumption is through a higher price." The argument is also made that "energy companies are reaping windfall profits from the Katrina catastrophe. That is in one sense true -- the oil they've already extracted and refined is more valuable now, and we would be pleased to see some of these extra profits donated to the relief effort." But "artificially holding down the price of gas makes a bad situation worse."

Blunt Requests Gas Price Gouging Investigation. KDEB-TV Springfield, MO (9/6, 9:12 p.m.) reported, "With gas prices continuing to hover around three dollars a gallon here in Missouri, Governor Matt Blunt is once again looking to launch an investigation into price gouging. The governor sent letters today to US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and the FTC chairman asking their offices to look into the sudden increases with a focus on big oil companies."

KOLR-TV Springfield, MO (9/6, 10:00 p.m.) also ran this story.

DeLay Says There's No Backing For Rolling Back Gasoline Tax. Reuters (9/7) reports, "House Republican Leader Tom DeLay said on Tuesday there was no support for rolling back the federal gasoline tax to offset higher prices. 'Absolutely not,' he told reporters after a meeting with President George W. Bush on issues related to Hurricane Katrina." He added, "Now more than ever you're going to need...that infrastructure, those highway trust funds, to rebuild the bridges that were destroyed, rebuild the railroads that were destroyed. You have to have the infrastructure or you can't have a recovery."

IAEA Report Says Iran Could Develop Nuclear Weapons In Five Years. Preceding a Sept 16 IAEA meeting to decide on penalties for Iran for pursuing its nuclear program, the International Institute of Strategic Studies released a study saying Iran could develop enough weapons-grade uranium for a weapon in five years, but that it would likely focus on developing on production capability for a decade before making a decision on acquiring atomic weapons. The Financial Times (9/7, Spiegel) reports, "The five-year estimate is more aggressive than reported projections of US intelligence agencies, which are believed to have determined Iran is six to ten years away from such a breakthrough. But in spite of a capability to develop weapons-grade uranium by the end of the decade, John Chipman, the IISS director, said that would require Iran to 'throw caution to the wind' and ignore the threat of international sanctions, a move Tehran has been reluctant to pursue." Chipman "noted that a more cautious approach – which would involve building a more sophisticated "industrial-scale" centrifuge plant at Natanz – would allow Iran to have a much greater capability to produce the higher enriched uranium needed for weapons in the long-term."

DOJ_NMG_0003154

The New York Times (9/7, Cowell) says that with the report being released "at a diplomatically delicate time," Dr. Chipman "said it would be important for negotiators 'to apply pressure and create inducements to persuade Iran not to develop a fuel-cycle capability that it could turn later into a weapons program.'" In addition he said "it will be important to apply international diplomacy in such a way that does not inspire Iran to abandon all restraint and seek a nuclear-weapons capability without regard to international repercussions."

Bolton Offers Compromise On UN Reforms. The New York Times/Reuters (9/7) reports, "Ambassador John R. Bolton of the United States on Tuesday offered compromise language on development and aid spending and climate change to try to resolve a deadlock over a list of goals being prepared for a world summit meeting here next week." With disagreements on the Kyoto protocols and UN foreign aid increases "surfacing again as a logjam in the preparation of the goals list, Mr. Bolton said the United States was ready to accept the use of the catch-all phase 'millennium development goals' throughout the text, 'provided it can be properly defined.'" In effect, US-proposed language "including the phrase would commit world leaders to meet obligations they had undertaken in United Nations climate change agreements, including 'for many of us, the Kyoto Protocol,' according to Mr. Bolton's prepared speaking notes."

WSJournal Lauds Bolton Efforts To Reform UN. The Wall Street Journal (9/7) writes in an editorial that some of Ambassador Bolton's reforms "seem small but are literally worth hundreds of millions of dollars." And Bolton "also focuses on management reform, which will come into special focus with the release today of Paul Volcker's fourth report on the Oil for Food scandal. The report will stress Mr. Annan's multiple supervisory failures, yet Mr. Annan wants the world's leaders to accept his reform plan as a fait accompli before Mr. Volcker's findings are even read, much less considered." The Journal concludes, "Those who want something more than a feckless and corrupt world body should welcome his efforts."

State Department Raises Concerns About Israeli Plans For Construction In West Bank. The AP (9/7, Schweid) reports, "The State Department said Tuesday it had raised with the Israeli government the approval of construction of 117 houses in the Ariel settlement in the heart of the West Bank." Spokesman Sean McCormack "left little doubt that the administration was displeased."

Rice Has "Good" Meeting With UN Official About Gaza. The AP (9/7, Schweid) also notes, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met Tuesday for a half-hour with Karen Koning AbuZayd, counsel-general of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency, on the post-withdrawal situation in Gaza." McCormack said, "They had a good meeting."

Arafat Cousin Killed In Gaza. The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Ellingwood) reports, "Unidentified gunmen in the Gaza Strip shot and killed Moussa Arafat, a former Palestinian Authority security chief and a cousin of the late Yasser Arafat, at his home in Gaza City before dawn today." The Times notes, "The brazen assault heightened worries about chaos and factional violence in the Gaza Strip following Israel's withdrawal from all 21 Jewish settlements there." He "made numerous enemies during his years as a ranking security official and was viewed by many Palestinians as corrupt."

Poll Shows US, Europe Remain In Agreement On Major Policy Issues. The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Rotella) reports, "Europeans and Americans have often starkly different views of each other and the world, but agree on some major issues such as promoting democracy and avoiding war with Iran, according to a survey being released today." While "Western leaders try to mend rifts exacerbated since 2003 by the Iraq war, the fourth annual study of European and U.S. public opinion by the German Marshall Fund depicts a complex, wary transatlantic relationship. But the report, an advanced copy of which was given to The Times, also contradicts stereotypes and common wisdom." And while "a majority of Europeans remain hostile to American global dominance and President Bush in particular, they are enthusiastic about the centerpiece of Bush's foreign policy: promoting democracy around the world."

The Wall Street Journal (9/7, Champion) reports, "An annual survey of opinion in 11 countries published today finds that, while the U.S.'s image no longer is sliding downward, Europeans feel no warmer toward the U.S. than they did a year ago, are no less hostile to U.S. global leadership and still disapprove overwhelmingly of the way Mr. Bush handles foreign policy." But although Europeans support some of the Administration's major foreign policy goals, "continuing bloodshed and instability in Iraq dominate. Since the poll was taken, the recent hurricane disaster on the U.S. Gulf Coast also appears to have rekindled distaste for the U.S.'s political system and social values, which are blamed here for leaving thousands of mainly poor and black New Orleans residents behind when the rest of the city evacuated."

DOJ_NMG_0003155

US, China Discuss Future Of Korean Peninsula. The Washington Post (9/7, A22, Kessler) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her deputy, Robert B. Zoellick, have begun to explore with Chinese leaders the economic and political future of the Korean Peninsula 'because the status quo was not going to hold,' Zoellick said in an interview with a small group of reporters yesterday." He "said it was clear the Chinese did not 'want a collapsed state on their border,' a concern that he suggested had hamstrung Chinese officials in pressing North Korea on its illicit weapons programs. He said that in his talks, he picked up a discussion on the Korean Peninsula's future that Rice had initiated during an earlier trip to Beijing." Rice and Zoellick's efforts "appeared to be aimed at reducing the anxiety of the Chinese over a possible reunification of North and South Korea."

Activist Arrested By Chinese Authorities. The Washington Post (9/7, A22, Pan) reports, "Local authorities on Tuesday seized a rural activist who has been leading a high-profile legal campaign against the use of forced sterilization and abortion in China, in an apparent effort to block him from meeting with senior government officials who had expressed support for his cause." Chen Guangcheng's arrest "occurred a few days after he arrived in Beijing for meetings with lawyers and journalists. He was seized just as the Chinese government opened an international legal conference here."

Mubarak Expected To Win Presidential Election. USA Today (9/7, Levinson) reports, "Egyptians will have a choice for the first time in their country's 7,000-year history when they vote for a leader at polls today. But a majority appear likely to vote for" President Hosni Mubarak "who has ruled this country for the past 24 years." USA Today notes, "Egypt is contending with double-digit unemployment and inflation. Still, many voters remain loyal to Mubarak. In a region beset by conflict, Mubarak has guided Egypt through a period of protracted stability. Egyptians who remember the wars and tumult of earlier eras say they are thankful to Mubarak."

German Voters Leaning Right In US-Style Campaign. The Christian Science Monitor (9/7, Tzortzis) reports that while flash polls after the only debate between Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and his challenger Angela Merkel showed Schroeder had won the exchange, polls "have shown Mr. Schroeder's Social Democratic Party (SPD) a good 10 points behind Ms. Merkel's Christian Democratic Union (CDU) -- pointing to a growing likelihood that the former East German physicist will end the chancellor's seven-year rule." A Merkel victory "would bring a shift to the right that promises better communication with the US, a critical voice in the pledge to include Turkey in the European Union, and -- most important -- a more aggressive approach to Germany's greatest problem: the economy." The German "campaign has seen even more borrowed elements from the US. Merkel's campaign team has set up a professional call center to handle queries from voters, and a so-called 'rapid response' team that contradicts inaccuracies made by Schroeder in speeches or attacks on his opponent, says a CDU campaign official."

Heinz Plant Seized By Venezuela. The Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones (9/7) reports, "Alimentos Heinz, a Venezuela subsidiary of H.J. Heinz Co., said a government takeover of an inactive tomato-processing plant in recent days lacks legal backing." The Heinz plant "wasn't operating because low market demand and low prices didn't make it feasible to keep it running, the company said. Company officials are seeking a meeting with Vice President José Vicente Rangel and Agriculture Ministry officials to discuss the problem, the statement added."

Dominance Of One-Party Rule Seen As Stifling Democracy In Japan. Despite recent gains by the opposition Democratic Party in Japan, polls indicate the Liberal Democratic Party is headed for a big victory in Sunday's general election. The New York Times (9/7, Onishi) credits Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi with using the campaign to portray his party as standing for reform, but says his victory "will delay, again, the start of a new political era in which power is transferred regularly from one party to another, as it is in other democracies." The Times notes, "Japan's democracy is East Asia's oldest, but its ruling party has held power almost as long as the Communist parties in China and North Korea. Younger democracies in South Korea and Taiwan have already experienced changes in ruling parties, and the underpinnings of democracies, from vibrant civil societies to strong, independent news media, appear to be flourishing there more than they are here."

DOJ_NMG_0003156

Koizumi Seeks Mandate To Shift Priorities From Rural To Urban Issues. The Wall Street Journal (9/7, Moffett, Woods) reports, "In elections this Sunday, Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi is betting he can win a mandate to engineer a shift no other Japanese leader has ever dared. His goal: To cut off the decades-long tradition of propping up Japan's declining countryside, and channel resources into the nation's successful cities and industries instead." He "plans to dismantle one of the countryside's biggest crutches, the huge and unusual post office, which in addition to selling stamps also acts as a bank and insurer. It is a vast network of 26,000 offices with 280,000 public employees, plus $3 trillion in savings and life-insurance deposits. The deposits are typically funneled into public-spending projects that have boosted rural economies.

Seriousness Of Chirac Illness Remains Unknown. The New York Times/IHT (9/7, Bennhold, Rosenthal) reports, "After a series of minimalist medical bulletins describing President Jacques Chirac's stay in a Paris hospital, it is still a public mystery what kind of neurological malady has befallen him, although French military doctors at this point certainly know the diagnosis, independent experts said." Official descriptions of a "little vascular accident," have raised concerns because that "means a problem with a blood vessel, which is almost always serious -- or a signal of something serious to come. It includes strokes, torn blood vessels and clots that block vessels, causing damage to the eye or brain."

WPost Criticizes Turkey Over Outspoken Writer's Arrest. The Washington Post (9/7, A24) editorializes, "Orhan Pamuk, one of Turkey's most acclaimed writers, is facing up to three years in prison. His offense, according to the state prosecutor? 'Public denigrating of Turkish identity.' Specifically, Mr. Pamuk told a Swiss newspaper in February that certain topics were off-limits for discussion in Turkey --- citing the massacre of Armenians in 1915 and the more recent conflicts between Turkish security forces and Kurdish separatists." His arrest "will raise questions about the wisdom of Turkey's EU membership bid" and that "may be exactly what those pushing for a prosecution intended; the timing of the charges, as European ministers meet in Wales to discuss Turkey's membership, is suspicious. That makes it even more important for the national government, though it doesn't control the prosecutor who brought the case, to do what it can to halt this case and others like it. Turkey has made important strides in protecting freedom of expression in recent years, including reforming its penal code. The charges against Mr. Pamuk underscore how far it still has to go."

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends funeral service for Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10:30 a.m. Senate reconvenes.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.R. 250 - Manufacturing Technology Competitiveness Act of 2005. Suspensions (3 bills): 1) H.R. 1215 - Green Chemistry Research and Development Act of 2005; 2) H.R. 230 - National Small Business Regulatory Assistance Act of 2005; 3) H.R. 3207 - Second-Stage Small Business Development Act of 2005.

10 a.m. AGRICULTURE _ Full Committee. Hearing to review the Kelo v. City of New London U.S. Supreme Court decision and H.R. 3405, the Strengthening the Ownership of Private Property Act of 2005 (STOPP). Location: Room 1300, Longworth.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ The Foreign Operations subcommittee holds an oversight hearing on Iraq reconstruction. Testimony to include: Ambassador James Jeffrey, senior adviser on Iraq to the Secretary of State; James Kunder, USAID assistant administrator; Stuart Bowen, Jr., special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction. Location: Rayburn, Room 2359.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Criminal Justice, Drug Policy and Human Resources Subcommittee. Hearing on Hearing on prevention, early detection and treatment of gynecologic cancers. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

DOJ_NMG_0003157

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Subcommittee on Economic Security, Infrastructure Protection, and Cybersecurity. Hearing on ``The London Bombings: Protecting Civilian Targets from Terrorist Attacks." Kip Hawley, Administrator, Transportation Security Administration, U.S. Department of Homeland Security; Robert Stephan, Assistant Secretary, Infrastructure Protection Division, U.S. Department of Homeland Security; Bill Miller, President, American Public Transportation Association; Peter Lowy, Chief Executive Officer, Westfield America, Inc.; Michael Norton, Managing Director of Global Property Management, Tishman Speyer Properties; Joe Madsen, Director, Safety & Risk Management, Spokane Public Schools. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on reorganization of the VA's information technology infrastructure. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

10:30 a.m. EDUCATION AND THE WORKFORCE _ Full Committee. Markup of amendments to the budget reconciliation. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

11 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on Medicaid. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

11 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on the impact of Hurricane Katrina. Panel One: David Garman, undersecretary for Energy, Science and Environment, Department of Energy; Guy Caruso, administrator, Energy Information Agency; John Seesel, associate general counsel for energy, Federal Trade Commission; Kenneth Moran, Federal Communications Commission. Panel Two: Scott Angelle, secretary, Louisiana Department of Natural Resources; Red Cavaney, American Petroleum Institute; Bob Slaughter, National Petrochemical and Refiners Association; James Newsome, New York Mercantile Exchange; Benjamin Cooper, Association of Oil Pipe Lines; Bill Douglass, Douglass Distributing Co.; William Smith, BellSouth Corp.; Mark Cooper, Consumer Federation of America; and Daniel Lashof, National Resources Defense Council. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

Other: REHNQUIST _ Funeral and viewing schedule for late Supreme Court Justice William Rehnquist. Highlights: 10 a.m. - 12 p.m. Viewing at the Supreme Court. 2 p.m. Funeral service. St. Matthew's Cathedral, 1725 Rhode Island Ave. NW, with burial at Arlington National Cemetery to follow. Note: Funeral service is open to friends and family members. Burial is private. Media wishing to cover the funeral should call the court's media office for details. No press coverage of the burial. Location: Supreme Court.

TERRORISM SUMMIT _ The New America Foundation sponsors a forum on America's approach to countering terrorism, ``Terrorism, Security, and America's Purpose: Towards a More Comprehensive Strategy." Highlights: 9 a.m. Steven Clemons, New America Foundation. 9:05 a.m. Rep. Jim Saxton, R-N.J., House Armed Services Committee. 9:30 a.m. Francis Fukuyama, SAIS; Zbigniew Brzezinski, former national security advisor to the President; Col. Lawrence Wilkerson, USA (Ret.), former chief of staff, State Department; G. John Ikenberry, Princeton University; Kim Campbell, former prime minister of Canada; moderator Martin Walker, former Washington bureau chief, The Guardian, chief editor, UPI. 10:30 a.m. Madeleine Albright, former secretary of state; interlocutor Andrea Koppel, State Department correspondent, CNN. 11:15 a.m. Jamie Metzl, president, Partnership for a Secure America; Charles Andrew, co-chairman, Partnership for a Secure America; Warren Rudman, former US senator, co-chairman, US Commission on National Security in the 21st Century; Lee Hamilton, president Woodrow Wilson Center. 11:45 a.m. Louise Richardson, Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study; Robert Hutchings, Princeton University; Charles Kupchan, Georgetown University; Suzanne Spaulding, managing director, The Harbour Group; Michael McFaul, Stanford University; moderator Theodore Piccone, Democracy Coalition Project. 12:45 p.m. Mary Fetchet, founding director, Voices of September 11th. 2 p.m. Marc Sagemen, University of Pennsylvania; Daniel Levy, former advisor, Office of the Prime Minister, Israel; Galima Bukharbaeva, former country director/Uzbekistan, Institute for War and Peace Reporting; Juan Cole, University of Michigan; Karen Greenberg, NYU School of Law; Ivan Eland, Independent Institute; moderator Kelli Arena, CNN. 3:15 p.m. Julian Borger, Washington bureau chief, The Guardian; Yosri Fonda, Al-Jazeera; Tsutomu Watanabe, Asahi Shimbun; Michael Backfisch, Washington bureau chief, Handelsblatt; Nathan Guttman, Washington bureau chief, Jerusalem Post; Paulo Sotero, Washington bureau chief, O Estado de S. Paulo; moderator Nikolas Gvosdev, The National Interest. Location: Capital Hilton, 16th and K Streets, NW.

CHINESE PRESIDENT HU _ 10:30 a.m. ``Who is Hu: A Closer Look at President Hu Jintao," presented by Prof. David Lampton, Johns Hopkins University SAIS. Room 2216, Rayburn House Office Building.

DOJ_NMG_0003158

KATRINA-CUMMINGS _ 8 a.m. Rep. Elijah Cummings, D-Md., discusses relief efforts and homeland security issues with an emphasis on transit security in a speech before the Lawmakers Committee of the National Press Club. Location: National Press Club, McClendon Room.

KATRINA-SMALL BUSINESS _ 8:30 a.m. Sen. Olympia Snowe meets in closed session with Majority Leader Bill Frist on aide to small businesses destroyed by Hurricane Katrina. Media briefing to follow. Location: Capitol, S-207.

HOUSE DEMOCRATS _ 9 a.m. Closed meeting of the House Democratic Caucus. Location: Room 345, Cannon. Notes: Newsx conference following the meeting outside the Cannon Caucus Room at 10 a.m.

VIOXX VERDICT _ 9 a.m. - 11 a.m. The American Enterprise Institute (AEI) hosts a panel discussion on ``The $253 Million Vioxx Verdict: What Does It Mean?" with Dan Troy, Sidley & Austin; Evan Schaeffer, Schaeffer & Lamere, P.C.; John Calfee, AEI; and Ted Frank, AEI. Location: AEI, Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th Floor, 1150 17th St. NW.

KATRINA-CANADA _ 9:30 a.m. Canada's Ambassador to the U.S., Frank McKenna, briefs reporters on Canadian relief operations being deployed to the Gulf region. Location: Canadian Embassy Briefing Centre, 501 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

NTSB-AVIATION _ 9:30 a.m. The National Transportation Safety Board holds a board meeting on two items: a safety study concerning risk factors associated with weather-related general aviation accidents, and an aviation accident report concerning a crash during landing of an Executive Airlines Flight 5401, in San Juan, Puerto Rico, on May 9, 2004. Location: NTSB Board Room, 429 L'Enfant Plaza, SW.

SEPTEMBER ECONOMIC OUTLOOK _ 9:30 a.m. - 10 a.m. Business Roundtable, an association of CEOs of leading U.S. companies, releases results of its latest CEO Economic Outlook Survey with reporters via a conference call. Briefer is Hank McKinnell, chairman, Business Roundtable, and chairman and CEO of Pfizer Inc., who will give a brief overview of the survey results and then wil respond to questions. Contacts: Jennifer Handt, 202-496-3288 Notes: Dial-in telephone number: (888) 428-4480. Host: Business Roundtable. Callers will be asked for their name and media outlet before they are admitted to the call. If encountering problems call (202) 872-1260.

REPUBLICAN AGENDA _ 10 a.m. Republican leaders hold a news conference to discuss their legislative agenda. Participants include House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill; Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo.; Conference Chairman Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio; Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis, R-Calif.; and Budget Chairman Jim Nusslke, R-Iowa. Location: Cannon, HC-6. Notes: Follows 9 a.m. closed meeting at Cannon HC-5.

DEMOCRATS-HOMELAND SECURITY _ 11 a.m. Democratic Leader Rep. Nancy Pelosi holds news conference after closed caucus meeting on homeland security, with Rep. Robert Menendez, D-N.J.; Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss.; Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass. Location: Capitol, H-203. Notes: Follows 10 a.m. closed meeting at Cannon 345.

PENTAGON BRIEFING _ 11 a.m. Lt. Gen. Joseph Inge, deputy commander of U.S. Northern Command, will brief live from Peterson Air Force Base in Colorado to discuss the status of the Defense Department's Hurricane Katrina relief effort. Location: DoD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

NORTH KOREA VISIT _ 11:15 a.m. News conference with Rep. Jim Leach, R-Iowa, and Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif. on their Aug. 30 to Sept. 3 visit to North Korea, and looking ahead to the resumption of the Six Party Talks on nuclear disarmament next week. Location: House Radio/TV Gallery.

GAS PRICES _ 12 p.m. Sen. Byron Dorgan holds a news conference to announce a bill to provide relief from high gasoline prices. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

MEDICAID _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute hosts a Policy Forum on ``Medicaid and the Long-Term Care Crisis--Who Should Pay?" with Stephen Moses, president, Center for Long-Term Care Reform; Vincent Russo, certified elder law attorney, past president, National Academy of Elder Law Attorneys; Michael Cannon, director of health policy studies, Cato Institute. Location: Cato Institute, 1000 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

COSTS OF IRAQ WAR _ 12:30 p.m. The Institute for Policy Studies hosts a discussion on ``The Real Costs of the Iraq War: Excessive Salaries for CEOs of Defense Contractors and Lives and Tax Dollars Wasted," with IPS Fellows Erik Leaver, Phyllis Bennis, and Sarah Anderson," co-authors of two new reports by IPS on the Iraq war. Location: Institute for Policy Studies, Ste. 1020, 733 15th St. NW.

OIL DEPENDENCE _ 1:30 p.m. Former Reagan administration defense officials discuss by telephone the need to reduce the country's dependence on oil and instead create more efficient transportation. Speakers include Frank Gaffney, former assistant secretary of defense under Reagan and Dan Lashof, Natural Resources Defense Council. Contacts: Nicole St. Clair, 202-289-2404. Notes: Telephone news conference. Call 1-877-826-1586 and ask for ``Oil Savings."

DOJ_NMG_0003159

PREDATORY LENDING _ 1:30 p.m. The Center for Responsible Lending (CRL) holds a phone-based news conference on legislation currently before Congress jeopardizing consumers by what the Center says is weakening protections against predatory lending already in place across the U.S., with Rep. Brad Miller, D-N.C.; Massachusetts State Rep. John Quinn; New Jersey Department of Banking & Insurance Director H. Robert Tillman; New Mexico Chief Deputy Attorney General Stuart Bluestone; and CRL Executive Vice President Debbie Goldstein. Contacts: Ailis Aaron, 703-276-3265. Notes: To join the live, telephone-based news conference (with full Q&A) dial 1-(800) 860-2442 by 1:30 p.m. ET on Sept. 7 and ask for the ``Attack on state predatory lending laws" news event.

9/11-PENNSYLVANIA MEMORIAL _ 2 p.m. A press conference will be held to announce the winning design for the Flight 93 memorial for 9/11 victims in Somerset County, Pa. Location: U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Hall of Flags, Washington, DC.

DEMOCRACY AT RISK _ 3 p.m. The Brookings Institution hosts a discussion on a new book it published and is sponsored by the American Political Science Association titled ``Democracy at Risk: How Political Choices Undermine Citizen Participation, and What We Can Do About It," with moderator E.J. Dionne, Jr., Washington Post; panelist authors of the book Yvette Alex-Assensoh, Indiana University; Michael Brintnall, American Political Science Association.; William Galston, University of Maryland; Stephen Macedo, Princeton University; Christopher Karpowitz, Princeton University; Rob Reich, Stanford University, Robert Rodgers, Princeton University; and Todd Swanstrom, Saint Louis University. Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

KATRINA RELIEF _ 6 p.m. The state societies of Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi and Florida hold a fund raising reception to benefit Hurricane Katrina victims. Location: Jones Day Building, 7th floor, 311 1st St. NW.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Sadr City Success Story."
"Water Drops, Mayor Hopeful."
"Baton Rouge A Booming Haven For The Displaced."
"A Home For The Brave."
"Donations At $500 Million, And Climbing."
"Legislature OKs Gay Marriage."

USA Today:
"Intimidation, Attacks Take Toll On Contractors In Iraq."
"3 Families With One Question: What Do We Do Now?"
"'Rays Of Light' In New Orleans."

New York Times:
"Flooding Recedes In New Orleans; U.S. Inquiry Is Set."
"Putting Down New Roots On More Solid Ground."
"Across Nation, Storm Victims Crowd Schools."
"Baseball In Iraq: As Pastimes Go, It's Anything But."
"In Nursing Home, A Fight Lost To Rising Waters."

Washington Post:
"Katrina Takes Environmental Toll."
"The Lure Of Coastal Life Outweighs The Risks."
"Offers Of Aid Immediate, But U.S. Approval Delayed For Days."
"California Legislature Approves Gay Marriage."

Washington Times:
"Residents Will Be Forced To Leave."
"'Marriage' Bill OK'd, Goes To Arnold."
"Surge In Saudi Oil Income Seen Aiding Fight On Terror."
"Rehnquist's 'Strong Legacy' Hailed."

Detroit Free Press:
"President, Congress To Lead Investigations."
"State Effort To Recoup Homestead Taxes Falters."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Overwhelmed."

Dallas Morning News:
"Mayor Orders Holdouts Evacuated."
"Fuming Congress Plans A Battery Of Hearings."
"Texas Expecting Up To 60,000 New Students."
"A 2nd Chance At UT-Austin."

Houston Chronicle:
"Disaster Probes Ahead."
"Focus Now Turns To Providing Services."
"Making Progress, One Sandbag At A Time."
"As Rehnquist Is Mourned, Senate Focuses On Roberts."

DOJ_NMG_0003160

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: New Orleans Refugees; Refugee Children-School; Bush-Katrina Response; Rehnquist Mourned; New Orleans-Katrina Response; Brown-Allbaugh; Gas Prices; New Orleans-Health Threats; Death Toll; New Orleans-Diehards.

CBS: Katrina-Blame Game; New Orleans-Water Receding; MS-Private Hurricane Relief; Katrina-Blame Game; Refugee Children-School; Iraq KIA Honored; New Orleans Police; Rehnquist Mourned; Gas Prices; New Orleans Refugees; Hurricane Season; Bob Denver Obit.

NBC: New Orleans Update; New Orleans-Diehards; Biloxi-Cleanup; Bush-Katrina Response; Storm Warnings; Pentagon-Katrina Response; Hurricane Evacuees-School; Katrina-Charity Scams; Baton Rouge Airport; Hurricane Relief Update; New Orleans EMS; Katrina-Stress; New Orleans Police; Death Toll; New Orleans-Reconstruction; Katrina-World Reaction; Rehnquist Mourned; Denver Obit; Katrina-Radio Coverage.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: New Orleans-Forced Evacuations; New Orleans-Contaminated Floodwater; Congress-Hurricane Response Questions.

CBS: New Orleans-Forced Evacuations; Bush-Hurricane Relief; Gas Prices; Roberts; CA-Gay Marriage.

NPR: New Orleans-Floodwater Removal; Congress-Hurricane Response Questions; FL-Tropical Storm Warning; CA-Gay Marriage; Wall Street; Palestinian Security Official Killed; UN-Oil For Food Probe; Denver Obit.

Copyright 2005 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 2005 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Captured Iraq Terror Suspect Had Thumb Drive Containing London Bombings Information. 3
British Home Secretary To Call For Increased Scrutiny Of Traveler Data. 3
California Man Pleads Not Guilty To Terror Plot Charges. 3
Judge Denies Bail For Florida Doctor Accused Of Taking Al Qaeda Loyalty Pledge. 3
Psychiatrists Disagree On Alleged Ohio Bombing Plotter's Mental State. 3
US Resident Released From Military Detention In Iraq. 3
WPost Says Guantanamo Bay Tribunals Should Be Modeled After Courts-Martial. 3

Homeland Response:

Coast Guard Raids In California Raise Concerns. 4
First Phase Of Rebuilding After 9/11 Begins In Manhattan. 4

War News:

US Strikes Insurgent Targets In Western Iraq. 4
Sunnis Refuse US Military Order To Leave Tall Afar. 4
US Transfers Security Of Najaf To Iraqis. 4
Top Iraqi Bomb Expert Killed By Insurgents. 5
Attacks On Contractors Slow Iraqi Reconstruction. 5
Saddam Reportedly Confesses To Ordering Execution Of Kurds. 5
Volcker Report To Criticize Annan, UN For Lax Oversight Of Oil-For-Food Program. 5
US Resident Detained In Iraq Released Before Hearing. 6
WSJournal Suggests Bolton Lead Effort To Pressure Arab Governments To Support Iraq. 6
Political Tensions Threaten Nascent Iraqi Baseball League. 6
Al Qaeda Militants Killed By Saudi Security Forces. 6
First Afghan Cadet At West Point Eager To Help Country's Reconstruction. 6

DOJ:

Gonzales To Award Medal Of Valor To Families Of 9/11 Victims. 7

Corporate Scandals:

Enron Defendants Claim Prosecutors Are Scaring Off Witnesses. 7
Former Skandia CEO To Be Charged. 7
Lawyers Says Misconceptions About Audits Lead To Counterproductive Reforms. 7
Morgan Director's Resignation Is Omen Of Reorganization. 8
Investment Firm Sues To Stop Spitzer Fee Inquiry. 8
Delaware Settles With Morgan Stanley Over Trading Complaint. 8

Criminal Law:

Prosecutors Could Employ Little-Used Provision In Plame Case. 8
Former Houston Official Sentenced For Corruption. 8
Dallas Planning Commissioner Resigns Amid FBI Probe. 8
Nigerian Official Meets With FBI About Nigerian Corruption Investigation. 9
Court-Appointed Monitor Finds Chicago Hiring Still Based On Politics. 9
Tennessee Transportation Officials Inspect Guardrails Amid Contract Probe. 9
Suspect Arraigned In Murder Of Convicted Washington Sex Offenders. 9
Jurisdiction In Moving Bus Killing Could Mean Life Or Death. 9
Judge Dismisses Lawsuit Against FBI Over Bungled Massachusetts Surrender. 10
SCOTUS Asked To Rule On Sleeping Jurors. 10
US, Taiwan Make Additional Counterfeit Seizures In Operation Royal Charm. 10
Federal Prosecutor Says Sliwa Kidnapping Shows Gotti Remained Gambino Boss. 10
Value Of Online Gambling Site Declines. 10

Civil Law:

New Jersey Lawmakers Try To Bar Base Closing. 11
General Dynamics Loses Breach Of Contract Suit Brought By Former Partner. 11
5th Circuit Rules Attorney-Client Privilege No Shield For Company In Whistleblower Suits. 11

Civil Rights:

Opponents Of Georgia Voter ID Law To Monitor Elections. 12
DOJ Officials To Tour Baltimore Juvenile Justice Center. 12
California Assembly Passes Gay Marriage Bill. 12
Ohio Ballot Initiative Would Strip GOP Officials Of Control Over Redistricting. 13

Antitrust:

Unipol Gets Italian Antitrust Nod For BNL Bank Acquisition. 13

Gas Natural's Endesa Takeover Bid Spurned. 13
Court Cases Haven't Reduced Music File Sharing. 13
Columnist Bearish On Refinery Merger. 13

Environment:

EPA To Bar Use Of Children, Pregnant Women In Pesticide Studies. 14
Illegal Off-Road Vehicles Destroying Parkland, "Serious National Problem. 14
Bonilla Takes Aim At Eminent Domain. 14
LATimes Urges Congress To Support Coastal Restoration. 14

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Code Provision Has Been Used Against Government Leakers. 14
Medical Marijuana Does Not Influence Teen Use, MPP Study Suggests. 15
"Jury Is Still Out" On Methadone Dependency Risk. 15
Guilty Plea In Texas Drug Money Trafficking Case. 15
Fox Challenges Drug Kingpins To Take On Security Forces In Nuevo Laredo. 15
Spain Leads World In Cocaine Use. 16

Immigration:

Tax:

Twelve More May Be Indicted Over KPMG Shelters. 16
Thousands Not Taking Advantage Of Higher Education Tax Break. 17

Congress-Administration:

Bush Mentions Gonzales As Possible O'Connor Replacement. . 17
Bush Announces Inquiry Into Government's Response To Katrina. 20
Bush To Ask Congress For $40 Billion In Hurricane Relief. 23
Federal Relief Effort Now In Full Swing. 23
FEMA Director Brown Said To Have "Big Target On His Back. .. 25
Blanco Indecision Said To Have Delayed Federal Relief Efforts. 27
Congress To Probe Federal Response To Katrina, With Focus On FEMA. 28
Federal Officials Warn Of Post-Katrina ID Theft Threat, Relief Scams. 29
FEMA, HUD Seek Temporary Housing For Evacuees..... 29
FEMA Bureaucracy Said To Be Delaying International Aid..... 30
Bush, Spellings Offering Help To Students, Schools Affected By Katrina. 31
Pentagon Defends Katrina Response. 32
IRS Expands Tax Relief For Hurricane Victims. 32
Private Donations To Charities Setting Records. 32
Katrina Expected To Have Big Negative Effect On US Economy.33
New Orleans Law Firms Struggle To Survive In Katrina's Wake. 33
Senators Say Action On Social Security Is Unlikely This Year.... 34
IG Finds Opinion Columnists Paid By Education Department Failed To Disclose Funding. 34
Hastings, Mollohan Face Questions About Ethics Panel Staffing.34

Other News:

Gulf Repairs, Saudi Cut Lead To Lower Oil, Gas Prices. 34
IAEA Report Says Iran Could Develop Nuclear Weapons In Five Years. 36
Bolton Offers Compromise On UN Reforms. 36
State Department Raises Concerns About Israeli Plans For Construction In West Bank. 36
Poll Shows US, Europe Remain In Agreement On Major Policy Issues. 36
US, China Discuss Future Of Korean Peninsula. 37
Mubarak Expected To Win Presidential Election. 37
German Voters Leaning Right In US-Style Campaign. 37
Heinz Plant Seized By Venezuela. 37
Dominance Of One-Party Rule Seen As Stifling Democracy In Japan. 37
Seriousness Of Chirac Illness Remains Unknown. 38
WPost Criticizes Turkey Over Outspoken Writer's Arrest. 38

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington. 38

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages. 41

DOJ_NMG_0003163

TERRORISM NEWS:

Captured Iraq Terror Suspect Had Thumb Drive Containing London Bombings Information. The Washington Times (9/7, Hess) reports a US military officer has said that a terrorist connected to al-Qaeda, who was captured near the Syrian border in Iraq last month, "had a computer 'thumb drive' that contained planning information about the July 7 suicide bombings in London." The news "fits with other evidence of a growing presence in Iraq by al Qaeda, which has taken responsibility for the British attacks."

British Home Secretary To Call For Increased Scrutiny Of Traveler Data. The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Daniszewski) reports, "Britain's chief law enforcement official will call on European leaders today to put biological data into passports, visas and identity cards, share airline passenger lists and retain telecommunications records to help fight international terrorists and organized crime." Home Secretary Charles Clarke "said he was seeking to strike the right balance between preserving civil liberties and protecting the public. 'It seems to me we have to give the same rights to those humans who want to be able to travel without being blown up on an underground train…as we do to the defendants,' he said."

California Man Pleads Not Guilty To Terror Plot Charges. The AP (9/7, Blood) reports, "One of four men indicted in an alleged terror plot against California targets pleaded not guilty to federal charges Tuesday. Hammad Riaz Samana, a 21-year-old Pakistani national, said only a few words as he appeared with hands shackled to his waist before U.S. Magistrate Judge Arthur Nakazato." The AP notes, "Outside court, defense attorney Timothy Lannen described Samana as a hardworking, upstanding person. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Kevin Smith said that 'the indictment speaks for itself' and that the investigation was continuing. He said he expected the other men to be arraigned later this month." KNBC-TV Los Angeles (9/6) also reports on Samana's plea, noting, "Authorities are not aware of any current threat based on what was learned during the investigation, said Randy Parsons, acting assistant head of the FBI's Los Angeles office."

Judge Denies Bail For Florida Doctor Accused Of Taking Al Qaeda Loyalty Pledge. The Miami Herald (9/7, Benn) reports US District Judge Loretta Preska "denied bail Tuesday for a Boca Raton doctor charged with conspiring to support al Qaeda." Rafiq Sabir "will continue to await trial in a maximum-security prison, his attorney, Ed Wilford, said. … Wilford said he will appeal the decision." The Herald notes, "An undercover FBI agent posed as an al Qaeda recruiter and secretly recorded Sabir and" codefendant Tarik Shah " reciting an alleged oath of allegiance" to al Qaeda in May.

Psychiatrists Disagree On Alleged Ohio Bombing Plotter's Mental State. The AP (9/6) reports, "Mental health experts who examined a Somali man accused of plotting to bomb a shopping mall have concluded he was faking when he became a wild-eyed defendant who tapped his head on a table, mumbled and giggled in court. Documents made public last week from two analysts at the Federal Medical Center in Rochester, Minn., said Nuradin Abdi was pretending to be mentally ill. … However, another psychiatrist requested by Abdi's defense attorney because the first report came from a federal agency said it's possible that Abdi has a 'legitimate psychosis.' Abdi's lawyer, Mahir T. Sherif, said Tuesday the second analysis was done by forensic psychiatrist Dr. Robert Phillips, who previously testified in the case of President Reagan's shooter, John Hinckley Jr."

US Resident Released From Military Detention In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Weinstein) reports, "More than two months after authorities cleared him of suspicion in a mortar attack on a United States base in Baghdad, an Iraqi man was released Tuesday from military custody, just days before government lawyers were due in court to answer questions about his captivity. Tuesday's release of Numan Adnan Al-Kaby, a longtime lawful U.S. resident, from a military prison outside Baghdad marked the second time in two months that authorities freed a captive in Iraq within a week of the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California filing a federal lawsuit in Washington."

WPost Says Guantanamo Bay Tribunals Should Be Modeled After Courts-Martial. The Washington Post (9/7, A24) editorializes that changes to the military tribunals that are being set up at Guantanamo Bay, announced last week by the Pentagon, "improve the system in subtle but important ways, moving it closer to the system of courts-martial by which the military tries its own soldiers. But they don't entirely fix the problems." The Post states that "the more the commissions come to resemble courts-martial, the less sense it makes for the military to create a justice system from scratch rather than using the one it already has -- in which Americans and the international community have high confidence."

DOJ_NMG_0003164

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Coast Guard Raids In California Raise Concerns. The Montery (CA) Herald (9/7, Hennessey) reports, "The Coast Guard boarded and inspected close to 30 vessels, many of them docked, in Monterey Bay over the Labor Day weekend in a operation that raised the eyebrows of some local boaters and the ire of one." The Herald continues, "The operation -- conducted in conjunction with the Monterey County Sheriff's Office, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration -- netted one arrest in Moss Landing Harbor and terminated the voyages of five vessels that were deemed unsafe." The Herald adds, "In all, 28 boats, many of them live-aboard vessels that were moored in the harbors, were boarded and 31 citations were issued. One angry boater said Coast Guard officers came aboard his boat in Moss Landing Harbor late Friday citing authority under the Patriot Act. … In an e-mail to The Herald, Lowell Jones of Moss Landing said the Coast Guard did a 'blanket boarding' in the harbor, "searching boats, and invading people's privacy at 10:30 p.m. They justified this intrusion by citing the Patriot Act. … Coast Guard officials said the operation was not in response to any particular law enforcement report and that search warrants are not required for such inspections."

First Phase Of Rebuilding After 9/11 Begins In Manhattan. The Washington Post (9/7, A2, Garcia) reports, "The first phase of rebuilding on the 16 acres of Lower Manhattan leveled by the Sept. 11 attacks began yesterday with a ceremonial groundbreaking for a new $2.2 billion transportation hub, highlighted by the release of two doves representing 'peace and rebirth.'" The new hub "will link commuter trains from New Jersey, ferries and the city subway system. Officials estimate 250,000 people a day will stream through the transportation hub after its scheduled completion in 2009."

WAR NEWS:

US Strikes Insurgent Targets In Western Iraq. The US launched two attacks against insurgents near Kalibah along the Syrian border. The AP (9/7, Reid) reports, "The airstrikes occurred about six miles east of the border city of Qaim, major parts of which have fallen under control of al-Qaida-linked foreign fighters." Local Iraqis "say al-Qaida in Iraq, led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, took over parts of Qaim after residents fled fighting between tribes supporting and opposing the insurgents." US troops maintain "a presence in the area, but U.S. officers have complained privately that they don't have enough American and Iraqi troops to secure Qaim."

The Washington Post (9/7, A20, Sarhan, Fekeiki) adds, "U.S. Marines have a force of about 5,000 to cover the province's 24,000 square miles. American officers in Anbar say the Marines are too few to bring the province under control, but U.S. and Iraqi officials say the U.S. raids have helped disrupt the flow of bombs and recruits into the rest of Iraq." The New York Times (9/7, Oppel Jr.) notes that "In contrast to the military's normally more upbeat assertions about progress curbing the insurgency, the first statement noted that western Anbar residents have 'experienced an increased level of violence at the hands of Al Qaeda in Iraq terrorists.'"

Sunnis Refuse US Military Order To Leave Tall Afar. The refusal of Tall Afar residents to leave the city while the US military hunts for insurgents has complicated the mission. The Washington Post (9/7, A20, Finer) reports, "Fighting has been sporadic so far. One U.S. soldier has been killed, along with at least 200 suspected insurgents, said Col. H.R. McMaster, commander of the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, which is leading the assault." The "small-scale raids and house-to-house searches have allowed troops to encircle Sarai, where commanders here believe insurgents have massed." But Iraqi officials have "asked the military commanders to minimize civilian casualties in this highly volatile region."

US Transfers Security Of Najaf To Iraqis. As one of the first steps for the withdrawal of thousands of US forces from Iraq by next spring Iraqi security forces were given responsibility for security in the city of Najf. The Washington Post (9/7, A20, Sarhan, Fekeiki) notes that it "marked the first transfer of an entire city from U.S. to Iraqi military responsibility this year. The raising of the Iraqi flag at a former U.S. base was 'pretty much putting the city of Najaf in Iraqi control,' Lt. Col. Steve Boylan, spokesman for the U.S. military, said in Baghdad." The city "has been the scene of relatively few insurgent attacks."

The New York Times (9/7, Oppel Jr.) reports, "American commander, Brig. Gen. Augustus L. Collins, said the 'Iraqi Army in Najaf can control the area,' according to a pool report of the ceremony. But the general also emphasized that a contingent of American troops would remain based nearby in case the Iraqi forces needed help."

The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Khalil, Sanders) says, "Najaf's hand-over scarcely could have been imagined last summer, when thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops fought a pitched, three-week battle in the city against the militia forces of radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr after the rebels seized control of several shrines. Hundreds died and much of the Old City was destroyed."

DOJ_NMG_0003165

Top Iraqi Bomb Expert Killed By Insurgents. As one example of recent success by insurgents targeting Iraqis assisting the US, USA Today (9/7, Jervis) reports Haqy Asaad was recently gunned down because he was adept at helping disarm IEDS and suicide bombers. Asaad "earned the nickname 'Robot' from U.S. advisers for his dogged disarming of insurgents' bombs." The US military is "working to hand over security responsibilities to Iraqi units such as Asaad's. An increasing number of Iraqi troops are manning checkpoints, policing streets, leading raids on suspected insurgent hide-outs and disarming roadside bombs." But unlike US troops "many Iraqi security personnel return home each night to regular neighborhoods, leaving them susceptible to attacks from guerrillas."

Attacks On Contractors Slow Iraqi Reconstruction. Contractors on US projects to help reconstruct Iraq were increasingly targeted in August. They were mainly Iraqis. USA Today (9/7, Jervis) reports U.S. Project and Contracting Office director of programs Karen Durham-Aguilera said, "August was real bad. … We've had to stop projects because of it." Rebuilding Iraq's infrastructure is a key part of the US strategy "of winning over Iraqis and undermining the insurgency. But insurgents are interfering with this by targeting contractors." And funding for security has "chewed away at the $18.4 billion appropriated by Congress last year for reconstruction in Iraq. Last year, $5 billion of that was redirected to training and equipping Iraq's security forces, a move that resulted in the cancellation of some projects and scaling back others." Yet, "reconstruction projects continue. The Army Corps of Engineers says more than 1,700 projects have been completed since June 2004."

US Strategy To Rebuild Sadr City Seen As Model For Success. In a lengthy article, the Los Angeles Times (9/7, Miller) examines the reasons behind the US success in helping reconstruct Sadr City. The US military's decision to provide sustained, focused attention on the city is credited with the success. The Times describes the rebuilding of Sadr City as "an impressive, if imperfect, accomplishment in Iraq, where many projects remain incomplete and U.S. promises unfulfilled." The US military's strategy "provided the oversight needed to coordinate the military's efforts with those of the U.S. Agency for International Development and the Pentagon's Project and Contracting Office." The reconstruction "also held more immediate significance among mid-level commanders in the field than among higher-level Pentagon officials preoccupied with fighting the war. The field officers focused on short-term, high-visibility projects such as cleaning up trash and digging wells, instead of massive new water treatment plants or power stations that take years to build. They also hired local Iraqi contractors, who in turn employed many of the militia members who had once battled U.S. troops."

Saddam Reportedly Confesses To Ordering Execution Of Kurds. CNN's The Situation Room (9/6, Verjee) reported Iraqi President, Jalal Talabani is saying "that Saddam Hussein has apparently confessed that he gave orders to execute thousands of Kurds back in the 1980s. He gave an interview to a state-funded broadcaster where he said that he had spoken to one of the Iraqi special tribunal judges that was involved in the investigation. Apparently the judge told Talabani that, quote, 'he said he was able to take important confessions from Saddam Hussein,' and that Saddam has signed these confessions, and there is video and audio recordings of these confessions as well. Talabani said that the judge told him Saddam confessed that he gave orders for the executions and the military operations that were directed against the Kurds in the late 1980s."

The Washington Post (9/7, A20, Sarhan, Fekeiki) in an article on recent US military activity in Iraq briefly notes Talabani said, "Saddam deserves a death sentence 20 times a day because he tried to assassinate me 20 times." USA Today/AP (9/7) adds, "Talabani said that some of the confessions involved cases under investigation but he gave no specifics."

But according to the New York Times (9/7, Oppel Jr.), Abdel Haq Alani, an attorney for Hussein, "dismissed the statement as a 'fabrication.'" Alani said reports "of a confession 'comes to me as a surprise, a big surprise," and he "said Mr. Hussein had made no mention of a confession during a meeting with his Iraqi lawyer on Monday."

Volcker Report To Criticize Annan, UN For Lax Oversight Of Oil-For-Food Program. The Washington Post (9/7, A20, Lynch) reports, "The U.N. Security Council and Secretary General Kofi Annan failed to adequately manage and police the $64 billion U.N. oil-for-food program, creating a permissive environment that enabled Saddam Hussein's government in Iraq to take billions of dollars in illicit kickbacks, according to the findings of a U.N. investigation to be released Wednesday." Volcker's report "will portray a largely dysfunctional, leaderless international effort to operate the humanitarian relief effort for Iraq from December 1996 until the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003. Volcker will urge world leaders attending a Sept. 14 summit on U.N. reform to support steps to strengthen the quality of independent oversight of the organization's spending."

The Washington Times (9/7, Pisik) notes that while the "Independent Inquiry Committee (IIC) is expected to formally absolve U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan in the awarding of a key contract to his son's former employer," Volcker's report "will not spare Mr. Annan's administration from a harsh assessment of its management capabilities." The report will also address "the political sensitivities that compromised the Security Council's ability to make important decisions; the 'grievous absence' of effective auditing and management controls; and the inability to track expenditures across agencies and programs."

DOJ_NMG_0003166

The New York Times (9/7, Hoge) reports, "The general conclusion of" Volcker's latest report "is that the United Nations is inefficient, over-politicized, corrupt and in desperate need of immediate repair."

The New York Sun (9/7, Clyne) reports that some U.N. critics have made an hour-long documentary film entitled "Broken Promises: The United Nations at 60." The Sun says the film chronicles "the organization's failings since its inception," and raises "questions about whether the world body should perpetuate itself for another 60 years." The documentary is set to be released nationwide later this month. It "is the brainchild of…actor and activist, Ronald Silver, and the president of the Citizens United Foundation, David Bossie." Silver said "that he hoped a broadly accessible film would heighten public interest as debate over the" UN "escalates in coming weeks, with the imminent release of a [high-profile] report…on the oil-for-food investigation."

US Resident Detained In Iraq Released Before Hearing. The Washington Post (9/7, A6, Leonnig) reports, "An Iraqi-born U.S. resident was released from a U.S. military prison in Baghdad yesterday, two days before a scheduled hearing on why the U.S. government had continued to detain him after clearing him of involvement in a mortar attack." The "decision to free Numan Adnan Al-Kaby comes less than a week after lawyers filed suit demanding his release. A federal judge had scheduled a hearing on Al-Kaby's case for Thursday afternoon, but the government yesterday asked that it be canceled and the complaint be dismissed as moot."

WSJournal Suggests Bolton Lead Effort To Pressure Arab Governments To Support Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (9/7) editorializes, "One of the world's unremarked scandals is how little help Iraq's new government is getting from its fellow Arabs. And now Iraq's elected leaders are becoming increasingly vocal about that fact. On Monday Iraq President Jalal Talabani scored Arab leaders for their minimal-to-nonexistent diplomatic presence in Baghdad." The Journal concludes, "Encouraging Arab help in Iraq would seem to be a job for the State Department. But if Foggy Bottom isn't up to it, perhaps the White House should authorize U.S. Ambassador John Bolton to inform Arab nations…that their relations with the U.S., and especially future economic and military assistance, depend on it."

Political Tensions Threaten Nascent Iraqi Baseball League. The Iraqi national baseball league, according to the New York Times (9/7, Semple), was founded in 2003 and "has grown to 26 full-fledged baseball teams in 18 provinces stretching from Nineveh in the north to Basra in the south." Yet, "like Iraq since the American invasion, the league, after less than two years in existence, has itself been torn by political infighting and charges of malfeasance that have cast its future into doubt."

Al Qaeda Militants Killed By Saudi Security Forces. The New York Times (9/7, Fattah) reports, "Saudi security forces finally overwhelmed a cell of militants holed up in a house in the Persian Gulf city of Dammam on Tuesday, ending a three-day siege. The bloody firefight was the latest in a string of confrontations between militants and security forces throughout the country." On Monday "the Interior Ministry announced that security forces had killed two militants on Sunday, including the No. 3 most-wanted militant in Saudi Arabia, Zaid Saad Zaid al-Samari, who was sought in connection with numerous attacks." Recently "Saudi security forces have found themselves in almost weekly confrontations with militants."

Economic Progress May Help Reduce Attraction Of Al Qaeda For Saudi Youth. The Washington Times (9/7, Abou-Alsamh) reports, "Record oil prices have sent Saudi revenues soaring and contributed to a sixfold increase in stock prices, but ordinary citizens are just beginning to feel the benefits, financial analysts say." Experts "hope that in time the surge will produce more and better jobs for young Saudis, reducing their interest in joining al Qaeda-linked terrorist groups that have been battling the government."

First Afghan Cadet At West Point Eager To Help Country's Reconstruction. USA Today (9/7, Brook) reports, "The U.S. Military Academy accepted its first cadet from Afghanistan last month as that country takes its initial steps toward building a professional military after decades of war and unrest." Cadet Shoaib Yosoufzai, "who grew up under harsh Taliban rule, wants to learn to build bridges, dams, power plants and roads for his ravaged country."

West Point Cadets Undeterred By Dangers Of Service. USA Today (9/7, Brook) reports Geryah White "and the 1,200 other members of the West Point class of 2009 have the grades and test scores to get into almost any top school -- one that wouldn't bring compulsory military service after graduation. Instead, they accepted this challenge, their eyes wide open to the dangers as American soldiers return home in flag-draped caskets or maimed by roadside bombs." USA Today notes, "The Army and Army National Guard are expected to miss their 2005 recruiting goals by several thousand new soldiers, but interest in West Point hasn't flagged. Applications reached 12,692 in 2003. They're down to 10,733 this year but still high by historical standards, says Lt. Gen. William Lennox, West Point's superintendent."

DOJ_NMG_0003167

DOJ:

Gonzales To Award Medal Of Valor To Families Of 9/11 Victims. The Staten Island Advance (NY) (9/7, Kivlan) reports, "Dozens of Sept. 11 family members are expected to travel here Friday to receive the Congressional Medal of Valor on behalf of the more than 400 firefighters and police officers killed at the World Trade Center. … The medals will be awarded by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez in a ceremony at the Justice Department." The Advance continues, "Relatives of the fallen first responders were notified of the event by Justice Department officials by telephone late last week. Free air fare was made available for the family members through a travel agency in the city. … Among the relatives planning to attend was Joanne Barbara of West Brighton, whose husband Gerard, a battalion chief, was among the 343 firefighters who died at Ground Zero." The Advance adds, "She said in an interview that she had mixed feelings about the event. … 'Of course, it will be an honor to accept the Medal of Valor for my husband,' she said. … But Mrs. Barbara said the Justice Department should have informed the families of the ceremony much sooner. 'Our weekend is going to be very emotional as it is,' she said, referring to the 9/11 anniversary. 'And they just added another event to it that we didn't know about.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Defendants Claim Prosecutors Are Scaring Off Witnesses. The Washington Post (9/7, Johnson) reports, "Defense lawyers for former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling have complained for years about the government's hard-nosed tactics in pursuit of their clients." The Post continues, "Now they are hoping for support from an unlikely source: the federal judge overseeing next year's fraud trial against the two. … U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III has scheduled a hearing in Houston for tomorrow to examine why only four former Enron employees have agreed to meet with the defense team. The judge has raised the prospect, employed in other cases, that he could privately inform a limited number of potential witnesses that they have nothing to fear by speaking with Lay's and Skilling's lawyers." The Post adds, "The judge's action comes in response to defense claims, made public yesterday in court filings, that prosecutors abused their power by warning Enron employees that it was not a 'good idea' to help Skilling and Lay. A government lawyer also advised a critical, unidentified witness to 'get rid' of his or her lawyer if the lawyer continued to talk with the defense, the brief said. … A grand jury continues to investigate misconduct at Enron, and prosecutors have said in court papers that they consider 114 people 'unindicted co-conspirators.' … Lake has not ruled that prosecutors at the Justice Department's Enron Task Force acted improperly. Even so, the judge said last week, Lay and Skilling had identified 'a problem I am persuaded exists' in advance of a trial only four months away."

Former Skandia CEO To Be Charged. The Wall Street Journal (9/7, C3, Akerhielm, Nordstrom, Pfalzer) reports that Lars-Eric Petersson, former chief executive officer of insurer Skandia AB, will be prosecuted "for two cases of 'severe' breach of trust." He was "fired by Skandia in 2003 for his involvement in the lifting of a cap on a bonus-payment program to executives. The charges against him won't have any bearing on the 44.9 billion kronor ($6.02, or €4.83 billion) takeover bid for Skandia filed last week by Old Mutual PLC." The first charge against Petersson deals with that decision. "The second charge against Mr. Petersson relates to retirement payments … Without approval from Skandia's board, he added retirement benefits under which his own benefits would always reach at least 97.1 million kronor."

Lawyers Says Misconceptions About Audits Lead To Counterproductive Reforms. Clare Canning, head of commercial litigation, and James Roberts, associate, in the commercial litigation team at Barlow Lyde & Gilbert, who currently act for Ernst & Young in the Equitable Life litigation, in an op-ed in the Financial Times (9/7) reports, "There is a danger that misconceptions about the audit's role will lead to counterproductive attempts to bolster the robustness of the audit opinion … Some of those expressing concerns appear to expect the audit to function like a form of commercial guarantee; a bastion against corporate scandal and a blanket protection for the company and its directors against their own commercial mismanagement." An audit is "an opinion that a company's financial statements show a true and fair view at a particular point in time." Any reform towards "rules-based audit processes" or creating "a criminal offence of 'recklessly' giving an audit opinion" will only "create irresistible pressure towards form over substance" and "frustrate swift and effective operation of the regulatory regime and civil litigation."

DOJ_NMG_0003168

Morgan Director's Resignation Is Omen Of Reorganization. The New York Times (9/7, Thomas) reports, "Michael A. Miles, a Morgan Stanley director with close ties to the former chief executive, Philip J. Purcell, has resigned from the board … The move, which was expected, is the latest signal that the new chief executive, John J. Mack, intends to reorganize a board that during the battle over Mr. Purcell's leadership became a lightning rod for criticism and remains the target of several shareholder lawsuits."

Investment Firm Sues To Stop Spitzer Fee Inquiry. The New York Times (9/7, Atlas) reports, "J.& W. Seligman & Company, a New York investment firm, sued the state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, yesterday, asserting that he had overstepped his authority in his investigation of improper trading in Seligman's mutual funds" and "seeks to suspend Mr. Spitzer's ability to investigate 'allegedly excessive advisory fees paid to Seligman.'" All of Spitzer's "settlements with fund companies to date" required "a third party to review how fees are set," but "the fee reductions…have been criticized by officials at the S.E.C., who have said it is not the role of the government to set prices."

Delaware Settles With Morgan Stanley Over Trading Complaint. The AP (9/7) reports, "Morgan Stanley Inc. has agreed to pay $700,000 to settle a complaint brought by the state Department of Justice regarding improper trading in a Delaware couple's brokerage account, officials said Tuesday." The AP continues, "The bulk of the settlement will be paid to the Wilmington couple to reimburse them for losses incurred, authorities said." The AP adds, "The Division of Securities filed a formal complaint in 2003 against the brokerage firm and two brokers, George Coughlin and Argie Economou who worked in a Morgan Stanley branch office in Burlington, Vt. … The complaint alleged that Morgan Stanley, through Coughlin, executed more than 500 unauthorized transactions and more than 70 'unsuitable' transactions in the couple's account. The complaint also alleged that Morgan Stanley and Economou, who was Coughlins immediate supervisor, failed to properly supervise Coughlins trading activities, in violation of Delaware securities laws."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutors Could Employ Little-Used Provision In Plame Case. Convictions for leaking sensitive government information to the media are rare, and according to the Washington Post (9/7, A23, Lee), "legal experts say prosecutors will have a hard time putting away anyone in the administration for violating the Intelligence Identities Protection Act in the revelation of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity in 2003." However, some legal experts say it is not out of the question for prosecutors to use Section 641 in Title 18 of the US Code, which "nominally deals with prohibitions on the embezzlement of public money, property or records for private use. It typically would be used to go after a federal employee who, say, absconds with government laptops. … The statute 'is used by the government from time to time in lieu of not having a criminal prohibition on leaking classified information, generally,' said William Banks, a national security law expert at Syracuse University."

Former Houston Official Sentenced For Corruption. The Houston Chronicle (9/7, Rice) reports, "A former Houston city official was sentenced to two years and six months in federal prison today for accepting cash and gifts from businesses seeking her influence in gaining lucrative city contracts." The Chronicle continues, "The sentencing of Monique McGilbra, former head of the city Building Services Department, follows a three-year sentence she received Friday in Cleveland, Ohio, for accepting bribes from a Cleveland businessman. … McGilbra, 41, is the second Houston city official to plead guilty in a continuing investigation that began in Cleveland and expanded to include Houston and New Orleans." The Chronicle adds, "Oliver Spellman, 51, chief of staff to former Mayor Lee Brown, received probation and a $10,000 fine Friday in Cleveland federal court for taking a $2,000 bribe from a Cleveland consultant. … U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore said McGilbra's Houston sentence will run at the same time as the Cleveland sentence, meaning she will spend no more than three years in prison." The Chronicle notes, "U.S. marshals took McGilbra into custody on orders from Gwin, but Gilmore said McGilbra could be released until ordered to report to prison if Gwin agreed to reconsider his order. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Edward Gallagher and Mary Butler, a prosecutor with the Department of Justice's public integrity unit, told Gilmore McGilbra was cooperating in an ongoing investigation."

Dallas Planning Commissioner Resigns Amid FBI Probe. The Dallas Morning News (9/7, Ramshaw) reports, "Embattled City Plan Commissioner D'Angelo Lee stepped down over the holiday weekend, more than two months after he fell under scrutiny in a far-reaching FBI investigation and days before a second City Council vote over whether to remove him." Mayor Laura Miller "said Tuesday that the resignation should have occurred 'a few months ago.' … 'He has now stepped down, and that's a really good step forward,' Ms. Miller said." WFAA-TV Dallas-

DOJ_NMG_0003169

Ft. Worth (9/6, Heinbaugh) notes, "Lee's business interests and activities as a City Plan Commissioner have been at the core of the FBI investigation. … Many Council members said they were pleased that Lee's decision will avoid another potential fight."

Nigerian Official Meets With FBI About Nigerian Corruption Investigation. The Nigeria Daily Independent (9/7, Eluemunor, Aruna) reports, "Economic and Financial Crimes Commission…chairman, Nuhu Ribadu, has been holding meetings with the United States Federal Bureau of Investigation…to intensify the search for corrupt Nigerian public officials. He was in the U.S. last week to meet with senior government and FBI officials and to exchange information on the activities of Nigerian politicians, especially governors being investigated for corrupt practices. Ribadu, according to sources, was sighted in Maryland and Washington D.C. where he had meetings with U.S. officials…to obtain additional information on the property deeds of some governors and pass details to the INTERPOL. He also used the visit to obtain more information on the raid the FBI carried out last month on the property of Vice President, Atiku Abubakar."

Nigerian Vice President Releases List Of Items Seized In FBI Raid. Nigerian news Web site This Day (9/6, Akogun) reports, "The Office of Vice President Atiku Abubakar yesterday released a list of items taken away from Maryland, US home by operatives of the Federal Bureau of Investigation…during their August 3 raid. … According to the statement, the document containing the report of FBI search was jointly signed by the FBI officials and a representative of the Atiku family." The Day adds, "The statement from the Vice President's office quoted Atiku's family lawyers and added that the content of the FBI document was made public to reassure members of the public and disabuse their minds of what it called 'the fabrication of falsehood'."

Court-Appointed Monitor Finds Chicago Hiring Still Based On Politics. The AP (9/7, Robinson) reports, "Chicago officials have been basing hiring decisions on political clout and not merits, defying a court-ordered ban on patronage employment, a federal monitor said Tuesday. Court-appointed monitor Noelle Brennan urged sweeping changes at City Hall, including requiring top officials to swear under penalty of perjury that hirings aren't based on politics. Brennan made the recommendations in an 11-page report to U.S. District Judge Wayne R. Andersen on how to enforce the decades-old Shakman Decree that bans the use of patronage." The AP notes, "The mayor's office of intergovernmental affairs-- the political high command-- has been excessively involved in the hiring process, Brennan said. She said unqualified applicants who have political clout often get consideration for jobs."

Tennessee Transportation Officials Inspect Guardrails Amid Contract Probe. The Tennessean (9/7, Craig) reports, "The Tennessee Department of Transportation said yesterday that it spent $478,385 to inspect every inch of guardrail across the state for evidence of improper installation, but the state won't say what was found." The Tennessean adds, "Some of the state's guardrail companies are under scrutiny by the FBI, the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Transportation Department and the state on suspicion of installing guardrail posts shorter than required lengths. Evidence began to surface in January after an anonymous tip from a guardrail employee. As additional evidence came to light, TDOT deployed teams in May to inspect more than 4,000 miles of state highway guardrails.

Suspect Arraigned In Murder Of Convicted Washington Sex Offenders. The New York Times (9/7, Marshall) reports, "A man who told the police that he had found his victims on a sheriff's department Web site was arraigned yesterday in the killings of two convicted sex offenders in Bellingham, Wash. Investigators said the man, Michael A. Mullen, was upset by a child abuse case in Idaho that involved a repeat sex offender. They said Mr. Mullen, 36, telephoned the 911 center in Bellingham on Monday to confess to a double killing in which a man posing as an F.B.I. agent visited the home of three known sex offenders and told them they were on a hit list and in danger." The AP (9/7, Blankinship) notes Mullen "tried to plead guilty Tuesday before he had even been formally charged. … 'Can I have a speedy trial?' Mullen asked a court official, via closed circuit television from jail, during a preliminary hearing Tuesday. 'I would like to plead guilty.'"

The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Tizon) also reports on Mullens' arraignment and confession.

Jurisdiction In Moving Bus Killing Could Mean Life Or Death. The Baltimore Sun (9/7, Goldberg) reports that Kevin G. Johns Jr. has been "charged in Baltimore County with murder," for killing Philip E. Parker Jr. However, as Parker was killed on a bus that moved through several jurisdictions, the choice of venue is important because "Baltimore County seeks the death penalty much, much, much more frequently than any other venue," according to Byron L. Warnken, a University of Baltimore law professor. The standard when dealing with murders in moving vehicles, as set by "a reported opinion by the Court of Special Appeals," only requires the state "to show that the crime occurred 'close enough to the county boundary' when the evidence is ambiguous," and in this case there is a "lack of certainty about the most basic of details."

DOJ_NMG_0003170

Judge Dismisses Lawsuit Against FBI Over Bungled Massachusetts Surrender. The Boston Globe (9/7, Murphy) reports US District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay "ruled yesterday that the FBI can't be sued over a clerk's bungling of a call from Gary Lee Sampson when the killer offered to surrender on bank robbery charges, just a day before going on a murderous rampage four years ago." Lindsay "dismissed a $10 million lawsuit filed by the family of one of Sampson's three victims, 69-year-old Philip McCloskey, of Taunton." Lindsay "wrote that federal law protects the government from being sued for negligence because former FBI clerk William H. Anderson was exercising his discretion when he disconnected Sampson's call to the FBI's Boston office on July 23, 2001, and failed to tell anyone about it. ... McCloskey's son, Scott, said it was ridiculous that the FBI has no legal responsibility, even though Anderson was sentenced to six months in prison for lying under oath when he initially denied taking Sampson's phone call." The AP (9/7) notes, "Sampson waited several hours for the FBI to arrest him outside a convenient store a day before his rampage."

SCOTUS Asked To Rule On Sleeping Jurors. The New Jersey Law Journal (9/7, Gallagher) reports, "New Jersey's public defender wants the U.S. Supreme Court to issue a bright-line rule that a defendant's due process right to a fair trial is violated when jurors fall asleep during testimony." The Journal continues, "Several jurors allegedly dozed off during Roy Higinia's October 1996 drug-possession trial in Essex County, N.J. The transcript shows that Assistant Deputy Public Defender Rafael Gomez, at a sidebar just prior to cross-examining a police detective, told the judge that four or five jurors were 'deep asleep' and some were 'falling asleep' during his opening. … Superior Court Judge Julius Feinberg said he had not noticed and the case would continue but he would 'wake them up, if necessary.' He then asked the jurors if the room was too hot and when one answered 'a little bit,' he had the windows opened. … The trial proceeded and Higinia was convicted and sentenced to five years in jail." The Journal adds, "The Appellate Division rejected the argument that the defendant was entitled to jurors who have heard all the evidence. In State v. Higinia, A-5515-02, decided March 21, Judges Francine Axelrad and Rudy Coleman said Feinberg took 'proper remedial measures' by opening the windows after surveying the jury. Further, since defense counsel did not request anything more at the time, the issue could not be raised on appeal. … They also found no prejudice because the alleged napping occurred during direct testimony by a prosecution witness and the jurors were awake for the cross-examination. The New Jersey Supreme Court denied certification on May 25."

US, Taiwan Make Additional Counterfeit Seizures In Operation Royal Charm. The AP (9/7) reports that since the arrests of 87 alleged counterfeit smugglers in Operation Royal Charm "authorities seized an additional $1.8 million worth of cigarettes in southern New Jersey on Aug. 21, followed by a seizure of $2.7 million worth of cigarettes the next day at Port Elizabeth, according to the FBI. On Aug. 23, approximately $2 million in counterfeit U.S. currency, commonly referred to as 'super notes,' were seized by Taiwanese and American authorities in Kaohsiung, Taiwan, authorities said. And on Aug. 24, more cigarettes worth more than $500,000 were seized in northern New Jersey."

Federal Prosecutor Says Sliwa Kidnapping Shows Gotti Remained Gambino Boss. The New York Times (9/7, Preston) reports John Gotti "ordered the 1992 kidnapping of the Guardian Angels founder, Curtis Sliwa, because he regarded himself as 'the street boss of his own government,' a federal prosecutor said yesterday in his closing argument in Mr. Gotti's racketeering trial." Assistant US Attorney Joon Kim "pointed to corroboration in testimony about the attack by two former Gambino members, Michael DiLeonardo and Joseph D'Angelo." The Times adds that Charles Carnesi, attorney for codefendant Louis Mariani "said the turncoat witnesses had all shown they were liars. 'They spit out a story and the prosecutors and the F.B.I. decide not to check the story and it becomes the truth,' Mr. Carnesi said. 'The game is rigged.'"

Newsday (9/7, Hurtado) reports Kim said that "Gotti's claim that he retired from mob life after his 1999 guilty plea is 'ridiculous and sounds like a way to get a pass for a lifetime of crime.'" Kim added "that while Gotti pleaded guilty to federal racketeering charges in April 1999, he never stopped committing crimes as Gotti lawyer Jeffrey Lichtman asserted. … 'In Gotti's mind he was not a normal citizen obliged to obey the law,' Kim said." The AP (9/7, Weissenstein) notes, "Gotti continued to meet with gangsters, take their tribute money and plot crimes in the years after his purported renunciation of the mob life, Kim said. 'You've seen no evidence of withdrawal,' he told jurors." Reuters (9/7, Kearney) also report on the prosecution's closing arguments.

Value Of Online Gambling Site Declines. Bloomberg News (9/7) reports, "Shares of PartyGaming Plc, the online poker operator that sold $1.9 billion of stock in a June initial public offering, fell as much as 37 percent to below the IPO price after the company said revenue growth is slowing." Bloomberg continues, "The stock dropped as much as 58.75 pence to 98 pence in London, wiping about 2.4

DOJ_NMG_0003171

billion pounds ($4.4 billion) from the company's market value. The shares, which were sold to the public at 116 pence each, were at 105 pence at 12:50 p.m. local time. Stock of competitors including Sportingbet Plc also fell. … PartyGaming's share sale was more than three times subscribed by investors on expectations that the increased popularity of online poker will spur growth in an industry that's expanded 10-fold in three years. The company's revenue gains are slowing as more operators seek to enter the market, adding to competition. … 'There were some clear dangers in relation to the valuation of this company and our concerns have been realized,' said Henk Potts, a London-based fund manager at Barclays Private Clients, which manages the equivalent of $45 billion. 'PartyGaming is all about its growth potential, and some investors decided to bet on the growth rather than consider the potential slowdown.'" Bloomberg adds, "Profit rose 25 percent in the first half, PartyGaming said today in a statement, as revenue gained 81 percent. The company incurred costs of $62.3 million related to its stock sale. … Revenue, 92 percent of which comes from fees for poker games played on the company's Web site, increased to $437.4 million, PartyGaming said. Sales in the U.S. gained 77 percent, while growth outside the U.S. more than doubled. … The company makes 87 percent of its revenue in the U.S., where the Justice Department considers online gambling illegal."

Bloomberg News (9/7) reports, "In April 2003, Deputy Assistant Attorney General John Malcolm told the Crime, Terrorism and Homeland Security Committee of the U.S. House of Representatives that if online gambling companies accept bets from customers in the U.S., they are violating federal laws. … 'While the United States can indict these companies or the individuals operating these companies, it may be difficult to bring them to trial in the United States,' Malcolm said. … In his testimony, Malcolm referred to the 1961 Federal Interstate Wire Act. The act states that it's illegal to use a 'wire communication facility,' referring to a telephone, to transmit bets across state borders. Congress developed the act to stop organized crime involvement in sports gambling, says Lawrence Walters, a lawyer at Weston, Garrou, DeWitt & Walters in Altamonte Springs, Florida, who has advised the online gaming industry. … 'The government has used the Wire Act as a threat against anyone providing services such as payment processing or advertising to the online gaming companies,' Walters says. 'Even if they are empty threats, public companies are not going to take a chance.'"

CIVIL LAW:

New Jersey Lawmakers Try To Bar Base Closing. WINS, 1010 AM, New York (9/7) reports, "Lawyers for several New Jersey politicians made their plea Tuesday for a judge to issue a ruling that could keep Fort Monmouth open despite a federal commission's recommendation to close it." WINS continues, "U.S. District Judge Mary L. Cooper told them that she would rule quickly _ but did not specify exactly when. … Timing may be of the essence for the judge, who could order the base removed from the list of installations be closed, keep it on the list or set up future hearings on the matter. … By federal law, a list of recommendations for which military installations to close must be submitted to President Bush by Thursday. Bush has pledged to pass the list on to Congress without making any changes." WINS adds, "A lawyer for the government argued in a hearing Tuesday that if there is a time for the court to intervene in the Base Realignment and Closure Commission's process, it is not now. … Justice Department lawyer Carl Nichols said it's too early for those who believe Fort Monmouth should not be shuttered to make their case, in part because the president and Congress have not approved the closures. … 'At that point, and at that point only, would we know Fort Monmouth would be closed,' Nichols said."

General Dynamics Loses Breach Of Contract Suit Brought By Former Partner. The Washington Post (9/7, Merle) reports, "A federal jury in Greenbelt yesterday ordered General Dynamics Corp. to pay $129.9 million to its onetime partner, Final Analysis Communication Services Inc., a small satellite firm, according to officials for the two companies." The Post continues, "The verdict concluded a seven-week trial in U.S. District Court that included appearances by some of the defense industry's biggest players, including Nicholas D. Chabraja, General Dynamics' chief executive; and Gordon R. England, the former General Dynamics executive who is now acting deputy secretary of defense." The Post adds, "The case centered on whether General Dynamics violated agreements to help Lanham-based Final Analysis develop a $400 million project to launch low-flying satellites for data transmissions, including paging and text message services. … James J. McGuire, attorney for Final Analysis, said the jury ordered General Dynamics to pay a total of $137.9 million but also ordered Final Analysis to pay $8 million under a counterclaim, netting $129.9 million for the smaller company." The Post notes, "General Dynamics is awaiting a final decision by the court, said spokesman Kendall Pease. The judge has asked for briefs from both sides, he said. General Dynamics argued in court that a power struggle between the company's founders contributed to the problems, according to the transcripts."

5th Circuit Rules Attorney-Client Privilege No Shield For Company In Whistleblower Suits.

DOJ_NMG_0003172

The Texas Lawyer (9/7, Council) reports, "For years, it has been nearly impossible for in-house counsel at Texas companies to bring whistleblower suits against their employers, because companies could claim that the attorney-client privilege protected important evidence from disclosure in such litigation. But a recent 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decision changes all that." Texas Lawyer continues, "The Aug. 24 ruling concerns an appeal of an administrative dismissal of a whistleblower complaint filed by an in-house lawyer. The 5th Circuit held in Willy v. Administrative Review Board, U.S. Department of Labor that the U.S. Department of Labor's Administrative Review Board incorrectly dismissed the in-house lawyer's complaint, after the board determined that a key piece of evidence needed to prove his allegations could not be disclosed because of the attorney-client privilege between the lawyer and the company." Texas Lawyer adds, "The 5th Circuit remanded the case to the Administrative Review Board, noting that the case had 'endured an odyssey through administrative and judicial tribunals' including four appeals to the 5th Circuit. … Coastal Corp. fired Donald J. Willy, then an in-house environmental attorney with the Houston-based company, after a series of events in 1984, according to the 5th Circuit opinion. Willy wrote two reports in 1984, referred to in the opinion as the Belcher Report, in which he concluded that one of the company's subsidiary oil companies was exposed to liability for allegedly violating several federal environmental statutes. Willy's supervisors disagreed with some of his conclusions in the Belcher Report and asked him to delete references to some of the alleged violations, which he refused to do, according to the opinion." Texas Lawyer notes, "Coastal fired Willy after his supervisors accused him of contacting state regulatory officials about environmental matters at a Corpus Christi refinery owned by Coastal, the opinion noted. … In October 1984, Willy filed a complaint with the U.S. Department of Labor, alleging that Coastal violated federal whistleblower laws by firing him in retaliation for writing the Belcher Report -- allegations the company denied."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Opponents Of Georgia Voter ID Law To Monitor Elections. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/7, Campos) reports, "Several groups opposed to a new law requiring voters to show state-issued photo ID at the polls announced Tuesday plans to monitor local elections on Sept. 20." The AJC continues, "The Rev. Joseph Lowery, head of the Coalition for the People's Agenda, said monitors will 'make sure there's no abuse of citizens who want to exercise their right to vote.'" The AJC adds, "Thirty-three Georgia counties and two cities are holding elections Sept. 20. Most are referendums for special purpose local option sales taxes, including one in Cobb County, but some include races for city council posts. Augusta voters will select a replacement for Democratic state Sen. Charles Walker, convicted earlier this year of federal fraud charges. … Volunteers plan to conduct exit polls asking people if they were denied the opportunity to vote due to a lack of photo ID. The Mexican-American Legal Defense Fund has set up a toll-free hotline to field voter complaints: 1-877-462-5333. … Opponents maintain the law will make it harder for poor people, the elderly and college students to vote. And they allege the law violates the Voting Rights Act, though it has received approval from the U.S. Justice Department."

DOJ Officials To Tour Baltimore Juvenile Justice Center. WJZ-TV, CBS 13, Baltimore, MD (9/7) reports, "Continuing troubles and constant complaints about the Juvenile Justice Center bring federal investigators to Baltimore today. … Federal investigators from the Department of Justice will spend nine days inside the Juvenile Justice Center downtown." WJZ-TV adds, "The state run facility is under scrutiny after a series of complaints of youths being mistreated among other issues. .. Meantime, a report on the Justice Department's visit this fall -- should be ready by early next year."

California Assembly Passes Gay Marriage Bill. On a 41-35 vote the California Assembly passed a bill legalizing same-sex marriage. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger reportedly opposes the bill, but is expected to let the courts decide the issue. The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Vogel) reports the legislature "made history" as it "became the first in the United States to act without a court order to sanction gay unions. The measure was approved after three Democratic lawmakers, who abstained on a similar proposal that failed in June, changed their minds under intense lobbying by bill author Assemblyman Mark Leno (D-San Francisco) and gay and civil rights activists." The legislation, "which would change California's legal definition of marriage from 'a civil contract between a man and a woman' to a 'civil contract between two persons,' now goes to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger. The governor has signaled that he will veto it."

The Washington Times/AP (9/7, Lawrence) notes, "The bill's supporters compared the legislation to such earlier campaigns as women's suffrage and the eradication of slavery." Yet "opponents repeatedly cited the public's vote five years ago" by 61 percent "to approve Proposition 22, an initiative to keep California from recognizing same-sex 'marriages' performed in other states or countries."

The New York Times/AP (9/7) reports a spokesman for Gov. Schwarzenegger said he "believes the issue should be decided by the courts, not by his signature on legislation. A state appellate court is considering appeals of a lower court ruling that overturned California laws banning recognition of gay marriages." Spokeswoman Margita Thompson said, "He will uphold whatever the court decides."

DOJ_NMG_0003173

Ohio Ballot Initiative Would Strip GOP Officials Of Control Over Redistricting. The New York Times (9/7, Murphy) reports, "The Ohio secretary of state announced yesterday that a series of election-related constitutional amendments had qualified for the November ballot, including one intended to strip Republican elected officials of their control over drawing legislative districts." One GOP-backed lawsuit to disqualify the amendments was rejected by the Ohio Supreme Court, but a second by former Republican state senator Richard Finan "is to be heard tomorrow in an appeals court in Columbus." He "has said the redistricting measure, if approved, could cost Republicans in Ohio 6 of their 12 seats in Congress and would probably inspire similar Democratic-backed efforts in other states dominated by Republicans."

ANTITRUST:

Unipol Gets Italian Antitrust Nod For BNL Bank Acquisition. The Boston Globe/AP (9/7) reports, "Unipol Assicurazioni SpA said Tuesday it had received the necessary antitrust regulator authorization for its $6.12 billion bid to take over Banca Nazionale del Lavoro SpA." The AP continues, "The bid is pending approval by insurance regulator Isvap and the Bank of Italy." The AP adds, "Italy's market watchdog Consob approved Unipol's prospectus last week but asked the insurer for further information regarding the nature of the agreements with Deutsche Bank. … The German bank has a call option on nearly 5 percent of BNL but is not a member of the shareholder pact led by Unipol that is launching the takeover bid for the Rome-based bank. … Unipol filed the final version of a 400-page document with conditions for its BNL bid to Consob on Friday."

Gas Natural's Endesa Takeover Bid Spurned. The Wall Street Journal (9/7, A3, Johnson, Singer) reports, "Spanish power utility Endesa SA rejected the unsolicited bid of €22.55 billion ($28.27 billion) from Gas Natural SDG SA…setting the stage for a hard-fought takeover battle as the European energy industry undergoes a bout of frantic consolidation." Endesa hired J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., Deutsche Bank AG and Citigroup Inc. "to help it craft its takeover defense … A flurry of deal making is taking place in the European energy sector," spurred "by both the European Union-mandated liberalization of the continent's energy markets and volatile commodity prices."

Court Cases Haven't Reduced Music File Sharing. USA Today (9/7, Graham) reports, "Despite two huge court losses for file-sharing firms, unauthorized online song and movie swapping is at an all-time peak, says Internet measurement company BigChampagne." While "an Australian federal court judge ruled that Sharman Networks, Kazaa's parent firm, must install filters to prevent its software from being used for unauthorized sharing," Kazaa's "popularity already had faded." BigChampagne CEO Eric Garland said "A judgment might have been more meaningful a few years ago, when Kazaa was more popular," and that "the industry should spend less time fighting the online pirates and more time turning them into paying customers."

Columnist Bearish On Refinery Merger. In his Washington Post column (9/7), Steven Pearlstein writes, "Last week, as supply shortages sent the price of a gallon of gasoline as high as $6 in some markets, federal officials charged with protecting consumers quietly approved yet another oil industry merger, this one creating the nation's largest oil refiner. … Because of the rush of Katrina news, the merger earned hardly a mention in the general press. And yet by giving its blessing to Valero's $8 billion purchase of Premcor, the Federal Trade Commission not only reinforced its reputation as a patsy for the energy industry but demonstrated a stunning lack of political sensitivity." Pearlstein continues, "Although the FTC and its staff never seem to make the link between industry consolidation, rising energy prices and record profits, Wall Street investors surely can. Over the past year, shares in Valero are up 226 percent, which, as the Financial Times pointed out last week, makes Google (only 186 percent) look like a laggard. … Listen to what Valero's chief executive, Bill Greehey, had to say Thursday in announcing that the deal had closed: 'We are in a new era for refining where I believe you will continue to see higher highs and higher lows for both product margins and sour crude discounts. And now, with 18 refineries, no one is better positioned to benefit from this than Valero.' … Translation: This deal will do nothing for consumers, but it's a home run for investors." Pearlstein adds, "Here's the situation, as far as I can make it out. Refineries in the United States produce about 18 million barrels of refined product a day for an economy that consumes about 21 million. A completely new refinery hasn't been built in this country in nearly 40 years. And although Valero and others have spent $47 billion over the past decade to expand existing capacity by 13 percent, demand has grown even faster. … The reason that supply has not kept up in this industry, as in others, is simple: The industry makes more money that way. And one way the industry is better able to enforce this gentleman's agreement against investing too heavily in new capacity is by reducing the number of players and making entry into the industry even more difficult than it is already." Pearlstein concludes, "Valero is a great company and a real success story. … But what the country needs isn't a bigger Valero -- it's more Valeros, challenging the majors, investing heavily in new capacity and competing for market share. By approving the merger with Premcor, the FTC has reduced the chance of having that kind of full-throttle competition in an industry that desperately needs it."

DOJ_NMG_0003174

ENVIRONMENT:

EPA To Bar Use Of Children, Pregnant Women In Pesticide Studies. The EPA plans to propose regulations for human testing of pesticides which will bar the inclusion of children and pregnant women in studies examining the effects of the chemicals. The New York Times (9/7, Janofsky) reports, "The regulations, to be proposed on Wednesday, would also establish an independent oversight panel to ensure that all studies submitted to the agency were conducted ethically and followed internationally accepted protocols for human testing. Agency officials discussed the new regulations with reporters on Tuesday. They declined to make copies of the proposal available, leading at least one major critic of the agency, Senator Barbara Boxer, Democrat of California, to suggest that a close examination of the regulations might reveal weaknesses identified in an earlier version.'

Illegal Off-Road Vehicles Destroying Parkland, "Serious National Problem." The Christian Science Monitor (9/7, Clayton) reports, "Unauthorized off-road vehicles are buzzing through nearly one-third of America's national parks, according to a recently released internal National Park Service (NPS) survey. In one-fifth of the parks, they have damaged natural environments that by law must be preserved for future generations." While the Parks Service "downplay the challenge" of dealing with the problem, "critics say the problem is acute and growing," and "other branches of the Department of Interior…say illegal motorized vehicles are a serious national problem. The chief of the National Forest Service…called it one of his top four management problems."

Bonilla Takes Aim At Eminent Domain. Legislation authored by Rep. Henry Bonilla would deny federal funding to any state or local government that employs the right of eminent domain to transfer property from one private owner to another, The Hill (9/7) reports. Agriculture Committee Chairman Bob Goodlatte "characterized the legislation as the strongest response yet to the Supreme Court's June ruling in Kelo v. City of New London, Conn., which affirmed governments' rights to seize property from landowners for private development deemed by elected officials to be in the community interest. The Agriculture Committee, which will hold a hearing on the Bonilla bill today, has been given primary jurisdiction on the issue."

LATimes Urges Congress To Support Coastal Restoration. The Los Angeles Times (9/7) editorializes, "For the next several weeks, and possibly months, the Army Corps of Engineers will pump the water out [of New Orleans]. Meanwhile the Corps, Congress and the Bush administration need to figure out how to avoid a repeat of last week's disaster." The Times goes on to say "the very levees and canals that protect New Orleans and provide navigation divert replenishing sediment. Louisiana loses about 24 square miles of this land barrier each year." This is land that could "present hurricanes with a formidable…barrier to cross before reaching New Orleans. A plan backed by environmentalists, industry and the Corps of Engineers would spend $2 billion to dredge sediment from the Gulf to be used in rebuilding the land, and divert some river sediment toward the marshland. Congress should not only approve that project but should start giving serious consideration to the rest of a $14-billion coastal restoration project supported by 11 state and federal agencies."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

US Code Provision Has Been Used Against Government Leakers. The Washington Post (9/7, A23, Lee) writes that convictions for "leaking sensitive government information to the media are almost as rare as sightings of the ivory-billed woodpecker." But while there have been few convictions under the Intelligence Identities Protection Act, there is "another statute that federal officials have used to go after government leakers. … The provision, Section 641 in Title 18 of the U.S. Code, nominally deals with prohibitions on the embezzlement of public money, property or records for private use. It typically would be used to go after a federal employee who, say, absconds with government laptops." Prosecutors used the statute against Jonathan Randel, "a former Drug Enforcement Agency intelligence research specialist who in 2003 was sentenced to a year in prison for selling restricted information." Randel "provided information from a DEA database to the Times of London newspaper indicating that the name of Lord Michael Ashcroft -- a dual citizen of Britain and Belize who was treasurer of the Conservative Party -- was in agency files used in investigations of drug trafficking. The newspaper cited the information in stories on Ashcroft and his business dealings in Belize, stories that Ashcroft complained falsely suggested that he was a target of DEA investigations into drug trafficking. (After Ashcroft filed a libel suit, the paper published a statement saying there was no evidence he had been suspected of any drug-related crime.) Prosecutors said Randel was paid $13,000 for the information, which was sensitive but not classified. The newspaper said the money was to cover Randel's expenses and time when he traveled to Britain to help the newspaper prepare a defense to Ashcroft's libel suit." Prosecutors are considering using the provision in any case against a suspect in the Valerie Plame name-leak probe.

DOJ_NMG_0003175

Medical Marijuana Does Not Influence Teen Use, MPP Study Suggests. UPI (9/6, Zwillich) reports that, according to a study "funded and released by the Marijuana Policy Project," teenagers in state that allow medical marijuana "are no more likely to use the drug than those in other states." The study "shows widespread reductions in marijuana use have occurred generally at the same rate among all the states, including those allowing medical use. … The group said its findings belie Bush administration claims that medical-marijuana laws send youth a mixed message that helps to encourage drug use. Ten states currently allow patients with certain medical conditions to use marijuana under the supervision of a physician." The US has seen an overall "decrease in marijuana's popularity among teenagers since 2000, after a prolonged increase in use during the 1990s. For example, compared with 1996, about 43 percent fewer 8th graders and 9 percent fewer 12th graders reported they had used the drug in the past 30 days in 2003. California became the first state to permit medical-marijuana use in 1996. At the same time, past-month use dropped by half among the state's 9th graders and by one-quarter among 11th graders, according to the report, which analyzed federal and state statistics. Approximately one-fifth of California's high school juniors now acknowledge using marijuana within the last month. Other states with medical-marijuana laws also saw varying reductions in youth marijuana use. Past-month use by 12th graders in Washington state was down 32 percent since a medical-marijuana law was enacted in 1998, though rates dropped only 12 percent among Maine's high school seniors since a similar law was passed there in 1999."

The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Bailey) reports that "Tom Riley, of the president's Office of National Drug Control Policy, said the drop in teen drug use across the nation is attributable to the federal anti-drug advertising campaign in recent years, including $125 million spent during the federal fiscal year that ends Oct. 1. Medical marijuana has only clouded that pitch, he said. 'It's foolish to give kids a message that marijuana can be helpful to them,' Riley said, adding that all Americans 'should be glad that teen drug use is going down. If the drug legalizers are recognizing that, too, I think that says something.'"

"Jury Is Still Out" On Methadone Dependency Risk. The Boston Herald (9/7, Wedge) reports, "Seen by many as a miracle cure for heroin addiction, the jury is still out on whether methadone can itself impair users or create a long-term dependency. 'There still appears to be some controversy about it,' said Jim Ross, a counselor at Taunton's Community Partnerships, which specializes in helping heroin addicts. 'Although it is supposedly not addictive, we've seen firsthand some people do not use it as a stepping stone (toward recovery) and they end up being dependent on methadone their whole life. And that could be a good or a bad thing.' The White House Drug Policy Information Clearinghouse supports methadone programs, saying the drug 'does not impair cognitive functions' and 'is not sedating or intoxicating.' The federal clearinghouse also says the drug does not 'interfere with ordinary activities such as driving a car or operating machinery.'" In addition to "possible side effects, Ross said addicts sometimes stockpile methadone to sell. 'Methadone has been a great saving grace for many heroin addicts,' he said. 'We need to be as supportive as we can to help addicts, but sometimes we need to ask questions to assure we're taking care of public safety as well.'"

Guilty Plea In Texas Drug Money Trafficking Case. The Lufkin (TX) Daily News (9/7, Cook) reports tractor-trailer driver Juan Castanon of Mission, Texas, "pleaded guilty Friday in federal court to trafficking close to $3 million in drug money through Nacogdoches County, according to plea papers filed in court." Castanon "could face up to five years in federal prison on the charge. Details of his plea agreement with the U.S. Attorney's Office remained sealed in court documents. Texas Department of Public Safety Trooper Ryan Koonce found the stash of cocaine-tainted cash during a Feb. 8 traffic stop. The money was hidden in a secret compartment in Castanon's trailer. A drug-sniffing dog alerted Koonce to the bundled and wrapped money, which later tested positive for traces of cocaine."

Fox Challenges Drug Kingpins To Take On Security Forces In Nuevo Laredo. Reuters (9/6) reports that Mexican President Vicente Fox "challenged drug barons" to "take on security forces in a notorious city on the U.S. border where troops and police are locked in a war with traffickers. Fox said in an interview that federal forces were in control of Nuevo Laredo, across from Laredo, Texas, despite more than 100 drug-related murders there this year." Fox said, "We are going to win this battle. We'll see who is tougher, we'll see who is more stubborn." The "explosion of violence among drug gangs vying for control of a cocaine, heroin and marijuana smuggling route into the United States has drawn an influx of Mexican troops to Nuevo Laredo and strained relations with Washington. The murder rate has soared with killings practically every day, and residential neighborhoods have seen shootouts with heavy weaponry, at one point prompting the U.S. Embassy to close a consulate in Nuevo Laredo. But Fox said his government has taken control of the sweltering city, which also is a hub for legitimate trade." Fox said, "Nuevo Laredo now has much less criminal activity from these kingpins than it did two months ago. I can tell you that we have the city under control and from there we will put things in order." But as the "death toll rises, with 15 police officers among those killed by gunmen this year, residents and local activists are skeptical about authorities' ability to stem the tide of violence. Critics say very few cartel henchmen have been put behind bars and there is no evidence the tighter security will curb the flow of drugs across the border."

DOJ_NMG_0003176

Spain Leads World In Cocaine Use. The British newspaper the Guardian (9/7, Tremlett) reports, "Spaniards are the most prolific users of cocaine in the world, according to a report from state prosecutors obtained by El País newspaper yesterday. Spain has overtaken the US and left Britain and Ireland behind, with the proportion of people who use the drug rising to more than one in 40. 'Spain occupies the top place in the world,' the report said, citing United Nations figures on cocaine use around the globe. The reason for such a high rate in Spain is that much of Europe's cocaine is unloaded on to Spanish beaches." In 2004, 33 tons of cocaine "were seized by Spanish police, much of it being handled by the smuggling clans in the north-western region of Galicia who turned to the lucrative cocaine trade more than 10 years ago. The smugglers offer their services to traffickers from around the world who want to get the drug into Europe. Often cocaine is unloaded from merchant ships into trawlers and then, once near the Spanish coast and under the cover of darkness, into speedboats that land it on Galicia's rugged beaches. The Galician smugglers store it then hand it back to the traffickers. They take a cut of the cocaine as payment. More than 50% of cocaine found by police in Europe is discovered by Spanish officers, who arrested about 600 suspected traffickers from Colombia last year, and 150 from Britain. Spanish police were also reported yesterday to have been behind the discovery of 4.6 tonnes of cocaine unloaded in Rotterdam at the weekend."

IMMIGRATION:

TAX:

Twelve More May Be Indicted Over KPMG Shelters. The Wall Street Journal (9/7, C1, Weil, Scannell) reports that assistant U.S. Attorney Justin Weddle, lead prosecutor in the KPMG LLP tax-shelter investigation, said "the government expects to seek indictments against at least 12 more" as yet unnamed "individuals in the coming weeks, on top of the nine people who were arraigned yesterday … The additional defendants will be named as part of a superseding indictment" that "likely would include obstruction of justice, as well as tax evasion, in addition to the existing conspiracy count that the government unsealed last week." While "prosecutors asked for three months to seek the superseding indictment, citing Justice Department procedures for tax-fraud prosecutions," Judge Lewis A. Kaplan denied the motion, saying, "'You're going to have to move a lot faster. It's not clear to me why you can't.'" The government has an Oct. 17 deadline to file its superseding indictment. Reuters (9/7, Graybow) also reports on the arraignment.

Proceeding Could Be "Unwieldy," Judge Lays Down Rules. The New York Times (9/7, Glater) adds, "The proceedings yesterday offered a hint of how unwieldy the case against the nine executives, let alone against as many as 21 possible defendants, could be." Judge Kaplan "warned prosecutors against lengthy proceedings" and "advised lawyers for both sides to prepare as clear a presentation for jurors as possible, using video presentations, for instance, and avoiding cumbersome binders full of copies of exhibits."

Lawyer-Client Privilege Being Pared Back. The New York Times (9/7, Glater) reports that lawyer-client "privilege has been weakened…as more individual defendants try to argue that their actions were blessed by a lawyer and that, as a result, they did not know they were doing anything wrong." Some "powerful forces have put in play the privilege protecting communications, as well as the so-called work product privilege covering documents and other work by a lawyer in anticipation of litigation." William Ide III, a lawyer at McKenna Long & Aldridge in Atlanta and also chairman of an American Bar Association committee on lawyer-client privilege "and other lawyers say they worry that when prosecutors insist on a waiver, they are essentially making corporations an offer they cannot refuse." Robert S. Bennett, of Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom," said "'In today's climate, in order for a company to avoid an indictment, it must cooperate with the government. And today, cooperation…as a practical matter often requires companies to waive the attorney-client privilege.'" With this erosion, "companies may have difficulty conducting internal inquiries if employees do not talk because they know their statements may end up being handed over to the government; executives may decide not to consult lawyers before making critical business decisions; and lawyers may temper their advice if they know it may one day be exposed."

DOJ_NMG_0003177

Thousands Not Taking Advantage Of Higher Education Tax Break. The number of Americans who claimed a federal higher education tax break in 2002 was more than double the number who did in 1996. USA Today (9/7, Marklein) reports that while nearly 10 million Americans claimed the tax break last year, "hundreds of thousands of families who may be eligible for such breaks aren't taking advantage of them, a federal report says." A report issued last week by the GAO, "found that filers of 27% of the 1.8 million returns it analyzed appeared eligible but did not claim either a tuition deduction or tax credit.'

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Mentions Gonzales As Possible O'Connor Replacement. The AP (9/7, Holland) reports President Bush "said the list of possibilities for his second Supreme Court nomination was 'wide open' Tuesday as Senate Republicans urged him to consider a woman and Democrats pressed him to consult with them before making his next pick." The Washington Post (9/7, A9, Baker, Becker) adds Bush "playfully hinted he could choose his friend Alberto R. Gonzales, a prospect that reignited consternation among conservative groups skeptical of the attorney general's politics."

The Washington Times (9/7, Sammon) also reports Bush "reignited speculation that he would nominate" Attorney General Gonzales. Bush "made his comments at a Cabinet meeting, adding that his words 'should create some good speculation here in Washington. And make sure you notice when I said that I looked right at Al Gonzales, who can really create speculation.'" The Times adds, "Although the remark drew chuckles from Cabinet members and journalists, Bush aides said he is seriously considering Mr. Gonzales. That prompted a fresh round of grumbling from conservatives, who fear that Mr. Gonzales would not vote to overturn Roe v. Wade, the 1973 high court ruling that legalized abortion."

The New York Times (9/7, Stevenson, Stolberg) says Bush's "mention of Mr. Gonzales as a possibility, in comments to reporters at the end of a cabinet meeting, fueled concern among conservatives, who were already mobilizing against the attorney general. Conservatives say that Mr. Gonzales has not shown himself to be sufficiently opposed to abortion rights and that nominating him would miss an opportunity to move the court fundamentally to the right."

NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 17, 2:00, P. Williams) reported that "as far as a successor for Justice O'Connor, President Bush suggested today he will not send up a name for another week or so." President Bush: "I want the Senate to focus not on who the next nominee is going to be, but the nominee I got up there now. And it's important for the country that they complete the work."

The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Reynolds) reports Democrats "urged the president to move quickly to fill the vacancy, saying it would be easier for them to support Roberts' nomination if they knew the name of the second nominee." Judiciary Committee member Sen. Richard Durbin said, "If we had an idea of who might fill the other vacancy, it would help put (Roberts' nomination) in perspective. This court is very closely divided, and if the president's next nominee is too extreme, it will worry us that the court is going to change for generations to come." The Times adds Sen. Russell D. Feingold "said it was now more important for the White House to release 16 case files from Roberts' service in George H.W. Bush's administration that the current White House has withheld."

The Roberts story appeared almost universally in local television news broadcasts across the nation. In many newscasts, there were comments about how Robert's new nomination could change the tenor of his confirmation hearings. For example, WFLA-TV Tampa (9/6, 11:10 a.m.) reported, "President Bush's decision to nominate John Roberts as the nation's 17th Supreme Court Chief Justice raises the stakes of the upcoming Senate confirmation hearings." KCNC-TV Denver (9/6. 5:04 a.m.) added, "The legal wrangling from both parts could make the hearings pretty interesting. They are going to say they want an up or down vote before the President has to make his other selection, and the Democrats are going to say 'whoa, we want it as a package deal. We want to know when the other shoe falls before we make a decision on John Roberts.'"

Meanwhile, KONG-TV Seattle (9/6, 7:37 a.m.) said Roberts "may be a better fit to succeed his mentor Rehnquist than to succeed Sandra Day O'Connor, more of a somewhat moderate Republican and swing vote on the Supreme Court. That may now be the big fight for the next Supreme Court nomination after weeks and weeks of trying to dig up things on John Roberts, not much has been found, although Democrats and others have indicated that the questioning will be tougher now because, after all, he is being nominated for Chief Justice of the Supreme Court."

Republicans were portrayed as optimistic as the hearings draw near. KUSA-TV Denver (9/6, 4:10 p.m.) reported, "Republican's expect he'll be approved," while KPRC-TV Houston (9/6, 4:23 p.m.) said "Bill Frist says they hope to have a Chief Justice in place by the end of the month."

Gonzales Possible Supreme Court Nominee, Again. Alberto Gonzales was named as a possible nominee for the Supreme Court by a few stations: WGN-TV Chicago (9/6, 6:44 a.m.), WMAQ-TV Chicago (9/6, 11:16 a.m.), KCCI-TV Des Moines (9/6, 7:11 a.m.), and KAIT-TV Jonesboro (9/6, 5:30 a.m.)

DOJ_NMG_0003178

Katrina Increases Gonzales' Chances. WNBC-TV New York (9/6, 6:36 a.m.) reported, "What the American people have seen in the aftermath of Katrina, probably elevates the imperative on the White House to try to demonstrate to Americans that George Bush is the president of all Americans, that probably helps Alberto Gonzalez, the attorney general, who would be the first Hispanic elevated to the court if chosen."

Terror Policies, Centrism, Gender Work Against Gonzales. KSFY-TV Sioux Falls (9/6, 6:33 a.m.) reported, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales seems to have dropped off because of opposition to him because of the War on Terror policies he's advocated and because many conservatives see his as too centrist."

KRDO-TV Colorado Springs (9/6, 6:06 a.m.) also reported this in much the same words.

WSPA-TV Greenville (9/6, 5:15 a.m.) reported, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is mentioned as a candidate, but analysts say the president is under pressure to nominate a woman."

Key Republicans Said To Be Pressing Bush To Nominate A Woman. The Hill (9/7, Bolton) reports, "Key Republicans and conservatives are pressing President Bush to nominate a woman to replace retiring Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor." It "may suggest that, with the president faltering in opinion polls, the right believes it needs the sop of liberal identity politics to get a second conservative justice confirmed. Priscilla Owen, Edith Jones and Edith Brown Clement, all three from the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, and Janice Rogers Brown, of the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, are considered by conservatives to lead the list of potential female nominees."

Alito Mentionied As Possible Nominee. The AP (9/7, De La Cruz) reports, "A second opening on the U.S. Supreme Court is bringing renewed interest in Samuel A. Alito Jr., a federal judge from New Jersey who used to serve as the state's federal prosecutor." The AP continues, "Alito, who sits on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers the Garden State, is among several people mentioned by court observers as being on a "short list" of candidates for associate justice to succeed Sandra Day O'Connor. She is retiring but remaining on the bench until her replacement is confirmed. President Bush's original choice for that position, John Roberts, has been nominated to become chief justice following the death Saturday of William H. Rehnquist. … The other possible nominees include U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, former U.S. Solicitor General Theodore Olson, and former deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson." The AP notes, "Alito, 55, has been dubbed 'Scalito' or 'Scalia-lite' by some lawyers and political pundits because of a reputation as a strong, conservative jurist that often brings comparisons to conservative Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia. But Alito, 55, also has a reputation as being scholarly and quiet, rarely asking questions during oral arguments."

Judiciary Committee To Vote On Roberts By September 26. The Wall Street Journal (9/7) reports Senate leaders "said the Judiciary Committee will vote no later than Sept. 26 on the nomination of Appeals Court Judge John Roberts to become the next U.S. chief justice." Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter said that "the committee will begin confirmation hearings on Monday. The hearings are expected to run a week. Although Republican and Democratic leaders said they are working together to move Mr. Roberts's nomination quickly, the full Senate might not hold a final vote on Judge Roberts until just before the high court convenes for its new term on Oct. 3." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "said Democrats plan to work with Republicans to move ahead on the hearings. But he said his party remains largely uncommitted on how it will vote."

NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 17, 2:00, P. Williams) reported Judge Roberts' "'hearings have been put off due to the funeral, but even the Democratic Senate leader predicted a prompt confirmation." Sen. Harry Reed (D) Nevada: "We're going to do everything we can so that we do have a full court by the beginning of term."

Roll Call (9/7, Kane) reports the Senate Judiciary Committee "will kick-start hearings on Judge John Roberts' nomination to be chief justice of the United States on Monday, a six-day delay allowing for the funeral and burial services this week for the late William Rehnquist. The delay, however, still leaves plenty of time for the committee to hold a week's worth of hearings, as originally scheduled, and send the nominee to the full Senate for a vote by the final week of September — the timetable originally laid out by Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.)."

The Washington Times (9/7, Hurt) reports Majority Leader Bill Frist said, "The schedule allows us both to pause to pay appropriate respect to Chief Justice Rehnquist and to complete floor action on the nomination of Judge Roberts as chief justice by October 3, the start of the Supreme Court's new term."

Specter Quizzes Roberts On Hot-Button Issues. The Washington Post (9/7, A9, Babington) reports Judiciary Chairman Specter invited Roberts "to his Senate office shortly after Roberts helped carry William H. Rehnquist's coffin into the Supreme Court, where the late chief justice lay in repose. In an interview, Specter said he asked Roberts, an appeals court judge, a range of questions, including, 'How are you going to handle guys like Scalia? He's a lot older than you.'" Roberts "replied somewhat indirectly, according to Specter, by saying he considers it 'a dialogue among equals' when lawyers argue cases before the Supreme Court." Specter "said he also raised concerns about recent court rulings that he considers confusing and inexplicable. They include two 5 to 4 decisions regarding public displays of the Ten Commandments that in some ways seemed contradictory." But when Specter asked if Roe vs. Wade was a "super-precedent," Roberts "didn't say."

DOJ_NMG_0003179

Democrats Plan To Step Up Questioning Of Roberts On Civil Rights. The Washington Post (9/7, A9, Baker, Becker) reports some "influential Democrats signaled that Roberts's ascension" to the chief justiceship "increased their eagerness to press him on his record -- particularly on civil rights, which they said has taken on new salience in the wake of Hurricane Katrina." Sen. Edward Kennedy said, "What the American people have seen is this incredible disparity in which those people who had cars and money got out and those people who were impoverished died." He said the "question for Roberts, he said, is whether he stands for 'a fairer, more just nation' or for 'narrow, stingy interpretations of the law to frustrate progress.'" Democrats will "make that argument in part through their witness list, which includes Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), a leader in the 1960s civil rights movement who plans to note that courts historically have led the way in guaranteeing rights for the disenfranchised." Rep. Lewis said, "New Orleans is just a symbol. We are still a nation divided by race and class, and I don't see [Roberts] being an advocate for those who were left out and left behind." Reuters (9/7, Ferraro) reports Democrats are "vowing to take as long as needed to question" Roberts, "who could lead the Supreme Court for decades."

Knight Ridder (9/7, Kuhnhenn) reports that by "opening questions about poverty, race and government policies, Hurricane Katrina has made landfall on Washington's deliberations over vacancies on the U.S. Supreme Court and threatens to make John Roberts' confirmation hearings for chief justice a contentious test of conservative thought." Democrats and liberal groups "say Roberts' past opposition to expanded affirmative action and voting rights laws should get extra scrutiny, especially in light of the disproportionate suffering by poor black residents of New Orleans." Despite the "stepped up scrutiny, Roberts' confirmation still appears likely."

The Legal Times (9/7, Mauro) reports, "By today, Supreme Court nominee John Roberts Jr. was supposed to be answering the questions of Senate Judiciary Committee members as part of his confirmation hearing to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Instead, because of the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist on Saturday, and the swift decision by President George W. Bush to put Roberts in the chief justice's spot instead, the Roberts hearing has been put off until Monday. … But when the hearing finally gets underway, the questions will likely be the same, and the dilemma for Roberts will be the same, though possibly more urgent: how candid should he be about his views on the law? It's a crucial decision for Roberts to make. Senate Democrats will be insisting on as much candor as possible, while Republicans hope and expect Roberts will stay out of trouble by invoking a previously unheard of doctrine called the 'Ginsburg precedent.'" The Times continues, "In anticipation of a reticent Roberts, conservatives offered evidence of what the Federalist Society said was the 'vast number' of times Clinton nominee Ruth Bader Ginsburg declined to answer substantive questions during her 1993 confirmation hearing. Liberal groups including the American Constitution Society fired back, documenting all the moments when Ginsburg actually answered questions 'candidly and at length.' … Sen. Charles Schumer, D-NY, gave a speech last week debunking the conservative version of the Ginsburg precedent, warning that if Roberts invokes it, it will sound more like taking the Fifth. On the other side, former Republican Attorneys General Edwin Meese III, Dick Thornburgh and William Barr, among others, wrote to the Judiciary Committee reminding members that Ginsburg said during her hearing that she would give 'no hints, no forecast, no previews' of how she might vote on future cases."

Trivia About Roberts. People (9/12) publishes ten trivia facts about John Roberts, ranging from his taste in music, his handedness (ambidextrous), to anecdotes about his childhood, to how he met his wife and adopted their children. Roberts "has argued 39 cases before the Supreme Court – more than nay of the current justices," and "writes his courtroom speeches in longhand." Roberts "became a first-time parent at 45," and he and his wife have "hinted they would like some more." Documents "released to date show [Roberts is] worth $5.3 million."

Bork Backs Roberts For Chief Justice. The Washington Times (9/7, Harper) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Robert H. Bork, the Reagan-era Supreme Court nominee rejected by the Senate after his 1987 confirmation hearings devolved into public spectacle, says he wants Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to be confirmed as the next chief justice. Speaking at the National Press Club yesterday, Mr. Bork suggested it's unlikely Supreme Court confirmation hearings ever again will resemble 'any dignified process.'"

Chief Justice Rehnquist Mourned At Supreme Court. NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 17, 2:00, Williams) reported, "There was a rare and dramatic sight today at the US Supreme Court. Chief Justice William Rehnquist, laying in repose: One of the pallbearers was the man nominated to replace him as chief justice." NBC (P. Williams) added, "It was, as far as the experts could remember, unprecedented, a pallbearer helping to carry the casket of a Supreme Court justice he's been nominated to succeed. John Roberts was one of the eight pallbearers, mostly former Rehnquist law clerks, as the chief justice arrived for the final time at the building where he served for more than three decades."

ABC World News Tonight (9/6, story 4, :30, Gibson) reported, "Six justices paid their respects. Among them, a visibly moved Sandra Day O'Connor. President Bush came later in the day. Rehnquist will lie in repose, until his funeral tomorrow afternoon." The CBS Evening News (9/6, story 8, 0:40, Schieffer) reported, "In Washington, the casket of Chief Justice William Rehnquist was carried today to the Supreme Court. Among the pallbearers, was federal judge John Roberts, who was once a law clerk for Rehnquist, and now the nominee to replace him as chief justice. The current justices waited tearfully."

DOJ_NMG_0003180

The Washington Post (9/7, A8, Levine, Lane) reports "few gathered in the morning crowd outside the Supreme Court missed the most telling moments: When John G. Roberts Jr., the man nominated to succeed Rehnquist, walked solemnly with the other pallbearers toward the hearse bearing his body, and when an emotional Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, on the eve of her own planned farewell, wiped away tears as the plain white pine coffin passed and entered the building's Great Hall." USA Today (9/7, Biskupic) reports the "moment seemed to symbolize a transition of sorts, and with Roberts facing confirmation hearings in the Senate on Monday it was a reminder of a question that will be part of the backdrop to the hearings: how Roberts' style and brand of conservatism compares with that of the man he would succeed."

USA Today (9/7, Kiely) reports Roberts "was one of eight ex-Rehnquist aides who served as pallbearers. President Bush later paid a solemn visit to the court, a day after nominating the federal appeals court judge to become the nation's 17th chief justice."

USA Today (9/7, Biskupic) reports one "of the most compelling images was the distraught, tear-streaked face of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Her public sadness was a reminder of all that Rehnquist and the nation's first female justice had been through together. They met in law school at Stanford University in the late 1940s. The World War II veteran was nearly six years her senior, but they developed a bond that endured through the years. They dated briefly, but then married other college sweethearts. Their families became close as Rehnquist and O'Connor walked remarkably similar paths."

The New York Times (9/7, Greenhouse) reports President Bush "and his wife, Laura, made an unscheduled visit on Tuesday to the Supreme Court to pay their respects to Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, whose flag-draped coffin lay in the 'great hall' that leads to the courtroom." During their "brief midafternoon visit, the president and first lady walked together to the coffin, and then examined the portrait in the company of Justice Antonin Scalia and Sally Rider, the chief justice's administrative assistant."

The Washington Times (9/7, Mansfield) reports, "Solemn and respectful they stood, single file, and at times the line snaked around the block in the September sunshine: congressional staffers, college kids in baseball caps, tourists, Capitol Hill groundskeepers, many on their lunch break."

Rehnquist's Legacy Noted. USA Today (9/7) says in an editorial, "Chief Justice William Rehnquist was that rarity among public officials: one who worked to make his office less powerful. From his days as a Supreme Court clerk a half-century ago until his death Saturday after 33 years on the court, Rehnquist argued for leaving important decisions to state legislatures or, if necessary, Congress — not the courts. The result was a career that foreshadowed much of today's political debate, and one that helps to focus it."

In a USA Today op-ed (9/7), Tom Mauro says, "It is sad but unsurprising that Chief Justice William Rehnquist's death came at a most inopportune time, full of ironies. Many of the ironies of his death were personal. But it also was remarkable that Rehnquist died at a moment when the nation was completely distracted by a crisis that relates significantly to his judicial legacy. The finger-pointing between state and federal officials over the handling of Hurricane Katrina's awful devastation is a debate that Rehnquist would have found familiar."

The New York Times (9/7) says in an editorial that it is "a moment to honor one of the vital but less celebrated hallmarks of Chief Justice Rehnquist's 33-year service on the court: his proud record of defending the independence of the federal judiciary against attacks by politicians. Those attacks, as Chief Justice Rehnquist noted last January in his 19th and final report on the state of the federal courts, have taken a troubling new turn in recent years. Without singling out individual members of Congress by name, he made clear his disapproval of some conservative Republicans, like the House majority leader, Tom DeLay, and others. He disapproved of their moving beyond the normal criticism of judicial decisions to try to bully and intimidate individual judges, strip federal courts of jurisdiction to decide certain constitutional challenges, and otherwise undermine the constitutional separation of powers and checks and balances."

Bush Announces Inquiry Into Government's Response To Katrina. Political fallout from the government's response to Hurricane Katrina was fast and furious yesterday. The President, who met with congressional leaders, announced a review of the Federal response, and said he was sending Vice President Cheney to the affected region to evaluate the damage. As NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 4, 2:05) White House correspondent David Gregory reported, "At the White House, a series of appearances were designed to help the President reassert control over the catastrophe. The message, that hurricane relief is now the top priority for a White House still reeling from criticism it responded too late." Yet even as Bush sought to focus attention on relief and recovery efforts and promised an investigation into what went wrong, congressional Democrats blasted the Administration for the delay in Federal relief. Other members of Congress, such as Sens. Trent Lott and Hillary Clinton, called for taking the Federal Emergency Management Agency out of the Department of Homeland Security.

DOJ_NMG_0003181

NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 4, 2:05, Williams) reported Bush "clearly seemed to be trying to get out ahead of this crisis." NBC (Gregory) added, "Stung by blistering criticism of the government's response to Katrina, the President for the first time today promised accountability." Meanwhile, "top Democrats" are "calling for an immediate, independent, 9/11-commission style investigation as troubling questions are raised in Washington about the government's ability to secure Americans after another major storm or worse, a massive terror attack."

ABC World News Tonight (9/6, story 3, 2:35, Moran) reported the White House "was both the hub of a lot of Federal activity aimed at helping people affected by Katrina and a battleground over who should be held accountable for the catastrophic failure to respond last week." Bush told the Cabinet "recovery is their top priority" and he "announced he was sending Vice President Cheney to the Gulf Coast on Thursday to assess the progress on the relief efforts." The President "promised a thorough review of the government's failures," but "all day today the White House refused to discuss holding anyone accountable." On Capitol Hill, "there was scorn." House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi: "The President said he's going to lead the investigation into what went wrong. He need to look only in the mirror." Moran: "But others argue that Congress itself is to blame, for downgrading the Federal Emergency Management Agency after 9/11, placing it under the control of the Homeland Security secretary."

The CBS Evening News (9/6, lead story, 1:30, Schieffer) led its broadcast by contrasting statements made by President Bush with those of Jefferson Parish executive Aaron Broussard, who said, "Bureaucracy has murdered people in the greater New Orleans area and bureaucracy needs to stand trial before Congress today." Schieffer: "Back in Washington, the President said there will be time enough to pass judgment later."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/6, Blitzer) reported, "The White House knows what happens when Congress comes back to town and that is: The criticism that already has been going on gets louder and louder, closer and closer to the White House. So, it was obvious that the President wanted to try to head that off."

Much of the print coverage this morning suggests the White House's efforts to regain its political "footing" have so far been unsuccessful. The AP (9/7, Loven) reports, "The Bush White House is known for its ability to remain in control of its message and image, sliding out of crises with barely a scratch. Not this time." Despite "day after day of appearances by…Bush aimed at undoing the political damage from a poor response to Hurricane Katrina, the White House has not been able to regain its footing, already shaken by the war in Iraq and a death toll exceeding 1,880." The administration yesterday "struggled to deflect calls for an accounting of who was responsible for a hurricane response that even Bush acknowledged was inadequate." White House counselor Dan Bartlett "said the president and his aides are unconcerned for now about the unrelenting criticism. 'Emotions are running high. People are tired,' Bartlett said. 'If we focused more of our attention on decisions that have already been made, rather than on those before us, there's potential for making far greater mistakes. ... We really don't have time to play the political game right now.'"

Reuters (9/7, Holland) adds "partisan tempers flared" yesterday, and "much anger from Democrats and Republicans alike has been directed at Bush for a slow federal response to a catastrophe that may have killed thousands in New Orleans and along the Gulf coast." Along the same lines, the Washington Post (9/7, A19, Balz) runs a story titled, "For Bush, A Deepening Divide; Katrina Crisis Brings No Repeat of 9/11 Bipartisanship." The Post says, "The starkly different verdicts on Bush's stewardship of the two biggest crises of his presidency underscore the deepening polarization of the electorate that has occurred on his watch." This "gaping divide has left the president with no reservoir of good will among his political opponents at a critical moment of national need and has touched off a fresh debate about whether he could have done anything to prevent it." The Post adds, "To his critics, Bush is now reaping what he has sown. Their case against him goes as follows: Facing a divided nation, the president has eschewed unity in both his governing strategy and his political blueprint."

USA Today (9/7, Benedetto) reports Bush "met with his Cabinet, education officials, congressional leaders and the heads of charities involved in the recovery. Afterward, he said the relief effort is improving, more supplies are en route, schooling is being arranged for thousands of displaced children and that he will make sure the recovery continues."

The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Gold, Hart) says Bush "sought to short-circuit congressional criticism by declaring that he will investigate the federal relief effort. … 'What I intend to do is to lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong,' he said."

The New York Times (9/7, Kornblut, Hulse) adds Bush is acting under "relentless political fire," and that he "met with leaders from both parties, capping a day of constant political attention to a crisis that has exposed fault lines within the Republican Party and threatens to overtake the entire Congressional agenda."

The Washington Post (9/7, A18, Weisman, Fletcher) says the President was "stung by criticism" as he "vowed to

DOJ_NMG_0003182

'find out what went right and what went wrong.'" Meanwhile, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld "said that the military already has begun a 'lessons-learned' assessment of its coordination with state and local governments. Nine Cabinet members briefed Senate and House leaders last night on the federal response, and key senators pushed for changes that would allow Third World relief efforts to be emulated in the United States."

The Washington Times (9/7, Curl, Scarborough) reports, "Republicans tried to limit the political damage from the botched federal response to Hurricane Katrina – with…Bush, members of Congress and military leaders yesterday all promising to look into the failures." Republicans "said they have received the message that there is frustration over the federal response." But "even as Republicans promised investigations, they made it clear that the first failure was at the state and local levels, where governments are charged with preparation and the first response to disasters."

Whether Bush bounces back from the current crisis, USA Today (9/7, Page) says Katrina has already done much damage to his ambitious domestic agenda, writing, "His plan to overhaul Social Security? Forget it. Repeal the estate tax? Postponed. Make the 2001 tax cuts permanent? Tougher to finance. Stay the course in Iraq? Questions about the deployment of U.S. resources and National Guard troops for the war have been sharpened." The New York Times (9/7, Andrews) runs a similar story under the headline "Hurricane's Toll Is Likely To Reshape Bush's Economic Agenda." The Times reports, "Katrina is about to blow a hole in the federal budget, and it is already jeopardizing President Bush's agenda for cutting taxes and reducing the deficit."

Bush Resists Calls For FEMA Chief's Ouster. The New York Times (9/7, Kornblut, Hulse) reports Bush "resisted renewed calls to fire Michael D. Brown, the director of FEMA, who became a lightning rod for attacks last week when he said he was unaware of a crisis at the New Orleans convention center, news of which had been televised for days." Instead, Mr. Bush accused critics of playing the 'blame game' and said he would remain focused on the immediate crisis as evacuees fanned out across the country."

On the CBS Evening News (9/6, lead story, 1:30, Schieffer), Bush was shown saying, "I think one of the things that people want us to do here is to play a blame game. We've got to solve problems. We're problem solvers. There will be ample time for people to find out what went right and what went wrong."

Bush Meets With Faith-Based Charities. The Washington Times (9/7, Curl) says "Bush met in the White House with faith-based and community groups, including representatives from the African Methodist Episcopal Church, the Southern Baptist Convention, the Salvation Army, the American Red Cross, the United Way of America, the YMCA, Catholic Charities USA and several others."

Bush Objects To Term "Refugees." The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Gerstenzang, Curtius) notes that last Monday, "during his second trip to the region in a week, Bush heard one of the storm's victims complain about the use of the term 'refugees.' At the end of the meeting in the White House Roosevelt Room, Bush addressed that issue. 'Let me tell you my attitude and the attitude of people around this table: The people we're talking about are not refugees. They are Americans, and they need the help and love and compassion of our fellow citizens.'"

Poll Finds Public Not Blaming Bush Or Federal Government. USA Today (9/7, Welch) reports on a poll of 609 people Tuesday that "asked who was to blame the most for problems after the hurricane. Twenty-five percent said state and local officials; 18% said the federal government, 13% blamed Bush. But the majority, 38%, said no one is to blame."

Morris Says Bush Will Obtain Political Dividends From Katrina Relief. Dick Morris writes in his column for The Hill (9/7), "Make no mistake about it: Every day for the next year, voters will see nonstop scenes of federal relief, rebuilding, renovation and reconstruction along with the empathy, sympathy and compassion these efforts imply in the heart of George W. Bush. He may have had a terrible first week, but he will rebound big time in the months to come." Morris adds that "in a year, Katrina and the relief and rebuilding efforts that are about to follow will be seen as having imparted a new and crucial momentum to an administration that was obviously increasingly running out of ideas, out of steam, and -- like its nation -- out of gas." Katrina "has the capacity to shape the second Bush term in the same way Sept. 11 shaped his first term."

LATimes Says Katrina Will "Haunt" Bush Presidency. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/7) is critical of Bush's response to Hurricane Katrina, stating that "the overriding fact on the ground -- both in Washington and along the Gulf -- is this: Too many people died needlessly because their governments were too concerned about the threat of terrorism to pay attention to the threat posed by Mother Nature." The Times argues that the "human tragedy [resulting from the crisis] will haunt the remainder of the Bush presidency."

Bush Criticized. Columnist David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (9/7, A25), "There were two levee breaks last week: The natural disaster of Katrina ravaged New Orleans and left behind thousands of victims, but there was also a political catastrophe that breached the Bush administration's containment walls and exposed fundamental weaknesses in how this White House makes decisions." Ignatius adds, "The political damage may be harder to repair than the flooded infrastructure. The management flaws that have been so obvious over the past week go to the heart of how President Bush runs the government."

DOJ_NMG_0003183

In his Washington Post column (9/7, A25), Harold Meyerson writes, "The world looks on in stunned amazement, unable to understand how a once great nation has grown so indifferent not just to its poor and its blacks but even to the most rudimentary self-preservation. Some of it is institutional racism," but "the primary culprit is the economic libertarianism that the president still espouses whenever he sells his Social Security snake oil. It's that libertarianism, more than anything else, that has transformed a great city into an immense morgue."

Thomas L. Friedman writes in the New York Times (9/7), "An administration whose tax policy has been dominated by the toweringly selfish Grover Norquist…doesn't have the instincts for this moment." Norquist "is the only person about whom I would say this: I hope he owns property around the New Orleans levee that was never properly finished because of a lack of tax dollars. I hope his basement got flooded. And I hope that he was busy drowning government in his bathtub when the levee broke and that he had to wait for a US Army helicopter to get out of town."

Maureen Dowd says in her New York Times (column 9/7, Dowd), "Maybe Mr. Cheney is going down to New Orleans to hunt looters. Or to make sure that Halliburton's lucrative contract to rebuild the city is watertight. Or maybe, since former Senator John Breaux of Louisiana described the shattered parish as 'Baghdad under water,' the vice president plans to take his pal Ahmad Chalabi along for a consultation on destroying minority rights."

The Washington Post's Jim Hoagland (9/7) writes that Katrina "left its marks on President Bush's ambitious foreign policy agenda as well. Overcoming these setbacks will require a demonstration that the United States under Bush is not an irrevocably weakened and divided nation about to turn inward on its own problems. … European embassies in Washington are already reporting back to their capitals on how the disaster may further impair Bush's effectiveness as he slips toward lame-duck status."

Bush To Ask Congress For $40 Billion In Hurricane Relief. ABC World News Tonight (9/6, lead story, 3:50, Gibson) reported, "President Bush said today he wants another $40 billion -- $40 billion -- to cover the next phase of recovery. And some in Congress say it's going to cost $150 billion before it is all over." NBC Nightly News (9/6, lead story,4:05, Williams) added "that is just one step the President is now taking after the unrelenting criticism of how the Bush Administration and for that matter state and local government responded to this crisis."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/6, Velshi) reported, "Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid has suggested, after meeting with the President, that there will be a bill, a request emerging for a bill to authorize $40 to $50 billion in emergency hurricane aid. … This substantially ups the estimate of what this hurricane is going to cost. And some of these are direct costs, obviously. We know what the indirect costs are in energy, because we have seen gasoline go to above $3" per gallon. But "there are a whole set of costs beyond that that are going to affect those people hurt by the hurricane and spread across the country. We are now looking at estimates well in excess of $100 billion to the economy, enough to actually start taking the annual growth rate of the economy down."

The Wall Street Journal (9/7, McKinnon, Rogers, Searcey) adds "that will be only a down payment on a federal tab that all now agree is going to reach more eye-popping levels." Reid "was the first to go public, predicting a government commitment of $150 billion. Top Republicans bridled initially, saying any such estimates at this time translated into playing 'political games.'" But GOP Sen. Judd Gregg "subsequently used an even higher $200 billion estimate, and defended Mr. Reid's figure." The Journal adds, "Some of the ideas being discussed on Capitol Hill involved relief far beyond the disaster area. For example, Sen. Charles Grassley, the Iowa Republican, said he wants loan relief for farmers whose crops might not reach market on schedule due to disruption at the New Orleans port. Sen. Ted Stevens, the Alaska Republican, said he favors tax relief for airlines hit by higher fuel costs."

Black Activists Seek Set Asides As Part Of Rebuilding Effort. USA Today (9/7, Leinwand, Eversley) reports, "After accusations that many New Orleans hurricane victims were not evacuated or rescued because they were black and poor, civil rights advocates Tuesday shifted their focus to making sure poor blacks aren't left out of the city's rebuilding. Jesse Jackson, at the Louisiana state emergency center in Baton Rouge, said Hurricane Katrina is an opportunity for the federal government to lift a community out of poverty. New Orleans' impoverished black residents 'should be first in line to get the jobs to clean up their own neighborhoods,' he said. Rep. Mel Watt, D-N.C., head of the Congressional Black Caucus, said the caucus would support any effort to make sure New Orleans residents were part of rebuilding."

Federal Relief Effort Now In Full Swing. The rescue and relief effort in New Orleans has made significant progress since the aftermath of Katrina reached crisis proportions last week. Aid is now readily available, and the Army Corps of Engineers has begun the long process of pumping out the water that is inundating the city. However, the relief effort was still characterized as belated, and as some diehard residents refuse to leave the city, public health officials have grown increasingly worried over the possibility of water-born disease.

DOJ_NMG_0003184

In a typical report, the CBS Evening News (9/6, story 4, 3:55, Roberts) reported, "There's a lot of things that are working right in terms of the relief efforts. The problem is that it all got here too late. For example when the National Guard set up a feeding station outside the convention center, the next day people were gone, they had been starving for four days. The USS Iwo Jima is here now, with its big hospital, but it's empty because there's nobody left to treat. They're still trying to get all of those people out of the floodwaters, but it's like they took a canon here and are firing it down the street and there's nothing to hit."

NBC Nightly News (9/6, lead story,4:05, Williams) reported there are "more Blackhawk helicopters in the air, more ships docked in the harbor, more of a military district, really, than a city. US Army regulars and National Guard have indeed taken up positions, the streets, for the most part are safe, but they are also desolate. New Orleans has been through so much in these eight days and tonight, there are predictions that might have been the easy part for this metropolitan area. While the water is on its way out and some pumps are running, today, an estimated 60% of this city was still under water. Officially, there are now 60,000 troops here, according to the Department of Defense. They have restored order, they've brought food and water, all three of those elements that were so sorely missing last week."

Mayor Authorizes Forced Evacuation Of New Orleans. The AP (9/7, Burdeau) reports New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin "authorized law enforcement officers and the US military to force the evacuation of all residents who refuse to heed orders to leave the dark, dangerous city. … While acknowledging the emergency declaration, police Capt. Marlon Defillo said late Tuesday that forced removal of citizens had not yet begun. He said that officers who were visiting homes were still reminding people that police may not be able to rescue them if they stay."

Many New Orleans Residents Refuse To Evacuate. ABC World News Tonight (9/6, story 10, 2:20, Woodruff) reported, "We met a lot of people over this past week that said they'd rather endure hell or high water, rather than leave their homes." NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 2, 3:35, Williams) reported, "With conditions the way they are, and we're talking about the toxic water, lack of food and water and electricity, the fact that the city is now a waterlogged ghost town, it is hard to believe, having said that, that anyone would choose to stay here. But as you know, we keep on finding more and more stories of the diehards here, survivors, who won't leave." NBC (Teague) added, "Rescuers tell us there are hundreds of people still in their homes here, but they won't show themselves because they are afraid of being rescued."

New Orleans Levee Breaches Repaired, Some Pumps Operating. Bloomberg (9/7) reports, "Engineers repaired a ruptured levee in New Orleans and began pumping water from the flooded city. … Engineers are pumping water from the flooded areas of New Orleans back into Lake Pontchartrain after patching the levee at the city's 17th Street Canal yesterday, said Jason Binet, a civil engineer with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. Today, the repaired breach will be fortified with layers of stone and asphalt, Binet said. About 60 percent of the city is still under water, Corps of Engineers officials said today at a press conference. They estimate it will take 24 to 80 days to drain the city." USA Today (9/7, Eisler) and the New York Times (9/7, Longman, Chan), among other sources, run similar stories this morning.

Tenor Of Network TV Coverage Of Katrina Changing. The tenor of the network coverage of Katrina's aftermath has changed significantly this week. There is a greater focus on refugees dislocated by the disaster and the political "blame game" over the inadequacies of the responses by Federal, state, and local governments. There is a corresponding decrease in air time given to scenes of human pathos, and such stories tend to focus more on less concrete issues, such as the health threat posed by the floodwater in New Orleans. In addition, the networks paid little attention to the situation outside of New Orleans, with only two stories on recovery efforts in Biloxi, Mississippi.

On ABC, roughly one-third of the newscast was devoted to the political fallout from Katrina, while a second third was devoted to scenes of human suffering, devastation, and health threats, and slightly more time was spent covering the plight of the refugees. On CBS, about 25% of the hurricane zone coverage was spent on refugees, 50% was spent on human suffering, and another 25% was devoted to the political situation. On NBC, which ran an hour-long newscast last night, about 15% was spent on the political aspects, while about 40% each was devoted to human suffering and refugees.

Meanwhile, local TV from the Gulf Coast area were split, with half of the stations in the area leading their broadcasts with stories assessing the physical damage the storm has caused, and the rest focusing on the political issues that have emerged in Katrina's wake. Typical of coverage assessing Katrina's destruction was a report from WIAT-TV Birmingham (9/6, 4:58 pm) that "the full extent of the horrors left behind by Hurricane Katrina sits beneath the water that fills the streets of New Orleans. While the water is being pumped out the mayor says it'll take at least three weeks before all of its removed."

WAFF-TV Huntsville (9/6, 4:59 pm) added that de-watering New Orleans is "expected to take two to three months. Thousands have joined the search for the victims and the survivors."

While a majority of stations focusing on the damage Katrina has caused continued to lead with reports from New Orleans, some led with stories from Mississippi or with local reports. WCFT-TV Birmingham (9/6 4:58 pm) reported,

DOJ_NMG_0003185

"Plenty of Alabamians are on the Gulf-Coast tonight as they begin a gruesome recovery-effort. They're digging through tons of debris left behind by Katrina. That rubble could…hide the remains of people who didn't survive." Meanwhile, WAKA-TV Montgomery (9/6, 5:59 pm) reported, "Hurricane Katrina remains evident in Biloxi and Gulfport. More than a week after Katrina hit the Gulf Coast, slabs of wood and piles of rubble are all that are left of some homes."

Stations that led with Katrina's political aftermath focused on investigations into the Federal government's response. Typical of coverage was a report from WPMI-TV Mobile (9/6, 5:00 pm) that, "Both President Bush and Congress are pledging separate investigations into the federal response after Katrina." The President "says he himself will lead an investigation into what happened in the aftermath of Katrina." WSFA-TV Montgomery (9/6, 5:01 pm) noted that "Congress plans to investigate what it calls the government's 'woefully inadequate' response to Katrina. The Governmental Affairs Committee will get a closed briefing tomorrow from FEMA. WVTM-TV Birmingham (9/6, 5:58 pm) added that the President is "also sending Vice President Dick Cheney to the Gulf Coast to find out if the government is doing all it can."

A minority of stations also picked up on House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's criticism of FEMA's Brown, noting, as on WBRC-TV Birmingham (9/6, 9:46 pm) that Pelosi "emerged from a White House meeting with the President calling for heads to role." Pelosi was shown saying, "If Michael Brown brings nothing to the table, then he should not continue in that job, unless we want a continuation of the shortcomings that we have had in the response."

A majority of local TV stations nationwide spent an extensive amount of time dealing with the political aspects of the story. For example, WWOR-TV New York (9/6, 10:00 p.m.) reported, "President Bush said he will lead an investigation into finding out what went wrong." The station added, "There's more anger and finger pointing tonight over Hurricane Katrina, and most are pointed straight at the disaster agencies." WFLA-TV Tampa (9/6, 5:02 p.m.) added, "Members of Congress are promising a Federal investigation into the response for help following Hurricane Katrina. President Bush said he will personally head up this investigation."

Fewer stations, meanwhile, chose to focus on continued efforts help speed the recovery process. KDAF-TV Dallas (9/6, 9:33 p.m.) reported, "President Bush is asking for another $40 billion in Hurricane Katrina relief. The President met with lawmakers and his Cabinet today to discuss recovery and rebuilding. During the meeting, the President outlined what needed to be done in the affected areas, saying bureaucracy should be pushed aside to speed up the recovery." Meanwhile, KHOU-TV Houston (9/6, 12:08 p.m.) aired a positive report, noting that "there is a bit of good news today. Half of the Gulf Coast refineries damaged by Hurricane Katrina plan to restart production this week. Eight major refineries that produce gasoline, diesel, jet fuel and heating oil were knocked out of commission."

More Tropical Storms May Be On Way. The CBS Evening News (9/6, story 11, 0:25, Roberts) reported, "Even as the country is dealing with the Katrina disaster, the busiest part of the hurricane season may be just starting. There are three storms now in the Atlantic. Ophelia, a tropical depression, is expected to be a tropical storm when it reaches Florida tomorrow with heavy rain."

NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 5, 0:25, Williams) reported, "We know the last thing this area needs is another hurricane. All eyes are on the Atlantic now that we are at the height of hurricane season. The largest concern out there is something called Tropical Depression 16. It is off the Florida coast, it is likely to strengthen into something called Tropical Storm Ophelia. There are two other storms out there, Nate and Maria, but they, luckily, are not threatening land."

FEMA Director Brown Said To Have "Big Target On His Back." FEMA Director Michael Brown is the focus of much of the criticism over the Federal Government's response to the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. On the CBS Evening News (9/6, story 4, 3:55), Gloria Borger said, "I think FEMA Director Michael Brown has a big target on his back. There are lots of Democrats today calling for his removal. And I think they're going to hear a lot more of that. Republicans were kind of holding back a little, but they're not too fond of him either these days."

NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 4, 2:05, Gregory) reported, "Top Democrats are calling for the firing of FEMA Director Michael Brown and Administration sources say questions are being raised about whether Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff should continue to oversee the government's Katrina response."

Meanwhile, ABC World News Tonight (9/6, story 6, :30, Gibson) reported, "A correction on a report last night about FEMA Director Michael Brown. We and other news organizations reported that Brown was college roommates with a man who recommended him for the job, former FEMA Director Joe Allbaugh. Allbaugh told us that was not correct. They were friends, but not roommates. Although Allbaugh said he is a registered lobbyist for Halliburton on disaster relief, he has not lobbied FEMA directly for Halliburton contracts."

USA Today (9/7, Lawrence) reports that in his "online résumé, Michael Brown touts his experience dealing with hurricanes and wildfires. He talks of being a state legislative committee director and an assistant city manager. He doesn't mention the decade he spent as chief rules enforcer for the Arabian Horse Association." The horse job, "which he left in 2000, is now fodder for critics who say Brown" has "botched the Katrina relief operation. Those critics include Republicans, Democrats and newspapers." President Bush "appointed a FEMA director who had 'absolutely no credentials' for the job, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said Tuesday." Brown says he has "led the federal government's response to more than 160 disasters and emergencies."

DOJ_NMG_0003186

The New York Times (9/7, Shane) reports Brown "has faced two simultaneous challenges - coordinating 14 federal agencies with state and local counterparts under grueling conditions, and fending off criticism from those who say that FEMA has failed and put the blame squarely on him." By "all accounts, it was not experience in managing disasters that brought Mr. Brown, 50, a lawyer from Oklahoma, to FEMA in 2001 as general counsel. It was his 30-year friendship with" Allbaugh. But when "pressed yet again to give his qualifications at a news conference on Monday, Mr. Brown gave a practiced answer, running through his learning curve as general counsel, then deputy director and finally, since 2003, director of FEMA. He has overseen the response to 164 presidentially declared disasters, he said, including California wildfires, a rash of tornadoes in the Midwest several years ago and the four Florida hurricanes last year." Brown's "friends say they have cringed watching the criticism of a man they describe as compassionate and dedicated to difficult work."

On CNN's Paula Zahn Now (9/6, 8:39 pm), Mississippi Rep. Bennie Thompson (D) said, "FEMA is clearly is flying by the seat of their pants. What we need is a professional in there trained to run disaster preparedness operations who can make quick decisions, cut through the red tape, and get the job done."

FEMA Sends Evacuees To Wrong Charleston. CNN.com (9/7) reports, "A South Carolina health official said his colleagues scrambled Tuesday when FEMA gave only a half-hour notice to prepare for the arrival of a plane carrying as many as 180 evacuees to Charleston. But the plane, instead, landed in Charleston, West Virginia, 400 miles away. It was not known whether arrangements have been made to care for the evacuees or transport them to the correct destination."

ABC World News Tonight (9/6, lead story, 3:50, Avila) reported, "There are still communication problems between the states affected and FEMA. Today, in Charleston, South Carolina, ambulances were standing by. Shelter arranged for evacuees who never arrived. Why? The plane went to the wrong Charleston. It went to the one in West Virginia. In Wisconsin, the Governor says he was told to expect hundreds of evacuees. None has shown up."

Chertoff Tasks Allen With "Bailing Out" Brown. The Washington Post (9/7, A23, White) reports that with Brown "taking harsh criticism for the slow federal response to Hurricane Katrina, the secretary of homeland security this week assigned a top Coast Guard official to help bail him out." Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, the Coast Guard's chief of staff, "was assigned on Monday to be Brown's deputy and to take over operational control of the search-and-rescue and recovery efforts along the Gulf Coast. The unprecedented task of coordinating the massive effort was handed off to a leader and expert who was described by colleagues as unflappable, engaging and intensely organized."

Brown Waited Five Hours To Request Personnel From Chertoff. The AP (9/6, Bridis), in a widely distributed article, reported that internal government documents show that Brown asked Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to send Homeland Security workers into the Gulf Coast region "roughly five hours after Katrina made landfall on Aug. 29." The Director's "memo to Chertoff described Katrina as 'this near catastrophic event' but otherwise lacked any urgent language. The memo politely ended, 'Thank you for your consideration in helping us to meet our responsibilities.'"

Private Relief Efforts Taking Up Slack For FEMA In Mississippi. The CBS Evening News (9/6, story 3, 2:15, Schieffer) reported, "In a major disaster," FEMA "is supposed to move quickly to coordinate aid for victims. But for countless survivors of Hurricane Katrina, that never happened. So private citizens are taking up the slack as best they can." CBS (Bowers) added, "It took eight days for FEMA to open its first Mississippi-based disaster response center, here in ocean beach." But "what nobody expected was how quickly and completely everyday people would fill the gap. Big church groups are cooking up three meals a day for thousands of hungry souls. And all across the Gulf Coast good Samaritans are on the ground are getting places the government has yet to find." FEMA "told us today it is no where near ready to start handing out checks. In fact, it can't even get its disaster center up and running in this hard hit city until sometime next week."

Blanco Brings Former FEMA Director Witt On Board. The Hill (9/7, Kaplan) reports it "didn't take long for James Lee Witt, the former head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), to throw his weight around in hurricane-ravaged Louisiana." Witt "has been hired by Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D) to help coordinate state and federal responses to the natural disaster." Blanco "introduced Witt to President Bush on Monday, according to a source who has spoken with Witt. Bush promised Witt whatever support he needed and said that Mike Brown, FEMA's embattled director, is his man in charge."

Witt Says FEMA Must Retool Response Plan. In a USA Today op-ed (9/7), Witt says, "I witnessed the incredible abilities and dedication of our nation's emergency response personnel, of which we have the best trained and best equipped possible. Despite their skills, ability and technology, we must do more to be better prepared and protected in the case of such a catastrophe. Our financial recovery mechanisms, which rely primarily on the private insurance market, federal assistance in the form of low-interest loans and a handful of state catastrophe funds, need to be retooled so that they are capable of meeting the immeasurable costs of a catastrophe."

DOJ_NMG_0003187

WTimes Says Brown, FEMA Performance Dysfunctional. The Washington Times (9/7) says in an editorial that Brown "confirmed the dysfunctional performance of his organization throughout the first three or four days following Hurricane Katrina's assault on New Orleans. In an interview on CNN's 'Paula Zahn Now,' three-and-a-half days after Katrina made landfall, Mr. Brown insisted that the federal government in general and FEMA in particular had no idea until that very day that tens of thousands of New Orleans residents and tourists had assembled at the city's convention center."

NYTimes Says Brown Should Be Replaced. The New York Times (9/7) says in an editorial, "It's obvious…that Michael Brown has met the expectations of those who warned that he would be a terrible director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. This is no time to be engaging in a wholesale change of leadership, but in Mr. Brown's case there seems to be precious little leadership to lose. He should be replaced with someone who can do the huge job that remains to be done. But the questions go way beyond Mr. Brown - starting with why federal officials ignored predictions of a disastrous flood in New Orleans - and the answers can come only from an independent commission."

WPost Says DC-Area Should Not Count On FEMA In Disaster. The Washington Post (9/7, A24) says in an editorial, "The District's mission to the storm survivors encountered widespread confusion, made worse by governmental red tape and indecision. Surveying the federal response to Hurricane Katrina and observing that the Washington region itself could be subject to a disaster or terrorist attack, Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) said yesterday on WTOP Radio's 'Ask the Executive' program that area officials "need to know what we can count on and not count on from FEMA." That observation is aptly borne out by the District's experience in New Orleans and other flood-ravaged communities."

Congress Said To Share Blame For FEMA Problems. Norman Ornstein writes in his column for Roll Call this morning (9/7), "When the Department of Homeland Security bill came to Congress, it ended up facing one and only one serious area of controversy and deliberation: the question of sweeping civil service changes to eliminate many of the regular protections for the 70,000 DHS employees. That issue became a political tool — a major campaign point in the 2002 elections — even as the larger and important questions of what kind of department, and how to fulfill all the real and serious government functions, was ignored. The result was, as we now see in embarrassing fashion, a downgrading of FEMA and confusion about its mission." Much "of the failure to implement the changes needed over the past four years can be laid at the feet of Congress and its leaders."

Blanco Indecision Said To Have Delayed Federal Relief Efforts. The Washington Times (9/7, A1, Lakely) reports that while Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco "has been critical of the Bush administration's response to the disastrous aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, but, according to the mayor of New Orleans, her indecision when President Bush offered help delayed rescue efforts and cost lives." New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin told CNN "he met with Mr. Bush and Mrs. Blanco on Air Force One on Friday and implored the two to 'get in sync.' 'If you don't get in sync, more people are going to die,' Mr. Nagin said." The Times adds Bush "met privately first with Mrs. Blanco, then called Mr. Nagin in for a meeting." Nagin said, "'He said, 'Mr. Mayor, I offered two options to the governor.' I was ready to move. The governor said she needed 24 hours to make a decision." The Times adds that "decision was a request by Mr. Bush to allow the federal government to take over the evacuation of New Orleans, which had been marked by chaos for days. The Democratic governor, who has clashed behind the scenes with the Bush administration since the storm hit, refused."

ABC World News Tonight (9/6, story 5, 2:35, Harris) reported, "FEMA says Gov. Kathleen Blanco failed to ask for help in a timely manner. Shortly before Katrina hit, the Governor sent the President requests for food and provisions, but made no specific request for help with evacuations. One aide to the governor told us today she thought city officials were taking care of the evacuation. Nonetheless, the Federal Government might have been more pro-active." Jerry Hauer, former FEMA official: "If the city and the state are stumbling, or in over their head, then it's FEMA's responsibility to show some leadership."

The Financial Times (9/7, Alden, Swann, Dinmore, Chaffin) says Gov. Blanco "insisted on CNN on Tuesday that 'I asked for everything that we had available from the federal government...and the federal effort was just a little slow in coming. I can't understand why.'" But "at the same time she said that co-operation had improved dramatically in recent days. 'We are parties in this effort. We are a team,' she told a news conference in Baton Rouge, the state capital."

New Orleans Officials Failed To Implement Own Disaster Relief Plan. ABC World News Tonight (9/6, story 5, 2:35, Woodruff) reported, "In New Orleans, both those in peril and those in power have pointed the finger squarely at the Federal Government." But "experts say when natural disasters hit, it is the primary responsibility of state and local governments, not the Federal Government, to respond. New Orleans' own comprehensive emergency plan raises the specter of 'having large numbers of people stranded.' And promises the 'city will utilize all available resources to quickly and safely evacuate threatened areas.'" When Katrina hit, "however, instead of being evacuated, people were told to go to the Superdome or the convention center, where no one provided sufficient sustenance or security." Bob Williams "dealt with emergency response issues after the eruption of Mount St. Helens in Washington state." Bob Williams: "If the plan had been implemented, particularly the early evacuation plan, thousands of lives would have been saved."

DOJ_NMG_0003188

NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 6, 2:35, Myers) reported, "Some 200 New Orleans school buses sit underwater in a parking lot, unused, enough to have evacuated at least 13,000 people. Why weren't those buses sent street by street to pick up people before the storm?" A "draft emergency plan obtained by NBC News calls for 400 buses to be prepared to evacuate victims, yet some 200 buses were left abandoned in Katrina's path."

Congress To Probe Federal Response To Katrina, With Focus On FEMA. The CBS Evening News (9/6, story 4, 3:55, Borger) reported, "Official Washington began its angry and accusatory finger pointing." Sen. Patrick Leahy: "Where in God's name were the people who are supposed to give water? Support? People were dying there." Congress "wants answers, and today opened its own investigation." GOP Sen. Susan Collins was shown saying, "If our system did such a poor job, when there was no enemy, how would the Federal, state and local governments have coped with a terrorist attack?"

Reuters (9/7) says Collins "said her Senate Homeland Security Committee would begin its investigation this week into the relief efforts." FEMA "has been a focus of much of the criticism, which has also targeted President George W. Bush." USA Today (9/7, Stone) adds others "called for a 9/11-style commission to investigate failures in responding to the disaster. 'It's hard to untangle all of the causes,' said Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., who will introduce a bill that would create such a commission." She "said cutbacks in funding and personnel at the Federal Emergency Management Agency, as well as unclear lines of command that appear to have bogged down the response, 'have to be thoroughly investigated.'" Clinton also "introduced a bill to separate FEMA, which she and others say bungled the initial response to Katrina, from the Department of Homeland Security." USA Today adds that "some Republicans agreed. Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., who lost his home in Pascagoula, said it was "a mistake" to take away FEMA's independence. But he warned against finger-pointing while hundreds of thousands of people are homeless."

The Dallas Morning News (9/7, Gillman, Dodge) reports that yesterday, "lawmakers couldn't find enough ways to express their disgust for the planning and response to the disaster." It is "a frenzy President Bush hasn't faced from a Congress controlled for most of his tenure by allies. Through terrorism, war and the occasional scandal, they have protected his administration from the sort of pointed grilling lawmakers are planning over the coming days and weeks. … This time, GOP lawmakers have rushed to the microphones."

The Washington Post (9/7, A19) reports in its "Washington Sketch" column, "As horrendous as the death and dislocation have been in and around New Orleans, the government's 'woefully inadequate' response there, as Collins put it, has left Americans far from the disaster area to assume that, if a terrorist's nuclear bomb goes off on K Street or smallpox is released in Times Square, it will be every man for himself. " On the Hill, "outraged lawmakers launched a bipartisan investigation and demanded to know what good had come from all that homeland security spending. At the White House, the president was still operating in the conditional. 'If things went wrong, we'll correct them,' he said. 'And when things went right, we'll duplicate them.'" Bush, adds the Post, "was in no hurry to probe. … The mood was more urgent on the Hill, where a bipartisan group of lawmakers in the House was preparing legislation to separate FEMA from the Department of Homeland Security."

The Hill (9/7, Kaplan, O'Connor, Tiron) adds "the House and Senate government-oversight committees will hold hearings into the widespread criticism of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina. The hearings are just part of Republicans' response to the public-relations fallout over the administration's admitted mishandling of the devastation in the immediate aftermath of the hurricane." Even though "several GOP leaders pleaded for increased civility, Congress plunged immediately into bitter partisanship as lawmakers returned to work yesterday, with the two parties arguing over blame for the death and destruction left in Hurricane Katrina's wake." Under the headline "Parties Divided Over Katrina Response," Roll Call (9/7, Pierce, Pershing, Billings) adds "the Democrats' proposals and demands for "immediate" Congressional action were received somewhat skeptically by Republicans."

Collins, Lieberman "Stop Short" Of Calling For Resignations. PBS's Newshour With Jim Lehrer (9/6, 7:15 pm) reported that in announcing that the Governmental Affairs Committee would hold investigative hearings into the response to Hurricane Katrina, Sens. Collins and Joseph Lieberman, the ranking member, "stopped short" of calling for the dismissal of Michael Chertoff or Michael Brown. Lieberman said, "Obviously what Michael Chertoff and Michael Brown did in this circumstance would be of great interest in our inquiry, but we want to go at this in a way that's credible and legitimate and open minded. Therefore, I think the last thing we'd want to do right now is to reach judgments about who should stay and who should go."

DOJ_NMG_0003189

Lawmakers Chide Chertoff, Other Cabinet Members Over Katrina Response. CNN's NewsNight With Aaron Brown (9/6, 10:00 pm) reported, "At a meeting on Capitol Hill tonight, members of Congress took cabinet officials to task," concerning government response to Hurricane Katrina. The meeting was reported to have been rough not only on Michael Chertoff, but also on a slew of Bush cabinet secretaries who "started out by giving rosy reports about how things are turning out for the better." NewsNight reported that the first question came from a Republican who said, "All of you deserve failing grades, despite what you're saying right now. The response was a disaster."

GOP Wants Congressional Review To Look Beyond Perceived FEMA Failures. CNN's The Situation Room (9/6, Henry) reported that "the bottom line is that Republicans here on the Hill privately feel that Democrats have been beating up on FEMA solely to score political points against this White House. That's a charge that Democrats up here flatly reject. But earlier on Capitol Hill, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, in fact, tried to spread the blame a little bit here and say that congressional review should focus not just on the federal government, but the local and state government."

Katrina Scrambles Congressional Calendar. Roll Call (9/7, Pershing) reports, "The aftermath of Hurricane Katrina has scrambled Congress' post-recess agenda and calendar, as leaders are frantically reordering their legislative priorities and pushing the anticipated adjournment date back weeks, and possibly more than a month." Both the House and Senate "were already resigned to missing their original departure target of Oct. 1. And with an enormous new set of challenges to tackle in the coming days, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) said Tuesday: 'It's obvious that we're going to be here until Thanksgiving.'"

Federal Officials Warn Of Post-Katrina ID Theft Threat, Relief Scams. The AP (9/7, Kerr) reports the FTC on Tuesday warned "Social Security cards, driver's licenses, credit cards and other personal documents are literally floating around New Orleans, raising the prospect some hurricane survivors could be victimized again -- this time by identity thieves." The AP notes, "The FBI also warned people wanting to donate money for Katrina survivors to beware of scammers who solicit online donations to lure victims into giving up credit card numbers and other sensitive information. 'There are people out there who are willing to stoop so low as to scam people who are willing to open their hearts and wallets to people in need,' said FBI spokesman Paul Bresson. He said the bureau has identified about 2,000 Web sites related to the Katrina relief effort. Most are legitimate, Bresson said, but the FBI is investigating about a dozen for possible fraud."

Reuters (9/7, Hurdle) notes, "After last year's Asian tsunami…the FBI investigated more than 170 Web sites that were preying on donors by mimicking the sites of well-known charities, according to Patrick Meehan, U.S. district attorney for Eastern Pennsylvania. While no evidence has emerged of criminals attempting to divert money destined for hurricane victims, Meehan said authorities were on high alert."

Four Charged In Virginia Aid Scam. The Washington Times (9/7, Emerling) reports, "Fairfax County police arrested four persons on Sunday for operating a roadside scam claiming to collect money for victims of Hurricane Katrina." Joseph J. Murphy Jr., Isaac M. Beavers, Marie S. Golden, and Nicholas P. Flint have been "charged with misdemeanor solicitation violations and released on a summons to appear in court." They "told motorists in the 12100 block of Sunset Hills Road in Reston they represented charities helping hurricane victims and asked for cash donations."

FEMA, HUD Seek Temporary Housing For Evacuees. USA Today (9/7, Hall) reports, "The federal government is pushing ahead with plans to offer makeshift housing -- in cruise ships, abandoned military houses and recreational vehicles — to tens of thousands of Gulf Coast evacuees. Housing and Urban Development (HUD) Secretary Alphonso Jackson said Tuesday that the government is cobbling together enough housing to take care of the hundreds of thousands of people who were displaced by Hurricane Katrina and have nowhere to go as they rebuild their lives. … HUD and the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) initially looked for temporary housing within a 500-mile range of the devastation along the Gulf Coast. FEMA spokesman James McIntyre said the agency has ordered 70,000 small recreational vehicles, each of which can sleep five. In areas without flooding, the trailers can be parked on people's property." The Washington Times/AP (9/7, Burdeau) reports, "A plan to move thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees from the Astrodome to cruise ships was put on hold yesterday after many objected, some because they were terrified by the thought of living on the water." The Washington Post (9/7, A1, Williams) and USA Today (9/7, Cauchon) both carry profiles of families that evacuated the New Orleans area and are now attempting to secure housing, employment and schools for their children.

Barbara Bush's Comments On Evacuees Provoke Controversy. The New York Times (9/7) reports, "As President Bush battled criticism over the response to Hurricane Katrina, his mother declared it a success for evacuees who 'were underprivileged anyway,' saying on Monday that many of the poor people she had seen while touring a Houston relocation site were faring better than before the storm hit. 'What I'm hearing, which is sort of scary, is they all want to stay in Texas,' Barbara Bush said in an interview on Monday with the radio program 'Marketplace.' 'Everyone is so overwhelmed by the hospitality.' 'And so many of the people in the arena here, you know, were underprivileged anyway,' she said, 'so this is working very well for them.'

DOJ_NMG_0003190

Evacuees Displaced To 21 States So Far. Evacuees displaced from the Gulf Coast have now been relocated to 21 states, and nine more have offered assistance. ABC World News Tonight (9/6, lead story, 3:50, Gibson) reported, "With approximately one million refugees, the logistical problems are overwhelming. States are stepping up. California and Colorado, taking 1,000 refugees, each. Texas, of course, taking the most, 230,000. Tennessee is next, and Arkansas. … Thirty states in all are accepting evacuees. But many, when they get on planes, don't know where they're going." ABC (Avila) added, "Where do one million evacuees go when their cities, towns and homes are left in ruins? In the aftermath of Katrina, the answer seems to be everywhere and anywhere. Today, 200 arrived in faraway Washington, D.C., 1,100 miles from home. Same story for these evacuees in Salt Lake City." The CBS Evening News (9/6, story 10, 2:45, Roberts) reported, "The hurricane disaster has resulted in mass relocations of Americans from three Gulf coast states, the biggest migration in decades. 21 states, Texas in particular, are already housing evacuees. And nine more say they are prepared to take in the homeless." CBS (Strassmann) added, "At this bus depot in Baton Rouge, evacuees fill every outbound seat. 3,000 people a day, heading to Texas, Florida, anywhere."

Influx Of New Orleans Residents Leaves Baton Rouge Uneasy. The New York Times (9/7, Applebome) reports, "Last week came the rumors -- of riots at Wal-Marts, of break-ins at homes, of drug gangs from New Orleans roaming the streets of' Baton Rouge. According to the Times, "the overwhelming response of people in Baton Rouge to Hurricane Katrina has been one of compassion and sacrifice. … But there have also been runs on gun stores, mounting frustration over gridlocked roads and an undercurrent of fear about crime and the effect of the evacuees."

Military, Church Groups Play Key Roles In Biloxi Relief Efforts. NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 3, 1:20, Teague) reported, "Since Sunday, the beach here in Biloxi has been turned into a mini military camp." This "is an L-cat, what they call a landing craft air cushion. And it has been bringing heavy equipment onto the beach to help out with cleanup efforts." The CBS Evening News (9/6, story 3, 2:15, Schieffer) reported that in Biloxi, Mississippi, "What nobody expected was how quickly and completely everyday people would fill the gap" left by the federal response, as "big church groups are cooking up three meals a day for thousands of hungry souls. And all across the Gulf Coast good Samaritans are on the ground are getting places the government has yet to find."

DC Welcomes Nearly 300 Evacuees. The Washington Post (9/7, A1, Labbe, Montgomery) reports, "One by one, the New Orleans survivors of Hurricane Katrina arrived in Washington yesterday, welcomed with smiles and applause from emergency workers and District leaders. … A total of 295 evacuees were flown from New Orleans to Dulles International Airport on two commercial aircraft, and more may arrive here over the next several days."

Up To 20% Of Flood Victims May Suffer Post Traumatic Stress Disorder. NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 12, 2:15, Bazell) reported, "In such a massive tragedy, there is no way of knowing will suffer long-term mental effects, but studies of previous disasters show that 20% of victims end up with post-traumatic stress disorder. At the FEMA emergency medical centers, mental health counselors are well aware of the danger."

FEMA Bureaucracy Said To Be Delaying International Aid. The Washington Post (9/7, A1, Williamson) reports in a front page story, "Offers of foreign aid worth tens of millions of dollars -- including a Swedish water purification system, a German cellular telephone network and two Canadian rescue ships -- have been delayed for days awaiting review by backlogged federal agencies, according to European diplomats and information collected by the State Department." Since Hurricane Katrina, "more than 90 countries and international organizations offered to assist in recovery efforts for the flood-stricken region, but nearly all endeavors remained mired yesterday in bureaucratic entanglements, in most cases, at the Federal Emergency Management Agency."

US Not Accepting All International Offers Of Aid. The Washington Times (9/7, Kralev) reports the US" has accepted help from about 40 countries for the victims of Hurricane Katrina -- fewer than half of those that offered -- including high-speed water pumps, food, cruise ships and more than $400 million in cash, U.S. officials said yesterday." Although "no offer has been rejected officially, proposals from Cuba and other countries to send doctors or nurses have not been accepted because there is enough U.S. medical personnel to deal with the crisis for now, the State Department said."

International Media Portray Katrina Disaster As US Shortcoming. NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 16, 2:25, Williams) reported, "A lot of nations around the world are fascinated by the seeming powerlessness of the most powerful, the richest nation on Earth, to handle relief supplies in the immediate aftermath." NBC (Miller) added, "Germans today loading 25 tons of food rations heading to the US just one of 60 nations reacting to America's call for help: The disturbing images from an American city so heartbreaking that the world has reacted with both kindness and shock." Here "in Britain and elsewhere, newspaper editorials are asking why the world's only superpower appears so helpless, 'The Independent' declaring on its front page, people died because they were poor. In the Middle East, Katrina has dominated evening newscasts." Arab networks "claiming Americans can't fight a war in Iraq and battle storm damage at home. Egyptian newspapers called it shocking that America was incapable of handling the disaster." But "rich or poor, nations are lining up to help. Afghanistan pledged $100,000. Singaporians are flying rescue missions. Even tsunami-ravaged Sri Lanka pledged $25,000, all it could afford: Shocked nations offering aid in recognition of America's own tradition of generosity in times of need."

DOJ_NMG_0003191

USA Today (9/7) says in an editorial, "To believe some commentary in countries from Europe to Asia to the Middle East, the world's wealthy superpower has, in Katrina's wake, been exposed as a vulnerable supermonster. In this view from abroad, the USA is a place that is callous toward its poor and black. A Pakistani newspaper wrote, for example, of how the U.S. government 'for three days sat smugly apathetic to the people's plight.' It's a place where the early looting reflects a culture of violence and selfishness: 'The darker side of the American dream' was how a columnist for London's Daily Mail put it. And it's a place where a focus on the Iraq war has starved it of resources to deal with natural disasters — a favorite topic in the Arab media. The comments, which contain both distortions and grains of truth, are a jolting reminder that the U.S. image in the world has been in a tailspin since the start of the Iraq war — fueled by anger and frustration over the go-it-alone U.S. approach that has too often disregarded others' opinions or interests."

Bush, Spellings Offering Help To Students, Schools Affected By Katrina. The AP (9/7) reports President Bush says that "the administration is looking at ways to help schools absorb students displaced by Hurricane Katrina." In a meeting with U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings, he said that "local school districts are extending 'extraordinary efforts' right now to help kids learn." And he "promised that Washington is ready to show flexibility when it comes to college loans."

The New York Times (9/7, Dillon) reports, "School districts from Maine to Washington State were enrolling thousands of students from New Orleans and other devastated Gulf Coast districts yesterday in what experts said could become the largest student resettlement in the nation's history. Schools welcoming the displaced students must not only provide classrooms, teachers and textbooks, but under the terms of President Bush's education law must also almost immediately begin to raise their scholastic achievement unless some provisions of that law are waived. Historians said that those twin challenges surpassed anything that public education had experienced since its creation." So far, "the total number of displaced students is not yet known, but it appears to be well above 200,000." President Bush said that Education Secretary Spellings "was working on a plan to help states absorb the educational costs but gave no hint of what kind of assistance might be provided. The Department of Education set up a Web site to coordinate private donations to schools enrolling displaced students." Spellings "has invited 40 education groups, including the P.T.A. and teachers unions, to meet at the Department of Education today to discuss disaster recovery efforts."

KYW-TV Philadelphia, Pennsylvania (9/6, 4:06 p.m.) reported, "President Bush met today with Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to talk about assistance for displaced students and closed schools in the disaster area. Tens of thousands of students, public and college students, were displaced by Hurricane Katrina."

WTAE-TV Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania (9/6, 5:03 p.m.) reported "Margaret Spellings will meet with education leaders from around the country to come up with a plan to help schools absorb students who have been displaced by the hurricane." WBAL-TV Baltimore, Maryland (9/6, 6:00 p.m.) also reported this story.

Districts Welcome Students. The AP (9/7, Lewan) reports, "Refugee students are getting a tough crash course in adjustment." School districts "have begun hastily enrolling these students, even embracing them" but "the influx is putting a logistical and financial strain on schools at a time when many are grappling with budget and program cuts, soaring gas prices, and the pressure of satisfying the No Child Left Behind Act."

The AP (9/7, Bluestein) reports, "Some 350 evacuees have already enrolled in Georgia public schools." And "although education officials are uncertain how the influx will strain schools throughout the state, the priority now is to 'put them in a classroom and we'll work out the details later,' said spokesman Dana Tofig."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/7, Wascoe) reports, Metairie, Louisiana high school senior Johnathan Smith has enrolled at Minneapolis' Southwest High and "as word spread of the New Orleans emigre's arrival, Johnathan was treated 'like a rock star,' said Josh Collins, a Minneapolis schools spokesman."

The Dallas Morning News (9/7, Booth) reports, "More than 6,100 students fleeing Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath have enrolled in Texas public schools so far…and state education officials promise to release money immediately to help affected districts cope. Officials expect 50,000 to 60,000 new students to enroll in Texas schools."

The Washington Times (9/7, Wagner) reports, "Public schools in Maryland and Virginia are enrolling Katrina victims under the federal McKinney-Vento Act, which provides for the enrollment of homeless students without immediately obtaining birth records or requiring the children to receive necessary immunizations."

DOJ_NMG_0003192

Pentagon Defends Katrina Response. USA Today (9/7, Kelley) reports the Pentagon's top officials "said Tuesday that the military responded quickly to Hurricane Katrina, although it took nearly four days for troops to begin delivering large amounts of food and water to storm victims." Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said, "Not only was there no delay, I think we anticipated in most cases — not in all cases, but in most cases — the support that was required." USA adds storm victims "in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama complained bitterly that the military didn't start large-scale delivery of provisions until Friday. Some military helicopters began search-and-rescue operations Aug. 30."

NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 6, 2:35, Myers) reported, "On the Federal level, clearly the arrival of the military has helped. But why did it take so long? On Wednesday, an Army officer said the nation's elite rapid deployment group, the 82nd Airborne, had 3,500 soldiers and 30 helicopters ready to be in New Orleans within hours. Yet they arrived only yesterday. Today, the Pentagon was defensive." General Richard Myers, Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff: "Not only was there no delay, I think we anticipated in most cases, not in all cases, but in most cases, the support that was required, and we were pushing support before we were formally asked for it." Myers: "A persistent unanswered question, why didn't the military just drop pallets of water to those stranded in various locations."

Parallels Between Katrina, Iraq Planning Failures Noted. The Wall Street Journal (9/7, A4, Jaffe) reports, "Military officials surveying the slow federal response to Hurricane Katrina say the problems that hindered early relief efforts along the Gulf Coast are eerily similar to those that have dogged relief and reconstruction efforts in Iraq." The crises "spotlight the inability of disparate departments within the government to plan together before a catastrophe and work quickly together once one hits." Michele Flournoy, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said, "Clearly we didn't get a coordinated governmental response in the case of Katrina. The same thing happened in Iraq. The mechanisms to integrate efforts across the government were just lacking." The Journal adds, "Some senior Pentagon officials, however, dispute that analysis. Rather than lack of coordination, they blame the magnitude of the disaster, which wiped out state and local emergency-response efforts."

Two Navy Pilots Reprimanded For Rescuing Hurricane Victims. The New York Times (9/7, Cloud) reports, "Two Navy helicopter pilots and their crews returned from New Orleans on Aug. 30 expecting to be greeted as lifesavers after ferrying more than 100 hurricane victims to safety." Instead, "their superiors chided the pilots, Lt. David Shand and Lt. Matt Udkow, at a meeting the next morning for rescuing civilians when their assignment that day had been to deliver food and water to military installations along the Gulf Coast."

IRS Expands Tax Relief For Hurricane Victims. The Wall Street Journal (9/7, Herman) reports in its "Tax Report" column that the federal government "has greatly expanded the number of areas eligible for special tax relief and is taking other steps designed to ease pressures on taxpayers in the storm-ravaged region. Areas eligible for relief include 64 Louisiana parishes, 52 Mississippi counties and six Alabama counties, the Internal Revenue Service said. Also on the list are three Florida counties: Broward, Miami-Dade and Monroe. Early last week, the IRS initially singled out only 31 Louisiana parishes, 15 Mississippi counties and three Alabama counties."

Private Donations To Charities Setting Records. USA Today (9/7, Koch) reports, "Private fundraising for Hurricane Katrina victims — from bake sales, to carwashes, to football games — has topped a half billion dollars and is outpacing U.S. donations for tsunami relief. The American Red Cross has raised more than $409 million, abetted by corporations, Texas businessman T. Boone Pickens as well as schoolchildren emptying their penny jars. Half of the total has arrived online. … The intensity is expected to continue as schools hold fundraisers, former presidents Bill Clinton and George H.W. Bush plead for donations and entertainers host a TV benefit concert, 'Shelter From the Storm,' Friday." USA Today (9/7, Cava) reports, "While bake sales and food collections have sprung up in countless towns, some cities are giving more. Much more. Partly because they're asked to, by both city officials and fate. But mostly because they want to. Such is the case with" San Antonio."

Government Warns About Katrina Relief Scams. NBC Nightly News (9/6, story 8, 0:30, O'Donnell) reported, "The Red Cross estimates more than $400 million in gifts and pledges so far to date. But we have to give you a warning tonight, to look out for charity scams because the government has warned us. For tips on steering clear of these Katrina schemes, log on to our website, the information is there the address is nightly.msnbc.com. Part of the information has to deal with those scam computer addresses."

Some Charitable Organizations Have Trouble Delivering Aid. The Washington Post (9/7, B9, Trejos) reports, "The Rev. William Finch, pastor of St. Raphael's Catholic Church in Rockville, arrived [in Houston] Tuesday ready to sell Montgomery County as a haven for 50 hurricane evacuees living in the Astrodome. … Since deciding to go after watching television coverage of Katrina's catastrophic aftermath last week, Finch has contacted the Red Cross and Texas officials for help identifying evacuees. He said he has not been able to reach anyone who can help. Others who want to assist have been rebuffed. When the D.C. government sent 10 buses to New Orleans to pick up storm victims Friday, people reportedly refused to leave." The Washington Post (9/7) reports, "A convoy of buses that set out Friday to rescue New Orleans evacuees is scheduled to return this morning largely empty-handed. … By the time they made it to New Orleans, though, crowds at the convention center and Superdome had been evacuated, city officials said."

DOJ_NMG_0003193

Katrina Expected To Have Big Negative Effect On US Economy. The Christian Science Monitor (9/7, Trumbull) reports this morning that "Katrina has packed an unusually big punch to the United States economy. Though the full impact of the Aug. 29 superstorm is still being assessed, the economic brunt differs in at least three major ways from a typical recovery led by armies of insurance adjusters bearing clipboards and checkbooks." They are, "A region's major city has been entirely displaced, throwing hundreds of thousands of people out of work and casting doubt on the financial future of New Orleans itself. The movement of goods through America's heartland has been disrupted, with key ports still closed and the channel of the Mississippi narrowed by the storm. Oil and gas drilling platforms, refineries, and pipelines are damaged, and some will take months to bring back on line." The result "is a barrage of challenges likely to affect everything from the US unemployment rate to winter heating costs for months to come . The typical forecast now is for slowing growth rather than outright recession."

The Washington Post (9/7, D1, Pressler, Blustein) says "the long-term economic impact of Hurricane Katrina will hinge in large part on how US consumers react to the disaster and resulting surge in gas prices. … Even before Katrina laid waste to the central Gulf Coast, gas prices were dampening consumption, according to a survey in early May for the National Retail Federation. People with low incomes are those most likely to economize when gas prices rise. That is one reason Wal-Mart Stores Inc. reduced its earnings forecast for the third quarter."

Moreover, says the Wall Street Journal (9/7, Barta, Walker, Hilsenrath), "the economic waves from Hurricane Katrina are being felt not just in the US, but around the globe, particularly in countries such as Indonesia and Italy that already were straining from soaring oil costs before the storm disrupted energy supplies. … Few economists expect the global economy to grind to a halt because of the storm alone. Just as the US has become more resilient to energy shocks in the past two decades, so have many of its trading partners." But "given the US role as the world's economic locomotive, the likely slowing of growth and employment here in the months ahead is likely to restrain growth elsewhere." The Financial Times (9/7, Giles, Editor) adds that "the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development on Tuesday urged the world's central banks to adopt a relaxed attitude to interest rates in the wake of surging oil prices and Hurricane Katrina."

Katrina Could Cause Increase In Steel Prices. The Wall Street Journal (9/7) reports, "The price of steel used to make cars and industrial equipment is expected to rise by as much as 20% in coming months because New Orleans flooding has limited the supply and distribution of raw materials such as liquid hydrogen and scrap steel." The increase "would be in addition to roughly 20% price increases by steelmakers including Pittsburgh-based US Steel Corp. and Nucor Corp., of Charlotte, N.C., that became effective on Sept. 1 for shipments of key products like hot-rolled coil."

Insurance Industry Expected To Survive Katrina Aftermath. The Washington Post (9/7, D1, Crenshaw) reports, "Katrina seems likely to become the most expensive natural catastrophe in US history, but unless insured damages go far higher than the current high-endestimate of $35 billion, the insurance industry should be able to pay the claims without threat to its own solvency, industry experts said yesterday." However, "taxpayers, insurance ratepayers and others are likely to be feeling the economic effect of the giant storm for years to come," and some risk experts are starting to raise the question of how -- or if -- houses or other buildings in low-lying areas such as New Orleans should be rebuilt."

Stocks Rally. The Financial Times (9/7, Schurr) reports, "If muted activity last week in the face of Hurricane Katrina was an exercise in restraint, yesterday's market performance could be called a return of animal spirits. Stocks rallied solidly and broadly, with every sector in the S&P 500 posting gains." The S&P 500 rose 15.38 points, or 1.3 per cent, to 1,233.40, the biggest percentage gain since the recent bottom on April 21. The Nasdaq Composite added 25.79 points, or 1.2 per cent, to 2,166.86 and the Dow Jones Industrial Average increased 141.87 points, or 1.4 per cent, to 10,565.12. The Wall Street Journal (9/7) and USA Today (9/7, Shell), among other sources, also report the stock numbers.

New Orleans Law Firms Struggle To Survive In Katrina's Wake. The National Law Journal (9/7, Jones) reports, "Much of the New Orleans legal community is in shambles following the devastation from Hurricane Katrina. … Attorneys and staffers at some law firms were still unaccounted for last week, and office buildings and courthouses -- and the documents inside -- remained soaking under water." The Journal continues, "Legal professionals said that they thought they had planned for the worst, but until some levees collapsed flooding almost 80 percent of the city after the hurricane hit, they believed they had escaped much of the damage predicted from the massive storm. … 'We have never dealt with something of this magnitude, but we're going to have to,' said Gregory Bodin, president of the Baton Rouge Bar Association. With offices at the Louisiana State Bar Association and the New Orleans Bar Association flooded, the Baton Rouge organization is serving as the headquarters for the other groups." The Journal adds, "The New Orleans area was home to about 7,500 lawyers, Bodin said, which equals about one-third of the state's attorneys. 'Most of the lawyers lost their homes, jobs and maybe their practices,' he said. … As most phone and electronic communications remained useless after the barriers protecting the low-lying city failed, law firm leaders and court personnel were struggling to find offices and even housing for their workers."

DOJ_NMG_0003194

Senators Say Action On Social Security Is Unlikely This Year. In what the Washington Times (9/7, Fagan) calls the "final blow to President Bush's signature domestic issue," senators "said they don't think they will act on Social Security legislation this year. … 'It's off the radar,' said Sen. Gordon H. Smith, Oregon Republican, adding that hurricane relief is much more important now, and Social Security is an issue 'we'll eventually deal with' down the line, though not likely this year. 'Social Security? I think not much is going to happen there this year,' agreed Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican. 'I can't imagine President Bush is going to go back to it,' Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Illinois Democrat, said of Social Security." The Times adds that some Senate Republicans, including Sens. Orrin Hatch and Craig Thomas, "still say action is possible in their chamber this year."

IG Finds Opinion Columnists Paid By Education Department Failed To Disclose Funding. The Dallas Morning News (9/7, Hillman) reports the U.S. Department of Education "paid education advocacy organizations to submit opinion pieces to newspapers and produce other ads, brochures and postcards -- and many did not disclose their government ties, the department's inspector general has concluded." But department spokeswoman Susan Aspey "cited a letter to the inspector general from Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, who said she agreed with most of the findings and that the department already had moved to 'strengthen the grant-making and contracting processes.'"

Hastings, Mollohan Face Questions About Ethics Panel Staffing. Reps. Doc Hastings and Alan Mollohan, the two top members of the house ethics committee are facing questions on when they will finish hiring staff for the panel. Roll Call (9/7, Bresnahan) reports, "Hastings and Mollohan, chairman and ranking member of the committee, hope to select a new chief counsel/staff director by the end of September or early October, according to sources close to the panel. Mollohan also wants to hire at least two additional investigators before initiating any inquiries, and Hastings is expected to accede to that request. But the slow pace of hiring signals that the committee will likely not have completed a preliminary investigation of House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) over his dealings with former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff by the end of this year. DeLay then faces the possibility of a second straight election cycle in which the ethics committee releases findings on an investigation of him before voters go to the polls, a daunting challenge for even the most politically astute Member."

OTHER NEWS:

Gulf Repairs, Saudi Cut Lead To Lower Oil, Gas Prices. The Wall Street Journal (9/7, Hotter) reports, "Petroleum futures on the New York Mercantile Exchange fell 2.4% as Gulf of Mexico oil production continued to recover in the wake of Hurricane Katrina." The "massive government response to the supply disruptions caused by the storm eased traders' concerns about curtailed US production. October crude fell $1.61 to $65.96 a barrel."

The Financial Times (9/7, Flood) reports, "The price reduction on its heavy crude is likely to lead to a production increase by the world's largest exporter. This may be confirmed this weekend when the kingdom nominates its October oil export programme." The move "comes ahead of the meeting of the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries later this month, when Saudi Arabia may push for an increase in the Opec quota from its current level of 28m b/d in an effort to stem the rise in global oil prices."

The Wall Street Journal (9/7, Herrick, Gold, Fialka) adds "the Gulf Coast network of production platforms, pipelines and refineries hammered by Hurricane Katrina last week took a step toward normalcy yesterday, helping to temper the price of crude oil and offering hope that the worst of the current energy crunch may have passed." As a result, "the US average retail price for unleaded gasoline -- having matched an all-time high Monday -- eased about a cent to $3.04 a gallon yesterday, according to AAA, formerly the American Automobile Association, as Labor Day marked the end of the summer driving season."

DOJ_NMG_0003195

The New York Times (9/7, Bajaj, Mouawad) also runs a story titled "Gas Prices At Pumps Show Signs Of Easing." USA Today (9/7, Healey), under the headline "Gas Prices Ease As Gulf Production Up," reports "most Americans -- eight of 10 -- told USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup pollsters Monday and Tuesday that gasoline suppliers are taking advantage of the hurricane to charge unfair prices. Prices zoomed past $6 a gallon in some areas after Katrina, and average more than $3 currently."

Network coverage of gas prices was markedly negative and didn't note prices had gone down. ABC World News Tonight (9/6, story 7, :15, Gibson) reported, "The government reported today that gasoline prices have soared to an average of $3.07 a gallon. That is a record 46 cent increase in just one week, since Hurricane Katrina knocked out eight major refineries." The CBS Evening News (9/6, story 9, 0:20, Roberts) reported, "In the week since the hurricane struck, gasoline prices have been rising nearly seven cents a day."

Senators Suggest Raising Fuel Economy Standards. Key senators said yesterday that Congress should consider raising fuel economy standards for all vehicles, citing gasoline shortages and spike in gas prices caused by Hurricane Katrina. The Washington Times (9/7, Hill) reports that Sen. Pete Domenici, chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said, "I believe we must take another look at the CAFE standards," adding, "We looked at that before, and it was not politically possible. I'm not sure that will be the case after Katrina." Sen. Jeff Bingaman, the committee's ranking member, "said he also hopes Congress will revisit whether to require cars, trucks and sport utility vehicles to give better mileage than the current standard, which is 27.5 miles per gallon on average for cars."

Lawmakers Also Accuse Oil Companies Of Profiteering. The New York Times (9/7, Kirkpatrick) reports 'the Senate energy committee also "vented bipartisan wrath Tuesday over accusations of energy-company profiteering after the Gulf Coast was struck by a hurricane. 'Hurricane Katrina exposed the harsh reality that we have been skirting and skating on thin ice when it comes to this country's energy concentration on the Gulf Coast,' said Senator Pete V. Domenici, the New Mexico Republican who is chairman of the panel. 'Why are the oil companies making record profits, and what are they doing with them?' he asked." Lawmakers "of both parties were eager to warn oil producers to watch their prices. Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, said: 'The distrust is enormous. I hope somebody out there is listening who controls these prices.'" The Times adds, "Several senators from both parties called for the Federal Trade Commission to vigorously investigate charges of price gouging."

The AP (9/7, Hebert) reports, "Senators, both Republicans and Democrats, said Tuesday that they suspect price gouging as gasoline costs soared in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina but complained that the government doesn't have the ability to investigate or prevent such market abuses. … 'The American people are being victimized more than any free market would warrant,' said Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., at Senate hearing on the impact of the hurricane on energy prices." The AP continues, "Smith and other senators said regulators, including the Federal Trade Commission, are not aggressively pursuing price gouging and other market manipulation by energy companies reaping huge profits. … Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., chairman of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, which held hearings into the recent price spikes, said Congress needs to give agencies the tools to investigate price-gouging complaints. … Sen. Jon Corzine, D-N.J., said that even as crude prices were declining, gasoline prices at the pump soared by 25 percent. … Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., said he will introduce legislation for a windfall profits tax on oil companies, with the proceeds used to rebate consumers who have paid huge prices at the pump." The AP notes, "Twenty-three states have price-gouging statutes, but Domenici acknowledged they are 'all over the waterfront' as to how they are used. In Virginia, a government must declare an emergency for the law to be used. … The FTC does not have authority over price gouging unless it involves an antitrust or market monopoly issue. … The afternoon of testimony demonstrated that one person's price gouging may be another person's justified price response to changing conditions of supply and demand."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (9/7) defended the oil companies in an editorial this morning. Says the Journal, "Let's explain why prices have been rising. Katrina has knocked out about 90% of Gulf crude oil production and about 80% of natural gas output." That" translates into about two million barrels a day that are not available to consumers, an 11% decrease in supply. This means that in the near term Americans are going to have to consume two million fewer barrels of gas every day, at least until the refineries are brought back on line and increased output and supplies from other nations arrive. The way the market achieves this reduction in consumption is through a higher price." The argument is also made that "energy companies are reaping windfall profits from the Katrina catastrophe. That is in one sense true -- the oil they've already extracted and refined is more valuable now, and we would be pleased to see some of these extra profits donated to the relief effort." But "artificially holding down the price of gas makes a bad situation worse."

Blunt Requests Gas Price Gouging Investigation. KDEB-TV Springfield, MO (9/6, 9:12 p.m.) reported, "With gas prices continuing to hover around three dollars a gallon here in Missouri, Governor Matt Blunt is once again looking to launch an investigation into price gouging. The governor sent letters today to US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and the FTC chairman asking their offices to look into the sudden increases with a focus on big oil companies."

DOJ_NMG_0003196

KOLR-TV Springfield, MO (9/6, 10:00 p.m.) also ran this story.

DeLay Says There's No Backing For Rolling Back Gasoline Tax. Reuters (9/7) reports, "House Republican Leader Tom DeLay said on Tuesday there was no support for rolling back the federal gasoline tax to offset higher prices. 'Absolutely not,' he told reporters after a meeting with President George W. Bush on issues related to Hurricane Katrina." He added, "Now more than ever you're going to need...that infrastructure, those highway trust funds, to rebuild the bridges that were destroyed, rebuild the railroads that were destroyed. You have to have the infrastructure or you can't have a recovery."

IAEA Report Says Iran Could Develop Nuclear Weapons In Five Years. Preceding a Sept 16 IAEA meeting to decide on penalties for Iran for pursuing its nuclear program, the International Institute of Strategic Studies released a study saying Iran could develop enough weapons-grade uranium for a weapon in five years, but that it would likely focus on developing on production capability for a decade before making a decision on acquiring atomic weapons. The Financial Times (9/7, Spiegel) reports, "The five-year estimate is more aggressive than reported projections of US intelligence agencies, which are believed to have determined Iran is six to ten years away from such a breakthrough. But in spite of a capability to develop weapons-grade uranium by the end of the decade, John Chipman, the IISS director, said that would require Iran to 'throw caution to the wind' and ignore the threat of international sanctions, a move Tehran has been reluctant to pursue." Chipman "noted that a more cautious approach – which would involve building a more sophisticated "industrial-scale" centrifuge plant at Natanz – would allow Iran to have a much greater capability to produce the higher enriched uranium needed for weapons in the long-term."

The New York Times (9/7, Cowell) says that with the report being released "at a diplomatically delicate time," Dr. Chipman "said it would be important for negotiators 'to apply pressure and create inducements to persuade Iran not to develop a fuel-cycle capability that it could turn later into a weapons program.'" In addition he said "it will be important to apply international diplomacy in such a way that does not inspire Iran to abandon all restraint and seek a nuclear-weapons capability without regard to international repercussions."

Bolton Offers Compromise On UN Reforms. The New York Times/Reuters (9/7) reports, "Ambassador John R. Bolton of the United States on Tuesday offered compromise language on development and aid spending and climate change to try to resolve a deadlock over a list of goals being prepared for a world summit meeting here next week." With disagreements on the Kyoto protocols and UN foreign aid increases "surfacing again as a logjam in the preparation of the goals list, Mr. Bolton said the United States was ready to accept the use of the catch-all phase 'millennium development goals' throughout the text, 'provided it can be properly defined.'" In effect, US-proposed language "including the phrase would commit world leaders to meet obligations they had undertaken in United Nations climate change agreements, including 'for many of us, the Kyoto Protocol,' according to Mr. Bolton's prepared speaking notes."

WSJournal Lauds Bolton Efforts To Reform UN. The Wall Street Journal (9/7) writes in an editorial that some of Ambassador Bolton's reforms "seem small but are literally worth hundreds of millions of dollars." And Bolton "also focuses on management reform, which will come into special focus with the release today of Paul Volcker's fourth report on the Oil for Food scandal. The report will stress Mr. Annan's multiple supervisory failures, yet Mr. Annan wants the world's leaders to accept his reform plan as a fait accompli before Mr. Volcker's findings are even read, much less considered." The Journal concludes, "Those who want something more than a feckless and corrupt world body should welcome his efforts."

State Department Raises Concerns About Israeli Plans For Construction In West Bank. The AP (9/7, Schweid) reports, "The State Department said Tuesday it had raised with the Israeli government the approval of construction of 117 houses in the Ariel settlement in the heart of the West Bank." Spokesman Sean McCormack "left little doubt that the administration was displeased."

Rice Has "Good" Meeting With UN Official About Gaza. The AP (9/7, Schweid) also notes, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met Tuesday for a half-hour with Karen Koning AbuZayd, counsel-general of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency, on the post-withdrawal situation in Gaza." McCormack said, "They had a good meeting."

Arafat Cousin Killed In Gaza. The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Ellingwood) reports, "Unidentified gunmen in the Gaza Strip shot and killed Moussa Arafat, a former Palestinian Authority security chief and a cousin of the late Yasser Arafat, at his home in Gaza City before dawn today." The Times notes, "The brazen assault heightened worries about chaos and factional violence in the Gaza Strip following Israel's withdrawal from all 21 Jewish settlements there." He "made numerous enemies during his years as a ranking security official and was viewed by many Palestinians as corrupt."

Poll Shows US, Europe Remain In Agreement On Major Policy Issues. The Los Angeles Times (9/7, Rotella) reports, "Europeans and Americans have often starkly different views of each other and the world, but agree on some major issues such as promoting democracy and avoiding war with Iran, according to a survey being released today." While "Western leaders try to mend rifts exacerbated since 2003 by the Iraq war, the fourth annual study of European and U.S. public opinion by the German Marshall Fund depicts a complex, wary transatlantic relationship. But the report, an advanced copy of which was given to The Times, also contradicts stereotypes and common wisdom." And while "a majority of Europeans remain hostile to American global dominance and President Bush in particular, they are enthusiastic about the centerpiece of Bush's foreign policy: promoting democracy around the world."

DOJ_NMG_0003197

The Wall Street Journal (9/7, Champion) reports, "An annual survey of opinion in 11 countries published today finds that, while the U.S.'s image no longer is sliding downward, Europeans feel no warmer toward the U.S. than they did a year ago, are no less hostile to U.S. global leadership and still disapprove overwhelmingly of the way Mr. Bush handles foreign policy." But although Europeans support some of the Administration's major foreign policy goals, "continuing bloodshed and instability in Iraq dominate. Since the poll was taken, the recent hurricane disaster on the U.S. Gulf Coast also appears to have rekindled distaste for the U.S.'s political system and social values, which are blamed here for leaving thousands of mainly poor and black New Orleans residents behind when the rest of the city evacuated."

US, China Discuss Future Of Korean Peninsula. The Washington Post (9/7, A22, Kessler) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her deputy, Robert B. Zoellick, have begun to explore with Chinese leaders the economic and political future of the Korean Peninsula 'because the status quo was not going to hold,' Zoellick said in an interview with a small group of reporters yesterday." He "said it was clear the Chinese did not 'want a collapsed state on their border,' a concern that he suggested had hamstrung Chinese officials in pressing North Korea on its illicit weapons programs. He said that in his talks, he picked up a discussion on the Korean Peninsula's future that Rice had initiated during an earlier trip to Beijing." Rice and Zoellick's efforts "appeared to be aimed at reducing the anxiety of the Chinese over a possible reunification of North and South Korea."

Activist Arrested By Chinese Authorities. The Washington Post (9/7, A22, Pan) reports, "Local authorities on Tuesday seized a rural activist who has been leading a high-profile legal campaign against the use of forced sterilization and abortion in China, in an apparent effort to block him from meeting with senior government officials who had expressed support for his cause." Chen Guangcheng's arrest "occurred a few days after he arrived in Beijing for meetings with lawyers and journalists. He was seized just as the Chinese government opened an international legal conference here."

Mubarak Expected To Win Presidential Election. USA Today (9/7, Levinson) reports, "Egyptians will have a choice for the first time in their country's 7,000-year history when they vote for a leader at polls today. But a majority appear likely to vote for" President Hosni Mubarak "who has ruled this country for the past 24 years." USA Today notes, "Egypt is contending with double-digit unemployment and inflation. Still, many voters remain loyal to Mubarak. In a region beset by conflict, Mubarak has guided Egypt through a period of protracted stability. Egyptians who remember the wars and tumult of earlier eras say they are thankful to Mubarak."

German Voters Leaning Right In US-Style Campaign. The Christian Science Monitor (9/7, Tzortzis) reports that while flash polls after the only debate between Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and his challenger Angela Merkel showed Schroeder had won the exchange, polls "have shown Mr. Schroeder's Social Democratic Party (SPD) a good 10 points behind Ms. Merkel's Christian Democratic Union (CDU) -- pointing to a growing likelihood that the former East German physicist will end the chancellor's seven-year rule." A Merkel victory "would bring a shift to the right that promises better communication with the US, a critical voice in the pledge to include Turkey in the European Union, and -- most important -- a more aggressive approach to Germany's greatest problem: the economy." The German "campaign has seen even more borrowed elements from the US. Merkel's campaign team has set up a professional call center to handle queries from voters, and a so-called 'rapid response' team that contradicts inaccuracies made by Schroeder in speeches or attacks on his opponent, says a CDU campaign official."

Heinz Plant Seized By Venezuela. The Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones (9/7) reports, "Alimentos Heinz, a Venezuela subsidiary of H.J. Heinz Co., said a government takeover of an inactive tomato-processing plant in recent days lacks legal backing." The Heinz plant "wasn't operating because low market demand and low prices didn't make it feasible to keep it running, the company said. Company officials are seeking a meeting with Vice President José Vicente Rangel and Agriculture Ministry officials to discuss the problem, the statement added."

Dominance Of One-Party Rule Seen As Stifling Democracy In Japan. Despite recent gains by the opposition Democratic Party in Japan, polls indicate the Liberal Democratic Party is headed for a big victory in Sunday's general election. The New York Times (9/7, Onishi)

DOJ_NMG_0003198

credits Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi with using the campaign to portray his party as standing for reform, but says his victory "will delay, again, the start of a new political era in which power is transferred regularly from one party to another, as it is in other democracies." The Times notes, "Japan's democracy is East Asia's oldest, but its ruling party has held power almost as long as the Communist parties in China and North Korea. Younger democracies in South Korea and Taiwan have already experienced changes in ruling parties, and the underpinnings of democracies, from vibrant civil societies to strong, independent news media, appear to be flourishing there more than they are here."

Koizumi Seeks Mandate To Shift Priorities From Rural To Urban Issues. The Wall Street Journal (9/7, Moffett, Woods) reports, "In elections this Sunday, Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi is betting he can win a mandate to engineer a shift no other Japanese leader has ever dared. His goal: To cut off the decades-long tradition of propping up Japan's declining countryside, and channel resources into the nation's successful cities and industries instead." He "plans to dismantle one of the countryside's biggest crutches, the huge and unusual post office, which in addition to selling stamps also acts as a bank and insurer. It is a vast network of 26,000 offices with 280,000 public employees, plus $3 trillion in savings and life-insurance deposits. The deposits are typically funneled into public-spending projects that have boosted rural economies.

Seriousness Of Chirac Illness Remains Unknown. The New York Times/IHT (9/7, Bennhold, Rosenthal) reports, "After a series of minimalist medical bulletins describing President Jacques Chirac's stay in a Paris hospital, it is still a public mystery what kind of neurological malady has befallen him, although French military doctors at this point certainly know the diagnosis, independent experts said." Official descriptions of a "little vascular accident," have raised concerns because that "means a problem with a blood vessel, which is almost always serious -- or a signal of something serious to come. It includes strokes, torn blood vessels and clots that block vessels, causing damage to the eye or brain."

WPost Criticizes Turkey Over Outspoken Writer's Arrest. The Washington Post (9/7, A24) editorializes, "Orhan Pamuk, one of Turkey's most acclaimed writers, is facing up to three years in prison. His offense, according to the state prosecutor? 'Public denigrating of Turkish identity.' Specifically, Mr. Pamuk told a Swiss newspaper in February that certain topics were off-limits for discussion in Turkey --- citing the massacre of Armenians in 1915 and the more recent conflicts between Turkish security forces and Kurdish separatists." His arrest "will raise questions about the wisdom of Turkey's EU membership bid" and that "may be exactly what those pushing for a prosecution intended; the timing of the charges, as European ministers meet in Wales to discuss Turkey's membership, is suspicious. That makes it even more important for the national government, though it doesn't control the prosecutor who brought the case, to do what it can to halt this case and others like it. Turkey has made important strides in protecting freedom of expression in recent years, including reforming its penal code. The charges against Mr. Pamuk underscore how far it still has to go."

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Attends funeral service for Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10:30 a.m. Senate reconvenes.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.R. 250 - Manufacturing Technology Competitiveness Act of 2005. Suspensions (3 bills): 1) H.R. 1215 - Green Chemistry Research and Development Act of 2005; 2) H.R. 230 - National Small Business Regulatory Assistance Act of 2005; 3) H.R. 3207 - Second-Stage Small Business Development Act of 2005.

10 a.m. AGRICULTURE _ Full Committee. Hearing to review the Kelo v. City of New London U.S. Supreme Court decision and H.R. 3405, the Strengthening the Ownership of Private Property Act of 2005 (STOPP). Location: Room 1300, Longworth.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ The Foreign Operations subcommittee holds an oversight hearing on Iraq reconstruction. Testimony to include: Ambassador James Jeffrey, senior adviser on Iraq to the Secretary of State; James Kunder, USAID assistant administrator; Stuart Bowen, Jr., special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction. Location: Rayburn, Room 2359.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Criminal Justice, Drug Policy and Human Resources Subcommittee. Hearing on Hearing on prevention, early detection and treatment of gynecologic cancers. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Subcommittee on Economic Security, Infrastructure Protection, and Cybersecurity. Hearing on ``The London Bombings: Protecting Civilian Targets from Terrorist Attacks." Kip Hawley, Administrator, Transportation Security Administration, U.S. Department of Homeland Security;

DOJ_NMG_0003199

Robert Stephan, Assistant Secretary, Infrastructure Protection Division, U.S. Department of Homeland Security; Bill Miller, President, American Public Transportation Association; Peter Lowy, Chief Executive Officer, Westfield America, Inc.; Michael Norton, Managing Director of Global Property Management, Tishman Speyer Properties; Joe Madsen, Director, Safety & Risk Management, Spokane Public Schools. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on reorganization of the VA's information technology infrastructure. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

10:30 a.m. EDUCATION AND THE WORKFORCE _ Full Committee. Markup of amendments to the budget reconciliation. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

11 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on Medicaid. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

11 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on the impact of Hurricane Katrina. Panel One: David Garman, undersecretary for Energy, Science and Environment, Department of Energy; Guy Caruso, administrator, Energy Information Agency; John Seesel, associate general counsel for energy, Federal Trade Commission; Kenneth Moran, Federal Communications Commission. Panel Two: Scott Angelle, secretary, Louisiana Department of Natural Resources; Red Cavaney, American Petroleum Institute; Bob Slaughter, National Petrochemical and Refiners Association; James Newsome, New York Mercantile Exchange; Benjamin Cooper, Association of Oil Pipe Lines; Bill Douglass, Douglass Distributing Co.; William Smith, BellSouth Corp.; Mark Cooper, Consumer Federation of America; and Daniel Lashof, National Resources Defense Council. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

Other: REHNQUIST _ Funeral and viewing schedule for late Supreme Court Justice William Rehnquist. Highlights: 10 a.m. - 12 p.m. Viewing at the Supreme Court. 2 p.m. Funeral service. St. Matthew's Cathedral, 1725 Rhode Island Ave. NW, with burial at Arlington National Cemetery to follow. Note: Funeral service is open to friends and family members. Burial is private. Media wishing to cover the funeral should call the court's media office for details. No press coverage of the burial. Location: Supreme Court.

TERRORISM SUMMIT _ The New America Foundation sponsors a forum on America's approach to countering terrorism, ``Terrorism, Security, and America's Purpose: Towards a More Comprehensive Strategy." Highlights: 9 a.m. Steven Clemons, New America Foundation. 9:05 a.m. Rep. Jim Saxton, R-N.J., House Armed Services Committee. 9:30 a.m. Francis Fukuyama, SAIS; Zbigniew Brzezinski, former national security advisor to the President; Col. Lawrence Wilkerson, USA (Ret.), former chief of staff, State Department; G. John Ikenberry, Princeton University; Kim Campbell, former prime minister of Canada; moderator Martin Walker, former Washington bureau chief, The Guardian, chief editor, UPI. 10:30 a.m. Madeleine Albright, former secretary of state; interlocutor Andrea Koppel, State Department correspondent, CNN. 11:15 a.m. Jamie Metzl, president, Partnership for a Secure America; Charles Andrew, co-chairman, Partnership for a Secure America; Warren Rudman, former US senator, co-chairman, US Commission on National Security in the 21st Century; Lee Hamilton, president Woodrow Wilson Center. 11:45 a.m. Louise Richardson, Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study; Robert Hutchings, Princeton University; Charles Kupchan, Georgetown University; Suzanne Spaulding, managing director, The Harbour Group; Michael McFaul, Stanford University; moderator Theodore Piccone, Democracy Coalition Project. 12:45 p.m. Mary Fetchet, founding director, Voices of September 11th. 2 p.m. Marc Sagemen, University of Pennsylvania; Daniel Levy, former advisor, Office of the Prime Minister, Israel; Galima Bukharbaeva, former country director/Uzbekistan, Institute for War and Peace Reporting; Juan Cole, University of Michigan; Karen Greenberg, NYU School of Law; Ivan Eland, Independent Institute; moderator Kelli Arena, CNN. 3:15 p.m. Julian Borger, Washington bureau chief, The Guardian; Yosri Fonda, Al-Jazeera; Tsutomu Watanabe, Asahi Shimbun; Michael Backfisch, Washington bureau chief, Handelsblatt; Nathan Guttman, Washington bureau chief, Jerusalem Post; Paulo Sotero, Washington bureau chief, O Estado de S. Paulo; moderator Nikolas Gvosdev, The National Interest. Location: Capital Hilton, 16th and K Streets, NW.

CHINESE PRESIDENT HU _ 10:30 a.m. ``Who is Hu: A Closer Look at President Hu Jintao," presented by Prof. David Lampton, Johns Hopkins University SAIS. Room 2216, Rayburn House Office Building.

KATRINA-CUMMINGS _ 8 a.m. Rep. Elijah Cummings, D-Md., discusses relief efforts and homeland security issues with an emphasis on transit security in a speech before the Lawmakers Committee of the National Press Club. Location: National Press Club, McClendon Room.

KATRINA-SMALL BUSINESS _ 8:30 a.m. Sen. Olympia Snowe meets in closed session with Majority Leader Bill Frist on aide to small businesses destroyed by Hurricane Katrina. Media briefing to follow. Location: Capitol, S-207.

HOUSE DEMOCRATS _ 9 a.m. Closed meeting of the House Democratic Caucus. Location: Room 345, Cannon. Notes: Newsx conference following the meeting outside the Cannon Caucus Room at 10 a.m.

VIOXX VERDICT _ 9 a.m. - 11 a.m. The American Enterprise Institute (AEI) hosts a panel discussion on ``The $253 Million Vioxx Verdict: What Does It Mean?" with Dan Troy, Sidley & Austin; Evan Schaeffer, Schaeffer & Lamere, P.C.; John Calfee, AEI; and Ted Frank, AEI. Location: AEI, Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th Floor, 1150 17th St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0003200

KATRINA-CANADA _ 9:30 a.m. Canada's Ambassador to the U.S., Frank McKenna, briefs reporters on Canadian relief operations being deployed to the Gulf region. Location: Canadian Embassy Briefing Centre, 501 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

NTSB-AVIATION _ 9:30 a.m. The National Transportation Safety Board holds a board meeting on two items: a safety study concerning risk factors associated with weather-related general aviation accidents, and an aviation accident report concerning a crash during landing of an Executive Airlines Flight 5401, in San Juan, Puerto Rico, on May 9, 2004. Location: NTSB Board Room, 429 L'Enfant Plaza, SW.

SEPTEMBER ECONOMIC OUTLOOK _ 9:30 a.m. - 10 a.m. Business Roundtable, an association of CEOs of leading U.S. companies, releases results of its latest CEO Economic Outlook Survey with reporters via a conference call. Briefer is Hank McKinnell, chairman, Business Roundtable, and chairman and CEO of Pfizer Inc., who will give a brief overview of the survey results and then wil respond to questions. Contacts: Jennifer Handt, 202-496-3288 Notes: Dial-in telephone number: (888) 428-4480. Host: Business Roundtable. Callers will be asked for their name and media outlet before they are admitted to the call. If encountering problems call (202) 872-1260.

REPUBLICAN AGENDA _ 10 a.m. Republican leaders hold a news conference to discuss their legislative agenda. Participants include House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill; Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo.; Conference Chairman Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio; Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis, R-Calif.; and Budget Chairman Jim Nusslke, R-Iowa. Location: Cannon, HC-6. Notes: Follows 9 a.m. closed meeting at Cannon HC-5.

DEMOCRATS-HOMELAND SECURITY _ 11 a.m. Democratic Leader Rep. Nancy Pelosi holds news conference after closed caucus meeting on homeland security, with Rep. Robert Menendez, D-N.J.; Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss.; Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass. Location: Capitol, H-203. Notes: Follows 10 a.m. closed meeting at Cannon 345.

PENTAGON BRIEFING _ 11 a.m. Lt. Gen. Joseph Inge, deputy commander of U.S. Northern Command, will brief live from Peterson Air Force Base in Colorado to discuss the status of the Defense Department's Hurricane Katrina relief effort. Location: DoD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

NORTH KOREA VISIT _ 11:15 a.m. News conference with Rep. Jim Leach, R-Iowa, and Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif. on their Aug. 30 to Sept. 3 visit to North Korea, and looking ahead to the resumption of the Six Party Talks on nuclear disarmament next week. Location: House Radio/TV Gallery.

GAS PRICES _ 12 p.m. Sen. Byron Dorgan holds a news conference to announce a bill to provide relief from high gasoline prices. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

MEDICAID _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute hosts a Policy Forum on ``Medicaid and the Long-Term Care Crisis--Who Should Pay?" with Stephen Moses, president, Center for Long-Term Care Reform; Vincent Russo, certified elder law attorney, past president, National Academy of Elder Law Attorneys; Michael Cannon, director of health policy studies, Cato Institute. Location: Cato Institute, 1000 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

COSTS OF IRAQ WAR _ 12:30 p.m. The Institute for Policy Studies hosts a discussion on ``The Real Costs of the Iraq War: Excessive Salaries for CEOs of Defense Contractors and Lives and Tax Dollars Wasted," with IPS Fellows Erik Leaver, Phyllis Bennis, and Sarah Anderson," co-authors of two new reports by IPS on the Iraq war. Location: Institute for Policy Studies, Ste. 1020, 733 15th St. NW.

OIL DEPENDENCE _ 1:30 p.m. Former Reagan administration defense officials discuss by telephone the need to reduce the country's dependence on oil and instead create more efficient transportation. Speakers include Frank Gaffney, former assistant secretary of defense under Reagan and Dan Lashof, Natural Resources Defense Council. Contacts: Nicole St. Clair, 202-289-2404. Notes: Telephone news conference. Call 1-877-826-1586 and ask for ``Oil Savings."

PREDATORY LENDING _ 1:30 p.m. The Center for Responsible Lending (CRL) holds a phone-based news conference on legislation currently before Congress jeopardizing consumers by what the Center says is weakening protections against predatory lending already in place across the U.S., with Rep. Brad Miller, D-N.C.; Massachusetts State Rep. John Quinn; New Jersey Department of Banking & Insurance Director H. Robert Tillman; New Mexico Chief Deputy Attorney General Stuart Bluestone; and CRL Executive Vice President Debbie Goldstein. Contacts: Ailis Aaron, 703-276-3265. Notes: To join the live, telephone-based news conference (with full Q&A) dial 1-(800) 860-2442 by 1:30 p.m. ET on Sept. 7 and ask for the ``Attack on state predatory lending laws" news event.

9/11-PENNSYLVANIA MEMORIAL _ 2 p.m. A press conference will be held to announce the winning design for the Flight 93 memorial for 9/11 victims in Somerset County, Pa. Location: U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Hall of Flags, Washington, DC.

DEMOCRACY AT RISK _ 3 p.m. The Brookings Institution hosts a discussion on a new book it published and is sponsored by the American Political Science Association titled ``Democracy at Risk: How Political Choices Undermine Citizen Participation, and What We Can Do About It," with moderator E.J. Dionne, Jr., Washington Post; panelist authors of the book Yvette Alex-Assensoh, Indiana University; Michael Brintnall, American Political Science

DOJ_NMG_0003201

Association.; William Galston, University of Maryland; Stephen Macedo, Princeton University; Christopher Karpowitz, Princeton University; Rob Reich, Stanford University, Robert Rodgers, Princeton University; and Todd Swanstrom, Saint Louis University. Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

KATRINA RELIEF _ 6 p.m. The state societies of Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi and Florida hold a fund raising reception to benefit Hurricane Katrina victims. Location: Jones Day Building, 7th floor, 311 1st St. NW.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Sadr City Success Story."
"Water Drops, Mayor Hopeful."
"Baton Rouge A Booming Haven For The Displaced."
"A Home For The Brave."
"Donations At $500 Million, And Climbing."
"Legislature OKs Gay Marriage."

USA Today:
"Intimidation, Attacks Take Toll On Contractors In Iraq."
"3 Families With One Question: What Do We Do Now?"
"'Rays Of Light' In New Orleans."

New York Times:
"Flooding Recedes In New Orleans; U.S. Inquiry Is Set."
"Putting Down New Roots On More Solid Ground."
"Across Nation, Storm Victims Crowd Schools."
"Baseball In Iraq: As Pastimes Go, It's Anything But."
"In Nursing Home, A Fight Lost To Rising Waters."

Washington Post:
"Katrina Takes Environmental Toll."
"The Lure Of Coastal Life Outweighs The Risks."
"Offers Of Aid Immediate, But U.S. Approval Delayed For Days."
"California Legislature Approves Gay Marriage."

Washington Times:
"Residents Will Be Forced To Leave."
"'Marriage' Bill OK'd, Goes To Arnold."
"Surge In Saudi Oil Income Seen Aiding Fight On Terror."
"Rehnquist's 'Strong Legacy' Hailed."

Detroit Free Press:
"President, Congress To Lead Investigations."
"State Effort To Recoup Homestead Taxes Falters."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Overwhelmed."

Dallas Morning News:
"Mayor Orders Holdouts Evacuated."
"Fuming Congress Plans A Battery Of Hearings."
"Texas Expecting Up To 60,000 New Students."
"A 2nd Chance At UT-Austin."

Houston Chronicle:
"Disaster Probes Ahead."
"Focus Now Turns To Providing Services."
"Making Progress, One Sandbag At A Time."
"As Rehnquist Is Mourned, Senate Focuses On Roberts."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: New Orleans Refugees; Refugee Children-School; Bush-Katrina Response; Rehnquist Mourned; New Orleans-Katrina Response; Brown-Allbaugh; Gas Prices; New Orleans-Health Threats; Death Toll; New Orleans-Diehards.
CBS: Katrina-Blame Game; New Orleans-Water Receding; MS-Private Hurricane Relief; Katrina-Blame Game; Refugee Children-School; Iraq KIA Honored; New Orleans Police; Rehnquist Mourned; Gas Prices; New Orleans Refugees; Hurricane Season; Bob Denver Obit.
NBC: New Orleans Update; New Orleans-Diehards; Biloxi-Cleanup; Bush-Katrina Response; Storm Warnings; Pentagon-Katrina Response; Hurricane Evacuees-School; Katrina-Charity Scams; Baton Rouge Airport; Hurricane Relief Update; New Orleans EMS; Katrina-Stress; New Orleans Police; Death Toll; New Orleans-Reconstruction; Katrina-World Reaction; Rehnquist Mourned; Denver Obit; Katrina-Radio Coverage.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: New Orleans-Forced Evacuations; New Orleans-Contaminated Floodwater; Congress-Hurricane Response Questions.
CBS: New Orleans-Forced Evacuations; Bush-Hurricane Relief; Gas Prices; Roberts; CA-Gay Marriage.
NPR: New Orleans-Floodwater Removal; Congress-Hurricane Response Questions; FL-Tropical Storm Warning; CA-Gay Marriage; Wall Street; Palestinian Security Official Killed; UN-Oil For Food Probe; Denver Obit.

Copyright 2005 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0003202

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent: Wednesday, September 07, 2005 8:30 AM
To: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject: Department of Justice News Clips 9/7/05
Attachments: dojclips050907.pdf; dojclips050907.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 2005 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Terrorist Had Plans For London Attacks (WT/UPI) 4
Briton To Urge Europe To Tighten Security (LAT) 5
Man Held In California Terrorism Probe Pleads Not Guilty (SACBEE)....6
Terror Suspect Pleads Not Guilty To Conspiracy Charges (KNBC-TV)....6
Boca Doctor Charged With Supporting Al Qaeda Denied Bail (MH)....8
Government's Doctors: Man Accused Of Mall Bomb Plot Faked Illness (ABJ/AP) 9
U.S. Resident Held In Iraq Is Freed (LAT) 9
The Guantanamo Trials (WP)....11

Homeland Response:

Coast Guard Raids Moored Harbor Vessels (MHCA)....12
Rebuilding Begins Where Terror Struck (WP) 13

War News:

U.S. Attacks Insurgent Targets In Iraq (AJC/AP)....14
U.S. Forces Give Iraqis Full Control Of Najaf (WP)....15
Hussein Confessed To Massacre Order, Iraqi President Says (NYT) 16
With Death At Their Door, Few Leave Iraqi City (WP) 17
Iraqi Army Takes Control Of Najaf (LAT)....19
Gunman Kills 'one Of The Best' Explosives Experts (USAT) . 20
Intimidation, Attacks Take Toll On Contractors In Iraq (USAT)....21
Sadr City Success Story (LAT)....22
Iraq President Says Saddam Confessed To Crimes; U.S. Hits Bridges (USAT/AP)....24
Oil-For-Food Probe: UN Needs Overhaul To Stop Fraud (WP) 25
Panel Hits U.N. On Oil-for-food Failures (WT)....26
Annan Failed To Curb Corruption In Iraq's Oil-for-Food Program, Investigators Report (NYT) 27
U.N. Naysayers Greet 60th Anniversary With Biting Documentary (NYSUN) 28
U.S. Resident Freed From Baghdad Prison (WP) 30
Iraq And The Arabs (WSJ)....30
Baseball In Iraq: As Pastimes Go, It's Anything But (NYT) 31
Saudis Kill Top Militant, Ending Skirmish With A Qaeda Cell (NYT)....33
Surge In Saudi Oil Income Seen Aiding Fight On Terror (WT) 33
1st Afghan At U.S. Academy Sees Move As Way To Help His Country (USAT)....34
Despite War, Cadets Line Up For West Point (USAT)....35

DOJ:

Medals Of Valor To Be Given To Families Of 9/11 Heroes (STNIA)....37

Corporate Scandals:

Enron Defendants Cry Foul (WP) 37
Sweden Will Prosecute Ex-CEO Of Insurer Skandia (WSJ/DJN)....38
The Debate On Auditing Must First Clarify Its Purpose (FT) ..39
Morgan Director Resigns, A Sign That A Reorganization Is Likely (NYT) 40
Firm Sues To Block Mutual Fund Fee Inquiry (NYT) 40
Morgan Stanley To Pay To Settle Complaint (FINDLAW/AP).42

Criminal Law:

Legal Experts Call Current Law A Poor Fit For Leak Prosecutions (WP)....42
Former City Official Gets 30 Months In Prison (HC)....43
Embattled Lee Quits Plan Board (DMN)....44
Lee Resigns From Plan Commission (WFAA-TV)....46
Ribadu, FBI Meet In U.S. (NDI)....46
'What FBI Took From Atiku's US Home' (THISDAY)....47
Monitor: City Defying Ban On Political Hiring (CHIST/AP) 48
State Spent $478,385 To Check Guardrails (TENN) 49

Man Charged In Killings Of Sex Offenders (NYT) 49
Man In Wash. Murders Tries To Plead Guilty (TLPA) 50
Man Admits To Killing 2 Sex Offenders, Cites Idaho Case (LAT) 51
Lawyers Protest Court Venue For Prison-bus Killing (BSUN). 52
Judge Finds FBI Not Liable For Bungling Call From Killer (BOS) 54
Judge Dismisses Suit Against FBI (BOS) 55
U.S. Supreme Court Is Asked To Decide If It's Proper To Let Sleeping Jurors Lie (LAW) 56
Millions More In Bogus Cigarettes, Cash Seized By Feds (NSDY) 56
Gotti Was 'A Street Boss,' Prosecutors Say In Closing (NYT) . 57
Prosecutors: Gotti Son Ordered Sliwa Attack As Part Of Criminal Reign (NYNSDY) 57
Prosecutor: Gotti's Son Ordered Sliwa Hit (AP) 58
Trial Of 'Junior' Gotti Draws To Close In New York (REU) 59
PartyGaming Shares Plunge As Growth Rates To Slow (Update5) (BLOOM) 59
Betfair Makes Online Odds On AC Milan, Hillary Clinton, Weather (BLOOM) 61

Civil Law:

Pols To Court To Stop NJ Base Closing (WINS) 67
General Dynamics Loses Suit (WP) 67
Attorney-Client Privilege Doesn't Shield Company In Suit (LAW) 68

Civil Rights:

Voter ID Opponents To Monitor Elections (AJC) 70
Feds Tour Juvenile Justice Center (WJZ-TV) 70
Gay-Marriage Bill Narrowly Passes California Assembly (LAT) 70
'Marriage' Bill OK'd, Goes To Arnold (WT/AP) 72
Calif. Lawmakers Pass Gay Marriage Bill (NYT/AP) 73
Democrats And Labor Get Redistricting Vote On Ohio Ballot (NYT) 74

Antitrust:

Unipol Gets Antitrust OK For BNL Bank (BOS) 74
Endesa Rejects Gas Natural's Bid (WSJ) 75
Court Cases Don't Scare Music File Swappers Away (USAT) 76
Refiners' Merger Good For Business, Not Consumers (WP) . 77

Environment:

E.P.A. To Bar Data From Pesticide Studies Involving Children And Pregnant Women (NYT) 78
National Parks Grapple With Surge Of Illegal Off-road Vehicles (CSM) 79
Bonilla Bill Targets Eminent Domain (HILL) 80
Let Nature Help (LAT) 80

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Medical Marijuana No Influence On Teen Use (UPI) 81
Pot Use Down Where Medical Use OK (LAT) 82
Jury's Still Out On Narcotic's Effects (BOSH) 83
Truck Driver Pleads Guilty To Trafficking (LUFNEWS) 84
Mexico's Fox To Border Drug Lords: Who's Tougher? (REU) 84
Spain Tops Table Of Cocaine Use (GUARDIAN) 84

Tax:

U.S. Expects To Indict At Least 12 More Over KPMG Shelters (WSJ) 85
US Sees More Defendants In KPMG Tax Case (REU) 86
U.S. To Widen Inquiry Of KPMG Tax Shelters (NYT) 87
The Squeezing Of Lawyer-Client Privilege (NYT) 88
Many Families Miss Tuition Tax Breaks (USAT) 89

Congress-Administration:

Bush: List For Second Vacancy 'Wide Open' (CO) 90
Bush Pledges Wide Search For Court Seat (WP) 91
Bush Hints At Gonzales For Court Opening (WT) 93
Gonzales Is Mentioned In Supreme Court Remarks (NYT) 94
Pressure Rises With Roberts Hearings Set For Next Week (LAT) 95
The Right Wants A Woman (HILL) 96
NJ Judge Mentioned As Possible Supreme Court Nominee (AP) 98
Target Date Is Set For Committee Vote On Roberts (WSJ/DJN) 99
Hearings Set For Monday (RC) 100
Senate Sets Date For Roberts Confirmation Hearings (WT) 100
Specter Asks; Roberts Answers, For The Most Part (WP) 101
Roberts Confirmation Hearing Set For Monday (REU-Y2) 101
Katrina Thrusts Government's Role To The Fore In Confirmation Battle (KRT) 102
Will Roberts Choose Candor Or Silence Before Senate? (LAW) 103
Inside Politics (WT) 104
For Chief Justice, A Final Session With His Court (WP) 106
Roberts, Rehnquist Compel Comparisons (USAT) 107
Former Aide Roberts Helps Bear Rehnquist's Coffin (USAT) 109
Chief Justice's Death Hits O'Connor Hard (USAT) 109
Bush And First Lady Visit Rehnquist's Coffin At Court (NYT) . 110
Rehnquist's 'Strong Legacy' Hailed (WT) 111

DOJ_NMG_0003205

Rehnquist's Legacy (USAT) 112
Ironies Abound As Rehnquist Leaves Us (USAT) 113
A Defender Of Independent Courts (NYT) 114
Newsview: White House Falls Out Of Step (NSDY/AP) 115
Bush Resists Immediate Probe Into Katrina Response (REU) 116
For Bush, A Deepening Divide (WP) 117
Bush Pledges To Stay On Top Of Relief Effort, Says It's Improving (USAT) 118
Bush Counters Criticism Of Federal Relief Effort (LAT) 119
Bush Promises To Seek Answers To Failures Of Hurricane Relief (NYT) 122
Bush To Probe Storm Response (WP) 123
GOP Begins Damage Control (WT) 125
Storm Upheaves Bush's Second-term Agenda (USAT) 126
Hurricane's Toll Is Likely To Reshape Bush's Economic Agenda (NYT) 128
Bush Praises Americans' Aid To Hurricane Victims (WT) 130
Bush Taps Cheney To Assess Recovery Effort (LAT) 130
'Rays Of Light' In New Orleans (USAT) 132
Bush Will Rebound From Katrina Missteps (HILL) 132
A Swamped Nation-builder (LAT) 133
A CEO's Weaknesses (WP) 134
The 'Stuff Happens' Presidency (WP) 135
Osama And Katrina (NYT) 136
Haunted By Hesitation (NYT) 137
Katrina's Global Lessons (WP) 138
First Estimates On Katrina Costs For Washington Hit $200 Billion (WSJ) 139
Leaders Push To Make Sure Blacks Given Fair Share Of Rebuilding Jobs (USAT) 142
New Orleans Mayor Orders Forced Evacuation (AJC/AP) 142
New Orleans Levees Patched, Army Starts Pumping Water (Update6) (BLOOM) 144
Huge Pumps Start Draining Toxic Floodwater From City Runoff Flowing Into Pontchartrain May Threaten Lake's Health (USAT) 147
Flooding Recedes In New Orleans; U.S. Inquiry Is Set (NYT) 148
FEMA Director Faces His Own Storm Of Controversy (USAT) 150
Michael DeWayne Brown: Facing Blame In A Disaster (NYT) 151
Right City, Wrong State (CNN) 153
Coast Guard's Chief Of Staff To Assist FEMA Head Brown (WP) 153
FEMA Chief Sent Help Only When Storm Ended (AP) 154
Witt Makes Presence Known In La. (HILL) 155
We Can't Afford Not To Plan For Catastrophes (USAT) 156
FEMA Fails Its Core Mission (WT) 157
It's Not A 'Blame Game' (NYT) 158
Convoy To Chaos (WP) 159
Congress Should Share A Big Part Of The Blame For Katrina Response (RC) 159
Mayor Slams Blanco For Stalling (WT) 161
Congress Investigates 'woeful' Response To Katrina (FT) ..162
Lawmakers Prepare Katrina Probe, Financial Aid (REU) 163
Members Of Congress Return From Recess, Call For Probes (USAT) 164
Fuming Congress Plans A Battery Of Hearings (DMN) 165
Deconstructing Katrina (WP) 166
Storm Rages In The Wake Of Katrina (HILL) 167
Parties Divided Over Katrina Response (RC) 169
New Exit Plan: Thanksgiving (RC) 171
Experts Warn Of Katrina Identity Theft (WP/AP) 172
U.S. Officials Warn Against Hurricane Aid Scams (REU) 173
Four Held In Scam Soliciting Money (WT) 174
Government Works To Arrange Places For The Displaced (USAT) 174
Residents Will Be Forced To Leave (WT/AP) 175
Together In Houston: 'We're Going To Survive As A Family' (WP) 177
Stunned By Scope Of Destruction, Couple Wonder Whether To Begin Rebuilding Home (USAT) 179
Barbara Bush Calls Evacuees Better Off (NYT) 180
Amid One City's Welcome, A Tinge Of Backlash (NYT) 181
Hundreds Of Storm Survivors Arrive In Capital (WP) 182
Offers Of Aid Immediate, But U.S. Approval Delayed For Days (WP) 184
U.S. Declines Some Foreign Offers Of Hurricane Aid (WT) .185
A Foreign Aid Twist: U.S. Gets, Others Give (USAT) 186
Bush: Aministration Looking To Help Schools Absorb Kids Displaced By Katrina (AP) 187
Across Nation, Storm Victims Crowd Schools (NYT) 187
Hard Lessons For Kids Starting Class Far From Home (AP) 189
Katrina Forces Children To Start School Again In Georgia (AP) 189
Student Displaced By Hurricane Instant 'Rock Star' At Local School (MINNST) 190
Texas Expecting Up To 60,000 New Students (DMN) 191
Local Schools Open Doors For Displaced (WT) 192
Top Pentagon Brass Defend Response Time (USAT) 193
Katrina, Iraq Aid Efforts Hit Same Hurdles (WSJ) 194
Navy Pilots Who Rescued Victims Are Reprimanded (NYT) 195
IRS Offers Relief To Katrina Victims (WSJ) 197

DOJ_NMG_0003206

Storm Giving Outpaces That Of 9/11, Tsunami (USAT) 198
In Katrina's Wake, Generosity (USAT) 199
A Mission Of Mercy To Houston (WP) 202
New Orleans Bus Convoy Returning Mostly Empty (WP) 203
US Economy Takes Big Hit (CSM) 203
Long-Term Impact Depends On Consumers (WP) 204
Storm's Economic Impact Is Felt Around Globe (WSJ) 205
OECD Tells Banks To Relax Over Rates (FT) 207
Steel Prices Could Rise Further As Flooding Stalls Key Materials (WSJ) 207
Surviving Katrina's Huge Damage Claims (WP) 208
Wall Street Rallies As Crude Prices Ease (FT) 209
Investors Gauge Katrina Impact (WSJ) 210
Stocks Rally With Investors' Outlook (USAT) 211
In Katrina's Wake, Law Firm Disaster Teams See Action (LAW) 212
Social Security Reform 'Off Radar'? (WT) 213
U.S. Agency Funded Opinion Columns (DMN) 214
Ethics Staffing Slow As Panel's Caseload Mounts (RC) 215

Other News:

Zinc Tumbles 3.7% After Stockpiles Prove Unaffected By Storm (WSJ) 216
Crude Oil Lower After Saudi Price Cut (FT) 217
Gulf's Energy Infrastructure Begins To Regain Its Footing (WSJ) 217
Gas Prices At Pumps Show Signs Of Easing (NYT) 219
Gas Prices Ease As Gulf Production Up (USAT) 221
Senators Urge Boost In Standards Of Fuel Economy (WT) .222
Some Senators On Panel Ask Angry Questions About Gasoline Pricing And Profits (NYT) 223
Senate Holds Hearing On Gas Price Gouging (AP) 224
In Praise Of 'Gouging' (WSJ) 225
Tom DeLay: No Support To Roll Back Gas Tax (REU-Y2) ..226
Iran Five Years From Nuclear Arms, Says IISS (FT) 226
Nuclear Weapon Is Years Off For Iran, Research Panel Says (NYT) 227
Compromise Sought For U.N. Meeting (NYT/REU) 228
The Bolton Edit (WSJ) 228
White House Questions Israel Construction (AJC/AP) 229
Arafat's Cousin Is Assassinated (LAT) 229
Transatlantic Divide Deep, Not So Wide, Poll Finds (LAT) ...230
U.S. Fails To Mend Image In Europe (WSJ) 231
Zoellick Details Discussions With China On Future Of The Korean Peninsula (WP) 232
Rural Activist Seized In Beijing (WP) 233
For First Time, Egypt Has More Than 1 Presidential Candidate (USAT) 234
Germans Lean To Right (CSM) 235
Venezuela Seizes Idled Plant Of Heinz Subsidiary (WSJ/DJN) 236
Why Japan Seems Content To Be Run By One Party (NYT) 237
As Japan Votes, Aid To Countryside Hangs In Balance (WSJ) 238
Chirac's Illness Remains A Mystery, Despite Official Details (NYT) 241
Free Speech For Turkey (WP) 242

TERRORISM NEWS:

Terrorist Had Plans For London Attacks (WT/UPI)

By Pam Hess, United Press International

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

MOSUL, Iraq -- A terrorist captured near the Syrian border last month had a computer "thumb drive" that contained planning information about the July 7 suicide bombings in London, according to a U.S. military officer.

Col. Robert Brown, commander of the 1st Brigade 25th Infantry Division in Mosul, said that the man was captured north of Qaim in western Iraq and that authorities had connected him to the al Qaeda terrorist network.

It is the first evidence of a link between the London bombs and terrorists in Iraq, but fits with other evidence of a growing presence in Iraq by al Qaeda, which has taken responsibility for the British attacks.

Qaim, a Euphrates River border town, fell under the control of fighters claiming allegiance to Osama bin Laden's terrorist organization Monday, according to tribal members, officials, residents and others quoted yesterday by the Associated Press.

The sources said members of the group led by terror chief Abu Musab Zarqawi had killed U.S. collaborators and imposed strict Islamic law, posting a sign at an entrance to the town declaring, "Welcome to the Islamic Republic of Qaim."

DOJ_NMG_0003207

Col. Brown declined to discuss the specific nature of the information on the thumb drive -- a miniature data storage device that plugs into a computer's USB port -- but said it indicated al Qaeda involvement in the attacks on London's bus and subway system.

"I don't think anyone's done a good enough job explaining" the relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda, he said.

The Arabic language satellite channel Al Jazeera last week aired parts of a videotape in which al Qaeda's second-in-command, Ayman al-Zawahri, took responsibility for the blasts, thought to have used a potent but easily manufactured homemade explosive called TATP.

The same video carried a recorded statement by one of the four British Muslims who killed themselves and 52 others in the near-simultaneous attacks. The London bomber also cited his admiration for Zarqawi.

Bashar al-Naher, an adviser to Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, told The Washington Times that he had not heard about the Mosul discovery but said, "This does not surprise me. We are noting a pattern of involvement by [Iraqi hard-liners] in terrorist plots abroad."

The U.S. Central Command estimates that about 100 to 150 "foreign fighters" enter Iraq each month. These men are responsible for the great majority of suicide bombs, the most devastating weapon the insurgents and terrorists have in their arsenal.

Most such attacks are coordinated by Zarqawi's group, which calls itself al Qaeda in Iraq. Zarqawi claims allegiance to al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, but little is known about the level of direct cooperation between the groups.

Briton To Urge Europe To Tighten Security (LAT)

By John Daniszewski

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

LONDON — Britain's chief law enforcement official will call on European leaders today to put biological data into passports, visas and identity cards, share airline passenger lists and retain telecommunications records to help fight international terrorists and organized crime.

Concerns for safeguarding liberties must be weighed against the right of law-abiding people to be protected from crime and terrorist attacks, Home Secretary Charles Clarke will argue, according to an advance text of his remarks released to reporters before his address to the European Parliament in Strasbourg, France.

The British proposals to the EU come during a time of heightened fear of terrorism in Europe after the July 7 bombings of the London transportation network. They also coincide with growing public doubts about the merits of further European integration; this spring voters in France and the Netherlands rejected a proposed European constitution.

Drawing a connection between the issues, Clarke in his speech argues that a rising "Euro-skepticism" on the continent is in part due to doubts among ordinary people that European institutions are effective and sufficiently tough to protect them.

One solution he proposes is for Europe to adopt practical steps for police and security agencies to collect and share intelligence data and use them in cross-border prosecutions.

"This European Parliament, as well as national parliaments throughout Europe, needs to face up to the fact that the legal framework within which we currently operate makes the collection and use of this intelligence very difficult and in some cases impossible," Clarke plans to tell his audience. "The rules that currently govern our law enforcement bodies seriously inhibit their ability to protect us against criminals."

As an example of how laws undermine police efforts, Clarke cited regulations in some European countries that oblige telecom companies to destroy data on phone calls and electronic messages if they have no business purposes. Such information can be instrumental for police to establish links between suspects and to dismantle criminal networks, he argues.

Clarke says he hopes Britain's proposals will lead to "hard-headed discussions and practical agreement."

Britain recently assumed the presidency of the European Union, a post that rotates every six months.

Discussing his speech with reporters in London on Tuesday, Clarke said he was seeking to strike the right balance between preserving civil liberties and protecting the public. "It seems to me we have to give the same rights to those humans who want to be able to travel without being blown up on an underground train … as we do to the defendants," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0003208

If European governments agreed to put "biometric data" into passports, visas and identity cards, Clarke said, the information would be "an important means of ensuring that people have the identity which is genuinely theirs, and [are] not stealing other identities as some criminals or terrorists seek to do."

Clarke's suggestion that national and European courts must be pragmatic and sensitive to public opinion in weighing whether to deport terrorist suspects could run into opposition from legislators who fear undermining the European Convention on Human Rights, which forbids extraditing or deporting suspects to countries that practice torture.

Britain, which wants to deport radical Islamic clerics that it accuses of fomenting hatred and violence, is in the process of negotiating bilateral agreements with several countries promising that deported prisoners would not face ill treatment, Clarke said.

Although opponents argue that the agreements would not be respected, Clarke said the existence of such an agreement between sovereign governments ought to be enough to satisfy European courts.

"The judges need to understand that the people of Europe and people of Britain will not for a long time accept that action cannot be taken against people who are offering a real threat to our way of life and who are seeking to destroy it," he told the reporters Tuesday. "That is a message I shall send very strongly indeed."

Man Held In California Terrorism Probe Pleads Not Guilty (SACBEE)

By MICHAEL R. BLOOD, Associated Press Writer

The Sacramento Bee, September 7, 2005

SANTA ANA, Calif. (AP) - One of four men indicted in an alleged terror plot against California targets pleaded not guilty to federal charges Tuesday.

Hammad Riaz Samana, a 21-year-old Pakistani national, said only a few words as he appeared with hands shackled to his waist before U.S. Magistrate Judge Arthur Nakazato.

Trial was set for Sept. 27 before U.S. District Judge Cormack Carney, but a postponement was expected.

Samana and the others were indicted last week on charges of conspiring to wage war against the U.S. government through terrorism.

Federal prosecutors allege the plot targeted military facilities, synagogues and other Los Angeles-area sites. Authorities claim the four men were a cell of a California prison gang of radical Muslims.

Named with Samana in the indictment were Levar Haley Washington, 25; Gregory Vernon Patterson, 21; and Kevin James, 29. All but Samana are American born and Muslim converts.

Outside court, defense attorney Timothy Lannen described Samana as a hardworking, upstanding person.

"He's a peace-loving, respectful young man," Lannen said to reporters.

The attorney said Samana is a dean's list student at Santa Monica College and was working two jobs. Samana only met the others named in the indictment a few months ago, Lannen said.

When the case plays out the public will recognize "the decent young man that he is," Lannen said of his client.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kevin Smith said that "the indictment speaks for itself" and that the investigation was continuing. He said he expected the other men to be arraigned later this month.

Prosecutors allege that Washington, Patterson and Samana robbed gas stations to finance plans to target military sites, synagogues, the Israeli Consulate and the El Al counter at Los Angeles International Airport. Patterson bought a rifle. Samana received "firearms training and physical training," according to the indictment.

James, an inmate at California State Prison, Sacramento, is suspected of being the mastermind. He founded the radical group Jamiyyat Ul-Islam Is-Saheeh, or JIS. Washington converted to Islam while imprisoned there on a robbery conviction.

Terror Suspect Pleads Not Guilty To Conspiracy Charges (KNBC-TV)

KNBC-TV, September 7, 2005

SANTA ANA, Calif. -- A Pakistani man accused of plotting a terrorist campaign in the Southland -- using gas station holdups to fund the attacks -- pleaded not guilty Tuesday in Santa Ana to conspiracy-related charges.

Aug. 17 Images: FBI: Former Inmate Visited Mosque To Recruit For Alleged Plot

DOJ_NMG_0003209

Hammad Samana, 21 -- who has permanent-resident status -- denied charges of conspiracy to levy war against the U.S. government through terrorism; conspiracy to kill members of the U.S. military; conspiracy to kill foreign officials and conspiracy to use firearms in a crime of violence.

U.S. District Magistrate Judge Arthur Nakazato set a trial date of Sept. 27 and a status conference of Sept. 19. He assigned the case to U.S. District Judge Cormac Carney.

According to a federal grand jury indictment, Samana plotted with Kevin James, the founder of a group called Jamiyyat Ul-Islam Is-Saheeh -- or JIS -- and two other Southland men, Levar Washington and Gregory Patterson.

U.S. authorities allege the defendants intended to use money taken in holdups in Los Angeles and Orange counties to buy weapons and make other purchases needed to carry out attacks on local National Guard and Israeli facilities, according to court papers.

Samana is accused of participating in two of the 11 gas station robberies listed in a six-count federal grand jury indictment: a robbery on June 12 in Playa Del Rey -- in which Patterson was allegedly armed with a shotgun -- and a robbery on June 21 in the city of Orange.

Patterson and Washington were arrested July 5 after allegedly using shotgun to rob a Chevron gas station in Fullerton.

Four people who were in court during the arraignment of Samana, who is being held without bail, declined to comment outside the courtroom.

Defense attorney Timothy Lannen issued a statement about his client outside the courtroom and refused to take questions.

"He is a peace-loving, respectful young man," Lannen said.

Samana is on the dean's list at Santa Monica College, Lannen said, and "when arrested was working two jobs to support his family."

In response to the attorney's description of Samana, Assistant U.S. Attorney Kevin Smith said the lawyer "is free to characterize his client any way he wished.

In "plain terms," Smith said, Samana is accused of "conspiring to kill" U.S. military personnel, Israel officials and Jewish people at targeted synagogues.

Smith said he expects Patterson and Washington to appear for arraignment on Sept. 12. They are being held in the Men's Central Jail in Los Angeles, while James is set for arraignment on Sept. 26. He is being held in state prison.

Smith declined to provide additional details not specifically mentioned in the indictment, but did say that "We have charged everyone that could or should be charged based on the evidence."

In November, James, while in prison, allegedly recruited Washington, who was serving a robbery sentence, to join JIS, according to the indictment.

After Washington was paroled from a state prison late that month, James told him to recruit five individuals without felony convictions and "train them in covert operations," prosecutors allege.

Washington allegedly recruited Samana and Patterson, fellow attendees of the Jamat-E-Masijidul Islam mosque in Inglewood. At some point, Washington allegedly "reaffirmed his allegiance ... by pledging his loyalty until death by martyrdom."

According to authorities, Samana is the only one of the four not born in the United States.

Before the arrests, the defendants had been "on the verge of launching the attacks," which "had the potential to cause significant bloodshed," U.S. Attorney Debra Yang said in a news conference last week.

James, 29, preached that members of his group had a duty to "target for violent attack any enemies of Islam, or `infidels,'" including the U.S. government and supporters of Israel, the indictment states.

Samana and Patterson allegedly used the Internet to research the locations of military recruitment offices, Jewish events in the months of July and August and research on the Israeli consulate in Los Angeles, including the identity of specific Israeli officials.

James will remain in state prison, serving a sentence for being a prisoner in possession of a weapon, until transferred to federal custody, Smith said.

James, who was originally incarcerated for attempted robbery, allegedly founded JIS while behind bars in 1997. If convicted of all the charges, the defendants face life prison sentences.

DOJ_NMG_0003210

Authorities say the investigation began slightly more than eight weeks ago when Torrance police received a tip concerning a string of gas station robberies in Los Angeles and Orange counties.

After tailing Washington, 25, and Patterson, 21, for two days, Torrance officers allegedly saw them rob a gas station in Fullerton.

Police then arrested the pair and searched a South Los Angeles apartment they shared. That search turned up materials that led police to believe the men might be plotting attacks, said Torrance police Chief James Herren.

According to the indictment, the synagogue attacks were planned to coincide with the Jewish high holy days of Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur "in order to maximize the number of casualties to be inflicted."

The 10-day high-holyday period starts Oct. 3, the first day of Rosh Hashana, the Jewish New Year, and ends Oct. 12 on Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement, which is regarded as the holiest day on the Jewish calendar.

Authorities said they believed some targets would have been attacked soon if the arrests had not taken place.

Authorities are not aware of any current threat based on what was learned during the investigation, said Randy Parsons, acting assistant head of the FBI's Los Angeles office.

Boca Doctor Charged With Supporting Al Qaeda Denied Bail (MH)

By EVAN S. BENN

The Miami Herald, September 7, 2005

A federal judge in New York denied bail Tuesday for a Boca Raton doctor charged with conspiring to support al Qaeda.

Dr. Rafiq Sabir, 51, will continue to await trial in a maximum-security prison, his attorney, Ed Wilford, said.

"I indicated to the court that we had $1.5 million ready to be secured" for bail, Wilford said in a telephone interview after the hearing.

But U.S. District Court Judge Loretta Preska denied the motion, ruling that Sabir would pose a flight risk if granted bail.

Wilford said he will appeal the decision.

A federal grand jury handed up a one-count indictment June 27 against Sabir and Tarik Shah, an alleged co-conspirator who will be tried with Sabir. Shah, 42, also is being detained without bail.

The indictment supported the government's allegation that the men pledged an oath of loyalty to Osama bin Laden and his terrorist network on May 20.

An undercover FBI agent posed as an al Qaeda recruiter and secretly recorded Sabir and Shah reciting an alleged oath of allegiance on May 20.

Prosecutors claim that Shah, a martial-arts instructor, and Sabir, a medical doctor, promised to use their skills to help train and treat jihadists.

Federal agents arrested Sabir at his Boca Raton home on May 28, a few days before he was scheduled to fly to Saudi Arabia.

Both men pleaded not guilty to the charge of conspiring to support a terrorist organization. If convicted, they would face 15 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Attorneys for Sabir and Shah have said their clients, both U.S. citizens who are Muslim, committed no crime.

"In this case, I think we have a clear-cut violation of Dr. Sabir's First Amendment right to freedom of speech," said Wilford, who has previously represented defendants facing terrorism charges.

Sabir's previous attorney, Lighthouse Point lawyer Khurrum Wahid, said Tuesday that a full caseload forced him to hand over the Sabir case to Wilford.

At Tuesday's hearing, prosecutors said a third defendant would likely be added to the case against Sabir and Shah, but those two men will not face additional charges.

The man, Mahmud Faruq Brent, of Baltimore, was arrested Aug. 4 and charged with conspiring to support a terrorist organization. The government claims Brent and Shah are associates and that Brent went to Pakistan and trained to become a jihadist fighter.

Sabir and Shah are scheduled to be back in court Oct. 17 for a status conference.

Government's Doctors: Man Accused Of Mall Bomb Plot Faked Illness (ABJ/AP)

Associated Press

Akron Beacon Journal, September 7, 2005

COLUMBUS, Ohio - Mental health experts who examined a Somali man accused of plotting to bomb a shopping mall have concluded he was faking when he became a wild-eyed defendant who tapped his head on a table, mumbled and giggled in court.

Documents made public last week from two analysts at the Federal Medical Center in Rochester, Minn., said Nuradin Abdi was pretending to be mentally ill.

Abdi told psychiatrists that Hillary Rodham Clinton and Teresa Heinz Kerry would represent him in his terrorism trial.

He sometimes refused to shower, or he showered with his clothes on. Although a devout Muslim, he tore up a copy of the Quran and shoved the pieces into a toilet.

"We believe such behaviors were calculated attempts to appear severely mentally ill," forensic psychologist Andrew Simcox and staff psychiatrist Daniel Shine Jr. said in their report.

However, another psychiatrist requested by Abdi's defense attorney because the first report came from a federal agency said it's possible that Abdi has a "legitimate psychosis."

Abdi's lawyer, Mahir T. Sherif, said Tuesday the second analysis was done by forensic psychiatrist Dr. Robert Phillips, who previously testified in the case of President Reagan's shooter, John Hinckley Jr.

According to Sherif, Phillips reported that Abdi showed "clear signs of severe mental illness," particularly since he ate his own feces while imprisoned.

Abdi, 33, has pleaded innocent to charges of conspiring to aid terrorists and lying to gain political asylum in the United States as a refugee. His trial is scheduled for Sept. 26.

Abdi's attorneys have sought to bar statements he made to authorities in which he admitted to falsifying immigration documents and planning to blow up an undetermined Columbus-area shopping mall.

U.S. District Judge Algenon Marbley has said he will rule before the trial but indicated he would not discount the statements Abdi made with a lawyer at his side.

Prosecutors accuse Abdi of obtaining travel documents in 1999 by telling officials he planned to visit Germany and Saudi Arabia when he actually went to a military-style training camp for terrorists in Ethiopia.

Federal agents arrested Abdi on Nov. 28, 2003, after convicted al-Qaida operative Iyman Faris told them Abdi suggested shooting up a shopping mall.

Marbley last month criticized federal agents for arresting Abdi without a warrant.

Agents testified they were unable to get a warrant for the arrest because information leading them to have probable cause was classified and they wanted to act before the holiday shopping season.

Sherif argued Abdi's arrest was illegal and he was coerced and mistreated.

Investigators said Abdi was polite and cooperative during the interviews.

Officials said Abdi went from a model prisoner to one who abused himself, failed to communicate appropriately and had to be watched.

Simcox and Shine said Abdi had reason to feign mental illness, to avoid being tried on charges that could send him to prison for decades.

They said Abdi had no history of mental illness, that the onset of the symptoms was convenient, that the symptoms didn't match those of legitimate illness and_ testing didn't support a finding of mental illness.

By the time Abdi left the center in August 2004, he was acting normally again, they said.

His lawyer has a theory for Abdi's apparent turnaround. Sherif said his client's mind began to heal and he was "brought back to reality" after being allowed his first visits with family members and his legal counsel.

Abdi now is in the Franklin County jail.

U.S. Resident Held In Iraq Is Freed (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

More than two months after authorities cleared him of suspicion in a mortar attack on a United States base in Baghdad, an Iraqi man was released Tuesday from military custody, just days before government lawyers were due in court to answer questions about his captivity.

Tuesday's release of Numan Adnan Al-Kaby, a longtime lawful U.S. resident, from a military prison outside Baghdad marked the second time in two months that authorities freed a captive in Iraq within a week of the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California filing a federal lawsuit in Washington.

Mark Rosenbaum, legal director of the ACLU's Southern California chapter, said he was pleased that Al-Kaby had been released but disturbed that the prisoner had been held two months after a military review board first declared him an "innocent civilian."

"The U.S. government does not want to appear in front of a federal judge and answer questions about their indefensible detention policies in Iraq. This is a military and executive scandal," said Rosenbaum, who believes that more people are being held illegally by the U.S. military in Iraq.

A Pentagon spokesman, speaking on condition he not be identified, said, "I certainly understand the frustration people would feel by what they perceive is a delay, but it's a delay out of necessity, making sure that we are not releasing someone who is a threat to the security of Iraq or the Iraqi people."

Al-Kaby, 38, was originally taken into custody in April after calling in sick the day of a mortar attack on the base where he was doing construction work. He strenuously denied any advance knowledge of the attack, and was cleared by a military review board on July 4, but not released.

On Aug. 31, the ACLU filed suit after learning of Al-Kaby's situation from Los Angeles filmmaker Cyrus Kar, who also was freed from a Baghdad prison with the ACLU's intervention. The Times ran a story on Al-Kaby's detention the same day.

The suit was due to be heard Thursday in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C. But late Friday afternoon, Justice Department attorneys in Washington, led by Assistant Atty. Gen. Peter D. Keisler, filed papers seeking a 23-day delay to respond to the ACLU's suit.

The Justice Department did not mention that Al-Kaby had been cleared July 4, but said the ACLU suit raised "novel factual and legal questions."

In a motion filed Sunday, the ACLU issued a sharp retort: "The only truly novel question here is chilling … whether a determination of innocence of a lawful permanent resident by a military tribunal may be arbitrarily voided or ignored such that liberty becomes illusory."

On Tuesday, Col. James Coyne, staff judge advocate for the multinational force in Iraq, filed a declaration saying the military had held Al-Kaby past July 4 based on "new factual information." He did not provide details.

However, Coyne said that on Friday — just two days after the ACLU filed suit — the military had conducted another review and again recommended that the captive be freed.

The ACLU suit asserted that Al-Kaby was being held in violation of the U.S. Constitution, the Geneva Convention and international law.

As part of the suit, friends and relatives filed declarations stating that Al-Kaby was a Shiite whose family had long been opposed to the Sunni regime of Saddam Hussein. He fled Iraq in 1991 following the first Gulf War, and spent three years in a refugee camp in Saudi Arabia before coming to the U.S. and gaining political asylum.

He settled in Kalamazoo, Mich., where he opened a small restaurant with his cousin Haider Al-Saedy.

In 2003, both men applied for U.S. citizenship. Al-Kaby provided assistance to the FBI "to assist the government in the U.S. invasion of Iraq and even took a polygraph test to prove that the information he gave was truthful," the ACLU suit said.

After U.S. forces toppled Hussein, Al-Kaby decided to return to his native land to rejoin family members.

The day of the mortar attack, Al-Kaby had taken the day off so he could take his brother to buy a car in Baghdad, the ACLU contended.

Kar met Al-Kaby while both were incarcerated at Camp Cropper in Baghdad — where Saddam Hussein also is being held. Kar was released July 10 after being held captive in Iraq for 55 days.

In a court declaration last week, Kar said both he and Al-Kaby had received identical letters from the U.S. military declaring that each man was an "innocent civilian."

ACLU attorney Ranjana Natarajan said that if the government "had new information on Al-Kaby, it did not bother to tell the court what it was," in papers filed last week.

Her colleague Rosenbaum added, "The so-called new evidence is a transparent fabrication, intended to provide a fig leaf to cover five months of solitary confinement of an innocent man. This is an administration whose trademark is incompetence and indifference to human suffering."

The Guantanamo Trials (WP)

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

The Pentagon announced changes last week to the military tribunals that it has been trying to set up at the Guantanamo Bay naval base -- for years now -- to try terrorist suspects on war crimes charges. The tribunals, known as commissions, so far have been a total failure. Not a single detainee has been actually been put on trial. The system has been mired in litigation. There are serious problems of fairness and appropriate process for defendants who could face long prison terms or even the death penalty. The administration's changes improve the system in subtle but important ways, moving it closer to the system of courts-martial by which the military tries its own soldiers. But they don't entirely fix the problems.

The most substantial change in the new order separates the function of the commission's presiding officers from its other members. Under the previous order, all commission members functioned as both judge and jury. Under the new order, the presiding officer will function as the judge, responsible for rulings on matters of law -- though the other members of the commission could still override a decision concerning whether to admit certain evidence. The other commission members would decide guilt and sentencing, decisions in which the presiding officer would not participate. In addition, the order tightens a bit the right of the accused to be present at trial, subject to the need to protect classified information -- a largely symbolic change. And more important, it requires that if any material is withheld from the accused because of national security concerns and a reasonable summary cannot be provided, that material must be excluded from trial if its admission as evidence would preclude a fair trial.

Important differences remain between the commissions and true courts-martial, differences that leave the commissions wanting. The commissions still lack any direct appeal to the federal court system, which is a significant flaw. Their rules of evidence are more relaxed as well. But the more the commissions come to resemble courts-martial, the less sense it makes for the military to create a justice system from scratch rather than using the one it already has -- in which Americans and the international community have high confidence.

The administration's explanations on this point are increasingly less persuasive as time goes on. Al Qaeda operatives, officials note, did not fight according to the laws of war and, as a consequence, are not entitled to the privileges of honorable soldiers -- one of which is trial before court-martial. This is true enough. But is it really worth years of delay and litigation in order to bring defendants to trial under conditions whose fairness many people will doubt? The military also argues that commissions afford the government certain flexibility with respect to classified information and security that could not be easily handled in a court-martial. Again, that's true, but if Congress were to get involved and authorize courts-martial for accused terrorists, it could tinker with the model for these highly specialized circumstances.

At this stage, the critical matter is for fair rules to be clearly written in law. While the commissions are getting better, they still constitute a system in which the executive branch writes the rules (and rewrites them in midstream if need be), carries out the trials, hears the appeals and executes the sentences without input from the other two branches. Even if the commissions were perfectly designed -- and they still are far from that -- this would not be the best way to bring accused terrorists to trial.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DOJ_NMG_0003214

Coast Guard Raids Moored Harbor Vessels (MHCA)

By Virginia Hennessey

Montery (CA) Herald, September 7, 2005

The Coast Guard boarded and inspected close to 30 vessels, many of them docked, in Monterey Bay over the Labor Day weekend in a operation that raised the eyebrows of some local boaters and the ire of one.

The operation -- conducted in conjunction with the Monterey County Sheriff's Office, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration -- netted one arrest in Moss Landing Harbor and terminated the voyages of five vessels that were deemed unsafe.

In all, 28 boats, many of them live-aboard vessels that were moored in the harbors, were boarded and 31 citations were issued. One angry boater said Coast Guard officers came aboard his boat in Moss Landing Harbor late Friday citing authority under the Patriot Act.

In an e-mail to The Herald, Lowell Jones of Moss Landing said the Coast Guard did a "blanket boarding" in the harbor, "searching boats, and invading people's privacy at 10:30 p.m. They justified this intrusion by citing the Patriot Act.

"The locals are not happy, and the boating community as a whole has expressed concerns over privacy relating to such dockside boardings of legal live-aboard residents," he wrote.

Coast Guard officials said the operation was not in response to any particular law enforcement report and that search warrants are not required for such inspections.

"It wasn't a drill. But it wasn't in response to any Homeland Security threat we received," said Gabriel Flesher, chief of the Coast Guard's San Francisco division, which oversees Homeland Security issues in the area. "The exercise was developed as a random operation with local law enforcement agencies (and) we have the authority to board dockside."

Lt. Todd Moe of the Coast Guard's Monterey division said the operation was directed at boating safety during the busiest boating weekend of the year and was authorized under maritime law dating to the 1700s, which gives the Coast Guard jurisdiction over federal waters, including waterways that lead to the open seas.

Jon Copley, chief of the Coast Guard's law enforcement division in San Francisco, said he would be "very surprised" if one of the agency's officers cited the Patriot Act.

The U.S. Code allows the Coast Guard to "make inquiries, examinations, inspections, searches, seizures, and arrests upon the high seas and waters over which the United States has jurisdiction, for the prevention, detection, and suppression of violations of laws of the United States. For such purposes, commissioned, warrant, and petty officers may at any time go on board of any vessel subject to the jurisdiction... of the United States, address inquiries to those on board, examine the ship's documents and papers, and examine, inspect, and search the vessel and use all necessary force to compel compliance."

Moe said "99 percent of the feedback" he'd received was positive and that the operation resulted in the safest Labor Day on record on the Monterey Bay. The Coast Guard was called out to only one incident.

Safety violations that were cited included boats lacking floatation and fire-extinguishing devices and proper documentation. Moe said he did not know the identity of the one man who was arrested by the Sheriff's Office possession of marijuana and an illegal weapon. The deputies involved in the arrest were not available on Tuesday.

Harbormasters in Monterey, Moss Landing and Santa Cruz said they were not notified in advance of the operation. Moss Landing Harbormaster Linda McIntyre said she supports the Coast Guard's efforts to improve safety on the bay, but added that she'd never known the agency to do "door-to-door" inspections of docked vessels.

She said she had received complaints by some residents, but heard others praise the guard.

Monterey Harbormaster Steve Scheiblauer said in his 30 years as a harbormaster in Monterey and Santa Cruz, he'd never heard of any law enforcement agency randomly searching vessels being used as homes. Like several other harbormasters, Scheiblauer was under the impression the Coast Guard's blanket boarding authorization applied only to vessels that were underway.

"That is, on the face of it, pretty preposterous. They can board boats when they're underway. But when a boat is tied up, particularly as a residence, I don't think there's any probable cause to go aboard and search. As a random search, that would be very controversial, I would think, among the public."

Kimbra Eldridge, operations manager of the Santa Cruz Harbor, said her agency does not board boats "unless we have a particular cause."

Reports of the Coast Guard's operation also came as a surprise to Eric Endersby, chief harbor patrol officer in Morro Bay Harbor.

"The Coast Guard has the authority to board any vessel that's underway," he said. "But boats in slips are not underway and my understanding was the Coast Guard didn't have authority to board a boat that's tied up in a slip."

"That's a little scary," he added.

Andy Turpin, senior editor at Latitude 38, a widely read sailing magazine in Marin County, said Coast Guard boardings in the San Francisco Bay Area were an "accepted annoyance."

"It's common to be boarded and it's something you have to put up with," he said.

The practice was even more common during the height of the "zero tolerance" drug wars, he said, but even then, the Coast Guard did not randomly board docked boats.

"I have never heard of that happening up here," he said. "Before 9/11, when they had a little more time on their hands, they would come to a marina and offer free safety inspections and give you a sticker to keep you from being boarded on your Sunday sail."

Rebuilding Begins Where Terror Struck (WP)

By Michelle Garcia

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

NEW YORK, Sept. 6 -- The first phase of rebuilding on the 16 acres of Lower Manhattan leveled by the Sept. 11 attacks began yesterday with a ceremonial groundbreaking for a new $2.2 billion transportation hub, highlighted by the release of two doves representing "peace and rebirth."

Five days before the four-year anniversary of the 2001 terrorist attacks, federal and state officials celebrated the first phase of reconstruction at a site still considered a cemetery by survivors.

"Today, we begin to take back a site and restore something that was taken away from us on September 11," said Anthony Coscia, chairman of the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the site.

The transportation hub, designed by Spanish architect Santiago Calatrava, will link commuter trains from New Jersey, ferries and the city subway system. Officials estimate 250,000 people a day will stream through the transportation hub after its scheduled completion in 2009.

"New York is taking off again and set to soar to greater heights than ever before," said U.S. Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta, speaking in the 70-foot pit where the city's tallest buildings once stood.

The transportation hub is being financed by federal grants of $1.9 billion and by $300 million raised by the Port Authority. In the next six months, a total of $10 billion in new construction will get underway, said Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg (R). The planned projects include an underground memorial and the 1,776-foot Freedom Tower.

Construction of the transportation hub will begin next week. Families of Sept. 11 victims requested that the building's footprints remain uncovered for a 9/11 commemoration ceremony planned for the weekend, said Steve Coleman, a spokesman for the Port Authority. Workers will then lay a protective cover on the steel footings of the twin towers.

The design and intent of the rebuilding effort have been a focus of conflict and controversy. Some families of Sept. 11 victims waged a campaign against two museums planned for a new cultural center, charging they planned to host exhibits critical of the U.S. government.

Some officials at the ceremony drew parallels between the task of rebuilding the World Trade Center site and the challenges facing the Gulf Coast in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

"Let what we are doing be a beacon to the people of New Orleans," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.). "They should always know there is always hope, hope that is represented today by the rebuilding."

WAR NEWS:

DOJ_NMG_0003216

U.S. Attacks Insurgent Targets In Iraq (AJC/AP)

By Robert H. Reid, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 7, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq — U.S. jets struck targets Tuesday near the Syrian border where al-Qaida has expanded its presence, and civilians fled fighting in the northern city of Tal Afar, complaining they were running short of food and water.

To the south, U.S. troops handed the Iraqi army control of a Shiite city that saw bitter fighting last year — a sign of the uneven pattern of insecurity in this fragmented country.

The U.S. command also said four more Americans had been killed in action.

The airstrikes took place near Karabilah, about 185 miles west of Baghdad and one of a cluster of towns near the Syrian border used by foreign fighters to slip into Iraq.

In the first attack, Marine F/A-18 jets dropped bombs shortly after midnight on two bridges across the Euphrates River that the U.S. command said insurgents used to move fighters and arms toward Baghdad and other cities.

Hours later, a Marine jet destroyed a building used by insurgents to fire on U.S. and Iraqi troops, a U.S. statement said. One Iraqi soldier was wounded when Marines and Iraqi soldiers stormed the building, killing two foreigners and arresting three, it said.

Late Tuesday, Iraqi civilians reported a suicide bomber struck a checkpoint in Haditha, 60 miles east of Karabilah. There were no reports of casualties.

The airstrikes occurred about six miles east of the border city of Qaim, major parts of which have fallen under control of al-Qaida-linked foreign fighters.

Iraqi officials and residents say al-Qaida in Iraq, led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, took over parts of Qaim after residents fled fighting between tribes supporting and opposing the insurgents.

The U.S. military maintains a presence in the area, but U.S. officers have complained privately that they don't have enough American and Iraqi troops to secure Qaim.

Elsewhere, thousands of civilians fled Tal Afar, a predominantly ethnic Turkomen city 260 miles northwest of Baghdad where U.S. and Iraqi soldiers are trying to wrest control from insurgents.

Plumes of smoke rose from the city, which sits along a major trade and smuggling route to Syria. Ambulances were seen carrying at least 10 wounded civilians toward nearby Mosul.

Some of those who fled sought refuge in the village of Taha, where local officials scrambled to provide for about 700 families. Some of the refugees disputed claims by Iraqi officials that foreign fighters had joined local insurgents in the fighting inside Tal Afar.

"We did not see any strangers like Saudis, Syrians or others," said Hazem Mohammed Ali, deputy chairman of a Turkomen association in Tal Afar. "The people are suffering from lack of food stuff, drinkable water and blankets, because it is getting cold during the night here."

One U.S. soldier was killed Monday in Tal Afar, the military reported. Two others died Tuesday in a roadside bombing in Baghdad, and another was killed the day before near Ramadi west of Baghdad.

The deaths brought to at least 1,893 the number of U.S. military personnel who have died since the war began in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Despite the fighting, security is better in Shiite Muslim areas of central and southern Iraq, including the holy city of Najaf, scene of heavy combat last year between American soldiers and Shiite Muslim extremists.

But the Shiite clerical hierarchy mediated a truce, and the area was deemed peaceful enough for U.S. forces to hand over one of their bases in the city to Iraq's army. The transfer of Forward Operating Base Hotel means Iraqis are fully responsible for security in the city.

During a ceremony Tuesday, Lt. Col. James Oliver handed the ceremonial keys to the base to the new Iraqi commander, Col. Saadi Salih al-Maliky. About 1,500 Iraqi soldiers from the 2nd Battalion, 1st Brigade, 8th Division marched by.

U.S. troops relocated to a base outside the city in case their help is needed in a major security crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0003217

The move is the first step in a plan to gradually hand over areas once Iraqi forces are deemed capable of ensuring security. The goal is for the United States and its international partners to begin drawing down their troop numbers next year and focus on the insurgency-ridden Sunni Arab areas to the north.

"This is indeed a very important day for the province of Najaf," said Brig. Gen. Augustus L. Collins, commander of the 155th Brigade Combat Team. "It gives me great pleasure to say the Iraqi army in Najaf can control the area."

U.S. and Iraqi officials also hope a new constitution, which goes to the voters in an Oct. 15 referendum, will weaken the insurgency by luring Sunni Arabs into political participation.

However, Sunni negotiators rejected the proposed charter last month and vowed to defeat it in the referendum. The bitter, protracted talks appeared to raise tensions among Iraq's ethnic and religious communities.

U.S. Forces Give Iraqis Full Control Of Najaf (WP)

By Saad Sarhan And Omar Fekeiki

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

NAJAF, Iraq, Sept. 6 -- The U.S. military pulled hundreds of troops out of the southern city of Najaf on Tuesday, transferring security duties to Iraqi forces and sticking to a schedule that the United States hopes will allow the withdrawal of tens of thousands of its forces by early spring.

The handover came as Marine F/A-18 jets bombed two bridges near the Syrian border, hitting infrastructure in an area where insurgents have maintained effective control despite off-and-on offensives by U.S. forces. Insurgents have used the bridges to move fighters and arms across the Euphrates River toward Baghdad and other cities, the U.S. military said.

In the same area, U.S. warplanes later destroyed a building that insurgents had used to fire upon American and Iraqi troops, a U.S. military statement said. At least two suspected foreign fighters were killed, the military said.

Suspected insurgents in the same western province, Anbar, kidnapped the son of the new governor in Ramadi, the provincial capital, officials said Tuesday. Insurgents kidnapped the previous Anbar governor in May; he was killed in a U.S. attack on the house where he was being held.

U.S. Marines have a force of about 5,000 to cover the province's 24,000 square miles. American officers in Anbar say the Marines are too few to bring the province under control, but U.S. and Iraqi officials say the U.S. raids have helped disrupt the flow of bombs and recruits into the rest of Iraq.

Roadside bombs killed two American service members Tuesday, one in Baghdad and one in Ramadi, the U.S. military said.

In Baghdad, meanwhile, President Jalal Talabani told al-Iraqiya television that former president Saddam Hussein had confessed to crimes, including killings, committed on his orders. Talabani said he had been told by an investigating judge that "he was able to extract confessions from Saddam's mouth."

"Saddam deserves a death sentence 20 times a day because he tried to assassinate me 20 times," Talabani said, recalling his days as a Kurdish rebel leader. Hussein is scheduled to face trial on Oct. 19 for his role in a 1982 massacre of 143 Shiite Muslims in the town of Dujail.

The handover ceremony in Najaf marked the first transfer of an entire city from U.S. to Iraqi military responsibility this year. The raising of the Iraqi flag at a former U.S. base was "pretty much putting the city of Najaf in Iraqi control," Lt. Col. Steve Boylan, spokesman for the U.S. military, said in Baghdad.

U.S. forces will continue to support Iraqi troops in an advisory role and with logistics, Boylan said.

Najaf has been the scene of relatively few insurgent attacks. In August 2004, U.S. and Iraqi forces here launched a major assault to disarm the Mahdi Army, a militia loyal to the Shiite cleric Moqtada Sadr that had staged two uprisings against the U.S. military presence in Iraq. The assault claimed dozens of lives from both sides and ended only when Iraq's most influential cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, ordered Sadr to rein in his fighters.

Tensions surged again last month when clashes erupted between Sadr's men and Iraqi Interior Ministry forces seen as loyal to a rival Shiite bloc, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq. Nineteen died in those battles.

DOJ_NMG_0003218

"There's always [the] possibility of little spurts of violence here and there," Boylan said, but for U.S. forces now, "the top priority is foreign fighters and the Iraqis who support them."

About 400 U.S. soldiers left the base in Tuesday's handover, Lt. Col. James Oliver, commander of Forward Operating Base Hotel, told reporters, and "more will leave in the future."

The United States, which has 138,000 troops in Iraq, is pushing for major withdrawals to begin in early spring. Iraqi and U.S. officials had identified Najaf as one of the first places where the United States could draw down its forces. Other cities in the heavily Shiite south, and in the Kurdish north, are likely to be next.

The mostly Shiite Iraqi force assuming command here immediately renamed the post Base Karrar, or Base Warrior, a reference to one of Shiite Islam's most important figures, Ali, a cousin of the prophet Muhammad.

"Our forces are capable of defending the city," said Abdul Hussein Abdulridha Abtan, Najaf's deputy governor. "They are able to defeat the biggest terrorist operation."

Some residents of Najaf welcomed the handover.

"It is a happy event for Iraqis when we take care of our affairs, not the occupier," said Mustafa Hamdani, 19, a university student. "But we want them to continue [to] train our soldiers."

Others, however, expressed concern.

"It's true we would prefer not to have U.S. forces in the city -- but we need them," said boutique owner Aqil Farhan, 25. "The Iraqi forces are not capable of maintaining security yet."

Hussein Confessed To Massacre Order, Iraqi President Says (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 6 - The deposed Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein has confessed to crimes in meetings with investigators for the special tribunal that will try him later this year, President Jalal Talabani said in a televised interview Tuesday night. But a lawyer for Mr. Hussein's family dismissed the statement as a "fabrication."

Speaking on the state-run Iraqiya network, Mr. Talabani, a Kurd, said investigators have told him the "good news" that Mr. Hussein had confessed to ordering the Anfal massacre against the Kurds in northern Iraq in 1988 and to ordering other executions.

"He confessed about the Anfal executions, and the orders issued by his name," Mr. Talabani said. "Saddam should be executed 20 times."

It was not clear from the interview whether Mr. Talabani was saying that Mr. Hussein had acknowledged that his actions were criminal or that the former leader had merely admitted he had ordered killings he believed were proper. In the past he has not denied that he ordered people killed.

After the broadcast, a lawyer for Mr. Hussein's family criticized Mr. Talabani's remarks and suggested in an interview with The Associated Press that his statements had been false. Claims of a confession "comes to me as a surprise, a big surprise," said the lawyer, Abdel Haq Alani. He said Mr. Hussein had made no mention of a confession during a meeting with his Iraqi lawyer on Monday.

Mr. Alani added, "Is this the fabrication of Talabani or what?"

Fighting against Sunni Arab insurgents continued in western and northern Iraq. Some residents fled the northern insurgent stronghold of Tal Afar as fighting continued between American and Iraqi forces and insurgents who have controlled much of the city for almost a year. Residents complained of severe food shortages, and news services reported that the fighting had killed and wounded civilians and that residents had been bracing for a new round of combat.

Insurgents used a large roadside bomb to kill one American soldier in Tal Afar on Monday, the military said. American troops have been fighting since May to wrest control of the city from insurgents who moved in after the military largely abandoned Tal Afar last year.

DOJ_NMG_0003219

In western Iraq, military jets launched two airstrikes against insurgents near the Syrian border on Tuesday, the latest assault against militants who control much of the desolate badlands of western Anbar Province that are home turf to the most hardened elements of the Sunni Arab insurgency.

Shortly after midnight on Tuesday, jets bombed two bridges near the town of Karabila that insurgents had used to transport foreign fighters and weapons into central Iraq, a statement by the United States Marines said. Hours later, jets flattened a "foreign fighter safe house" near the bridges after a gun battle with marines there that killed two insurgents, another statement said.

In contrast to the military's normally more upbeat assertions about progress curbing the insurgency, the first statement noted that western Anbar residents have "experienced an increased level of violence at the hands of Al Qaeda in Iraq terrorists."

In central Baghdad, two American soldiers were killed Tuesday morning and two more were wounded when insurgents attacked their vehicle with a large roadside bomb. Another American soldier died Monday in Ramadi, the provincial capital of Anbar, when his vehicle was struck by a roadside bomb.

In other violence, the Iraqi police found four bodies in a sewage duct in southern Baghdad on Tuesday afternoon, according to an official at the Iraqi Interior Ministry. The official also said that shortly after 9 p.m., attackers shooting from a car window opened fire on people gathered at a Sunni mosque in northern Baghdad, killing three and wounding two. There were also unconfirmed reports that the son of Anbar Province's governor had been kidnapped from his college.

Iraqi officials say Mr. Hussein's first trial is expected to begin Oct. 19, when he faces charges that he ordered the killing of nearly 150 men and boys from the Shiite village of Dujail, 35 miles north of Baghdad, after a failed assassination attempt against him there in 1982.

If convicted, Mr. Hussein could be hanged soon afterward, eliminating the need for other prosecutions of charges of crimes against humanity, Iraqi officials have said. Those charges include ordering the Anfal massacre, where tens of thousands of Kurds were gassed or otherwise killed and dumped into mass graves, and the suppression of the Shiite uprising in southern Iraq in 1991, when 150,000 people were killed and bulldozed into graves.

Across many parts of Iraq with heavy Sunni Arab populations - especially in western Anbar - Iraqi security forces are far from being able to battle the insurgency on their own. But in the Shiite-dominated south, a battalion of 1,500 Iraqi troops formally assumed control of the holy city of Najaf, where Shiite insurgents fought fierce battles with American troops just last year.

The American 155th Brigade Combat Team handed over control of the main military encampment in Najaf, Forward Operating Base Hotel, to Iraqi troops during a ceremony on Tuesday.

The American commander, Brig. Gen. Augustus L. Collins, said the "Iraqi Army in Najaf can control the area," according to a pool report of the ceremony. But the general also emphasized that a contingent of American troops would remain based nearby in case the Iraqi forces needed help.

"Although we are transferring authority at this F.O.B., we will still be here to help the people of Najaf," he said.

With Death At Their Door, Few Leave Iraqi City (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

TALL AFAR, Iraq, Sept. 6 -- On one side of the concertina wire lining an avenue stood 100 U.S. troops, five Bradley Fighting Vehicles and two M1-A1 Abrams tanks. Across the street were about 1,000 men, women and children of this embattled northwestern city.

The military had warned in leaflets dropped by helicopter and messages played over loudspeaker Tuesday morning that it would soon raid the insurgent-controlled neighborhood of Sarai, east of the city center, and asked civilians to evacuate through checkpoints in the southern part of town. But the Sarai residents, most of them Sunni Turkmens, insisted they would either flee northward or remain in their homes, come what may.

After an eight-hour standoff marked by a cycle of negotiation, miscommunication, occasional gunfire and flashes of anger, one family, about 17 people, agreed to leave the city with a military escort, after a U.S. commander gave the crowd "one final chance." The rest retreated into Sarai, vowing to take their chances.

DOJ_NMG_0003220

"A lot of people are just barricading themselves in, which is a big mistake," said Staff Sgt. George Kakeletris, a psychological operations soldier who drove a Humvee all day up and down the avenue, which the military calls Bel Air, blaring messages in Arabic from speakers mounted on the roof.

About 5,000 U.S. and Iraqi soldiers entered Tall Afar four days ago in an offensive aimed at dislodging insurgents. Fighting has been sporadic so far. One U.S. soldier has been killed, along with at least 200 suspected insurgents, said Col. H.R. McMaster, commander of the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, which is leading the assault.

Five civilians were killed Tuesday when a suicide bomb detonated near an Iraqi army checkpoint. Four days of small-scale raids and house-to-house searches have allowed troops to encircle Sarai, where commanders here believe insurgents have massed.

The Iraqi government has asked the military commanders to minimize civilian casualties in this highly volatile region. A U.S.-led invasion of Tall Afar one year ago this month outraged the Turkish government, which argued that the assault victimized Turkmens, who share ethnic ties with Turks. When the U.S. withdrew, insurgents returned, capitalizing on anger over the offensive to consolidate control over the city, which has also been marred by sectarian violence between Sunni and Shiite tribes.

"Steps are being taken to ensure that this is done with the least possible amount of harm done to civilians," McMaster said.

But several Sarai residents said they had been warned that Shiite residents or policemen, who are concentrated in southern Tall Afar, would attack if they left in that direction.

"I would rather die from American bombs in my home with my family than walk south," a man in a gray dishdasha, or robe, and white head scarf explained to soldiers. "People are saying the Shiites will kill you or kidnap you. That is a disgrace."

The evacuation of Sarai, the oldest section of Tall Afar and a web of narrow streets where fighting is expected to be difficult, was supposed to help prevent civilians from being hurt or killed during the offensive's final phase. The military strung nearly a mile of concertina wire along Bel Air, on the northern edge of the neighborhood, on Sunday to encourage people to migrate south, where it had established checkpoints to prevent insurgents from fleeing undetected. Among 200 people who followed instructions and fled south Tuesday, soldiers discovered a man suspected of being an insurgent who was dressed as a woman, complete with prosthetic breasts.

For the military, problems began at 8 a.m. Tuesday when soldiers who had spent the night in an abandoned house awoke to about 300 Sarai residents who had picked their way across the wire and were sitting in the street outside the house, asking how they could get out of Tall Afar.

The soldiers escorted the crowd back to the other side of the wire but found that at least 500 other people were waiting to come across. To block them, they placed tanks and Bradleys along Bel Air and sent soldiers with rifles to the roofs overlooking the street.

Men who identified themselves as tribal leaders of the people attempting to flee would periodically walk across the street -- which is pockmarked with dozens of craters caused by explosions -- stepping gingerly over the wire to negotiate with soldiers. Some residents said that their relatives were too sick or frail to travel south of the city or that their tribe was located in the north so they needed to go in that direction. Others said they actually lived outside Sarai but had spent the night in the neighborhood and were trapped by the concertina wire. The soldiers refused to let them pass.

"I am sure 99 percent of you are good people who are telling us the truth," Capt. Alan Blackburn, commander of the 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment's Eagle Troop, 2nd Squadron, which was policing the area around Bel Air, told one of the men who wanted to go north. "But I am sure that there are a few people in that crowd who are not good people. And we don't have the facilities here to check them. You have to go south."

"I am not going unless you drive me in a tank," the man said. "There are no bad people in Sarai. If you come with me, I will take you to all the houses and you can see. The bad people are the Shiites in the south."

Late in the afternoon, the soldiers relented and offered a compromise. They told the residents they could exit to the north if they agreed to board military trucks bound for a base just outside the city where they could be processed and then released if they proved not to have ties to the insurgency.

"It sounds like a trick to take us south to the Shiites," one man said.

"We will go only if we can drive our own vehicles," another countered.

DOJ_NMG_0003221

About 3 p.m., Lt. Col. Christopher Hickey, the Squadron commander, arrived to make a final plea. "I am trying to help you to get out of a very dangerous situation. You are going to be in danger if you stay here, I am telling you," he said. "Please, this is your last chance."

As he turned away from the crowd, one family emerged, with nine adults carrying baggage and eight children in tow. "Anyone else?" Hickey asked, beckoning. "Okay, then we will save these people," he said, and walked away.

Iraqi Army Takes Control Of Najaf (LAT)

By Ashraf Khalil And Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

NAJAF, Iraq — U.S. troops withdrew from this holy city in southern Iraq on Tuesday, an initial step in the military's effort to pull back from the country's urban centers and turn over authority to Iraqi forces.

Under waving Iraqi flags, U.S. commanders formally turned over control of Forward Operating Base Hotel, a square, concrete-walled American base on the edge of Najaf, a shrine city about 100 miles south of Baghdad that saw intense fighting last year.

"The Iraqi army is operating successfully throughout the region," said Lt. Col. James Oliver, the outgoing base commander, as he handed over the ceremonial keys to the base. "They are fully independent and capable of responding to all security needs. We are now here in a strictly advisory mode."

Najaf's hand-over scarcely could have been imagined last summer, when thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops fought a pitched, three-week battle in the city against the militia forces of radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr after the rebels seized control of several shrines. Hundreds died and much of the Old City was destroyed.

Calm was restored after followers of Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, Iraq's leading Shiite cleric, marched on the city and brokered a resolution. Since then, violence has flared sporadically in Najaf — just two weeks ago, six people were killed when clashes erupted between Sadr's forces and another Shiite faction — but commanders decided the situation had stabilized enough to warrant Tuesday morning's transfer of authority.

The withdrawal is partially symbolic because U.S. forces will maintain a sizable force at Forward Operating Base Duke, a much larger facility about 20 miles away. But the move is an important psychological benchmark because the U.S. military presence in Iraq's holiest city has long been a sore spot for Shiites in Iraq and around the world.

Najaf Police Chief Gen. Abbas Karim Moadel hailed the hand-over as "a historic moment" and a tribute to the growing capability of the Iraqi security forces.

The Hotel base, renamed Camp Karrar, is one of two dozen turned over to the Iraqi security forces so far, U.S. Army spokesman Lt. Col. Steve Boylan said.

Before the transfer ceremony, soldiers of the Shiite-dominated Iraqi battalion chanted, "We stand for Iraq!" and "Saddam is a coward!"

Despite Oliver's statement that the U.S. remained only in an "advisory mode," several Iraqi soldiers said they expected U.S. forces to continue regular patrols in Najaf. It "remains to be seen" whether U.S. patrols would continue, Boylan said.

Some Najaf residents expressed a hope that the American troops would stick around a while longer. A complete American withdrawal from Najaf could spark violent competition among different Shiite factions within the police and army, said Haidar Sayid Salman, owner of a stationery store in the Old City.

"I trust them to fight terrorism, but their loyalty is not to the government," Salman said, referring to Iraqi security forces. "I wish we were ready for [independence], but we're not."

As the transfer of authority in Najaf proceeded Tuesday, violence was reported in the capital and restive Al Anbar province.

In Baghdad, two U.S. soldiers were killed and two others injured Tuesday morning when their vehicle hit a makeshift bomb and rolled over.

On Monday, a Marine assigned to the 2nd Marine Division in Al Anbar was killed by an improvised explosive during combat operations in Ramadi. Names of the dead were withheld pending family notification.

DOJ_NMG_0003222

Fighting continued late Monday night near the Syrian border, where battles broke out last month between two rival tribes, one aligned with the Iraqi government and the other with insurgents led by Jordanian-born militant Abu Musab Zarqawi.

In a midnight attack, U.S. warplanes bombed two small bridges spanning the Euphrates River near Karabila. Military officials said insurgents used the bridges to move foreign fighters and equipment to central Iraq.

Marine F/A-18D jets damaged the bridges with concrete-filled bombs but did not destroy them, the military said.

In a related raid, U.S. troops attacked a nearby safe house that they said was being used by foreign fighters.

Two suspected foreign fighters were killed and three were arrested, U.S. officials said. One coalition soldier was wounded by "friendly fire."

Gunman Kills 'one Of The Best' Explosives Experts (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, September 7, 2005

BAGHDAD — Haqy Asaad made a living snipping wires off bombs around Baghdad.

He was once flung back from the force of a roadside bomb that detonated prematurely, killing a colleague but only slightly wounding him.

In July, he carefully defused an explosives vest worn on a would-be suicide bomber outside the Green Zone, the fortified area housing U.S. and some Iraqi government offices.

He earned the nickname "Robot" from U.S. advisers for his dogged disarming of insurgents' bombs and was profiled in USA TODAY in July.

Asaad, an explosives expert with the Interior Ministry, was killed last week, not by bomb shrapnel but from a gunshot wound to the gut.

Gunmen ambushed him down the road from his home in southern Baghdad on Aug. 30. Officials are investigating the incident but believe Asaad was targeted by insurgents because of his job, said Brig. Hussein Muhssin, his supervisor.

Asaad was the eighth person in his unit to be killed either by bombs or insurgents. "I lost one of the best members of our department," Muhssin said. "He was so devoted to his work, very daring, brave and smart. But he was always in a rush. I warned him so many times our work needs to be cautious, accurate."

U.S. troops operating in Iraq are working to hand over security responsibilities to Iraqi units such as Asaad's. An increasing number of Iraqi troops are manning checkpoints, policing streets, leading raids on suspected insurgent hide-outs and disarming roadside bombs.

Unlike U.S. troops, however, who live in heavily fortified camps, many Iraqi security personnel return home each night to regular neighborhoods, leaving them susceptible to attacks from guerrillas.

Asaad, 38, was part of the 13-member Criminal Investigations Directorate/Explosives Ordnance Detachment. He was paid the equivalent of $330 month, a large salary by Iraqi standards, to disarm roadside bombs and car bombs discovered before they detonated.

Asaad had worked as an explosives expert with the Interior Ministry under Saddam Hussein. He lost his job in 2003, when former members of the ruling Baath Party were expunged from government under the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority, Muhssin said. But U.S. military officials rehired him last fall and dispatched him to Florida for explosives training, he said.

Armed with little more than a pocket tool, Asaad grew adept at defusing roadside bombs, the weapon of choice for insurgents, Muhssin said. He learned how the devices worked and would mouth the common Muslim refrain — "There is no god but Allah, and Mohammed is the messenger of Allah" — before each crucial snip, Asaad said in the USA TODAY article.

Each month, he would hand over to U.S. explosives experts about 120 munitions — including mortar and artillery shells — collected from defused roadside bombs, said Maj. Alayne Conway, a spokeswoman with the Army's 3rd Infantry Division, which worked with Asaad.

"I can't just leave these bombs in all these neighborhoods," Asaad said in July. "I want to live in a peaceful Iraq someday."

DOJ_NMG_0003223

In July, Asaad neutralized a bomb worn by a would-be suicide bomber. The bomber had been hit with shrapnel from another suicide bomber, leaving him nearly unconscious. Asaad disarmed the bomb and slipped the vest off the assailant to the cheers of U.S. and Iraqi personnel watching from a distance near the main entrance to the Green Zone.

"He was setting a standard for other Iraqis to follow," Conway said. "He knew that if he didn't do it, no one else would."

Asaad's success at his job was also making him a target among insurgents. He had received several threats the past few months, Muhssin said.

The latest one, scribbled on a sheet of paper and dropped in the garden outside his home last month, called him a "traitor and spy" and warned he would be killed if he didn't quit his job, Muhssin said.

On Aug. 30, Asaad called in sick, complaining of stomach pains. As he took a walk from his home in Baghdad's Dora neighborhood, witnesses saw two cars full of men, their faces concealed behind scarves, approach Asaad, Muhssin said. One jumped out and shot Asaad in the abdomen.

Asaad's wife called the police and accompanied her husband to Baghdad's Yarmouk Hospital, Muhssin said. In the back seat of the police car, Asaad told her to take good care of herself and their three children, ages 8, 15 and 17.

He died upon arrival at the hospital.

Intimidation, Attacks Take Toll On Contractors In Iraq (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, September 7, 2005

BAGHDAD — Attacks on contractors working on U.S.-funded projects in August reached one of the highest levels in the past year.

Insurgents killed seven contractors and injured 11 last month, according to the U.S. Project and Contracting Office in Baghdad. Sixteen more contractors were suspected or confirmed kidnapped.

"August was real bad," said Karen Durham-Aguilera, director of programs in the contracting office. "We've had to stop projects because of it."

August was the second most violent month since the contracting office began keeping records on the violence in September 2004. The worst was November, with nine deaths.

Most of those attacked were Iraqis working on U.S.-funded projects. Of the 34 people who were killed, wounded or went missing in August, 32 were Iraqis. None was American. Iraqi contractors, who rarely have security, are more vulnerable to attack than U.S. and some foreign contractors, who generally travel in armored convoys with armed security.

An important part of U.S. strategy in Iraq is to rebuild its aging infrastructure as a way of winning over Iraqis and undermining the insurgency. But insurgents are interfering with this by targeting contractors.

Security costs have chewed away at the $18.4 billion appropriated by Congress last year for reconstruction in Iraq. Last year, $5 billion of that was redirected to training and equipping Iraq's security forces, a move that resulted in the cancellation of some projects and scaling back others.

"Security is our biggest challenge," said Brig. Gen. William McCoy, an Army Corps of Engineers commander in Iraq. "We're losing a lot of contractors to a campaign of intimidation and terror."

Most recently, an Iraqi contractor recruiting security guards for reconstruction projects in Mosul was kidnapped last week and later killed, said Lt. Col. Stanley Heath, an Army Corps of Engineers spokesman.

In another incident, a supervisor for a Fallujah police station project was killed in his home on Aug. 19. The murder of the Iraqi supervisor prompted the contractor to halt construction on that and three other Fallujah police stations, Heath said.

A terrorist known as Abu Bakr, who leads a splinter cell of al-Qaeda in Iraq, specializes in disrupting reconstruction and is behind many of the attacks, McCoy said.

"He goes to sites, handing out workers a letter saying, 'I know where you live, and I'll kill you and your family,' " McCoy said. "He's out there kidnapping and killing these people."

Despite the threat, reconstruction projects continue. The Army Corps of Engineers says more than 1,700 projects have been completed since June 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0003224

Sadr City Success Story (LAT)

By T. Christian Miller

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

BAGHDAD — Crammed into armored Humvees heaving with weapons, Lt. Col. S. Jamie Gayton and his soldiers were greeted by a surprising sight as they rolled into one of Baghdad's poorest neighborhoods.

Men stood and waved. Women smiled. Children flashed thumbs-up signs as the convoy rumbled across the potholed streets of Sadr City.

It was a far more welcoming scene than the urban war zone of a year ago, when U.S. troops and black-clad guerrilla fighters battled in the narrow alleys of the squalid slum.

"We're making a huge impact," Gayton said as his men pulled up to a sewer station newly repaired with U.S. funds. "It has been incredibly safe, incredibly quiet and incredibly secure."

Sadr City has become one of the rare success stories of the U.S. reconstruction effort, say local residents, Iraqi and U.S. officials. Although vast swaths remain blighted, the neighborhood of 2 million mostly impoverished Shiites is one of the calmest in Baghdad. One U.S. soldier has been killed and one car bomb detonated in the last year, the military says.

The improvements are the result of an intense effort in the wake of the street battles last August with fighters loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr. Within a month, U.S. officials decided to make Sadr City a showcase for rebuilding, and increased spending to $805 million in a neighborhood long neglected under Saddam Hussein.

Having covered the U.S. reconstruction effort in Iraq for the last 22 months, I decided to take a measure of progress by going back to the same people I interviewed last August, in addition to talking with U.S. and Iraqi officials involved in the program.

Their stories provide insight into why the rebuilding of Sadr City is an impressive, if imperfect, accomplishment in Iraq, where many projects remain incomplete and U.S. promises unfulfilled.

Unlike elsewhere in Iraq, where the reconstruction fell under the purview of a hodgepodge of U.S. civilian agencies, the American military provided sustained, focused leadership in a limited geographic area. That focus provided the oversight needed to coordinate the military's efforts with those of the U.S. Agency for International Development and the Pentagon's Project and Contracting Office, the primary reconstruction agencies.

The rebuilding also held more immediate significance among mid-level commanders in the field than among higher-level Pentagon officials preoccupied with fighting the war. The field officers focused on short-term, high-visibility projects such as cleaning up trash and digging wells, instead of massive new water treatment plants or power stations that take years to build. They also hired local Iraqi contractors, who in turn employed many of the militia members who had once battled U.S. troops.

Finally, unlike the U.S. multinationals contracted to build large infrastructure projects, the military did not have to rely on expensive security contractors for protection. That enabled soldiers to more easily communicate with Iraqis, monitor progress and overcome problems.

The results can be seen in the life of Ahmed Kadhem, who spent much of August 2004 huddled with his family inside their home as the war raged outside. The family had limited electricity, no water and no sewer connection.

A year later, his family remains without those basic services. But he has seen improvements all around him. And he is ready to give the Americans a chance.

"There is some movement," he said last month. "People have taken note."

The effects of the U.S. effort were apparent on a recent visit to Sadr City.

At the newly repaired sewer station, a local family guarding it greeted Gayton like an old friend; he had visited several times before.

Haita Zamel showed Gayton how the local sewer authority was fixing a problem that had developed in one pump. She proudly showed off the small home that had been built on the site to replace a dilapidated trailer where her family of six once lived. She even asked Gayton for computer software to teach English to her children.

"When you tell me something, I know you'll do it," she said, clutching tightly at the white scarf covering her head. "To the last day of our life, we are with you. Us and all of our neighbors."

DOJ_NMG_0003225

Gayton and his men clambered back into the Humvees and moved on. A few minutes later, he ordered his driver to make a random stop in front of a group of stores where water lines had been installed. He wanted to make sure the water was flowing.

As a crowd gathered, the shop owners acknowledged better water. But they complained about electricity, saying that power lines were being installed at nearby shops but not theirs.

Gayton smiled. The military had divided Sadr City into four segments, each targeted for different improvements such as new sewers or clean water. That way, each area saw the improvements going on in the others, providing proof of progress and an incentive to remain cooperative.

"Everything happens one step at a time," Gayton told the men.

"We have to cooperate with the Americans. We know," said shopkeeper Amed Ali Ibrahim.

But the continuing risks were evident a moment later. As Gayton and his men roared away, one soldier, fearing a possible car bomb, fired into the ground to warn a vehicle that was getting too close.

Still, at each of half a dozen stops, the complaints were tempered by friendly banter and acknowledgment of improvements.

Residents and workers praised a health clinic being built at another site. But then they pointed in anger at a huge puddle of sickly green sewage blocking the entrance. Gayton promised to prod the Iraqis to make repairs.

"We are suffering," one worker, Jabbar Abed Khalef, told Gayton. Batting away flies, Khalef held up his shoes, coated in black muck. "Our children are sick. The road is blocked. It's a disaster."

But a moment later, Khalef was praising the U.S. for working more quickly than the Iraqi government.

"We know that if the Americans don't do it, the Iraqi government will take a long time," he said.

At the end of the run, Gayton appeared pleased. A tall, fit man with an easy command of figures, he appeared excited whenever the convoy passed a garbage truck at work. He said the investment made by the U.S. had paid dividends.

Last year, soldiers at Gayton's base were the target of more than 1,000 mortar strikes. This year, there have been none. There have been a handful of attacks on U.S. troops, mostly gunfire, and no clashes so far with Sadr's militiamen.

Gayton does not claim that the reconstruction alone has led to the decrease in violence. And he acknowledges that the militia members may well rise up again if commanded by Sadr.

But Gayton believes that fewer people will heed the call this time.

"Our goal is to provide them with hope so they see that tomorrow is better than today," he said. "We want them to look to the left and the right and say, 'Hey, joining hands with the [Iraqi] government and the coalition [forces] is going to help us more so than anybody else.' "

Kadhem doesn't deny progress. But it's easy enough for him to see the problems that remain.

His home is a one-story cinderblock house just off Sadr City's main drag. The potholed boulevard slices through the 8-mile-square district, a ragged sprawl of low-slung homes and dingy shops. Street vendors hawk everything from fat, ripe watermelons to AK-47s. Cars, trucks and horse-drawn wagons choke intersections. Sheep and goats wander through the filth.

Last August, Kadhem and his family of four were trapped in their house, a long, narrow structure with a threadbare rug, bare concrete floors and a fluorescent light that flickered to life during the rare occasions when electricity flowed.

The frequent blackouts meant that the temperature inside soared to 130 degrees. The stench of a pool of sewage just outside wafted in on the occasional hot, humid breeze.

"They said they were going to fix many things, and still nothing has happened," Kadhem said at the time, with fighting in the streets outside. "If the Americans had done well, most people would be with the Americans and we would not have these problems."

A year later, the blackouts are more frequent; his water remains undrinkable. The pond of sewage is gone — but that's only because Kadhem and his neighbors took up a collection and paid a private contractor to come and clean it up.

"No government has helped us," said Kadhem, a slight man with a Van Dyke pointy beard and a quick, broad smile. "We have helped the government."

Kadhem remains suspicious of the American presence in Iraq. Still, when members of Sadr's militia came around with a petition demanding the withdrawal of the Americans, Kadhem and his wife did not sign.

DOJ_NMG_0003226

"We refused to sign not because we love the occupiers or to be your friends, but I really believe that if the Americans leave Iraq now, it'll be chaos," Kadhem said. "Nobody loves the occupier. But there's no alternative."

Despite his hesitance, Kadhem acknowledged that things had gotten better.

His four children can play in streets now free from fighting. Among other evident improvements, Kadhem and his wife, both teachers, have seen their schools painted, books and supplies donated and new classrooms and bathrooms built.

But Kadhem has benefited most in two ways: First, and most important, Hussein's ouster has meant new opportunities for once-repressed Shiite Muslims. And second, his pay increased tenfold because of a state worker salary hike implemented under L. Paul Bremer III, the U.S. civilian administrator in Iraq at the time.

Kadhem took the extra money and his newfound freedom and decided to open a business.

A talented carpenter, he opened a workshop in northern Baghdad, where services are markedly better because they weren't subjected to deliberate neglect during Hussein's rule. The streets are paved, and clean water comes from the tap.

He now spends every free moment from his teaching career at the store, a narrow garage on the first floor of a home in a middle-class neighborhood of Sunnis and Shiites. In one corner sits a graceful, curved headboard made of wood imported from Malaysia. In another sits a partially completed bedroom set, built from a picture in a catalog.

On one recent morning, several customers stopped by to check on the progress of their orders. Kadhem's son and two other employees flitted in and out, carrying wood, sodas and supplies. Sawdust flew through the air and a generator chugged to power a band saw.

Kadhem proudly showed off his venture. As a young man, he had always wanted to be an artist. Now, he was finally putting his skills to use in woodworking.

Kadhem said that for the first time, he could imagine a future for his children better than his own.

"Things are different. Before, we felt afraid. Now, there is freedom and we feel there will be a solution and it will be better," he said. "At this stage, we have to endure.

"The change from a dictatorship to a democracy is not easy."

Iraq President Says Saddam Confessed To Crimes; U.S. Hits Bridges (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, September 7, 2005

BAGHDAD — Iraq's president said Tuesday that Saddam Hussein had confessed to killings and other crimes committed during his regime.

President Jalal Talabani told Iraqi television that he had been informed by an investigating judge that “he was able to extract confessions from Saddam's mouth” about crimes “such as executions” that the ousted leader had personally ordered.

Saddam's lawyers couldn't be reached for comment.

Talabani said that some of the confessions involved cases under investigation but he gave no specifics. Saddam faces his first trial Oct. 19 for his alleged role in the massacre of Shiites in Dujail in 1982. He could face the death penalty if convicted.

Also Tuesday, the U.S. military said four more Americans had been killed in action. One U.S. soldier was killed Monday in Tal Afar. Two others died Tuesday in a roadside bombing in Baghdad, and another was killed the day before near Ramadi west of Baghdad, U.S. command said.

The military also said Marine jets on Tuesday attacked two bridges across the Euphrates River near the Syrian border to prevent insurgents from moving foreign fighters and munitions toward Baghdad and other cities.

The airstrikes took place near Karabilah, about 185 miles west of Baghdad and one of a cluster of towns near the border used by foreign fighters to slip into Iraq.

Marine F/A-18 jets dropped bombs shortly after midnight on two Euphrates bridges. Hours later, a Marine jet destroyed a building used by insurgents to fire on U.S. and Iraqi forces, a military statement said.

One Iraqi soldier was wounded when Marines and Iraqi troops stormed the building, killing two foreigners and arresting three others, the statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0003227

In Tal Afar, civilians were fleeing the city, 260 miles northwest of Baghdad, where U.S. and Iraqi soldiers have launched an offensive. Plumes of smoke could be seen rising from the city, which sits along a major trade and smuggling route to Syria.

"The people are suffering from lack of food stuff, drinkable water and blankets," said Hazem Mohammed Ali, deputy chairman of a Turkomen association in Tal Afar.

To the south, U.S. forces handed the Iraqis control of the Shiite city, Najaf, once a scene of bitter conflict between American troops and militiamen. The transfer of U.S. Forward Operating Base Hotel means Iraqis are fully responsible for security in the city.

Oil-For-Food Probe: UN Needs Overhaul To Stop Fraud (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 6 -- The U.N. Security Council and Secretary General Kofi Annan failed to adequately manage and police the $64 billion U.N. oil-for-food program, creating a permissive environment that enabled Saddam Hussein's government in Iraq to take billions of dollars in illicit kickbacks, according to the findings of a U.N. investigation to be released Wednesday.

The report by Paul A. Volcker, the former U.S. Federal Reserve chairman who heads the U.N. Independent Inquiry Committee, will portray a largely dysfunctional, leaderless international effort to operate the humanitarian relief effort for Iraq from December 1996 until the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003. Volcker will urge world leaders attending a Sept. 14 summit on U.N. reform to support steps to strengthen the quality of independent oversight of the organization's spending.

"To settle for less, to permit delay and dilution, will invite failure, further erode public support, and dishonor the ideals upon which the United Nations is built," says the preface of Volcker's report.

The document, which is expected to exceed 700 pages, is the fourth and most comprehensive report by Volcker's panel and will summarize previously published findings while offering new details of abuses in the program.

Among those conclusions, the report will say that Iraq's neighbors, including Jordan, Turkey and Syria, violated U.N. sanctions by smuggling billions of dollars of Iraqi oil from Hussein's government, U.N. sources said. The report will also fault key Security Council members, including France and Russia, for impeding efforts to reform the oil-for-food program. And it will criticize the United States for doing too little to discourage allies in the region from violating the sanctions and by abetting the smuggling of Iraqi oil by Jordan immediately before the invasion, the sources said.

"The committee report documents how differences among member states impeded decisions, tolerated large-scale smuggling, and aided and abetted grievous weaknesses in administrative practices within the [U.N.] Secretariat," says the preface, which was released Tuesday. "As the years passed, reports spread of waste, inefficiency, and corruption, even within the United Nations itself. Some was rumor and exaggeration, but much -- too much -- has turned out to be true."

The U.N. program was established to allow Iraq, which was under a U.N. trade embargo following its 1990 invasion of Kuwait, to sell oil and use the proceeds to buy food and medicine and pay billions of dollars in war reparations. The report to be issued Wednesday says the program achieved "important successes" by improving nutritional and health standards and by undermining Hussein's efforts to build weapons of mass destruction. But it says the United Nations allowed Hussein to abuse the program by bribing U.N. officials and by forcing hundreds of companies to pay kickbacks in exchange for the right to trade in oil and humanitarian goods. The abuses cast a "dark shadow" over the program, Volcker's report says.

The oil-for-food scandal has triggered federal criminal investigations and several congressional probes of the United Nations' management of the program. The U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York has charged two Russian nationals with wire fraud and money laundering. One of them, a U.N. procurement officer who has pleaded guilty, was cited in a previous Volcker report for soliciting a bribe from a Swiss company seeking to do business in the oil-for-food program and for receiving more than $950,000 in bribes from contractors in other U.N. programs.

Volcker's new report will sharply criticize Annan's oversight of the oil program as lax, citing "serious instances of illicit, unethical, and corrupt behavior" by U.N. officials under his watch. The report will draw attention to administrative shortcomings by the nine U.N. humanitarian agencies, including the U.N. Development Program and Habitat, the main housing agency. It also will accuse the 15-nation Security Council of providing "uncertain, wavering direction" to U.N. officials running the program. "Neither the Security Council nor the Secretariat leadership was clearly in command," the preface states.

DOJ_NMG_0003228

Annan conceded in an interview with the BBC on Monday that "mistakes were made" in managing the program, but he insisted that there were "concessions that had to be made to get Saddam Hussein to agree."

"I accept responsibility for inadequacies and failures," he told the BBC. But "when it comes to Iraq, on this issue, no one is entirely covered in glory. . . . Honestly, I wish we had never been given that program, and I wish the U.N. will never be asked to undertake that kind of program again."

The Volcker panel singled out Annan's son, Kojo, for abusing diplomatic privileges extended to his father. The report claims that Kojo Annan received a $3,000 loan in 1998 to buy a $39,000 Mercedes-Benz from an executive of a Swiss company, Cotecna, that was trying to do business with the United Nations through the oil-for-food program, according to a member of Volcker's staff.

The report will also assert that Kojo Annan obtained thousands of dollars in diplomatic benefits -- including breaks on taxes and customs fees -- from the transaction by falsely claiming that he was purchasing the car for his father, according to the staff member. The sale was first reported by Time magazine. Efforts to reach Kojo Annan's attorney last night were unsuccessful.

Panel Hits U.N. On Oil-for-food Failures (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

NEW YORK -- An outside accounting of the U.N. oil-for-food program strongly criticizes the world body for failures ranging from a lack of oversight by the Secretariat to political interference from the Security Council, which established it.

The Independent Inquiry Committee (IIC) is expected to formally absolve U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan in the awarding of a key contract to his son's former employer when it issues its final report today.

But a five-page preface, which became public yesterday, makes clear that the commission, headed by former Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker, will not spare Mr. Annan's administration from a harsh assessment of its management capabilities.

The 1,000-page report comes only a week before world leaders gather at the United Nations for a summit devoted to strengthening and defining the organization for the 21st century.

"The committee reports reveal serious instances of illicit, unethical and corrupt behavior with the United Nations," according to the IIC, which also finds "wholesale corruption" by companies doing business with Saddam Hussein.

The IIC was created by Mr. Annan, authorized by the Security Council, and financed with $35 million from the same aid program it is investigating.

In three previous reports, the IIC investigated the quest for kickbacks and bribes by former U.N. officials, detailed misuse of funds and document-shredding by senior officials, and chipped away at management structures that failed to catch wrongdoing.

Today's report will examine the roles of the U.N.'s administrative staff, the Secretariat, in managing the program, and the nine primary U.N. agencies that carried out the humanitarian and reconstruction work in Iraq.

It also will address the political sensitivities that compromised the Security Council's ability to make important decisions; the "grievous absence" of effective auditing and management controls; and the inability to track expenditures across agencies and programs.

"The inescapable conclusion from the committee's work is that the U.N. organization needs thoroughgoing reform -- and it needs it urgently," the authors conclude.

The panel suggests that the secretary-general create a post of chief operating officer to oversee administration and coordination.

The Security Council, which winnowed Iraq's shopping list and vetted contracts from vendors through a committee, comes in for plenty of criticism.

From the beginning, the council allowed Saddam's regime too much power over the design and implementation of the program, it says. In an unusual move, diplomats were allowed to control program operations rather than just give advice.

At the end of the day, the IIC finds, neither the council nor the Secretariat was in clear control.

"When things went awry -- and they surely did when troublesome conflicts arose between political objectives and administrative effectiveness -- decisions were delayed, bungled or simply shunned," the report says.

U.N. officials yesterday declined to comment on the preface. But Mr. Annan told the British Broadcasting Corp. this week that the organization had been ill-equipped to take on a project as complex as the oil-for-food program.

"I suspect that there will be lots of criticism," Mr Annan said. "Honestly, I wish we were never given that program."

The IIC, found that the program did, in fact, accomplish its two primary objectives -- feeding ordinary Iraqis who were hurt by U.N. sanctions, and depriving Saddam of weapons of mass destruction.

But with charges of waste, inefficiency and corruption "those successes fell under an increasingly dark shadow," the preface says.

Although the report will run close to 1,000 pages, the panel stresses that investigators from 28 countries still don't have a complete picture.

"Constraints of time, concerns for personnel security in Iraq and lack of full cooperation by some member states and individuals means that examination of some parts of the program have been less detailed than others," the forward says.

Annan Failed To Curb Corruption In Iraq's Oil-for-Food Program, Investigators Report (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 6 - A yearlong investigation has concluded that Secretary General Kofi Annan failed to curb corruption and mismanagement at the United Nations, but it did not find evidence to support charges that he improperly influenced the scandal-tainted oil-for-food program.

"His sins were ones of omission basically; there were things that he might well have done and should have done that he didn't do," a senior investigator said Tuesday.

Typical of the lapses, the investigator said, was Mr. Annan's failure to look more thoroughly into the activities of his son, Kojo Annan, to see if his working for a company that received an oil-for-food contract posed a conflict of interest for his father.

The committee, led by Paul A. Volcker, a former chairman of the Federal Reserve Bank, found no evidence that Kofi Annan knew about the contract, but it found instances where Kojo Annan did try to influence it, and in general exploited his father's name, the investigator said.

In one incident, he said, Kojo Annan bought a new Mercedes using his father's name, which yielded him a diplomatic discount and enabled him to import the vehicle to Ghana without paying import duty.

The report, to be released on Wednesday, also details an instance in which Mr. Annan's predecessor, Boutros Boutros-Ghali of Egypt, was the target of an effort to exploit the oil-for-food program.

It says that an Iraqi-American businessman, Samir Vincent, and a Korean lobbyist, Tongsun Park, tried to pass $1 million to Mr. Boutros-Ghali but that there was no evidence that Mr. Boutros-Ghali had received or agreed to receive the money.

The report says that Iraq also tried to secure another high level contact at the United Nations in 1997 when Mr. Park invested $1 million of Iraqi money in a company controlled by Maurice Strong, a Canadian entrepreneur then serving as Mr. Annan's coordinator for United Nations reform. The committee said it found no evidence that Mr. Strong himself was involved.

Mr. Vincent pleaded guilty earlier this year to federal charges of illegal lobbying for Iraq. Mr. Park, who was also charged, is believed to be in South Korea. Mr. Strong stepped aside from his post as Mr. Annan's special envoy to North Korea because of past associations with Mr. Park, and the United Nations announced in July that his contract would not be renewed.

Mr. Volcker is to present the results of his $34 million inquiry to Mr. Annan and the Security Council in an open hearing on Wednesday.

The general conclusion of the 860-page report, the fourth and most definitive from Mr. Volcker's panel, is that the United Nations is inefficient, over-politicized, corrupt and in desperate need of immediate repair.

"The inescapable conclusion from the committee's work is that the United Nations organization needs thoroughgoing reform - and it needs it urgently," says the report's five-page preface, which was made public by The Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0003230

The report comes a week before more than 170 presidents and prime ministers are due at the United Nations to update goals from the 2000 millennium summit conference and to approve sweeping changes to the way the United Nations is run.

The much disputed $64 billion oil-for-food program was intended to ease the effects of sanctions on the 27 million Iraqis by supplying them with food and medicine in exchange for letting Saddam Hussein export oil. But its manipulation by Mr. Hussein and illicit profits it generated for the Iraqi government caused it to become a lightning rod for critics of the United Nations, and provoked calls from Republican lawmakers in Washington for Mr. Annan's resignation.

Mr. Annan's spokesman, Stéphane Dujarric of France, said Tuesday that Mr. Annan intended to fill out his term, which ends in late 2006.

The report, while criticizing Mr. Annan, acknowledges that the United Nations Charter gives him the responsibility of being the chief administrative officer without the resources to meet the demands.

"Whatever the founders had in mind, the secretary general - any secretary general - has not been chosen for his managerial or administrative skills, nor has he been provided with a structure and instruments conducive to strong executive oversight and control," the preface says.

In an allusion to the widespread cronyism at the United Nations, it says that a secretary general must see to it that personnel choices are based on "professional competence" rather than on "narrow political interests of member states."

"The reality is that the secretary general has come to be viewed as chief diplomatic and political agent of the United Nations," the preface says. "The present secretary general is widely respected for precisely those qualities. In these turbulent times, those responsibilities tend to be all-consuming. The record amply reflects consequent administrative failings."

The investigator who described the report said the committee had produced conclusive figures showing that the amount of Mr. Hussein's profits from kickbacks and surcharges connected to the oil-for-food program amounted to $10.99 billion, while smuggling amounted to $1.8 billion.

The preface said the committee had found "instances of illicit, unethical and corrupt behavior" among lower ranking United Nations staff members in the field, but the investigator said the report would not detail it.

"You had thousands of new employees over there, hired on the spot without much vetting, with transactions made only in cash," he said. "You're living in a corrupt environment, you're pushed by political pressures, but whether senior officials are involved is another question. We're neutral on that. We have not been able to pin any of it down."

According to the preface, "wholesale corruption" took place among private companies that were manipulated by Mr. Hussein's government. The committee plans a separate report next month detailing the companies and the abuses.

In the only instances of corruption that the Volcker committee has uncovered at headquarters, Benon V. Sevan of Cyprus, the former executive director of the program, was accused last month of banking at least $147,000 in kickbacks and a procurement officer, Aleksandr V. Yakovlev of Russia, was found to have solicited a bribe, unsuccessfully, from a program contractor.

Given the United Nations' international responsibilities, it is critical that it combat corruption, the preface said.

"Corrosive corruption, private and public, has been far too common, not least in the member states in which the United Nations has programs of economic and humanitarian assistance," the preface said.

Standing in the way of this, it said, was the "absence of a strong organizational ethic, an ethic that should permeate at its leadership and staff if the United nations is to command the respect upon which its work depends."

The investigator said he had sometimes asked himself whether the charges of corruption had been exaggerated.

"You can say, what the hell did you expect in a program this complicated, an international organization, political differences, it's kind of run of the mill and after all, the program was kind of successful getting food in there, maintaining sanctions," he said.

"But then another point of view is that the U.N. is the U.N., and they better try to meet very high standards because, with the sheer corruption in this world, maybe a good example by the U.N., considering all the corrupt places they have to work in, would help."

U.N. Naysayers Greet 60th Anniversary With Biting Documentary (NYSUN)

By Meghan Clyne

New York Sun, September 7, 2005

As the United Nations prepares to commence the 60th session of the General Assembly next week with a three-day summit on institutional reform, some of the world body's critics have readied suggestions of their own. An hour-long documentary film, "Broken Promises: The United Nations at 60," uses this year's milestone as an occasion to chronicle the organization's failings since its inception, and to raise questions about whether the world body should perpetuate itself for another 60 years.

The film, set for nationwide release this month, is the brainchild of an actor and activist, Ronald Silver, and the president of the Citizens United Foundation, David Bossie. Citizens United is a Washington, D.C.-based conservative advocacy organization that, among its other activities, produced "Celsius 41.11," one of the documentary films to emerge last year as a rebuttal to Michael Moore's "Fahrenheit 911." Mr. Bossie is a former chief investigator for the House of Representatives.

In "Broken Promises," Mr. Bossie turns his investigative instincts to the United Nations, to provide a "broad look ... to show just what the U.N. has successfully and not so successfully done in the last 60 years." The film, Mr. Bossie said, documents the world body's failures to intervene in massive human-rights abuses over the decades, and touches on recent financial scandals, including oil for food and the organization's proposed $1.2 billion renovation of its headquarters at Turtle Bay.

The documentary, which Mr. Bossie said cost around a half-million dollars to make, contains interviews with a diverse assortment of commentators. They include an Israeli politician and former Soviet dissident, Natan Sharansky; a former chief of the U.N.'s peacekeeping mission in Rwanda during the 1994 genocide, Romeo Dallaire, who is a retired Canadian general; a former Senate majority leader, George Mitchell, who, along with a former House speaker, Newt Gingrich, serves on an American congressional task force on U.N. reform, and the spokesman for Secretary-General Kofi Annan, Stephane Dujarric.

Among the issues the film addresses are the United Nations' failure to prevent genocide in Cambodia, in Bosnia, in Rwanda, and, most recently, in Dar fur, and the world body's failure to stand up to the murderous regime of the former Iraqi tyrant Saddam Hussein. The world body's treatment of Israel, too, is discussed, including its determination in 1975, in the form of resolution 3379, that Zionism is racism. Closer to home, the documentary features coverage of the organization's proposed renovation plans and the opposition from state lawmakers that has stalled U.N. hopes of expanding the Turtle Bay campus.

Two of the key players in that drama are also featured in the film: New York State Senator Martin Golden, Republican of Brooklyn, and the developer Donald Trump. Messrs. Golden and Trump testified before Congress about the renovation project in July, when Mr. Trump said the proposed costs of the refurbishment were exorbitant and offered to manage the project himself for a fraction of the price.

Mr. Bossie said "Broken Promises" would be the first documentary to turn a critical eye toward the world body, adding that he hoped it would bring another perspective to the discussions surrounding the 60th anniversary. Mr. Silver said that while U.N. reform has been a subject of ample discussion among journalists, politicians, and academics of late, part of the film's goal was to include in that dialogue American taxpayers, who, since they shoulder 22% of the world body's operating costs, have a special interest in ensuring that it lives up to its promises.

"We wanted to make it watchable and enjoyable regardless of how much information people had about the U.N.," Mr. Silver told The New York Sun, adding that he hoped a broadly accessible film would heighten public interest as debate over the United Nations escalates in coming weeks, with the imminent release of a report by the former Federal Reserve Board chairman, Paul Volcker, on the oil-for-food investigation, and of a report from the International Atomic Energy Agency on Iran's nuclear-weapons program.

Mr. Silver, in a phone interview Saturday, said his desire to document the United Nations' shortcomings on film was born of a long-running disillusionment. Growing up in Manhattan, Mr. Silver said, the United Nations was for him a source of pride, a nearby symbol of triumph over tyranny and a beacon of global optimism.

"The U.N. meant the birth of Israel," Mr. Silver added, referring to U.N. resolution 181, which in 1947 established the state of Israel.

Even in better, earlier times, however, the institutional makeup of the United Nations boded ill for the world body's ability to carry out its stated mission, Mr. Silver said. "Broken Promises," he said, examines some of these structural flaws, which, over decades, resulted in the United Nations' corruption. He cited, in particular, giving two of five permanent seats on the Security Council to the Soviet Union and Communist China.

DOJ_NMG_0003232

Messrs. Bossie and Silver both said "Broken Promises" is not intended to propagate a particular political agenda, to advocate elimination of the United Nations, or to act as a hit piece on the world body. Indeed, Mr. Silver said he was surprised and impressed by the level of cooperation from the United Nations, which granted the production team extensive access to its Turtle Bay facilities, Mr. Silver said.

The public will have its first glimpse of the film on DVD next week, when the documentary is released to coincide with the opening of the General Assembly on September 13, Mr. Silver said. The New York City release will take place September 27 at the AMC Empire Theater in Times Square. Those unable to catch the film on the big screen can visit www.brokenpromisesmovie.com, Mr. Bossie said, where, starting next week, they will be able to download a trailer and film clips. The Web site will also be a portal for ordering the DVD, which sells for $19.99 and will be available in stores next month.

U.S. Resident Freed From Baghdad Prison (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

An Iraqi-born U.S. resident was released from a U.S. military prison in Baghdad yesterday, two days before a scheduled hearing on why the U.S. government had continued to detain him after clearing him of involvement in a mortar attack.

The government's decision to free Numan Adnan Al-Kaby comes less than a week after lawyers filed suit demanding his release. A federal judge had scheduled a hearing on Al-Kaby's case for Thursday afternoon, but the government yesterday asked that it be canceled and the complaint be dismissed as moot.

Al-Kaby was arrested in April in Baghdad after a mortar attack on U.S. forces, but in July a military tribunal concluded he was not involved and recommended his release. In court papers filed yesterday, Justice Department lawyers acknowledged that Al-Kaby had been declared not guilty, but they said the military received additional information shortly after that decision and completed its investigation Friday -- two days after Al-Kaby's lawsuit was filed. Officials formally concluded he could be released to his family in Iraq yesterday.

Al-Kaby was a neighbor in prison of Cyrus Kar, an Iranian American filmmaker who was arrested in May on suspicion that he was involved in a terrorist plot. Like Al-Kaby, Kar was cleared by a military panel and recommended for release but remained in jail until days after his family filed suit in July.

One of Al-Kaby's attorneys, Mark Rosenbaum of the American Civil Liberties Union's Southern California chapter, called the government's explanation "a baldfaced lie" and charged that the government was covering up a "huge scandal" involving illegal detention of potentially hundreds or thousands of innocent people in Iraq.

"It certainly makes you wonder how many more people have been sitting in military jails for weeks and months after they know the person is innocent," said Arthur Spitzer of the ACLU's Washington office.

The Justice Department declined to comment.

Iraq And The Arabs (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

One of the world's unremarked scandals is how little help Iraq's new government is getting from its fellow Arabs. And now Iraq's elected leaders are becoming increasingly vocal about that fact. On Monday Iraq President Jalal Talabani scored Arab leaders for their minimal-to-nonexistent diplomatic presence in Baghdad, and their failure to offer condolences or help in the wake of last week's stampede that left nearly 1,000 dead.

"We stood with our Arab brothers in their hard times," he said. "For instance, we sent a letter expressing our condolences on the terrorist attack which claimed a lot of innocent lives in Sharm el Sheik."

It's a fairly open secret, of course, that most Arab autocracies -- even supposedly "moderate" ones like Egypt -- are alarmed at the precedent of a successful Iraqi democracy. Still, it takes chutzpah to declare, as Arab League Secretary-General and former Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa did recently, that Iraq's new constitution is a "dangerous" document. We don't recall the Arab League voicing such concerns about Iraq's old regime, which was run by a man who recognized no limits on his power.

DOJ_NMG_0003233

Encouraging Arab help in Iraq would seem to be a job for the State Department. But if Foggy Bottom isn't up to it, perhaps the White House should authorize U.S. Ambassador John Bolton to inform Arab nations -- whose heads of state will visit the United Nations next week -- that their relations with the U.S., and especially future economic and military assistance, depend on it.

Baseball In Iraq: As Pastimes Go, It's Anything But (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq - The opening pitch of the Northern Regional Junior Baseball Tournament last March was a slow ball that struck the dirt an inch behind home plate, bounced into the catcher's face mask and knocked him to the ground.

For anyone focusing on details, like skill, it may have seemed an inauspicious start. But to the players and the two dozen spectators, most of whom did not know the difference between a ball and a strike, the moment underscored something far more important: Baseball had come to Iraq.

Founded in the fall of 2003 by Ismael Khalil Ismael, a shop owner in Baghdad, the national league has grown to 26 full-fledged baseball teams in 18 provinces stretching from Nineveh in the north to Basra in the south. Using hand-me-down gloves and other cast-off equipment, much of it donated from the United States, the teams play on sandy lots, rutted pastures and soccer pitches.

"I'm doing it for the history of Iraq," he declared.

If this were the full outline of the league's narrative, it would be a rare, happy story for this troubled country. But like Iraq since the American invasion, the league, after less than two years in existence, has itself been torn by political infighting and charges of malfeasance that have cast its future into doubt.

And as if that were not enough, Mr. Ismael said he had been menaced by people who have who accused him of supporting an American cultural export.

"I'm under huge pressure," he said. "There is no freedom and democracy here. There is only plotting and conspiracy."

Mr. Ismael, 40, a former member of the national judo team, said he first heard of baseball when he was a child. His father had been working with an American contracting company building a dam near the northern city of Sulaimaniya, and the American workers would play.

The sport had also popped up at some private grade schools around the country, he said, though it never extended beyond physical education class.

In 1994, a cousin working at the Iraqi Embassy in Washington, sent him a supply of bats, balls and gloves - "enough for a team," recalled Mr. Ismael, whose physique these days is less outfielder and more home plate umpire.

But fearful that his interest in a decidedly American sport would antagonize Saddam Hussein, he shelved the idea. "My friends advised me not to fulfill my dream because I might be interrogated or put in prison," he recalled on a recent afternoon while sitting in one of four clothes and gift shops he owns in the lobby of the Babylon Hotel.

After the fall of Mr. Hussein's government, Mr. Ismael felt free to start the baseball league. In visits to sports clubs and college campuses, he mustered interest in the new sport, and held his first practice in November 2003.

In July 2004, the National Olympic Committee of Iraq admitted the league as a member and since then has budgeted more than $50,000 to support it. Called the Iraqi Baseball and Softball Federation, the league also includes 15 women's softball teams and a national baseball team, which has yet to play an international game.

The Olympic committee's contribution, Mr. Ismael said, helps to pay for equipment, salaries for himself ($150 per month) and his vice president ($60 per month), a $25 per month honorarium for each player on the national team, team travel and clinics for players, coaches and umpires.

DOJ_NMG_0003234

Mr. Ismael said the amount was not enough to cover all the league's expenses and he says he has contributed thousands of dollars of his own to keep the organization alive. The scarcity of resources is so bad, he said, that teams in Baghdad need to practice on alternate days because there is not enough equipment to go around.

League officials have been particularly conflicted about whether they should approach the most obvious source of financing - the American authorities here - and how they might go about it.

On one hand, Mr. Ismael points out, he desperately needs help, both financial and instructional. But on the other hand, he does not want to appear to be supported by the Americans, thereby inspiring attacks by insurgents.

He has already received menacing cellphone calls and two e-mail notes from strangers questioning his devotion to what one writer, a Saudi man, bitterly called "an imported sport."

That opposition - and the threat of something worse - has put Mr. Ismael in an unfortunate dilemma: a higher profile could invite more problems, yet without promotion the league can not grow.

"I've said this more than once: We are not bringing weapons of mass destruction to Iraq," he sighed. "We're only playing a simple game."

In spite of the threats, he has had surprisingly little trouble finding players. More than 200 people have attended his seminars and clinics, which he offers without charge.

"I like it because it's a new game in Iraq and it's exciting" said Yassir Abdullah, 21, a muscular second baseman on Baghdad's Salam, or Peace, team and a third-year student at the College of Athletic Education at Baghdad University. Like many players, he has caught only glimpses of American baseball in the background of movies.

The league took a bad turn in July when 15 players filed a complaint with the Olympic committee accusing Mr. Ismael of using the league's minibus for personal business and of providing them with substandard food and lodging during a road trip to Sulaimaniya. The committee has opened an investigation into the allegations.

A high-ranking committee official, Salman Abdul Hamza, suggested that the details of the league had probably overwhelmed Mr. Ismael. "He's a hard worker; he's doing a good job," Mr. Hamza said. "But some people may do good things in their job but administratively are not successful."

Mr. Ismael denies the charges and says they are part of an attempted power grab by people envious of his successes. At the same time, he has accused the president of the Olympic committee, Ahmed Assamarai, of underfinancing the sport in retribution for his refusal to allow Mr. Assamarai's son to run the league.

The spokesman for the Olympic committee denied that Mr. Assamarai had ever insisted that his son be put in charge of the league. Mr. Assamarai's son, the spokesman pointed out, lives in Britain.

The new season is supposed to begin sometime in September when the weather begins to cool down - Mr. Ismael said there was no particular opening day. The summer heat has made any regular practices absolutely unbearable, though on a recent afternoon, Mr. Ismael assembled a squad, including several players from the south, to put on a demonstration for a visiting reporter.

The players laid out the bases at the edge of a fallow soccer pitch, where the grass had grown to shin height and was full of dust from sand storms. A herd of cows and sheep grazed nearby. The players drew from a communal stockpile of gloves - most do not own their own - and took turns batting and running the bases.

There were a lot of wild throws, and few hits made it out of the infield. The shortstop was out of position, playing nearly on top of second base, and for some reason everyone referred to the catcher as "the umpire." Many players in the league said they had never seen the sport played by non-Iraqis; even Mr. Ismael has only seen college or professional players from abroad on instructional DVD's and videos.

But there was no shortage of enthusiasm. Ali Muhsen, the 27-year-old captain of the national team, said afterward that he dreamed of one day traveling to the United States with the Iraqi national team and playing the Americans.

Asked if beating the Americans was also part of the plan, he smiled bashfully and shook his head no.

The conversation went on but Mr. Muhsen remained silent, apparently reconsidering his answer.

"Inshallah," he finally said. "I hope."

DOJ_NMG_0003235

Saudis Kill Top Militant, Ending Skirmish With A Qaeda Cell (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

DAMASCUS, Syria, Sept. 6 - Saudi security forces finally overwhelmed a cell of militants holed up in a house in the Persian Gulf city of Dammam on Tuesday, ending a three-day siege. The bloody firefight was the latest in a string of confrontations between militants and security forces throughout the country.

Late Monday, the Interior Ministry announced that security forces had killed two militants on Sunday, including the No. 3 most-wanted militant in Saudi Arabia, Zaid Saad Zaid al-Samari, who was sought in connection with numerous attacks.

The militants took refuge in the seaside house on Sunday night and held security men at bay with heavy arms until Tuesday.

An Interior Ministry source, quoted by SPA, the official Saudi news agency, said security forces completed the operation in the Almubarakia neighborhood of Dammam by midday Tuesday. The agency said 4 policemen had been killed, 10 wounded and an unspecified number of militants killed.

"The security forces are currently securing and clearing the site where burnt remains are scattered," SPA reported.

A spokesman for the ministry said the gunmen were affiliated with a "deviant group," meaning Al Qaeda.

Gunfire and explosions rocked the neighborhood for hours on Tuesday as security officers dropped from helicopters and laid siege to the villa.

At one point, an explosion blasted debris, and smoke billowed out of a neighboring building, The Associated Press reported, and then there was silence.

The three-day siege forced the closing on Monday of the United States Consulate in Dhahran, about 15 miles away.

In recent months, Saudi security forces have found themselves in almost weekly confrontations with militants. Since May 2003, Islamic militants have carried out numerous attacks, suicide bombings and kidnappings in the kingdom, including an attack on the United States Consulate in Jidda, mainly singling out Westerners in a bid to hamper the country's economy.

Surge In Saudi Oil Income Seen Aiding Fight On Terror (WT)

By Rasheed Abou-alsamh

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

JIDDA, Saudi Arabia -- Record oil prices have sent Saudi revenues soaring and contributed to a sixfold increase in stock prices, but ordinary citizens are just beginning to feel the benefits, financial analysts say.

Economists hope that in time the surge will produce more and better jobs for young Saudis, reducing their interest in joining al Qaeda-linked terrorist groups that have been battling the government.

A midyear financial report by the Samba Financial Group, one of the largest and most profitable private banks in the kingdom, said oil revenue this year is expected to reach $157 billion, a 48 percent increase over 2004's oil revenue of $106 billion.

The Saudi stock market, meanwhile, has seen its capitalization grow from $82.1 billion at the end of June 2002 to $517.6 billion at the end of June 2005, or an increase of $435 billion in just three years.

"The increased wealth is beginning to trickle down to ordinary Saudis," said Ihsan Buhuleiga, a leading economist and member of the Shura Council, in an interview with The Washington Times.

While some economic analysts have expressed worries over an overheating stock market, Mr. Buhuleiga said he hoped to see the surge of new listings continue.

"The number of companies currently listed are only 80. In Oman, they have double that number. More Saudi companies should be listed, as this will encourage more job creation," he said.

Job creation is something the Saudi government desperately wants to achieve in order to stop young, unemployed Saudi men from being lured into joining terrorist groups.

DOJ_NMG_0003236

While some foreign critics of the Saudi government worry that some of the increased oil revenues will find their way into the pockets of the terrorists, Anthony Cordesman, a specialist in Saudi affairs at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, thinks the new revenues will allow the Saudi government to both battle the insurgents and develop the country.

The spurt in oil revenue may also help the ruling al-Saud royal family to secure its popularity.

On Aug. 22, the government announced a 15 percent increase in the wages of all government employees, a move ordered by newly enthroned Saudi King Abdullah to garner popular support and to inject money into the local economy.

Even before the salary raise, Saudis had seen their per-capita gross domestic product grow from $7,437 in 1998 to $11,052 in 2004. Samba estimates per capita GDP in 2005 to reach $13,603.

However, Mr. Buhuleiga warned that the government must avoid spending profligately and establish a buffer fund to tide the country over during leaner times.

"We don't know where oil prices will be in five years from now. We need to create a public budget-stabilization fund, in which all oil revenue is deposited, in order to finance budget deficits," he said.

"I don't think we want to be in the situation again of having to borrow money from our pension funds to cover our deficits. The government regularly overspends its budget by 15 [percent] to 20 percent. They should stop doing so. We need fiscal responsibility."

Saudi Arabia's current total population is 26 million of which more than 5 million are foreign workers. Mr. Buhuleiga cites this as evidence of the kingdom's overwhelming dependence on foreign labor to keep the economy growing.

"It is not going to be the normal state of things in the next three years. We should be talking about developing the citizen. We need to learn from the extremely hard lesson we had in 1998 when oil went below $10 a barrel. We must continue with economic reforms to maintain our competitive advantage," the economist said.

Government spending on infrastructure and education was cut back in the late 1990s owing to the low oil prices on international markets.

The government began to catch up by allocating $21.3 billion toward building new roads, water-desalination plants and schools through 2006.

1st Afghan At U.S. Academy Sees Move As Way To Help His Country (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, September 7, 2005

WEST POINT, N.Y. — The U.S. Military Academy accepted its first cadet from Afghanistan last month as that country takes its initial steps toward building a professional military after decades of war and unrest.

Shoaib Yosoufzai wears a slight smile, even after an all-night march that caps six weeks of training. The 20-year-old, who grew up under harsh Taliban rule, wants to learn to build bridges, dams, power plants and roads for his ravaged country.

“I want to study civil engineering so that I can work on practical things,” Yosoufzai says. “We need that in my country. We need professional officers.”

The U.S. Military Academy has taught international cadets for more than a century. Since it began tracking foreign students in 1889, West Point has had 324 international graduates from dozens of countries, says Capt. Robert Romans, the academy's international admissions officer.

Among them: Fidel Ramos, who became president of the Philippines; Anastasio Somoza, later the president of Nicaragua; and Jose Maria Figueres, who went on to become president of Costa Rica.

The Defense secretary decides which countries are invited to participate. Currently there are 140 countries eligible to send cadets to West Point, the Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md., and the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs.

West Point has a limit of 60 international cadets a year. It currently has 55.

Yosoufzai's father, Hamdullah Yosoufzai, is a colonel in the Afghan army and dean of its new military academy. West Point officers have advised their Afghan counterparts in how to train cadets.

They're starting almost from scratch.

DOJ_NMG_0003237

The Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan in 1979. Guerrilla forces chased out the Soviets 10 years later and toppled the communist government there in 1992. Factional fighting among warlords followed. In 1996, the Taliban, backed by neighboring Pakistan, seized Kabul, the capital, and installed a fundamentalist Islamic government that sheltered terrorists. A U.S.-led coalition ousted the Taliban in 2001 after the Sept. 11 attacks.

U.S. forces in Afghanistan recognized Yosoufzai as West Point material, and the U.S. Embassy in Kabul recommended him for admission, Romans says. Yosoufzai spent a year at the University of Nebraska at Omaha, polishing his English and adjusting to the USA.

"He had a little trouble at first with our food," Romans says. "Not a lot of burgers and fries in Afghanistan."

Yosoufzai agrees the transition has been rough at times.

"It is hard," he says. "I miss my family, my country, my friends. But if you can succeed here, you can succeed anywhere."

He says he wants to return to Afghanistan and help it make the transition to a modern society.

He's proved a quick study and today counts a young man from Burke, Va., as one of his best friends.

"I feel very proud to be his roommate," says Steve Hojnicki, 18, who, like Yosoufzai, comes from a military family. His father, Leon, belongs to the West Point Class of '81.

"Shoaib's country is going to need everything that this institution has to offer," Hojnicki says.

Despite War, Cadets Line Up For West Point (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, September 7, 2005

More than 10,000 applied for this year's 1,200 slots;

students 'prepared to accept the risks' of military service

WEST POINT, N.Y. — Geryah White, fresh from a 15-mile overnight march over rocks and gullies, stretches her legs and pronounces herself ready for more.

The challenge before her is four years of academic and military training at the U.S. Military Academy followed by five years of active duty in the Army.

"It's more mentally tough than physically tough," White, 19, says after her first six weeks at West Point. "It's just a matter of going one step further than you thought you could. I'm ready for the challenge. I'm ready for more."

White and the 1,200 other members of the West Point class of 2009 have the grades and test scores to get into almost any top school — one that wouldn't bring compulsory military service after graduation. Instead, they accepted this challenge, their eyes wide open to the dangers as American soldiers return home in flag-draped caskets or maimed by roadside bombs.

The Army and Army National Guard are expected to miss their 2005 recruiting goals by several thousand new soldiers, but interest in West Point hasn't flagged. Applications reached 12,692 in 2003. They're down to 10,733 this year but still high by historical standards, says Lt. Gen. William Lennox, West Point's superintendent.

"These kids are volunteers," says Lennox, who refers to the new class as the first of the post-9/11 generation. "They know about Iraq, Afghanistan, the war on terror."

The message is driven home when they apply to the academy.

"We convey to them the dangers by being very frank about the job of being a lieutenant, probably being in harm's way with what's going on in the world," says Col. Michael Jones, director of admissions at West Point.

A graduate of the academy receives a commission as a lieutenant.

The news of casualties in Iraq is unavoidable, and Kristina Dionne, 18, of Raymond, N.H., pays attention to it.

News of the death of the first female graduate of the academy since 9/11 reached the young cadets just days after they were formally admitted. First Lt. Laura Walker was killed with another soldier in Afghanistan when their Humvee struck a land mine Aug. 18.

"It's always something to think about," says Dionne, who hopes to study Arabic and Russian and specialize in military intelligence. "But West Point trains you to handle it better than anywhere, and you have to be prepared to accept the risks."

DOJ_NMG_0003238

Parents, particularly mothers in the past few years, have expressed anxiety about military service, Jones says. Yet their children still come. Alumni say the cadets' attitude is patriotism mixed with a thirst for adventure and a youthful feeling of invincibility.

Col. Don Sando, West Point class of '81, says the new cadets may be aware of the dangers but feel they're immune to them.

Sando, based at Fort Benning, Ga., says he has seen enough 18-year-old infantry privates to know that many believe they're "bulletproof, indestructible." He also sees "a basic motivation for adventure" among the young soldiers as well as a desire to serve their country.

The same holds true at West Point, he surmises.

"I suspect their motivations are as varied as there are faces in the crowd," Sando says. "But I believe the fact that West Point offers so much more than an undergraduate education — to develop leaders of character for a lifetime of service — goes a long way.

"And the notion of selfless service remains strong in the American culture."

John Wheeler, a 1966 academy graduate and Vietnam veteran, put it this way: "They may be just 15, 16 or 17 years old when they make that decision. But being young is no bar to figuring out the things that matter most in life."

Family influence can sway a decision to attend West Point. Jeffrey Caslen, 19, has watched his father climb the ranks to brigadier general.

"I've been an Army brat my whole life," says Jeffrey, who plans to study engineering. "This seems like a natural choice. There won't be the distractions here that there are at other colleges."

Brig. Gen. Robert Caslen, class of '75, deputy director for the War on Terrorism at the Pentagon, beams a smile at his son.

"As a dad in the Army, I'm humbled that he chose to follow the same path," the general says. "I'm anxious, too. There are huge demands and incredible sacrifices. His mom is tremendously nervous, too. It's one thing for her to see me off to combat and another with her son. She knows up close and personal the sacrifices."

Gerald and Ann White recall signs at an early age of the woman daughter Geryah would become.

Gerald White remembers a take-charge little girl pulling herself up as a toddler and taking her first steps unaided. Ann White says Geryah tugged on a basket of laundry at age 2, insisting on carrying the load.

"She wanted everything in the right place," Ann White says. "She's always had that inner drive to succeed."

It came as no surprise, the Whites say, when their daughter announced her interest in West Point after attending a college fair in Tampa.

"She didn't have to do this," Ann White says. "She had a choice of great universities, and she chose West Point."

Gerald White has seen a photo of his daughter emerging from a room filled with noxious gas during her training this summer. She is grim-acing, but she got through it.

"When I saw that, I thought, 'She can hang. She can hang,' " he says. "She's a strong, determined, tough young lady. She's going to serve her country well. She's a soldier."

As the first rays of peach-colored sun begin to burn off the fog obscuring the Hudson River Valley gorge, the new cadets sling 50 pounds of gear to the ground and take a break on the dew-slick grass on the steep grade of Victor Constant Ski Slope.

White says she thrives on challenges, physical and mental. That's what appealed to her about West Point, where she plans to study psychology and compete in track.

She has calculated the dangers of military service, noting that the casualty rate is "very low in Iraq," and says she's comfortable with the risks.

Since the 9/11 attacks, 26 West Point graduates have been killed in action.

"It comes with the job. You can't be naive about it," she says. "But you could get hit by a bus walking down the street, too."

Sweaty, smelly and smiling, the new cadets swill Gatorade. White gathers her gear and prepares to march again after a brief break.

"You know what they say," she jokes. "It sucks to be here now, but it will be great to be from here in four years."

DOJ_NMG_0003239

DOJ:

Medals Of Valor To Be Given To Families Of 9/11 Heroes (STNIA)

By TERENCE J. KIVLAN

Staten Island Advance (NY), September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Dozens of Sept. 11 family members are expected to travel here Friday to receive the Congressional Medal of Valor on behalf of the more than 400 firefighters and police officers killed at the World Trade Center.

The medals will be awarded by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez in a ceremony at the Justice Department.

Relatives of the fallen first responders were notified of the event by Justice Department officials by telephone late last week. Free air fare was made available for the family members through a travel agency in the city.

Advertisement

Among the relatives planning to attend was Joanne Barbara of West Brighton, whose husband Gerard, a battalion chief, was among the 343 firefighters who died at Ground Zero.

She said in an interview that she had mixed feelings about the event.

"Of course, it will be an honor to accept the Medal of Valor for my husband," she said.

But Mrs. Barbara said the Justice Department should have informed the families of the ceremony much sooner. "Our weekend is going to be very emotional as it is," she said, referring to the 9/11 anniversary. "And they just added another event to it that we didn't know about."

"We are not just to put on exhibition," said Mrs. Barbara. "We have feelings."

Congress created the medal in 2001 to honor public safety officers who displayed "exceptional courage." Winners are selected through a peer review process conducted by an advisory board of ex-police officers and firefighters.

Congress specifically authorized the issuance of the medal to the first responders killed in the 9/11 rescue efforts at the World Trade Center and the Pentagon in legislation passed in 2002. It was co-sponsored by Republican Rep. Vito Fossella

A total of 428 rescue workers were killed at Ground Zero, including 37 Port Authority cops, 23 city police officers, three state court uniformed officers and two federal agents.

Among those killed were 78 firefighters from Staten Island, one city police officer and two Port Authority cops.

Altogether, 442 public safety officers died in the 9/11 attacks. They were certified by Gonzalez to receive the valor award in July.

The list was compiled from the list of 9/11 rescue workers whose relatives received benefits from the Public Safety Officers Benefits Program. The program provides tax-free payments of $250,000 to the families of first responders killed in the line of duty.

Terence J. Kivlan is Washington correspondent for the Advance. He may be reached at terence.kivlan@newhouse.com

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Defendants Cry Foul (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

Defense lawyers for former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling have complained for years about the government's hard-nosed tactics in pursuit of their clients.

Now they are hoping for support from an unlikely source: the federal judge overseeing next year's fraud trial against the two.

U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III has scheduled a hearing in Houston for tomorrow to examine why only four former Enron employees have agreed to meet with the defense team. The judge has raised the prospect, employed in other cases, that he could privately inform a limited number of potential witnesses that they have nothing to fear by speaking with Lay's and Skilling's lawyers.

The judge's action comes in response to defense claims, made public yesterday in court filings, that prosecutors abused their power by warning Enron employees that it was not a "good idea" to help Skilling and Lay. A government lawyer also advised a critical, unidentified witness to "get rid" of his or her lawyer if the lawyer continued to talk with the defense, the brief said.

A grand jury continues to investigate misconduct at Enron, and prosecutors have said in court papers that they consider 114 people "unindicted co-conspirators."

Lake has not ruled that prosecutors at the Justice Department's Enron Task Force acted improperly. Even so, the judge said last week, Lay and Skilling had identified "a problem I am persuaded exists" in advance of a trial only four months away.

"Both sides have to have access to witnesses in order to try a case," Michael Ramsey, a defense lawyer for Lay, said in a telephone interview.

Daniel M. Petrocelli, Skilling's lead trial counsel, told the judge at a hearing in May: "There's hundreds of witnesses, and we can't get to anybody, and we need some relief."

Nearly three dozen former employees and those who did business with them have been charged with crimes in the Enron investigation. Several key figures, including finance chief Andrew S. Fastow and investor relations director Mark E. Koenig, pleaded guilty and agreed to testify against their former superiors.

The clash over access to witnesses is merely the first in a series of battles for control of the courtroom, the media and potential jurors who will be selected in January, experts said.

"As a general matter, witnesses refusing to talk to the defense is a huge problem," said Barry Boss, a partner at Cozen O'Connor LLP in the District who is not involved in the Enron case.

Unlike in civil cases, defendants who are charged with crimes do not automatically receive copies of written statements and information that witnesses provide to the government.

"The defense really doesn't have any clout" to force people to talk, said Stephen A. Saltzburg, a George Washington University law professor. Such concerns are increasingly common in sophisticated cases, he said. Defense lawyers for former WorldCom Inc. chief executive Bernard J. Ebbers cited similar problems as a basis for an appeal of his conviction for fraud and making false statements.

Lay, Skilling and former chief accountant Richard A. Causey, who is on trial with them, do have some guidance about the evidence marshaled against them -- in part because of the vast impact of Enron's 2001 collapse. The company's bankruptcy examiner filed several weighty reports citing e-mail messages and other documents. Congressional reports flagged other materials the government may use in its prosecution. And depositions of witnesses continue in shareholder lawsuits against Enron executives.

Defense lawyers for Skilling and Lay, however, say that 56 witnesses have invoked their constitutional rights against self-incrimination in connection with the civil case. Prosecutors have sought to postpone depositions of others, including Sherron Watkins, who sent Lay an anonymous letter in 2001 warning him that the company could implode in a wave of accounting fraud.

The Justice Department filed a motion late yesterday calling the defense brief "inflammatory."

"The government respects the right of any witness to meet or not meet with whomever they want," Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said. "The majority of witnesses in this case are represented by experienced counsel who are in the best position to advise them on whether to meet with the government or defense counsel."

Sweden Will Prosecute Ex-CEO Of Insurer Skandia (WSJ/DJN)

By Maria Akerhielm, Louise Nordstrom and Janina Pfalzer, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

STOCKHOLM -- Swedish state prosecutor Christer van der Kwast decided to prosecute Lars-Eric Petersson, former chief executive officer of insurer Skandia AB, for two cases of "severe" breach of trust.

Mr. Petersson was fired by Skandia in 2003 for his involvement in the lifting of a cap on a bonus-payment program to executives. The charges against him won't have any bearing on the 44.9 billion kronor ($6.02, or €4.83 billion) takeover bid for Skandia filed last week by Old Mutual PLC. The Old Mutual offer has to be approved by the Swedish company's board before Sept. 23.

DOJ_NMG_0003241

Mr. Petersson's attorney, Torgny Wetterberg, told Dow Jones Newswires he doesn't understand the prosecutor's reasoning. In his view, the preliminary investigation should have been discontinued.

"As I see it, there are insufficiencies in the presented circumstances, and we find it peculiar that the prosecutor has made the assessment that there is intent in this case," Mr. Wetterberg said. He added that he was confident that a trial would lead to an acquittal.

Officials from Skandia weren't available to comment.

The state prosecutor said he will decide in early October whether he will prosecute two other former Skandia executives, Ola Ramstedt and Ulf Spaang.

Mr. Petersson is being prosecuted for abusing his position of trust when he, as Skandia's CEO, lifted the cap on the bonus program Wealthbuilder without approval from Skandia's board, the prosecutor said.

Mr. Petersson is alleged to have set payment of the program 185 million kronor above the amount authorized by the board. This, the prosecutor said, has caused considerable damage to the company, and, therefore, the crime is "severe."

The prosecutor said the second charge against Mr. Petersson relates to retirement payments.

Without approval from Skandia's board, he added retirement benefits under which his own benefits would always reach at least 97.1 million kronor, the prosecutor said.

Parallel to the civil process against Mr. Petersson, Skandia is currently involved in arbitration against him, relating to his involvement in benefiting from the lifting of the payment cap of the bonus program. The company is seeking 300 million kronor in compensation from Mr. Petersson. It had previously said it expected the outcome of the arbitration to be reached early next year.

The Debate On Auditing Must First Clarify Its Purpose (FT)

By Clare Canning and James Roberts

Financial Times, September 7, 2005

The statutory audit continues to generate headlines, with reforms being either supported or attacked. Expectations of the audit process can rapidly exceed what can reasonably be delivered. There is a danger that misconceptions about the audit's role will lead to counterproductive attempts to bolster the robustness of the audit opinion.

Take the debate over the effect of the introduction of international accounting standards, which partially replace the concept of "true and fair view" by "presents fairly". Some investor groups have argued that this undermines the robustness of the audit opinion, through a shift away from the traditional UK approach of over-arching judgments based on general principles towards a US style of "tick box" or rules-based audit processes.

The Financial Reporting Council has come out firmly against these concerns with a vote of confidence in the system, rejecting the notion that these technical reforms have weakened the UK audit. Ultimately it will be for the courts and regulatory bodies to determine whether this is the case. What seems certain, however, is that the FRC is unlikely to have won over all its detractors. Is there not a danger that the problem underlying this debate is the more fundamental issue of what it is that the investor and business communities think auditors do? What is the statutory audit designed to safeguard against? Until these questions are addressed and there is clarity between service providers and consumers, issues about the niceties of any particular reform seem academic.

Some of those expressing concerns appear to expect the audit to function like a form of commercial guarantee; a bastion against corporate scandal and a blanket protection for the company and its directors against their own commercial mismanagement. These expectations are misplaced. This firm has defended many misconceived lawsuits brought against auditors over the years. The problem often arises because the claimant has a skewed view of the auditor's role. The audit is not an exercise in verifying or double checking commercial management. Auditors do not underwrite a company's commercial viability. It is easy to forget that primary responsibility for safeguarding against corporate scandal can only lie with the business principals. One cannot help but surmise that the focus on the audit role is largely aimed, certainly in the context of litigation, at what is perceived to be behind the auditor – its deep pocket.

Let us assume that what the business community realistically understands it has from an audit is, not an insurance policy against any commercial error, but an opinion that a company's financial statements show a true and fair view at a particular point in time. Are the government's proposals to introduce a limited form of proportionate liability by contract for auditors then to be welcomed? No other professional is required in the same way to accept unlimited legal liability. Refusing limitation would only seem likely to encourage the profession to focus on the ticking of boxes to avoid the exposure of subjective judgments. Allowing auditors some scope to limit their liability should help to resist any trend for auditors to seek refuge in form over substance in the audit process.

DOJ_NMG_0003242

The government is also considering introducing a criminal offence of "recklessly" giving an audit opinion. What exactly is involved in recklessness in this context is hard to define and even harder to apply. The mere risk of a prosecution may destroy an auditor's career. If, as is likely, the offence were to result in a risk of criminalisation in a swathe of circumstances, this too would create irresistible pressure towards form over substance. Excessive criminalisation would also frustrate swift and effective operation of the regulatory regime and civil litigation.

How unattractive does auditing need to become before the big four and others find it impossible to recruit quality staff and encourage their best partners to stay in audit? It may be that there is more that unites auditors, investors and the public when it comes to what will really bolster the giving of robust audit opinions. Conversely, initiatives based on unrealistic expectations will only fuel more speculative, expensive and ultimately unsuccessful litigation. That cannot be in the investment communities' interests.

Clare Canning is head of commercial litigation and James Roberts an associate in the commercial litigation team at Barlow Lyde & Gilbert, who currently act for Ernst & Young in the Equitable Life litigation

Morgan Director Resigns, A Sign That A Reorganization Is Likely (NYT)

By Landon Thomas Jr.

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

Michael A. Miles, a Morgan Stanley director with close ties to the former chief executive, Philip J. Purcell, has resigned from the board, the bank said yesterday.

The move, which was expected, is the latest signal that the new chief executive, John J. Mack, intends to reorganize a board that during the battle over Mr. Purcell's leadership became a lightning rod for criticism and remains the target of several shareholder lawsuits.

A former chief executive of Philip Morris, Mr. Miles, 66, was one of the original directors of Dean Witter when the investment bank was spun off from its parent, Sears, in 1993.

As head of Morgan's nominating committee, Mr. Miles was an architect of a board that included several former chief executives, many of whom lived in the Chicago suburbs, who defended Mr. Purcell in the years after the Dean Witter Morgan Stanley merger.

"I believe there is always a need for change and refreshment in any organization," Mr. Miles said in his letter of resignation.

A longtime director with years of boardroom experience - at one time he was on seven boards in addition to Morgan Stanley - Mr. Miles was one of Mr. Purcell's closest advisers during the bitter dispute with the group of eight dissident executives who were calling for Mr. Purcell's resignation.

From the beginning, Mr. Miles defended Mr. Purcell's record and, even as other directors began to waver, he remained a vocal critic of the campaign being waged by the retired executives, known widely as the group of eight.

While his resignation is the first since Mr. Mack became chief executive, another director with ties to Mr. Purcell, Edward A. Brennan, the former chief of Sears, will not stand for re-election next year because he will have exceeded the board's age limit of 72.

Mr. Mack has already welcomed three new directors - Charles H. Noski, a former chief financial officer at AT&T; Roy J. Bostock, a former advertising chief executive; and O. Griffith Sexton, a former Morgan Stanley executive and professor of finance at Columbia Business School.

Firm Sues To Block Mutual Fund Fee Inquiry (NYT)

By Riva D. Atlas

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003243

J.& W. Seligman & Company, a New York investment firm, sued the state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, yesterday, asserting that he had overstepped his authority in his investigation of improper trading in Seligman's mutual funds.

The lawsuit, filed in Federal District Court in Manhattan, seeks to suspend Mr. Spitzer's ability to investigate "allegedly excessive advisory fees paid to Seligman."

Seligman, founded in 1864 and one of the nation's oldest investment firms, is one of the few mutual fund managers that have yet to reach a settlement with Mr. Spitzer regarding market timing in its funds.

Market timing - the rapid trading in and out of mutual funds - has been the focus of an investigation made public by Mr. Spitzer two years ago this week.

The attorney general and other regulators have accused fund managers of permitting favored investors to make short-term trades, even when their public filings indicated that they discouraged the practice.

A long list of fund companies have agreed to ban the practice, and to pay about $3 billion worth of fines, restitution and fee reductions to investors harmed by the trading.

In recent months, however, some parties have begun to challenge Mr. Spitzer in the mutual fund investigation and beyond. In June, a jury found against the attorney general on most charges in a criminal case against a former broker at Bank of America, Theodore C. Sihpol III. Mr. Spitzer had accused Mr. Sihpol of helping Canary Capital Partners, a hedge fund, in market timing.

The same month, certain banks, including J. P. Morgan Chase, sought to prevent Mr. Spitzer from investigating whether the banks were charging excessive interest rates on mortgages to minorities. A court hearing is scheduled for today in Federal District Court in Manhattan on the matter.

A few months after Mr. Spitzer's mutual fund investigation became public, Seligman agreed to pay nearly $2 million to investors in three of its mutual funds where there had been rapid trading. It also said it would reduce fees on one of those funds by 0.05 percent for two years beginning in June 2004.

Despite the voluntary fee cuts, Mr. Spitzer's investigation continued, because he believed that the actions the firm had taken were not sufficient, a person briefed on the investigation said. That person said he could not speak for attribution because the talks were confidential.

Seligman reached a tentative agreement in August with Mr. Spitzer's office and the Securities and Exchange Commission, but talks broke down after Mr. Spitzer "sought to impose operating conditions on Seligman which were unacceptable to Seligman," the lawsuit said.

Mr. Spitzer's office wanted Seligman to appoint an independent monitor to review how the fund's managers negotiated fees, the lawsuit said. Seligman said monitoring its fees "is the regulatory province of the S.E.C., and only the S.E.C.," the lawsuit said.

After the talks broke down, Mr. Spitzer issued a series of subpoenas in late August against directors and executives at Seligman in an effort to pressure Seligman into agreeing to his terms, the lawsuit said.

Requiring a third party to review how fees are set has been a condition of all of Mr. Spitzer's settlements with fund companies to date, said David D. Brown IV, director of the attorney general's Investment Protection Bureau and the person overseeing the day-to-day operations of the mutual fund investigation.

The fee reductions, however, have been criticized by officials at the S.E.C., who have said it is not the role of the government to set prices.

Even with the fee reductions, expenses at many Seligman funds are above average, Mr. Brown said, citing data from Morningstar, a research firm that tracks mutual funds. "Why don't they want to join other mutual fund companies in reducing inordinately high fees?" he said.

Expenses at Seligman funds, on average, are 1.93 percent of assets, according to Morningstar, compared with an average of 1.47 percent at large fund companies. Performance at many Seligman funds has also been weak.

Last year, Seligman named a new chief investment officer, John B. Cunningham, who is making positive changes at the firm, said Todd Trubey, a Morningstar analyst.

"He came in to clean things up and we have found him to be a pretty straight shooter," Mr. Trubey said. For now, Morningstar is willing to give Seligman the benefit of the doubt, even with this lawsuit, Mr. Trubey said. The research firm plans to meet with Seligman executives within the next few days, he said.

Morgan Stanley To Pay To Settle Complaint (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, September 7, 2005

(AP) - WILMINGTON, Del.-Morgan Stanley Inc. has agreed to pay $700,000 to settle a complaint brought by the state Department of Justice regarding improper trading in a Delaware couple's brokerage account, officials said Tuesday.

The bulk of the settlement will be paid to the Wilmington couple to reimburse them for losses incurred, authorities said.

The Division of Securities filed a formal complaint in 2003 against the brokerage firm and two brokers, George Coughlin and Argie Economou who worked in a Morgan Stanley branch office in Burlington, Vt.

The complaint alleged that Morgan Stanley, through Coughlin, executed more than 500 unauthorized transactions and more than 70 "unsuitable" transactions in the couple's account. The complaint also alleged that Morgan Stanley and Economou, who was Coughlins immediate supervisor, failed to properly supervise Coughlins trading activities, in violation of Delaware securities laws.

As part of the settlement, Morgan Stanley and the brokers named in the complaint neither admitted nor denied the allegations.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Legal Experts Call Current Law A Poor Fit For Leak Prosecutions (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

Convictions for leaking sensitive government information to the media are almost as rare as sightings of the ivory-billed woodpecker.

Only twice have government employees gone to prison for such misdeeds. And legal experts say prosecutors will have a hard time putting away anyone in the administration for violating the Intelligence Identities Protection Act in the revelation of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity in 2003.

The bar for breaking the 1982 law is high. Whoever makes the disclosure must know that the person was a "covert agent" and must intentionally reveal the agent's identity to someone not authorized to know it.

There is, however, another statute that federal officials have used to go after government leakers. Some legal experts say it is not out of the question that prosecutors in the Plame case could bring it out again -- although it, too, seems a long shot.

The provision, Section 641 in Title 18 of the U.S. Code, nominally deals with prohibitions on the embezzlement of public money, property or records for private use. It typically would be used to go after a federal employee who, say, absconds with government laptops.

Prosecutors used the statute -- somewhat creatively, legal experts say -- to help build successful cases against Samuel L. Morison, a former Navy intelligence analyst who was sentenced to two years in prison in 1985 after being convicted of espionage and theft in leaking secret U.S. spy satellite photographs to a British magazine, and Jonathan Randel, a former Drug Enforcement Agency intelligence research specialist who in 2003 was sentenced to a year in prison for selling restricted information.

The statute "is used by the government from time to time in lieu of not having a criminal prohibition on leaking classified information, generally," said William Banks, a national security law expert at Syracuse University. "It isn't a good fit, but it's the best available."

Kevin M. Goldberg, a partner at Cohn and Marks LLP in Washington and an expert on First Amendment issues, said that prosecutors might try to use it.

DOJ_NMG_0003245

"I think that's a really bad precedent to set, however," Goldberg said. "Essentially, you are just creating almost an Official Secrets Act in which all government information belongs to the government, and can never be given out to a member of the public."

Morison, who worked at the Naval Intelligence Support Center in Suitland, sent Jane's Defence Weekly, for which he moonlighted as an editor, three photographs of the first Soviet nuclear aircraft carrier under construction at a Black Sea shipyard. His attorneys unsuccessfully argued that their client was a supporter of President Ronald Reagan and bigger defense budgets who wanted to publicize the Soviet threat.

Randel provided information from a DEA database to the Times of London newspaper indicating that the name of Lord Michael Ashcroft -- a dual citizen of Britain and Belize who was treasurer of the Conservative Party -- was in agency files used in investigations of drug trafficking.

The newspaper cited the information in stories on Ashcroft and his business dealings in Belize, stories that Ashcroft complained falsely suggested that he was a target of DEA investigations into drug trafficking. (After Ashcroft filed a libel suit, the paper published a statement saying there was no evidence he had been suspected of any drug-related crime.) Prosecutors said Randel was paid $13,000 for the information, which was sensitive but not classified. The newspaper said the money was to cover Randel's expenses and time when he traveled to Britain to help the newspaper prepare a defense to Ashcroft's libel suit.

At Randel's sentencing, U.S. District Judge Richard W. Story of the Northern District of Georgia said: "This is like the drunk driver who gets home without killing somebody. . . . No agent was killed as a result of the information that was leaked and no investigation was compromised, but the risk that was created was certainly there. And that is of grave concern."

In an essay published July 15 on CNN.com, former Nixon White House Counsel John Dean argued that White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove could be vulnerable on the same grounds. Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper has said that Rove told him in 2003 that Plame, the wife of President Bush critic Joseph C. Wilson IV, worked for the CIA, but that Rove said nothing about her being a covert operative.

"Rove had no idea what the specific consequences of giving a reporter the name of a CIA agent [about whom he says he knew nothing] would be," Dean wrote. ". . . [I]f the risk Randel was taking was a 'tremendous' risk, surely Rove's leak was monumental." Rove has said he did nothing illegal.

Several experts disagree with Dean's assessment, saying the embezzlement statute is an especially poor fit for the Plame case. For one thing, it requires that there be an intent to convert the purloined property or record -- the "thing of value" -- to one's use or gain. Morison was paid as an editor for Jane's. Randel got money from the Times of London. But political gain does not count, the experts said.

"This is for people who steal public property. This is used all the time, but not for situations like this," Banks said. "Because there isn't anybody in this for gain -- for pecuniary gain -- I think it's a bit of a stretch."

Victoria Toensing, a Washington lawyer who helped write the Intelligence Identities Protection Act, said prosecutors would "absolutely never" try to use the embezzlement statute in the Plame case.

Dean "is trying to put the stepsister's foot in Cinderella's shoe," she said. "What was converted? . . . Where is the 'value' given to Karl Rove? . . . The story shouldn't even be written, because it's so off the wall to give it any credence."

Former City Official Gets 30 Months In Prison (HC)

By Harvey Rice

Houston Chronicle, September 7, 2005

A former Houston city official was sentenced to two years and six months in federal prison today for accepting cash and gifts from businesses seeking her influence in gaining lucrative city contracts.

The sentencing of Monique McGilbra, former head of the city Building Services Department, follows a three-year sentence she received Friday in Cleveland, Ohio, for accepting bribes from a Cleveland businessman.

McGilbra, 41, is the second Houston city official to plead guilty in a continuing investigation that began in Cleveland and expanded to include Houston and New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0003246

Oliver Spellman, 51, chief of staff to former Mayor Lee Brown, received probation and a $10,000 fine Friday in Cleveland federal court for taking a $2,000 bribe from a Cleveland consultant.

U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore said McGilbra's Houston sentence will run at the same time as the Cleveland sentence, meaning she will spend no more than three years in prison.

McGilbra was more repentant in her statement to Gilmore than in her statement to U.S. District Judge James Gwin in Cleveland, who was unmoved when she told him that having expensive tastes shouldn't be a crime.

"I'd like to say how regretful and sorrowful I am," McGilbra told Gilmore. "I'll spend the rest of my life trying to make amends for that."

U.S. marshals took McGilbra into custody on orders from Gwin, but Gilmore said McGilbra could be released until ordered to report to prison if Gwin agreed to reconsider his order.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Edward Gallagher and Mary Butler, a prosecutor with the Department of Justice's public integrity unit, told Gilmore McGilbra was cooperating in an ongoing investigation.

"We are striving to discover the extent of corruption and we are not going to leave any stone unturned," Gallagher said outside the courtroom.

In return for agreeing to cooperate with the government, McGilbra pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud.

She admitted she received numerous gifts from representatives of the Keystone Group, controlled by Houston businessman Andy Schatte, including $1,000 in cash in a box containing champagne, use of a condominium for a ski trip to northern California, tickets to professional football games and a Neiman Marcus gift certificate on her birthday.

McGilbra admitted she accepted cash payments from her then-boyfriend, a consultant for the Keystone Group, and agreed to split a $250,000 cash bonus with him if the Keystone Group won a fire-station contract with the city.

She also admitted to using her influence to secure a consulting agreement for her boyfriend with an energy company she had helped obtain a city contract.

After clinching the energy company contract, she asked for and received financial assistance from a contractor seeking consulting work under the energy company, she admitted.

Gifts she received from the energy company and the contractor included $6,000 in cash, a $700 gift certificate from Louis Vuitton, and tickets to the Lion King worth about $1,000, according to the sentencing agreement.

harvey.rice@chron.com

Embattled Lee Quits Plan Board (DMN)

By Emily Ramshaw, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 7, 2005

File / DMN D'Angelo Lee

Embattled City Plan Commissioner D'Angelo Lee stepped down over the holiday weekend, more than two months after he fell under scrutiny in a far-reaching FBI investigation and days before a second City Council vote over whether to remove him.

Mayor Pro Tem Don Hill, who nominated Mr. Lee to the commission in 2003 and, until this weekend, had vowed to keep him in his post, accepted Mr. Lee's resignation in a memo sent out Tuesday morning. The city secretary did not receive an official resignation letter from Mr. Lee on Tuesday.

"He has been a visionary for economic development in the Southern Sector of Dallas, however his primary objectives are to clear his name and to develop his private business interests," wrote Mr. Hill, who did not return phone calls. "Achieving these objectives is very difficult in the present environment. This decision to resign from the City Plan and Zoning Commission is in the best interest of his family and our city."

Mr. Lee, Mr. Hill, and five other city officials – council members James Fantroy, Leo Chaney and Maxine Thornton-Reese and Plan Commissioners Melvin Traylor and Carol Brandon – have been named in federal subpoenas served at City Hall.

DOJ_NMG_0003247

Mayor Laura Miller, who led the charge to remove Mr. Lee from the City Plan Commission after allegations surfaced that he was not reporting gifts and was voting on zoning cases where he was being paid as a consultant, said Tuesday that the resignation should have occurred "a few months ago."

Also Online

Chris Heinbaugh reports

She said it's going to take a lot of hard decisions "to make sure that we restore public trust at City Hall."

"He has now stepped down, and that's a really good step forward," Ms. Miller said.

Mr. Lee did not return phone calls on Tuesday. But his attorney, Doug Greene, said the pressure finally got to Mr. Lee.

"He respected Don Hill and didn't want to bring any ill repute on him or the citizens of Dallas," Mr. Greene said. "Based on that, and based on the spiraling investigation and reports, he thought it would be prudent for everyone at this point if he resigned."

The mayor spearheaded a City Council vote last month to forcibly remove Mr. Lee. It failed, with a majority of council members voting to delay the matter three weeks and wait for the city's Ethics Commission to rule on Mr. Lee.

In the meantime, two ethics complaints were filed against Mr. Lee, and a preliminary Ethics Commission hearing was set for Sept. 16.

On Saturday, four days before today's rescheduled council vote on Mr. Lee, The Dallas Morning News reported that Mr. Lee had nearly $1,600 in unpaid traffic violations since 2000, and, as such, was ineligible to serve on the Plan Commission. Mr. Lee also had reported different birthdays – within one day and one year of one another – on city nomination forms, The News reported.

Mr. Greene said Mr. Lee took care of the fines over the weekend.

"He posted bond on those, and they're in the process of being handled," he said.

His explanation of the birthday discrepancies was less clear.

On various public documents, Mr. Lee listed his birth date variously as Dec. 22, 1965; Dec. 23, 1966; and Dec. 23, 1965.

Mr. Greene said Mr. Lee told him he was born at midnight on the night of Dec. 22-23, 1965, and therefore celebrated both days as his birthday. As far as the mistaken year, he said, Mr. Lee told him someone must have made a typographical error. The birth dates were written by hand.

Mr. Greene said he doubted the Ethics Commission would proceed with a hearing on the complaints against Mr. Lee, considering the resignation. But Assistant City Secretary Deborah Watkins said the complaints would still be heard.

"If there's a complaint filed, whether they are a current or former city official, we will hear the complaint," she said.

Mr. Lee is not the only city official named in federal subpoenas to leave the Plan Commission. Mr. Chaney said Tuesday he would not renominate Mr. Traylor, who is employed by Southwest Housing, a development company under scrutiny in the FBI probe.

"I believe in Mr. Traylor. It's not because of" the FBI investigation, said Mr. Chaney. He has asked District 7 resident Ann Bagley to serve on the Plan Commission and said he would nominate Mr. Traylor to the municipal library board. "I'm shaking things up. I just want to provide others with the opportunity to serve."

Ms. Brandon, who represents District 8 on the Plan Commission, will not be relieved of her post, Mr. Fantroy said.

"Don't even think about it," he said.

Mr. Lee should have stepped down "a long time ago," said council member Bill Blaydes, one of two people who filed ethics complaints against him. "The city benefited greatly by him doing so."

But Mr. Lee's resignation is only one step, Ms. Miller said. Today, she will reveal a slate of proposed reforms to clean up the city's zoning process – rules that, if approved, would require plan commissioners and City Council members to be vested in citywide land-use decisions.

Too often, Ms. Miller said, elected and appointed officials defer to the district representative when deciding complicated and controversial zoning cases, rather than learning the details and voting their convictions.

"I think if you put them all together, it really changes how we do business with zoning at City Hall," Ms. Miller said. "And those changes need to happen."

WFAA-TV (Channel 8) reporter Chris Heinbaugh contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0003248

Lee Resigns From Plan Commission (WFAA-TV)

By CHRIS HEINBAUGH

WFAA-TV, September 7, 2005

A key figure in the FBI investigation at Dallas City Hall has resigned.

City Plan Commissioner D'Angelo Lee submitted his resignation to Council member Don Hill. In a news release, Hill said he is regrettably accepting Lee's resignation.

Lee's business interests and activities as a City Plan Commissioner have been at the core of the FBI investigation.

Hill's memo said Lee's focus is clearing his name and developing his business interests. Hill said Lee can't do that in the present environment.

Hill said says Lee's resignation is in the best interest of his family and the city.

Three weeks ago, a sharply divided City Council refused a request from Mayor Laura Miller to remove Lee from the Plan Commission. The item was to be reconsidered on Wednesday.

Many Council members said they were pleased that Lee's decision will avoid another potential fight.

"Nobody likes a divided city," said Council member Elba Garcia. "I think that we'll need to move forward, work together, and make the best that we can for the city."

"This will help," Councilman Mitchell Rasansky agreed. "Surely it isn't going to hurt, but it should have been done several months ago."

Lee has reportedly has been driving a car belonging to someone else, and allegedly accepted fees from groups with business before the City Plan commission.

Lee is not the only member of the City Plan Commission who will be leaving his post.

Melvyn Traylor, whose name appeared in a recent subpoena, will not be back. City Council member Leo Chaney said he will not reappoint Traylor to the job.

Chaney insisted it was part of an overhaul of his appointee and had nothing to do with the FBI investigation.

The mayor is presenting a controversial package of reforms for the city plan commission.

"...There are some things going on behind the scenes that are not appropriate," she said. "And hopefully with these plan commission recommendations and city council recommendations tomorrow for reform, we won't have those problems anymore."

As for Don Hill, he said in light of the human tragedy caused by Hurricane Katrina, he would not answer questions today about Lee's resignation.

E-mail cheinbaugh@wfaa.com

Ribadu, FBI Meet In U.S. (NDI)

By Tony Eluemunor (Abuja) and Habib Aruna (Lagos)

Nigeria Daily Independent, September 7, 2005

Economic and Financial Crimes Commission (EFCC) chairman, Nuhu Ribadu, has been holding meetings with the United States Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) to intensify the search for corrupt Nigerian public officials.

He was in the U.S. last week to meet with senior government and FBI officials and to exchange information on the activities of Nigerian politicians, especially governors being investigated for corrupt practices.

Ribadu, according to sources, was sighted in Maryland and Washington D.C. where he had meetings with U.S. officials (in the company of an EFCC investigator) to obtain additional information on the property deeds of some governors and pass details to the INTERPOL.

He also used the visit to obtain more information on the raid the FBI carried out last month on the property of Vice President, Atiku Abubakar.

The search of his home in Maryland attracted national attention in Nigeria last week.

It was linked to the investigation of Congressman William Jefferson, whom Atiku had hosted during his visit to the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0003249

But Ribadu, who returned later in the week, reportedly achieved little success due to the national outcry generated by the slow response of the American Government to the destruction of New Orleans by Hurricane Katrina.

Besides, the FBI has tarried in its investigation of Jefferson who incidentally hails from New Orleans.

"The FBI is threading carefully in pursuing new leads in the investigation against Jefferson because of the sensitive nature and political dimension it might take", a source explained.

In any case, Daily Independent has obtained a list of what the FBI seized during the raid.

The document, titled "Receipt for Property Received/Returned/Released/Seized", was signed by the leader of the FBI team.

It stated that the items included

• 1A envelope with house sketch.
• Employee schedule information and employee contact information.
• 2005 appointment book.
• Possible list of camera locations.
• Software and operation manual for DVR.
• Kalatel digital recorder.
• Multiplayer.
• Manila envelope containing miscellaneous papers with William Jefferson's return address.

Atiku's family lawyers supplied Daily Independent with the document.

They deplored the attempt by some newspapers to sensationalise the issue through the "fabrication of falsehood".

'What FBI Took From Atiku's US Home' (THISDAY)

By Kunle Akogun

This Day (Nigeria), September 7, 2005

The Office of Vice President Atiku Abub-akar yesterday rele-ased a list of items taken away from Maryland, US home by operatives of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) during their August 3 raid.

In an e-mailed press statement titled "What FBI Took From The Atiku Family House" and signed by his deputy Press Scretary, Mohammed Yakub.

The Vice President's office listed the items as including: 1A envelop with house sketch, employee schedule information and employee contact information, green standard diary, 2005 appointment book and possible list of camera locations.

Other items are software and operation manual for DVR, Kalatel digital reco-rder, multiplexer as well as manila envelop containing miscellaneous papers with William Jefferson's return address.

According to the statement, the document containing the report of FBI search was jointly signed by the FBI officials and a representative of the Atiku family.

THISDAY checks revealed that the release of the document entitled "Receipt for Property Received/Returned/Released/Seized" dated August 3, 2005, might not be unconnected with the need to refute publication in a weekly newsmagazine that during the search of Atiku's house in Maryland, USA, FBI agents found some documents on payments to American congressmen through William Jerfferson, an eight-term member of the US congress.

The statement from the Vice President's office quotted Atiku's family lawyers and added that the content of the FBI document was made public to reassure members of the public and disabuse their minds of what it called "the fabrication of falsehood".

It noted that at the time of conducting the search on Atiku's house, the FBI agents "certified that the (listed items) above represents all that was obtained by special agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, US Department of Justice."

The Vice President's family lawyers deplored the attempt by some newspapers to sensationalise the issue through the "fabrication of falsehood", the statement added.

On August 27, American newspapers were awash with stories of the FBI raid of the Maryland, US residence of Vice President Atiku Abub-akar.

DOJ_NMG_0003250

The raid, according to the papers, was part of a probe into whether eight-term congressman William Jefferson made payments to top Nigerian and Ghanaian officials.

A source familiar with the investigation said subpoenas showed federal agents were looking for records indicating whether Jefferson paid, offered to pay or authorized payments to Nigerian or Ghanaian government officials, The Times-Picayune said.

Agents were seeking documents related to Jefferson's dealings with Atiku and the vice president of Ghana, Aliu Mahama. Jefferson returned from a five-day visit to Ghana in mid-July, about three weeks before the FBI raided his homes, according to the newspaper.

The subpoenas focused in part on a telecommunications deal Jefferson was trying to engineer in Nigeria over the past year, according to documents and those familiar with details of the investigation.

Sources familiar with the telecommunications deal said Jefferson was attempting to smooth the way for iGate Corp., a small Kentucky company, to offer its high-speed broadband technology to Nigeria's fast-growing telecommunications market.

In its reaction the Federal Government immediately said security agencies had been directed to investigate the matter which it described as an individual affair. However, in his reaction, Atiku had said that no wrong doing had been established against him.

Atiku in and a statement signed by Yakub, acknowledged that his US home was raided by the FBI following a visit by Congressman Jefferson, who unknown to him then was under investigation.

The Vice President later disclosed that he had before Jefferson's visit received a letter from Nigeria's Ambassador to the United States, Dr. George Obiozor, requesting that he look into the business dealings between the NITEL, another unnamed Nigerian firm and an American company.

He said since the business had not been sealed he immediately gave instructions to one of his aides that the letter be forwarded to the Minister of Communications, Chief Cornelius Adebayo, for necessary action and advice.

He said Jefferson's visit to his Maryland home while he was on vacation in the US, was a follow-up to the letter he received from Obiozor.

Monitor: City Defying Ban On Political Hiring (CHIST/AP)

By MIKE ROBINSON, ASSOCIATED PRESS

Chicago Sun-Times, September 7, 2005

Chicago officials have been basing hiring decisions on political clout and not merits, defying a court-ordered ban on patronage employment, a federal monitor said Tuesday.

Court-appointed monitor Noelle Brennan urged sweeping changes at City Hall, including requiring top officials to swear under penalty of perjury that hirings aren't based on politics.

Brennan made the recommendations in an 11-page report to U.S. District Judge Wayne R. Andersen on how to enforce the decades-old Shakman Decree that bans the use of patronage.

"We did find that the city has been substantially noncompliant with the Shakman Decree for a significant period of time," Brennan said in delivering the report to Andersen.

Brennan's conclusions reinforced long-standing claims by critics of City Hall that the 1983 decree issued in a lawsuit brought by attorney Michael Shakman has been violated almost since its inception.

Daley's former patronage chief, Robert Sorich, and another former city official, Patrick Slattery, are under federal indictment in an 18-month investigation of hiring abuses.

Brennan's report brought immediate praise from city Corporation Counsel Mara Georges, who promised to continue to work with the court-appointed monitor and help her to get information.

"We are there to facilitate the process and give her whatever information she requires," Georges said. But in response to questions from reporters she said that the city would continue with its effort to have a federal appeals court overturn the Shakman Decree.

"That case is just a strong as it ever was," Georges told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0003251

Shakman, himself, said the preliminary report was "a very good first step at addressing how to eliminate the culture of corruption and clout in city hiring and promotion practices."

Andersen said he wants fast progress on making changes in the way the city does its hiring and asked both Brennan and Georges to be back next month to update him on the process.

The use of patronage in city hiring and promotions has been at the heart of the so-called Chicago Machine for decades. Numerous precinct captains who get out the vote for the regular Democratic organization on Election Day have jobs on the city payroll.

In recent years, City Hall watchers have said that money to pay for television advertising has become much more important in winning elections than such doorbell-ringing foot soldiers.

But recent court hearings have made it plain that political officials still place a high premium on getting jobs for those who turn out the vote.

Among other things, Brennan found that available jobs are not always posted and frequently filled based on political factors. She said applicants without clout have been largely ignored.

The mayor's office of intergovernmental affairs-- the political high command-- has been excessively involved in the hiring process, Brennan said. She said unqualified applicants who have political clout often get consideration for jobs.

And the city has been unresponsive to complaints about violations, she said.

She said the city should immediately hire additional employees for the Department of Personal so that it can act as a buffer between political officials and the job applicants. She said that she should have a role in hiring the new employees for the department.

Brennan said she should be notified of new hires and there should be random auditing of some of the hires to determine if there was compliance with the Shakman Decree. There should also be an order barring retaliation against anyone assisting in her work, Brennan said.

State Spent $478,385 To Check Guardrails (TENN)

The Tennessean, September 7, 2005

The Tennessee Department of Transportation said yesterday that it spent $478,385 to inspect every inch of guardrail across the state for evidence of improper installation, but the state won't say what was found.

Efforts are under way to repair any deficient guardrails.

Some of the state's guardrail companies are under scrutiny by the FBI, the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. Transportation Department and the state on suspicion of installing guardrail posts shorter than required lengths.

Evidence began to surface in January after an anonymous tip from a guardrail employee. As additional evidence came to light, TDOT deployed teams in May to inspect more than 4,000 miles of state highway guardrails. The state inspection wrapped up Sept. 1, said Kim Keelor, a TDOT spokeswoman, adding that the results of the review are not being made public as ordered by the state attorney general's office.

"We will try to recoup as much of that money as possible, through legal recourses, from contractors involved in installing any guardrail found to be deficient," Keelor said.

The findings are confidential for litigation reasons, said Sharon Curtis-Flair, spokeswoman for the attorney general's office.

"Like TDOT, we're always concerned about the public's safety," Curtis-Flair said. "We're going to see to it that the (guardrails) get fixed as quickly as they can."

Keelor said TDOT crews are beginning to "pull, check, and replace if needed, any guardrail terminals that were flagged as possibly being deficient."

This phase of the guardrail improvements is expected to take until the end of the year.

Man Charged In Killings Of Sex Offenders (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003252

A man who told the police that he had found his victims on a sheriff's department Web site was arraigned yesterday in the killings of two convicted sex offenders in Bellingham, Wash.

Investigators said the man, Michael A. Mullen, was upset by a child abuse case in Idaho that involved a repeat sex offender.

They said Mr. Mullen, 36, telephoned the 911 center in Bellingham on Monday to confess to a double killing in which a man posing as an F.B.I. agent visited the home of three known sex offenders and told them they were on a hit list and in danger.

One of the three left for work, and upon returning found the other two, Hank Eisses, 49, and Victor Vasquez, 68, dead from single gunshot wounds to the head.

After calling the police to confess to the killings on Monday, Mr. Mullen surrendered to the authorities. He was arraigned in Whatcom County Superior Court yesterday, just hours after the police charged him with two counts of first-degree murder.

"I can't think of another set of circumstances out there where such a killing has occurred," said Lt. Craige Ambrose of the Bellingham Police Department.

Mr. Mullen said that he had been planning the murders for some time, officials said, and that he was upset over killings in Idaho in which a sex offender is charged.

A common theme in the interview was the case in Idaho, Lieutenant Ambrose said, adding: "He was upset that a sex offender killed a family and abducted the kids. He said that a couple of times. That was one of the things that may have triggered this."

The Idaho case involved a repeat sex offender, Joseph E. Duncan III, who is accused of fatally beating three people with a hammer in a house outside Coeur d'Alene and then abducting two children. One of the children, Shasta Groene, 8, was with Mr. Duncan when he was arrested. The body of her brother, Dylan, 9, was found two days later.

Mr. Mullen told the police that he searched the Whatcom County sheriff's sex offender Web site. The site includes addresses for the convicted offenders, with the number of the street address partly withheld. He focused on the home of Hank Eisses, who lived with the two other sex offenders.

Mr. Mullen, who the police said "selected at least one of the two victims," went to the Eisses house on Aug. 26, posing as a federal agent. The police said he wore a black ball cap with the F.B.I. insignia and a dark blue jump suit.

The roommate who escaped harm, James A. Russell, 42, has been moved to an undisclosed location.

Kit Bail, the regional administrator for the Washington Department of Corrections, said the authorities had contacted other sex offenders in Whatcom County and advised them to screen visitors and request identification.

"We are letting them know about the potential threats and giving them some perspective on what can make them safe," Ms. Bail said.

The authorities said they had not determined whether Mr. Mullen was acting alone. Letters sent to a newspaper and television station in Bellingham just after the killings warned that more sex offenders would die.

"We did, of course, take the letters seriously since we already had two people killed," Ms. Bail said. "The letter claimed there was a conspiracy, threatened the lives of other sex offenders and suggested the notion that there was a vigilante out there, seeking other targets."

Washington's sex offender registration law is 15 years old and like the laws in other states, tries to monitor the rehabilitation of sex offenders returned to the county of their convictions and the risk presented by them.

Corrections officials had been satisfied with the progress of Mr. Eisses, Mr. Vasquez and Mr. Russell, who was the most recent to move into the Bellingham house.

"They were what we called a success story," Ms. Bail said. "They had lived there for a number of years and although neighbors were not particularly happy about it, they all knew them. There had been no community problems and they had not reoffended."

Man In Wash. Murders Tries To Plead Guilty (TLPA)

By Donna Gordon Blankinship

Times Leader (NE PA), September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003253

BELLINGHAM, Wash. - A man arrested in the shooting deaths of two convicted child rapists tried to plead guilty Tuesday before he had even been formally charged.

Police believe Michael Anthony Mullen might have targeted the men in reaction to a notorious case in Idaho in May in which two children were abducted and one was slain.

"Can I have a speedy trial?" Mullen asked a court official, via closed circuit television from jail, during a preliminary hearing Tuesday. "I would like to plead guilty."

Prosecutor Mac Setter said Mullen would be formally charged with the murders Wednesday. Whatcom County Superior Court Commissioner David Thorn set bail at $1 million and scheduled Mullen's arraignment - when a formal plea may be entered - for Sept. 16.

Police said Mullen, 35, called them on Monday to turn himself in and later confessed to killing Hank Eisses and Victor Vazquez in their home on Aug. 27.

The hearing revealed that Mullen may have had help on the day the two men died. Setter said an unidentified woman whom he described as a witness had driven Mullen to and from the scene.

Mullen may have been motivated by the case of Joseph Edward Duncan, a convicted sex offender who is accused of killings and child abductions in Idaho, police said.

"One possible reason was the case in Idaho," Bellingham Police Lt. Craige Ambrose told The Associated Press. Ambrose wouldn't elaborate, and Setter refused to discuss possible motives.

Police said they believe Mullen's claim that he killed the Bellingham sex offenders because he knew details only the killer would know: the caliber of the weapon used, and that the victims were each shot once in the head.

"Mullen also said that he had planned the murders for some time and that on July 13, 2005, he had accessed the county sheriff's sex offender Web site, and from that selected at least one of the two victims," according to a police statement.

As is typical in Washington, the sheriff's Web site lists the residences of sex offenders who are required to register with local authorities.

Mullen has a criminal record but no history of violence, Ambrose said.

In the Idaho case, Joseph Edward Duncan is accused of fatally beating three people with a hammer in a home outside Coeur d'Alene in order to abduct two children for sex.

He was arrested July 2 at a restaurant with one of the children, 8-year-old Shasta Groene. Remains of her 9-year-old brother, Dylan, were found in a Montana forest two days later.

According to police, Mullen said he mailed a letter about the Bellingham killings to several news outlets last week. The Bellingham Herald, the daily newspaper in this college and mill town of about 71,000, reported Thursday that the letter threatened other sexual predators.

Eisses, 49, and Vazquez, 68, were both classified as Level 3 sex offenders, the type considered most likely to re-offend.

Their bodies were found by a roommate, also a sex offender, who said a man wearing a blue jumpsuit and a cap that said "FBI" came to the house, told them he was an FBI agent and said he wanted to discuss their status as sex offenders.

The supposed federal agent told them that one of them was on a "hit list," police said.

The roommate said he left while the FBI impostor was still there and he found the bodies when he returned about four hours later.

Vazquez was convicted in 1991 of molesting several relatives, according to court documents. He was released from prison about two years ago and remained under supervision.

Eisses was sentenced to 5 1/2 years in prison in 1997 for raping a 13-year-old boy. He was released from supervision about two years ago, said Kit Bail, Corrections Department field supervisor for the county.

Man Admits To Killing 2 Sex Offenders, Cites Idaho Case (LAT)

By Tomas Alex Tizon, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

SEATTLE — The man who confessed to slaying two registered sex offenders in Bellingham, Wash., told police that he was outraged by the recent case of Joseph Edward Duncan III, a convicted sexual predator being held in Idaho.

Michael Anthony Mullen, 36, made a brief court appearance Tuesday in Whatcom County Superior Court, about 80 miles north of here, after turning himself in to Bellingham police Monday afternoon.

Mullen, a longtime resident of Whatcom County with a history of petty crimes, faces charges in the Aug. 26 shooting deaths of Hank Eisses, 49, and Victor Vasquez, 68. Both victims were Level III sex offenders, considered the most likely to commit similar crimes again. Mullen's arrest all but ended fears that a vigilante was on the loose targeting other registered sex offenders in the Bellingham area.

"It's a relief that he's not running around anymore with who-knows-what on his mind, probably more of the same," said Bellingham Mayor Mark Asmundson, who was informed of Mullen's arrest minutes after it happened.

Police said Mullen called 911 from a Bellingham restaurant and confessed to the murders. He was arrested and questioned for "hours and hours," said Bellingham police Lt. Craige Ambrose.

Investigators said Mullen provided details of the crime that only the killer would know, such as the caliber of the weapon and the way in which each victim was shot: once in the head. Ambrose said that during the interview Mullen repeatedly "came back around to the Idaho incident," referring to the Duncan case.

"Let's just say he was influenced by what happened there," Ambrose said.

Duncan, a 42-year-old convicted sex predator from Tacoma, Wash., is in Kootenai County, Idaho, awaiting trial in the slayings of four people and the kidnapping of two children in May near Coeur D'Alene, Idaho. Duncan is being investigated in the deaths of other children across four states, including California.

Less than two weeks after Duncan's case made national headlines, police said, Mullen got on a Whatcom County website that listed the names and addresses of all Level III sex offenders in the county.

Eisses and Vasquez lived with a third sex offender in a little green house on Northwest Avenue.

According to earlier reports, a man entered the victims' home, just north of downtown Bellingham, impersonating an FBI agent. He told the men that there was a hit list targeting sex offenders and that he was there to warn them.

The third occupant left for work with the man still in the house. When he returned home from work, he found his housemates dead. Eisses had been convicted of child rape and Vasquez of child rape and molestation. Both men had committed their crimes in Whatcom County.

On Aug. 31, five days after the slayings, the Bellingham Herald received a letter from someone claiming responsibility for the killings and threatening to kill all other Whatcom County sex offenders designated as Level III. The county has 31 registered Level III offenders, including four in Bellingham, which has a population of 71,000.

Police said Mullen had confessed to sending the letter and told investigators that more letters would soon be arriving at other media outlets. Ambrose said he did not know the content of those letters.

Ambrose said Mullen, standing 6 feet 5 and weighing about 250 pounds, had no known history of violence but had an extensive history of theft and other property crimes. Mullen had no permanent address, police said.

The slayings stirred debate over the 1990 state law requiring sex offenders to register their addresses. Washington was the first state to pass such a law, which is intended to help the public keep track of dangerous sexual predators. In 1994, Congress mandated that states create registers of sex offenders. Now all 50 states have their own version of Washington's Community Protection Act.

Supporters say the public has a right to know about such offenders, but opponents argue that publicizing exact addresses invites vigilantism and prevents sexual offenders from leading normal lives.

Lawyers Protest Court Venue For Prison-bus Killing (BSUN)

By Lisa Goldberg

The Baltimore Sun, September 7, 2005

The night Philip E. Parker Jr. was killed, the crime scene was on the move.

DOJ_NMG_0003255

As a prison bus rumbled through the darkness on a winter night, passing through four Maryland counties and into Baltimore on a 75-mile trek to the city's Supermax prison, Parker was strangled and left slumped between rows of seats.

A fellow inmate was charged in Baltimore County with murder, which suggests that investigators believe the crime occurred there. But attorneys for the man, Kevin G. Johns Jr., say Parker likely died elsewhere -- and legal observers say a judge's ruling could be a matter of life and death.

"Baltimore County seeks the death penalty much, much, much more frequently than any other venue, so certainly on the defense side, you don't want to be in Baltimore County," said Byron L. Warnken, a University of Baltimore law professor.

The death penalty is never mentioned in court papers challenging Baltimore County prosecutors' right to try Johns, 22, but it lurks under the surface.

In 2002, researchers from Columbia, Rutgers and New York universities ranked Baltimore County second among large counties nationwide in the rate at which convicted murderers are sentenced to death. A University of Maryland study released a year later found that the county dominates the state in death-penalty cases and that prosecutors there are 13 times more likely to seek the death penalty than are prosecutors in the city.

"The stakes are very high for Mr. Johns," said Douglas Colbert, a University of Maryland law professor.

A hearing to determine which jurisdiction should try the case was originally scheduled for last month but was delayed because of the illness of one of Johns' lawyers. Last week, Baltimore County Circuit Judge Thomas J. Bollinger postponed the matter until the first week of January and set a trial date for July 31.

While Johns' case might seem an apt one for any prosecutor to consider seeking the death penalty -- he has previously been convicted of two murders, one inside and one outside prison -- the decision for many jurisdictions often comes down to a question of resources, court observers say.

In other areas, "there are so many factors that enter that decision," Colbert said.

William C. Brennan Jr., one of Johns' lawyers, would not comment beyond the court filings in the case.

Evidence conflicts

Exactly what led authorities to choose Baltimore County as the place to charge Johns is still unclear. Prosecutor S. Ann Brobst said there is "ample evidence" that Parker was killed in Baltimore County, but she would not discuss the specifics.

A termination notice for one of the correctional officers involved in the transport notes that "the trip proceeded without apparent incident" until the bus reached the area of Security Square Mall in the county, where one officer said he saw Johns switch seats "and became suspicious that there was a problem."

Johns and Parker, 20, were among more than 30 inmates and five correctional officers on the bus as it traveled along Interstate 70 from the Maryland Correctional Training Center near Hagerstown to the Maryland Correctional Adjustment Center, also known as Supermax, during the early-morning hours of Feb. 2.

Johns' lawyers argue in court filings that the strangling likely took place in Howard County -- although they also point to statements from inmates on the bus that alternately place the act in Washington, Frederick and Howard counties.

Johns said in an interview with authorities that the attack took place about 15 minutes after the bus left the Hagerstown prison, according to a defense brief.

Evidence points to the attack taking place before the bus reached Baltimore County, making that jurisdiction the wrong venue for the case, the lawyers wrote.

Case is 'trickier'

What makes the case unique is the lack of certainty about the most basic of details, legal observers say.

"Your normal murder occurs within a particular boundary, on a street corner or in a person's home -- not in a moving vehicle -- so it's very clear where the crime scene is," said defense attorney Margaret Mead, who unsuccessfully argued a decade ago to have a client's trial moved to Baltimore City based on similar circumstances. When a moving car or bus is involved, "that's when it gets trickier."

In Mead's previous case, a woman was fatally stabbed in 1995 while traveling from the city to the county on northbound Interstate 83. Two women were charged after they were seen dumping the body of 30-year-old Myra Harrison in northern Baltimore County.

DOJ_NMG_0003256

Mead said it would have been better for her client, Latina Rose Smith, to be tried by a city jury. Her client was not facing the death penalty but was afraid of facing a Baltimore County jury, she said.

"I think it was a better jury pool [in the city] to have listen to the dynamics between these women," she said.

Previous case set mark

But Mead lost her motion at the Baltimore County Circuit Court level and, later, in a reported opinion by the Court of Special Appeals that set the benchmark for determining venue in a case -- allowing the state to use a less stringent standard of proof to determine where a case should be tried.

The state only has to show that the crime occurred "close enough to the county boundary" when the evidence is ambiguous, Colbert said.

To prevail in the Johns case, the defense will have to prove a timeline of events and the location of each, Mead said.

"What's going to be hard is getting any precise location of where death occurred," she said.

Inmate made threat

Parker's mother, Melissa Rodriguez, said she worries that people have forgotten her son as the focus shifts to Johns.

The day before Parker's death, Johns said in open court that he would likely kill again if he didn't get the psychiatric help he needed. He was sentenced to life without parole for the death of his 16-year-old cellmate at a hearing in which Parker was called to testify on his behalf.

Several correctional officers were fired or disciplined after the killing on the bus.

Parker, who was serving a three-year sentence for unarmed robbery at the time of his death, had about 15 months left before his release, his mother said.

'I just want it done'

Rodriguez would not say whether she was in favor of the county's decision to seek death for Johns but said she doesn't want the case to move now. Doing so would take away the Baltimore County-based support system she's already come to rely on, she said.

"It already started there. I know the people there, and I feel comfortable with them," she said. "I just want it done and over with."

Judge Finds FBI Not Liable For Bungling Call From Killer (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, September 7, 2005

A federal judge ruled yesterday that the FBI can't be sued over a clerk's bungling of a call from Gary Lee Sampson when the killer offered to surrender on bank robbery charges, just a day before going on a murderous rampage four years ago.

US District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay dismissed a $10 million lawsuit filed by the family of one of Sampson's three victims, 69-year-old Philip McCloskey, of Taunton.

In a 24-page opinion, the judge wrote that federal law protects the government from being sued for negligence because former FBI clerk William H. Anderson was exercising his discretion when he disconnected Sampson's call to the FBI's Boston office on July 23, 2001, and failed to tell anyone about it.

The FBI's broad discretion to decide whether to investigate or apprehend someone "encompasses the discretion of an individual officer like Anderson to report or not report a particular call," Lindsay wrote.

McCloskey's son, Scott, said it was ridiculous that the FBI has no legal responsibility, even though Anderson was sentenced to six months in prison for lying under oath when he initially denied taking Sampson's phone call.

"He was made accountable for his mistake, so why can't the FBI be held accountable for their mistake?" said Scott McCloskey, of Plymouth.

After Sampson pleaded guilty to federal carjacking and murder charges, a jury recommended in December 2003 that he be executed -- making him the only person ever sentenced to the federal death penalty in Massachusetts. He's currently on death row at the federal prison in Terre Haute, Ind., while he appeals his sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0003257

The Abington native admitted that he carjacked McCloskey in Weymouth on July 24, 2001, and forced him at knifepoint to drive to Marshfield, where he walked him deep into the woods, tied him up, and stabbed him 24 times.

Three days later, Sampson carjacked 19-year-old Jonathan Rizzo, of Kingston, outside a Plymouth restaurant. He forced the college sophomore to drive to Abington, where he tied him to a tree in the woods and repeatedly stabbed him.

Sampson then fled in Rizzo's car to New Hampshire, where he broke into a vacation home on Lake Winnipesaukee and stabbed 59-year-old Robert "Eli" Whitney to death when he arrived to cut the lawn.

Sampson called police and surrendered the next day after breaking into a ski chalet in Plymouth, Vt., and setting off a burglar alarm. Then, Sampson, who was wanted for bank robberies in North Carolina, revealed that he had called the FBI's Boston office from a convenience store in Abington the day before going on his rampage and offered to surrender.

Sampson said he waited outside the store for several hours, but the FBI never showed up.

"They didn't even make an attempt to come and arrest him," Scott McCloskey said. "If they did show up and caught him they would have got all kinds of glory for catching this bank robber . . . and my father would still be alive."

Anderson, who had been filling in for a switchboard operator at lunchtime, said he had inadvertently disconnected Sampson's call when trying to switch it to an agent.

FBI officials said at the time that the bureau doesn't record its calls and didn't have the ability to track the lost call.

The McCloskeys also named Sampson, who is indigent, in the suit and were seeking $25 million in damages from him. The judge ruled yesterday that if the McCloskeys want to go forward against Sampson they must take their suit to state court.

Brockton attorney Kevin Reddington, who represents the McCloskeys, said he'll review the judge's decision with the family and then decide whether to appeal it. He added, "We believe the government owes a duty of protection to its citizens."

In his ruling, Lindsay also rejected the McCloskeys' claim that the FBI had a responsibility to protect the public from Sampson.

The judge wrote that in an unrelated lawsuit brought against the FBI by the family of Debra Davis, one of the victims of South Boston crime boss James "Whitey" Bulger, he'd concluded that the government had a duty to protect the public because Bulger was a longtime informant.

However, Lindsay wrote that the FBI had no special relationship with Sampson that obligated the government to control Sampson's conduct, because he was neither an informant nor in FBI custody.

David V. Kirby, the United States attorney for Vermont, who defended the government against the lawsuit, declined to comment yesterday on Lindsay's ruling.

But in its motion seeking dismissal of the suit, federal prosecutors wrote that the FBI could not have foreseen that Sampson would commit murders after his phone call was disconnected.

"Plaintiffs simply cannot establish that any alleged negligence by the FBI actually or proximately caused McCloskey's murder," the prosecutors wrote.

Judge Dismisses Suit Against FBI (BOS)

The Boston Globe, September 7, 2005

BOSTON --A lawsuit against the FBI filed by the family of one of Gary Sampson's victims has been dismissed by a federal judge, who ruled that the government is protected from such suits despite bungling Sampson's offer to surrender.

U.S. District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay on Tuesday threw out the $10 million suit filed by the family of 69-year-old Philip McCloskey, who was one of Sampson's three victims during his interstate murder spree four years ago.

The judge, in a 24-page decision, said federal law protects the government from being sued for negligence because former FBI clerk William H. Anderson was using his discretion when he disconnected Sampson's call, and failed to notify anyone.

Sampson had called the FBI to surrender to bank robbery charges, but the call was disconnected. Sampson waited several hours for the FBI to arrest him outside a convenient store a day before his rampage.

He later admitted to killing two Massachusetts men and a New Hampshire man.

Scott McCloskey, the victim's son, told The Boston Globe that Anderson was held responsible -- he was sentenced to six months in prison for lying under oath when he initially denied taking Sampson's call -- but not the FBI.

DOJ_NMG_0003258

"He was made accountable for his mistake," McCloskey said, "so why can't the FBI be held accountable for their mistake?"

A drifter who grew up in Abington, Sampson confessed to killing McCloskey, Jonathan Rizzo, 19, of Kingston, and Robert "Eli" Whitney of Meredith, N.H., in July 2001. His weeklong crime spree ended with his capture in Vermont.

A jury in December 2003 sentenced Sampson to death. He is being held in a federal prison in Terre Haute, Ind., while he appeals the death sentence.

U.S. Supreme Court Is Asked To Decide If It's Proper To Let Sleeping Jurors Lie (LAW)

By Mary P. Gallagher, New Jersey Law Journal

Law.com, September 7, 2005

New Jersey's public defender wants the U.S. Supreme Court to issue a bright-line rule that a defendant's due process right to a fair trial is violated when jurors fall asleep during testimony.

Several jurors allegedly dozed off during Roy Higinia's October 1996 drug-possession trial in Essex County, N.J. The transcript shows that Assistant Deputy Public Defender Rafael Gomez, at a sidebar just prior to cross-examining a police detective, told the judge that four or five jurors were "deep asleep" and some were "falling asleep" during his opening.

Superior Court Judge Julius Feinberg said he had not noticed and the case would continue but he would "wake them up, if necessary." He then asked the jurors if the room was too hot and when one answered "a little bit," he had the windows opened.

The trial proceeded and Higinia was convicted and sentenced to five years in jail.

The Appellate Division rejected the argument that the defendant was entitled to jurors who have heard all the evidence. In State v. Higinia, A-5515-02, decided March 21, Judges Francine Axelrad and Rudy Coleman said Feinberg took "proper remedial measures" by opening the windows after surveying the jury. Further, since defense counsel did not request anything more at the time, the issue could not be raised on appeal.

They also found no prejudice because the alleged napping occurred during direct testimony by a prosecution witness and the jurors were awake for the cross-examination. The New Jersey Supreme Court denied certification on May 25.

In the petition for certiorari filed Aug. 23, Assistant Deputy Public Defender Lon Taylor said the appeals judges ignored state precedent that places an affirmative duty on the trial court to assure an attentive jury. Taylor asked the Court to rule that a sleeping juror is per se a structural error not amenable to harmless error review and so requires reversal.

The petition points out that Higinia, who admitted possessing cocaine, claimed that police fabricated the distribution charges and that jurors who slept through police testimony would miss the chance to assess credibility based on factors like body language and demeanor.

Sleeping jurors are not uncommon. A 1996 survey of state and federal judges by Vanderbilt Law Professor Nancy King found that 69 percent of the 562 respondents had seen at least one in an estimated 2,300 cases during the preceding three years.

Rachel Sacharow, a spokeswoman for the state Division of Criminal Justice, declined comment last week, saying her office had not yet seen the petition.

Millions More In Bogus Cigarettes, Cash Seized By Feds (NSDY)

Long Island Newsday, September 7, 2005

NEWARK, N.J. -- In the weeks since federal authorities said they smashed a smuggling ring that brought counterfeit cash, cigarettes, and drugs into the U.S., additional raids have netted $5 million more in bogus cigarettes and $2 million more in fake U.S. currency.

Operation Royal Charm, in which 87 Asians and U.S. citizens were arrested in mid-August, netted $4.4 million in high-quality fake $100 bills, more than 1 billion counterfeit cigarettes worth $42 million, and hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of ecstasy, methamphetamines and Viagra, officials said.

At the time of the arrests, officials said some of the cigarettes were made in China and the money appeared to have been produced in North Korea.

Since the arrests, authorities seized an additional $1.8 million worth of cigarettes in southern New Jersey on Aug. 21, followed by a seizure of $2.7 million worth of cigarettes the next day at Port Elizabeth, according to the FBI.

DOJ_NMG_0003259

On Aug. 23, approximately $2 million in counterfeit U.S. currency, commonly referred to as "super notes," were seized by Taiwanese and American authorities in Kaohsiung, Taiwan, authorities said.

And on Aug. 24, more cigarettes worth more than $500,000 were seized in northern New Jersey.

Some of the arrests were made when alleged smugglers expected to attend a lavish wedding aboard a yacht in Atlantic City but were instead transported into the hands of federal agents.

Gotti Was 'A Street Boss,' Prosecutors Say In Closing (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

John A. Gotti, the prince of the Gambino crime family, ordered the 1992 kidnapping of the Guardian Angels founder, Curtis Sliwa, because he regarded himself as "the street boss of his own government," a federal prosecutor said yesterday in his closing argument in Mr. Gotti's racketeering trial.

Summing up the government's case in the four-week trial, the prosecutor, Joon Kim, said Mr. Gotti would not have been satisfied to "write a letter to the editor" with his complaints about Mr. Sliwa's tirades against the Gotti family on his morning radio show on WABC-AM.

"Instead of engaging in a public debate, Gotti responded in the Gambino crime family's native language: violence," Mr. Kim said.

Mr. Gotti, the son of John J. Gotti, the late Gambino boss, is on trial in Federal District Court in Manhattan on broad racketeering-conspiracy charges that include the June 19, 1992, attack on Mr. Sliwa. Mr. Sliwa was abducted in a New York taxicab and shot in the leg and abdomen at point-blank range before escaping through an open window.

Mr. Kim pointed to corroboration in testimony about the attack by two former Gambino members, Michael DiLeonardo and Joseph D'Angelo, who said he was the driver of the cab.

The prosecutor concluded his three-hour summation assailing Mr. Gotti's defense argument that he withdrew from organized crime after he was arrested in 1997 on earlier racketeering charges. Mr. Gotti pleaded guilty in 1999, and has served more than six years in jail.

"This argument is simply nonsense," Mr. Kim said. "You've seen no evidence of withdrawal."

To comply with a five-year statute of limitations on the charges, the prosecutors must show that Mr. Gotti continued to commit crimes with the Gambino organization after July 1999 - while he was in Ray Brook federal prison in upstate New York. Mr. Kim pointed to testimony from Mr. DiLeonardo that he complied in mid-2000 after Mr. Gotti asked him for $50,000 in loan sharking funds that Mr. DiLeonardo had been holding. Mr. Lichtman, Mr. Gotti's lawyer, is to sum up his defense today.

Also on trial are Louis Mariani, accused of extortion and securities fraud, and Michael Yannotti, charged with shooting Mr. Sliwa, among other crimes. Mr. Mariani's lawyer, Charles Carnesi, said the turncoat witnesses had all shown they were liars.

"They spit out a story and the prosecutors and the F.B.I. decide not to check the story and it becomes the truth," Mr. Carnesi said. "The game is rigged."

Prosecutors: Gotti Son Ordered Sliwa Attack As Part Of Criminal Reign (NYNSDY)

By Patricia Hurtado, Staff Writer

New York Newsday, September 7, 2005

A federal prosecutor contended Tuesday that John "Junior" Gotti's claim that he retired from mob life after his 1999 guilty plea is "ridiculous and sounds like a way to get a pass for a lifetime of crime."

In closing arguments to the jury after the month-long trial, Assistant Manhattan U.S. Attorney Joon Kim said that while Gotti pleaded guilty to federal racketeering charges in April 1999, he never stopped committing crimes as Gotti lawyer Jeffrey Lichtman asserted.

Kim said Gotti was appointed the "street boss" of the Gambino crime family after his father, mob boss John Gotti, was imprisoned in 1992.

Kim also said Junior Gotti was so enraged by comments radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa made about the "Dapper Don" that Junior Gotti dispatched two thugs to inflict a beating on Sliwa so severe "he would have to be scraped off the ground."

"In Gotti's mind he was not a normal citizen obliged to obey the law," Kim said of the younger man. "He believed he was special because he had become the street boss of his own government, a government which had its own set of rules and law, whose only purpose is to make money and commit crimes."

Kim cited the testimony of Joseph D'Angelo, a former Gambino soldier, who testified as a government witness that Junior Gotti dispatched him and Michael Yanotti to kidnap Sliwa and put him in the hospital.

"In Gotti's government, there is no right of free speech," Kim said.

Yanotti, charged with conspiracy and attempted murder for shooting Sliwa during the foiled kidnapping, is on trial with Gotti.

D'angelo testified Gotti oversaw nearly every aspect of the Sliwa attack, and yesterday, Kim reminded jurors that when D'angelo balked at attacking Sliwa, Gotti said: "I want it to be personal. I want him to know we had our hands on him."

And Kim asserted that testimony from other mobsters who once were close to Gotti, including former best friend Michael DiLeonardo, proved that Gotti continued his life of crime behind bars and reaped millions of dollars from the Gambinos' extortion of unions and construction firms and through loan sharking.

"We've seen no evidence of withdrawal," Kim said. "Instead, we've heard Gotti continued to receive illegal proceeds and benefits through 2001."

Kim said that six months after Junior Gotti was incarcerated he sent a message to subordinates to "push out" thousands of dollars in loansharking for the mob. Gotti later used mob proceeds to purchase commercial property on Hempstead Avenue in Queens Village, Kim said.

Lichtman is to deliver his closing arguments today.

Charles Carnesi, a lawyer for Gotti another co-defendant, Louis Mariani, a reputed Gambino associate, told jurors in his closing arguments yesterday that there was no evidence his client reaped millions of dollars from illicit Gambino operations.

Mariani is charged with racketeering, loansharking and stock fraud.

Prosecutor: Gotti's Son Ordered Sliwa Hit (AP)

By MICHAEL WEISSENSTEIN, The Associated Press

AP, September 7, 2005

NEW YORK (AP) — New York was buzzing about Gambino crime boss John Gotti in the spring of 1992, and radio host Curtis Sliwa didn't hide his disdain for the "Dapper Don."

Calling the boss "America's No. 1 drug dealer," Sliwa infuriated the late mobster's son and protege, John A. "Junior" Gotti, a federal prosecutor said Tuesday as the younger Gotti's racketeering trial drew to a close.

Gotti "didn't respond like an ordinary citizen," Assistant U.S. Attorney Joon Kim said in his closing argument. "Instead of engaging in public debate, Gotti responded to Sliwa's words in the Gambino family native language: violence."

Advertisement

The younger Gotti sent thugs to beat Sliwa with baseball bats, Kim said. But Sliwa didn't shut up, so two mobsters were dispatched to pick him up in a stolen cab, the prosecutor said.

As Sliwa struggled to escape, a hitman opened fire, leaving the Guardian Angels founder weak and bleeding in the back seat, Kim said.

Sliwa escaped by throwing himself out the cab window but other Gambino family rivals were not as lucky, Kim said, describing the machine-gun slaying of two other men, one killed simply because he was with the intended target.

Defense attorneys claim the younger Gotti, 41, had nothing to do with Sliwa's shooting and other attacks and quit the mob after a 1999 racketeering conviction.

But Kim called that argument "simply nonsense," saying Gotti was "a man who used his name to get to the top of this criminal enterprise ... a man who used his position in the family to line his pockets with millions of dollars in illegal money."

Gotti continued to meet with gangsters, take their tribute money and plot crimes in the years after his purported renunciation of the mob life, Kim said.

"You've seen no evidence of withdrawal," he told jurors.

Gotti's alleged role in the Sliwa attack is part of racketeering charges that could keep him in prison for up to 30 years. Gotti's attorney was to begin his summation Wednesday.

The elder Gotti was sentenced to life in prison in 1992 and died in prison in 2002.

Sliwa described the cab attack to jurors in gruesome detail last month, recounting how a masked gunman hiding in the front passenger seat "popped up like a jack-in-the-box," swore at him and began shooting.

Wounded in the stomach and bleeding profusely, Sliwa discovered the cab had been rigged so he couldn't open the back doors. He said he saved himself by throwing himself into the front seat and out the passenger window as the cab sped down the street.

"He would be dead if he didn't somehow leap out the window of a speeding cab," Kim said.

The trial has also featured the testimony of Michael "Mikey Scars" DiLeonardo, one of the highest-ranking Gambinos to become a cooperator.

Trial Of 'Junior' Gotti Draws To Close In New York (REU)

By Christine Kearney

Reuters, September 7, 2005

NEW YORK (Reuters) - The son of late mob boss John Gotti ordered a vicious attack from prison on the founder of the Guardian Angels anti-crime patrol as retribution for comments the man made about Gotti's father, prosecutors said on Tuesday.

John A. Gotti, also known as "Junior," rose to become the "street boss" of the Gambino crime family for most of the 1990s after his father, known as the "Dapper Don," went to prison, prosecutor Joon Kim told the jury in closing arguments at Gotti's federal trial in Manhattan.

Kim said the younger Gotti ordered an attack in 1992 on Curtis Sliwa that left the Guardian Angels' founder bloodied in a taxi cab with multiple bullet wounds after Sliwa made derogatory comments about his infamous father on his talk radio show.

In an attack on Sliwa a few months earlier, three thugs pummeled him with baseball bats, the prosecutor said.

"He (Gotti) sent his underlings to do his dirty work for him," said Kim. "Gotti responded to Sliwa's words in the Gambino family's native language: violence."

In the racketeering trial, Gotti faces a number of charges, including conspiracy to commit securities fraud, extortion of construction businesses and loan sharking, as well as the attempted kidnapping of Sliwa. If convicted, he faces up to 30 years in prison.

Jeffrey Lichtman, Gotti's defense attorney, has argued that his client turned away from crime since pleading guilty to racketeering charges in 1999. Lichtman described Gotti as a devoted father of five who drove a minivan and changed diapers.

Lichtman has said the prosecution's case was based on an array of untrustworthy witnesses who agreed to testify against Gotti so that they could get lighter prison terms.

Kim told jurors the array of mob turncoats who testified during the trial, including the driver of the taxi, Joseph D'Angelo, was "powerful, corroborating evidence." Sliwa provided colorful testimony, in which he described how he used the back seat of the taxi like a trampoline to escape through the window.

"He told you in frightening detail what happened to him that morning," Kim told jurors, noting how Sliwa described "blood oozing out of his body and soaking his shirt."

"Curtis Sliwa was shot in the stomach and the leg at point blank range. He would be dead if he didn't somehow leap out of the window of a speeding cab," he said.

The prosecutor said Gotti's contention he wanted out of organized crime after pleading guilty to racketeering charges in 1999 in a separate case was "nonsense" and that he continued to commit crimes from prison following the earlier plea.

Gotti's defense attorney planned to present closing arguments on Wednesday.

The elder Gotti died in prison in 2002.

PartyGaming Shares Plunge As Growth Rates To Slow (Update5) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 7, 2005

Shares of PartyGaming Plc, the online poker operator that sold $1.9 billion of stock in a June initial public offering, fell as much as 37 percent to below the IPO price after the company said revenue growth is slowing.

The stock dropped as much as 58.75 pence to 98 pence in London, wiping about 2.4 billion pounds ($4.4 billion) from the company's market value. The shares, which were sold to the public at 116 pence each, were at 105 pence at 12:50 p.m. local time. Stock of competitors including Sportingbet Plc also fell.

PartyGaming's share sale was more than three times subscribed by investors on expectations that the increased popularity of online poker will spur growth in an industry that's expanded 10-fold in three years. The company's revenue gains are slowing as more operators seek to enter the market, adding to competition.

``There were some clear dangers in relation to the valuation of this company and our concerns have been realized," said Henk Potts, a London-based fund manager at Barclays Private Clients, which manages the equivalent of $45 billion. ``PartyGaming is all about its growth potential, and some investors decided to bet on the growth rather than consider the potential slowdown."

Profit rose 25 percent in the first half, PartyGaming said today in a statement, as revenue gained 81 percent. The company incurred costs of $62.3 million related to its stock sale.

World Series of Poker

The drop in PartyGaming's share price has redressed the ``hype" that caused the stock to gain after the IPO, said Paul Leyland, an analyst at Seymour Pierce in London.

``The market has misinterpreted what's actually just happened in the same way that it misinterpreted that poker was going to the moon ad infinitum initially," said Leyland, who doesn't have a formal recommendation on the stock.

Gibraltar-based PartyGaming, formed in 1997, said revenue growth in July and August was slower and weaker than expected. This may have been caused by the later screening of the World Series of Poker, which this year started on Aug. 23, Chief Executive Richard Segal said on a conference call. The event, aired by Walt Disney Co.'s ESPN, began last year on July 6.

``We may have revenues which are slightly lower than what we had initially anticipated based on a softer pick-up in the third quarter," Finance Director Martin Weigold said on the call. ``That may just be a blip, it may be a trend."

The poker industry has swelled as events such as the World Series of Poker have encouraged more people play games such as Texas Hold'em on line. About 29,000 players competed for more than $103 million of prize money at this year's tournament in Las Vegas.

`Highly Competitive'

The number of days on which regular users played poker rose 59 percent in July and August from the same period last year, slowing from a 102 percent gain in the first half, Segal said.

PartyGaming said customer retention rates are falling as more casual players come on line. Competition is increasing in the market, which is 51 percent-controlled by Gibraltar-based PartyGaming. Empire Online Ltd., which helps poker and casino Web sites win customers, also had an initial public offering in June, and 888 Holdings Plc, the world's largest Web casino operator by number of visitors, is planning a $500 million share sale.

``The market has been highly competitive for some time and remains highly competitive," Segal said.

A spokesman for 888 said the company's IPO plan remains on track and amid ``very positive feedback" from investors.

According to research company Christensen Capital Advisors, growth in online poker will slow to 60 percent in 2006 from 130 percent in 2005, and to 30 percent in 2007. The industry grew to $1 billion in 2004 from $90 million in 2002, Christensen says.

Gaming companies have raised $4.5 billion selling shares over the last 12 months. Sportingbet sold stock twice in the period, raising a total of $220 million, Bloomberg data show.

First-Half Results

Shares of Sportingbet, the owner of Paradise Poker, fell as much as 18 percent in London today. Stock of Ukbetting Plc, which operates Ukbettingpoker.co.uk, dropped as much as 9 percent.

PartyGaming said first-half net income rose to $171 million, or 4.5 cents a share, from $136.5 million, or 3.6 cents, a year earlier. Earnings before interest, tax, depreciation and goodwill amortization rose 70 percent to $257.7 million.

Revenue, 92 percent of which comes from fees for poker games played on the company's Web site, increased to $437.4 million, PartyGaming said. Sales in the U.S. gained 77 percent, while growth outside the U.S. more than doubled.

The company makes 87 percent of its revenue in the U.S., where the Justice Department considers online gambling illegal.

Dresdner Kleinwort Wasserstein cut its 2006 estimate for earnings before interest, tax and amortization by 12 percent to $622 million, according to a research note.

Segal said the company is ``monitoring developments'' at Empire Online after Sportingbet said yesterday that it may make a takeover offer.

To contact the reporter on this story: Paul Jarvis in London at pjarvis@bloomberg.net. Last Updated: September 6, 2005 08:11 EDT

Betfair Makes Online Odds On AC Milan, Hillary Clinton, Weather (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, September 7, 2005

On a rainy July afternoon on the opening day of Glorious Goodwood, a two-century-old British horse- racing extravaganza, cricket star Michael Atherton is mingling in the box rented by Betfair, an online gambling site that processes 2 million wagers a day, six times the trades on the London Stock Exchange.

Betfair co-founder Andrew Black, 42, sneaks in two hours late, flinging a blue tie around his neck to conform to the ``jacket and tie'' dress code.

``I'm still feeling rough,'' Black quips. Twelve hours earlier, he'd dressed up as a jockey with a cap and leather whip to celebrate the fifth birthday of his company, London-based Sporting Exchange Ltd., which operates under the Betfair name.

Black has more than one reason to celebrate. In June, Betfair hired Morgan Stanley, the world's largest securities firm, and Goldman Sachs Group Inc., the second-biggest adviser for global acquisitions, to look into its financial options, including a potential initial public offering.

Given the valuations of gambling companies that have gone public in the past six months, Betfair would be worth as much as 600 million pounds ($1.1 billion), says Martin Oelbermann, a director at Munich-based research firm MECN GmbH. The valuation takes Betfair's profit of 17.1 million pounds for the year ended in April and applies the price-earnings multiples of online gaming companies such as Empire Online Ltd., which directs gamblers to poker Web sites.

``The Internet has proven to be a fantastic medium for gambling,'' says Richard Carter, an equities analyst who covers the leisure industry at London-based brokerage Numis Corp.

Gambling Bubble?

Carter says as many as seven Internet gambling companies may sell shares to the public this year. ``Every online gambling sector is growing faster than its land-based counterpart,'' he says, comparing Internet gaming to traditional betting shops and casinos.

The hubbub surrounding Betfair and the host of new gambling sites recalls the Internet bubble of the late 1990s, says Paul Leyland, an analyst at London-based brokerage Seymour Pierce Ltd.

``For these valuations to hold, there is an assumption that all companies in the medium to long term can grow at double-digit rates,'' Leyland says. ``We are skeptical.''

Yesterday, shares of PartyGaming Plc, which runs PartyPoker.com, the world's biggest poker site, plunged 33 percent to 105 pence, below the IPO price of 116 pence, after the company said revenue growth is slowing.

PartyGaming's Slowdown

Gibraltar-based PartyGaming went public in June, raising 1.04 billion pounds. It was the U.K.'s biggest IPO since Reading, England-based Yell Group Plc, which publishes Yellow Pages directories, raised 1.2 billion pounds in 2003.

Chief Executive Officer Richard Segal said on yesterday's conference call that the number of days during which regular users played poker rose 102 percent in the first half of 2005 from the same period a year earlier. In July and August, the pace slowed to 59 percent, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0003264

In addition, the revenue that each active player generates is falling because casual gamblers are joining and they play less frequently. ``The market has been highly competitive for some time and remains highly competitive," Segal said.

Online gaming generated $8.2 billion in revenue last year, or about 3 percent of the $243 billion global gambling market, according to New York-based research firm Christiansen Capital Advisors.

Betfair Stands Out

The online poker market alone soared to $1 billion in 2004 from $92 million in 2002. While revenue at traditional casino and gaming companies is likely to edge up 3 percent a year through 2009, revenue at online companies will surge about 22 percent annually to reach about $23 billion in that year, Christiansen predicts.

Oelbermann says Betfair stands out from competitors. He compares it to EBay Inc., the San Jose, California-based online auction house that matches buyers and sellers in a global marketplace.

Betfair charges nothing to a person who offers a wager. It takes a maximum cut of 5 percent of a winning bet. The strategy eliminates the bookmaker, the agent who offers odds and accepts bets for a fee.

In traditional casinos or gambling sites, customers play against the house, which builds a profit margin into the odds, making it hard to win, Black says.

In contrast, Betfair is a betting exchange -- an inspiration Black says he took from his stint in 1995 trading U.S. equities and learning about the New York Stock Exchange.

Split-Second Timing

A person who accesses Betfair's Web site can offer a bet and set the odds. If the odds are attractive, other bettors will take the counter position. This happens with split-second timing, and it's anonymous. Everybody has funds in the system to back their wagers. Transactions are reconciled immediately after the event is completed.

Betfair's 300,000 clients can -- and do -- bet on anything, from whether New York Senator Hillary Clinton will win the 2008 Democratic Party presidential nomination and how high home prices will rise in the U.K. to who will win MTV's best dance video and how hot the British summer will be.

Recent bets slightly favored Clinton's nomination, had housing prices reaching an average of 157,000 pounds to 158,999 pounds by December 2005, had Jennifer Lopez winning in the Best Dance Video category and were against temperatures reaching 100 degrees Fahrenheit (38 degrees Celsius).

In May, Betfair notched a company record of more than 10 million pounds of wagers on one event when the U.K.'s Liverpool soccer club came back from a 0-3 deficit against Italy's AC Milan to win the European Champions League final on penalty kicks.

`First-Mover Advantage'

``You can't beat the first-mover advantage," says Oelbermann, referring to the benefit he says Betfair and EBay have gained by being the first to strike it big from profits on client transactions. ``Nobody will be able to beat Betfair unless the management makes a massive mistake."

The gambling craze is spurring action on the acquisition front. Sportingbet Plc, which operates an online casino, accepts sports wagers and runs poker games, announced on Sept. 5 that it's in talks to buy Empire Online, which is based in the British Virgin Islands. Empire's shares have risen 44 percent this year to 252 pence yesterday. Sportingbet shares have gained 64 percent to 311 pence.

``The next wave of activity will be mergers and acquisitions," predicts Nigel Payne, Sportingbet's CEO. ``There will be 50 M&A deals in the next two years."

Getting big quickly may be the best way to ensure survival. Sporting Options Plc, a betting exchange like Betfair, filed for bankruptcy protection with debts of 5.4 million pounds in November 2004.

Failed Bet

Started in May 2002, Sporting Options took a maximum cut of 3 percent on a winning bet, less than Betfair's 5 percent ceiling. By 2003, losses had widened ninefold to 1 million pounds. The company struggled to attract 5,500 customers, less than one-tenth of Betfair's regular monthly clients.

DOJ_NMG_0003265

Black, who provided a 3.5 million-pound bailout for Sporting Options customers and took on some of the company's bets, declined to comment on plans for a Betfair IPO. He prefers to talk about how his company lets him do what he knows best. ``I read somewhere that to be a successful entrepreneur means being able to do things that you don't like," Black says as he watches half a dozen horses speed by Betfair's box. ``That's not me. I don't like to do things that I don't like."

From his earliest years, conforming was never part of Black's agenda. His grandfather was Sir Cyril Black, a teetotaler who campaigned against gambling as a Conservative Party Member of Parliament for Wimbledon, south of London.

Exeter University

The younger Black was expelled from Exeter University in southwestern England after he spent time gambling rather than studying.

He stacked shelves at a do-it-yourself store and toured Europe as a golf caddy -- a circuitous route to becoming a gambling mogul who's shaking up the old guard. Last year, Betfair processed $10 billion of wagers. Its strategy of taking a cut of every winning bet translated to a 63 percent jump in profit in the recent fiscal year. Revenue soared 61 percent to 107 million pounds.

Black says Betfair avoids legal headaches by taking no bets from residents of the U.S., a hotbed for online gamblers that produced 87 percent of PartyGaming's $600 million in revenue last year.

U.S. Laws

In April 2003, Deputy Assistant Attorney General John Malcolm told the Crime, Terrorism and Homeland Security Committee of the U.S. House of Representatives that if online gambling companies accept bets from customers in the U.S., they are violating federal laws.

``While the United States can indict these companies or the individuals operating these companies, it may be difficult to bring them to trial in the United States," Malcolm said.

In his testimony, Malcolm referred to the 1961 Federal Interstate Wire Act. The act states that it's illegal to use a ``wire communication facility," referring to a telephone, to transmit bets across state borders. Congress developed the act to stop organized crime involvement in sports gambling, says Lawrence Walters, a lawyer at Weston, Garrou, DeWitt & Walters in Altamonte Springs, Florida, who has advised the online gaming industry.

``The government has used the Wire Act as a threat against anyone providing services such as payment processing or advertising to the online gaming companies," Walters says. ``Even if they are empty threats, public companies are not going to take a chance."

Spitzer's Role

In June 2002, New York-based Citigroup Inc., the biggest issuer of credit cards at that time, reached an accord with state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, agreeing not to process transactions made at online casinos and other Internet gambling operations. Banks followed suit.

MBNA Corp., the Wilmington, Delaware-based bank that Bank of America Corp. has agreed to buy; Chase Manhattan, now part of JPMorgan Chase & Co., the third-largest U.S. bank; and Wells Fargo & Co., the top U.S. home equity lender, have agreed not to process online casino transactions. American Express Co., the fourth-biggest U.S. credit card issuer, prohibits cardholders from using their cards to gamble on line worldwide.

In July 2002, Spitzer subpoenaed PayPal Inc., the payment provider owned by EBay, questioning its use for online wagers. PayPal agreed to end payments for online gambling. U.S. Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra declined to comment on specific online gambling companies or cases. ``Our view is that online gambling in the United States is illegal," he says.

`Not Illegal'

PartyGaming's Segal says his company isn't doing anything wrong. ``We are satisfied that what we are doing is not illegal," he says.

Segal says he bases his reasoning on a court case in Louisiana and a ruling by the World Trade Organization. In 2001, Judge Stanwood Duval of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana in New Orleans dismissed a case against the world's second-biggest credit card brand, MasterCard International Inc. The suit asserted that MasterCard had run afoul of the Wire Act when it let customers use their cards to gamble and lose money at online casinos. The claimants argued that they shouldn't have to repay their debts because online gambling is illegal.

DOJ_NMG_0003266

``At this point in time, Internet casino gambling is not a violation of federal law," Duval ruled. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, also in New Orleans, affirmed the decision in November 2002.

Address Required

Then, in April 2005, the Geneva-based WTO's appellate body said that because a number of U.S. states allow online gaming on lotteries and some permit online betting on horse racing, it was difficult for the U.S. to justify banning online gaming internationally.

Betfair customers must give their address to register and submit bank details to deposit money into their account before they can wager. ``We don't accept bets from customers with a U.S. address or U.S. credit card," says CEO Stephen Hill, 44, sitting in a corner room in the company's glass and steel offices overlooking the Thames in West London.

On its home turf, Betfair is irritating traditional betting houses. David Harding, CEO of William Hill Plc, the U.K.'s biggest gambling company, says Betfair fosters unlicensed bookmaking because it lets anybody act as a bookmaker. The U.K. requires that bookmakers hold a permit from the Betting and Licensing Committee of a local Magistrates' Court.

`Perfectly Fine'

``If I go into a pub and offer to take bets from the public, I'd be arrested," Harding says, adding sarcastically, ``I do it on my computer, then that's perfectly fine."

In addition, Harding says, some regulated bookmakers use Betfair to avoid paying the U.K. racing levy. U.K. law mandates that bookmakers pay as much as 10 percent of their gross profits to the horse-racing industry. When a licensed bookmaker offers a bet on Betfair, he avoids paying that tax, Harding says.

``No overheads and no taxes to pay means that bookmakers using Betfair can offer better odds," he says. Betfair itself is subject to the U.K.'s 30 percent corporate tax and 15 percent gross-profits tax on its take of customers' winnings.

The rise of online casinos is also prompting debate about gambling addiction. People who gamble on the Internet may be more likely than traditional gamblers to have a problem, says Guy Clark, chairman of the nonprofit, Washington-based National Coalition Against Legalized Gambling.

Gambling Behavior

Clark cites a report by University of Connecticut psychologists George Ladd and Nancy Petry, who studied the gambling behavior of 389 people. They found that almost 11 percent were problem gamblers and more than 15 percent met the criteria for pathological gamblers, showing an inability to resist the impulse to gamble. The study further identified those with Internet gambling experience as having the most serious addictions.

``There is an awful lot of opposition to foreign online gambling companies becoming pervasive across the U.S.," Clark says.

Black grew up around traditional betting shops, the smoke- filled parlors where anyone can wager on a sporting event -- mostly horse races or football matches. The son of a property developer, Black attended Kings College, a private school for 7- to 18-year-olds in Wimbledon, the same district that his grandfather represented in Parliament. He got the nickname ``Bert" when a teacher mistakenly called him by the wrong name.

Even as Black's grandfather legislated against drinking and gambling, Black's father took his 8-year-old son to the Goodwood racetrack in the Sussex countryside.

Hooked on Excitement

Black says he became hooked on the excitement and the tactics for picking winners -- an avocation that hurt his studies when he enrolled at Exeter to study mathematics in 1981. The university expelled him two years later for failing some of his exams, he says.

``I got good grades in the ones I did take," Black says, declining to say which ones those were.

Black followed with part-time jobs. In between, he tried to perfect his gambling to make a living betting on horses and playing bridge. In 1984, Black met his best friend, Jeremy Wray, at the Young Chelsea Bridge Club in London's Earls Court neighborhood.

DOJ_NMG_0003267

In 1986, Black's brother Kevin, who was five years younger, contracted a brain infection that left him a paraplegic. Kevin died in 1988. Black says he decided to seek a regular job, joining the London branch of Track Data Corp., a New York-based financial information services company.

20-Pound Combination

All the same, he kept up his visits to the bookies. In 1992, he made his first big gambling profit. Black walked into his local bookmaking shop in Broadgate, near the Liverpool Street train station.

He put down a 20-pound combination bet on two horses named Party Politics and High Low to win the so-called spring double in the Grand National and Lincoln Handicap races. Both horses won, and Black scooped up 25,000 pounds. ``That was a very good day," Black says with a smile. ``That allowed me to quit my job."

He tried his hand at professional gambling and got bored. In 1995, he joined Boxall Asset Management Ltd., a private money management company in London. The firm, which has since disbanded, traded U.S. equities and derivatives. Black traded U.S. stocks, learning how a financial exchange operates.

He quit after he had a falling out with his boss, he says, and got married and set himself up writing computer database programs for Internet companies such as Deckchair.com, an online travel agency. ``I could come up with creative solutions, which was more valuable than my coding skills," Black says.

`Take It or Leave It'

The idea for Betfair popped up in 1998 when Black was writing software for the British government's GCHQ, part of its intelligence service. After work, he'd think about how to translate what he'd learned about stock trading to sports betting.

``On the NYSE, everyone bids and offers against everyone else," Black says. ``You put your bid on the board, and anyone can come and post their bid. But bookies set the price, and you can either take it or leave it."

Black began toying with the idea of a site that would allow bettors to bypass bookies and to bet not only on an outcome but also against an outcome, much like shorting a stock. The project foundered until the death of his father in 1999. While his brother's death spurred Black to get a full-time job, his father's death jolted him to pursue his betting-site idea.

``So many people go through life with great ideas and never do anything about it," Black says. ``I had to take a chance."

Business Plan

Black put up 50,000 pounds of his own money and persuaded Jeremy Wray's younger brother to join him. Edward Wray, now 37, was a trader in debt capital markets at J.P. Morgan & Co. in London and could provide management know-how and open doors to raise new capital, Black recalls thinking.

With a business plan in hand, the pair visited venture capitalists in London. At the peak of the dot-com boom, they found no takers. One reason was that a company called Flutter was peddling a similar idea. Josh Hannah, 34, and Vince Monical, 35, former Bain & Co. management consultants from San Francisco, had beaten Black and Wray by getting to the venture capitalist community first.

``We tried to raise money and failed miserably," Wray says. ``Flutter had been there ahead of us."

Like Betfair, Flutter's site removed the bookmaker from the gambling equation. Unlike Betfair, Flutter was aiming for the casual bettor. ``It was about creating a community and a way of settling disputes you make with a friend in a pub or at work," says Hannah, who now runs a San Francisco online information service called Ehow.com and is the entrepreneur-in-residence at Menlo Park, California-based Benchmark Capital, which funded EBay. Venture capitalists loved Flutter.

30 Million Pounds

Hannah raised 30 million pounds from Benchmark, Geneva-based Index Ventures and Zurich-based UBS Capital. Black's idea of an exchange focusing on gamblers found no takers.

``Maybe they looked at me and thought I was past my sell-by date," he says. ``If you think Flutter is likely to be the leader, then you back it."

Wray and Black turned to friends and family and scraped together 1 million pounds in increments as small as 25,000 pounds. Flutter went on line in May 2000. Betfair followed four weeks later. The timing was propitious. Betfair's first day was Oaks Day, a major horse-racing event in the U.K. The company hired an actor to parade in a coffin around Russell Square in central London with a banner that read ``death of the traditional bookmaker."

DOJ_NMG_0003268

`Liquidity and Size'

Betfair took in almost 1,000 pounds in bets on the horse race. Black says he knew he had a hit.

``Flutter was designed by management consultants who knew the Internet," he says. ``I knew gambling. I had been thinking about this for years."

In a few months, Betfair had about 95 percent of the betting exchange market based on volume of bets, says Simon Holliday, a partner at Global Betting & Gaming Consultants, a research firm in Wolverhampton, England.

Flutter's Hannah says he realized he'd been outflanked. ``This market is about liquidity and size," he says. ``It made sense to combine the two companies."

Hannah recalls that the decision to merge Betfair and Flutter happened over beers. The two combined in December 2001. The new company took the Betfair name, and Edward Wray became CEO. Fifteen months later, in April 2003, Betfair was handling 50 million pounds of bets a week and had increased its employees to 200 from 20. The company won a Queen's Award for Enterprise for ``outstanding innovation in the sports betting market."

Professional Gamblers

Betfair's arrival is spawning a new breed of professional gamblers. Jonathan Gale, 36, quit his job in the City of London, where he worked writing programs to determine options pricing at Deutsche Bank AG and other banks. He now spends as much as eight hours a day in an office 100 yards from his north London house, betting on intraday price movements of stock indexes using four computers and sophisticated software for program trading.

``With Betfair, your transactional costs are nil because you only pay a commission on your winnings," says Gale, who says he doesn't regret leaving his job. ``In the past 18 months, I haven't had a losing week."

Black is taking his company on the road. In Australia, Betfair has joined with Kerry Packer, the country's richest man, who owns Melbourne's Crown Casino. In July 2004, Black and Packer applied for a license to operate a betting exchange.

Australian Opposition

The local companies aren't in a hurry to put out the welcome mat. Michael Piggott, CEO of wagering at Melbourne-based Tabcorp Holdings Ltd., Australia's biggest gaming company, says Tabcorp has always opposed betting exchanges.

``Licensed bookmakers are the only people that can accept bets," Piggott said via e-mail. ``That has been a cornerstone of maintaining integrity in the conduct of racing. The public cannot offer to accept bets."

In the U.K., Betfair has joined forces with Yahoo! Inc., operator of the world's most-visited Web site. Yahoo Betting provides a stripped-down version of Betfair aimed at casual gamblers. It offers a limited number of categories and no wagers on financial indexes or exchanges.

William Hill's Harding wants the U.K. government to tax Betfair on the volume of transactions that cross its exchange rather than on its profits. In March 2004, U.K. Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown said the Treasury would review the tax treatment of betting exchanges and their clients. A decision is expected in November, as part of the Treasury's pre-budget report, Betfair's Hill says.

Offshore Move?

Should the report be unfavorable to Betfair, Hill says, the company will give up its U.K. headquarters. ``If we have to pay more taxes, we'll move offshore," he says.

Betfair already has a license to operate in Malta, which charges gambling companies a 0.5 percent tax on their revenue. ``We'd like to be in the U.K. because it offers many advantages," he says, noting that the country's regulatory environment for financial companies would help investors feel safe investing in Betfair.

Regulation, taxes and concerns about gambling addiction all loom as Betfair and other online gaming sites strive to keep their growth streaks alive. The longest odds may be on Betfair's ability to prove that online gambling isn't another Internet bubble ready to burst.

To contact the reporter on this story: Kambiz Foroohar in London at kforoohar@bloomberg.net. Last Updated: September 6, 2005 21:20 EDT

DOJ_NMG_0003269

CIVIL LAW:

Pols To Court To Stop NJ Base Closing (WINS)

WINS, 1010 AM, New York, September 7, 2005

(1010 WINS) (TRENTON) Lawyers for several New Jersey politicians made their plea Tuesday for a judge to issue a ruling that could keep Fort Monmouth open despite a federal commission's recommendation to close it.

U.S. District Judge Mary L. Cooper told them that she would rule quickly _ but did not specify exactly when.

Timing may be of the essence for the judge, who could order the base removed from the list of installations be closed, keep it on the list or set up future hearings on the matter.

By federal law, a list of recommendations for which military installations to close must be submitted to President Bush by Thursday. Bush has pledged to pass the list on to Congress without making any changes.

Congress can only vote the closures up or down. In past rounds of base closures, Congress has always accepted the commission's plan.

A lawyer for the government argued in a hearing Tuesday that if there is a time for the court to intervene in the Base Realignment and Closure Commission's process, it is not now.

Justice Department lawyer Carl Nichols said it's too early for those who believe Fort Monmouth should not be shuttered to make their case, in part because the president and Congress have not approved the closures.

``At that point, and at that point only, would we know Fort Monmouth would be closed," Nichols said.

Last month, BRAC recommended closing or consolidating 62 major military bases and 775 smaller installations across the country.

Among them, only the Fort Monmouth came with an asterisk: Fort Monmouth should be closed, the commission said, only if doing so would not interfere with the fort's work supporting the war on terror.

The closing would mean the loss of thousands of military and civilian contractors' jobs at a base where research is conducted. Fort Monmouth is headquarters of the U.S. Army's Communications Electronics Command, which designs radios, computers and software that keep troops in contact with each other.

Lawyers for a coalition including U.S. Sens. Jon Corzine and Frank Lautenberg, acting Gov. Richard J. Codey and other political and union leaders argued that BRAC did not follow six of Congress' eight criteria when it decided to close Fort Monmouth.

The effort to use the courts to save Fort Monmouth is probably a long shot, the lawyers conceded. But lawyer Frank G. Capece said Cooper's announced intention to issue a written opinion instead of an oral one gave some hope.

Corzine insisted the lawyers ``leave no procedural stone unturned," Capece said, and pursuing a lawsuit now leaves open the possibility of further action later.

General Dynamics Loses Suit (WP)

By Renae Merle, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

A federal jury in Greenbelt yesterday ordered General Dynamics Corp. to pay $129.9 million to its onetime partner, Final Analysis Communication Services Inc., a small satellite firm, according to officials for the two companies.

The verdict concluded a seven-week trial in U.S. District Court that included appearances by some of the defense industry's biggest players, including Nicholas D. Chabraja, General Dynamics' chief executive; and Gordon R. England, the former General Dynamics executive who is now acting deputy secretary of defense.

The case centered on whether General Dynamics violated agreements to help Lanham-based Final Analysis develop a $400 million project to launch low-flying satellites for data transmissions, including paging and text message services.

James J. McGuire, attorney for Final Analysis, said the jury ordered General Dynamics to pay a total of $137.9 million but also ordered Final Analysis to pay $8 million under a counterclaim, netting $129.9 million for the smaller company.

DOJ_NMG_0003270

General Dynamics is awaiting a final decision by the court, said spokesman Kendall Pease. The judge has asked for briefs from both sides, he said. General Dynamics argued in court that a power struggle between the company's founders contributed to the problems, according to the transcripts.

In the midst of the telecommunications boom in 1998, Final Analysis forged what executives hoped would be a critical partnership with Falls Church-based General Dynamics. The large defense contractor, best known for building tanks and submarines, would buy a 30 percent interest in the smaller company and help with the engineering work. Final Analysis launched three test satellites and was once valued at $400 million to $600 million, according to court documents.

But by 2000, as the telecommunications boom turned into a bust, General Dynamics had backed out, Final Analysis argued in its breach of contract lawsuit. When General Dynamics stopped work on the project, the firm's parent company, Final Analysis Inc., fell into bankruptcy without ever having launched a working satellite or started its service, McGuire said.

Final Analysis is appealing the loss of its Federal Communications Commission license and hopes to use the money the jury awarded to rebuild its business, McGuire said.

Attorney-Client Privilege Doesn't Shield Company In Suit (LAW)

By John Council, Texas Lawyer

Law.com, September 7, 2005

For years, it has been nearly impossible for in-house counsel at Texas companies to bring whistleblower suits against their employers, because companies could claim that the attorney-client privilege protected important evidence from disclosure in such litigation. But a recent 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decision changes all that.

The Aug. 24 ruling concerns an appeal of an administrative dismissal of a whistleblower complaint filed by an in-house lawyer. The 5th Circuit held in Willy v. Administrative Review Board, U.S. Department of Labor that the U.S. Department of Labor's Administrative Review Board incorrectly dismissed the in-house lawyer's complaint, after the board determined that a key piece of evidence needed to prove his allegations could not be disclosed because of the attorney-client privilege between the lawyer and the company.

The 5th Circuit remanded the case to the Administrative Review Board, noting that the case had "endured an odyssey through administrative and judicial tribunals" including four appeals to the 5th Circuit.

Coastal Corp. fired Donald J. Willy, then an in-house environmental attorney with the Houston-based company, after a series of events in 1984, according to the 5th Circuit opinion. Willy wrote two reports in 1984, referred to in the opinion as the Belcher Report, in which he concluded that one of the company's subsidiary oil companies was exposed to liability for allegedly violating several federal environmental statutes. Willy's supervisors disagreed with some of his conclusions in the Belcher Report and asked him to delete references to some of the alleged violations, which he refused to do, according to the opinion.

Coastal fired Willy after his supervisors accused him of contacting state regulatory officials about environmental matters at a Corpus Christi refinery owned by Coastal, the opinion noted.

In October 1984, Willy filed a complaint with the U.S. Department of Labor, alleging that Coastal violated federal whistleblower laws by firing him in retaliation for writing the Belcher Report -- allegations the company denied.

The company alleged the Belcher Report was protected by attorney-client privilege and refused to produce the report as part of the litigation.

Nevertheless, an administrative law judge allowed into evidence two draft versions of the Belcher Report that Willy had in his possession.

After a series of dismissals and reversals of dismissals by administrative law judges of Willy's complaint, in February 2004, the Department of Labor's Administrative Review Board (ARB) issued a final decision and dismissal order. The board concluded that there was no exception to the attorney-client privilege that would allow the Belcher Report to be admitted into evidence; therefore Willy could not prove his complaint.

The 5th Circuit found that the ARB incorrectly ruled that Willy could not introduce the Belcher Report.

DOJ_NMG_0003271

"The case law amply demonstrates the narrower proposition that the attorney-client privilege only prohibits a party from simultaneously using confidential information as both a shield and sword," wrote Judge Jacques Wiener in an opinion joined by Judges Patrick Higginbotham and Rhesa Barksdale.

"Stated differently, the 'shield and sword' analogy is conjunctive; it does not stand broadly for the proposition that an attorney may never use confidential information offensively," the judges concluded.

20+ YEARS

Willy, who coincidentally has been employed as a federal administrative law judge in Houston for the past 10 years, says he's pleased with the ruling.

"Look at the Constitution. The Fifth Amendment says you have a right to due process," Willy says. "How can you not have a right to due process because of your occupation?"

Willy represents himself in the case and argued it at the 5th Circuit. Judicial canons prevent judges from representing other people in court but permit judges to represent themselves. Another lawyer who had represented Willy dropped out of the case years earlier, Willy says.

"It's almost impossible to find someone to represent you in a case that's been pending for 20 years," Willy says. "I was forced to handle it, because there was no one else to handle it. It would be impossible for me to acquaint them with the case," which he says contains thousands of pages of documents.

J. Richard Hammett, a partner in the Houston office of Baker & McKenzie who represents Coastal, did not return two telephone calls seeking comment before press time on Sept. 1. Mark Edward Papadopoulos, a U.S. Department of Labor attorney who represents the agency in the case, declines comment.

Michael Maslanka, a partner in the Dallas office of Ford & Harrison who defends companies in employment suits, says Willy is a big deal for in-house counsel who want to sue their employers -- especially when the opinion is put in the context of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, which strengthened financial audit requirements in an attempt to prevent corporate fraud.

"This is a very empowering case for corporate counsel who believe they've been retaliated against under Sarbanes-Oxley," Maslanka says. "It removes a huge obstacle for them."

Maslanka says he has successfully used the attorney-client privilege to defend companies in Sarbanes-Oxley suits filed by in-house counsel. But Willy gives in-house counsel the same ability to file whistleblower cases against their employers as other employees have, Maslanka says.

"I think the lesson to draw from this is, if you haven't already done so, you make sure you have avenues where corporate counsel can register concerns with corporate governance," Maslanka says.

"The same good management techniques that stop other lawsuits from getting filed now apply to corporate counsel," Maslanka says. "Human resources has to treat corporate counsel as a potential plaintiff and listen to their concerns."

Rob Roby, a corporate defense attorney and partner in Dallas' Gwinn & Roby, says the opinion may have a chilling effect on a company's relationship with its own in-house counsel.

"I think it could be very critical in hindering communications that management thought would remain confidential. That's the real value of the attorney-client privilege," Roby says. "The goal is to have candid communication to stop things before they happen or fix them once they have happened."

Ken Molberg, a partner in Dallas' Wilson Williams & Molberg who represents employees in employment disputes, applauds the opinion.

"It's a common-sense approach, frankly. It says people in those positions are entitled to the protection under the law just like other people," says Molberg, president of the Texas Employment Lawyers Association.

"It really has broader implications. There are a series of cases out that circumscribe the rights of HR people who aren't even lawyers from using documents that will help their cases," Molberg says. "This speaks very loudly to that line of judicial reasoning."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ_NMG_0003272

Voter ID Opponents To Monitor Elections (AJC)

By Carlos Campos, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 7, 2005

Several groups opposed to a new law requiring voters to show state-issued photo ID at the polls announced Tuesday plans to monitor local elections on Sept. 20.

The Rev. Joseph Lowery, head of the Coalition for the People's Agenda, said monitors will "make sure there's no abuse of citizens who want to exercise their right to vote."

Thirty-three Georgia counties and two cities are holding elections Sept. 20. Most are referendums for special purpose local option sales taxes, including one in Cobb County, but some include races for city council posts. Augusta voters will select a replacement for Democratic state Sen. Charles Walker, convicted earlier this year of federal fraud charges.

Volunteers plan to conduct exit polls asking people if they were denied the opportunity to vote due to a lack of photo ID. The Mexican-American Legal Defense Fund has set up a toll-free hotline to field voter complaints: 1-877-462-5333.

Lowery was joined at the announcement by Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin and representatives of MALDEF, ACLU Voting Rights Project, the NAACP and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

The new law was passed by the General Assembly earlier this year. Supporters say it is intended to curb fraud by requiring voters to show a government-issued photo ID, such as a driver's license, state ID card, a public college ID or U.S. passport. Previously, voters were allowed to show non-photo identification, such as utility bills.

Opponents maintain the law will make it harder for poor people, the elderly and college students to vote. And they allege the law violates the Voting Rights Act, though it has received approval from the U.S. Justice Department.

Feds Tour Juvenile Justice Center (WJZ-TV)

WJZ-TV, CBS 13, Baltimore, MD, September 7, 2005

(WJZ) Baltimore, MD Continuing troubles and constant complaints about the Juvenile Justice Center bring federal investigators to Baltimore today.

Federal investigators fromthe Department of Justice will spend nine days inside the Juvenile Justice Center downtown.

The state run facility is under scrutiny after a series of complaints of youths being mistreated among other issues.

The Hickey School will close in November.

Meantime, a report on the Justice Department's visit this fall -- should be ready by early next year.

Right now, about 130 young offenders are housed inside the Juvenile Justice Center.

Gay-Marriage Bill Narrowly Passes California Assembly (LAT)

By Nancy Vogel

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

SACRAMENTO—The California Legislature made history Tuesday as the Assembly passed a bill to legalize same-sex marriage. With no votes to spare, California's lawmakers became the first in the United States to act without a court order to sanction gay unions. The measure was approved after three Democratic lawmakers, who abstained on a similar proposal that failed in June, changed their minds under intense lobbying by bill author Assemblyman Mark Leno (D-San Francisco) and gay and civil rights activists.

The bill, which would change California's legal definition of marriage from "a civil contract between a man and a woman" to a "civil contract between two persons," now goes to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger. The governor has signaled that he will veto it.

Tuesday's partisan vote came after 23 lawmakers spoke for an hour and a half, many of them describing the historic importance of their action, others relating intensely personal stories.

In a moment of high drama, with dozens of gay-rights supporters watching from the Assembly gallery, Salinas hesitated for several seconds as the tally hung at 40 "ayes" — one short of passage. Then, having promised Leno months ago that he would not let the bill fail if it garnered 40 votes, Salinas pressed the "aye" button on his desk, making the final vote 41-35. Those seconds

DOJ_NMG_0003273

"seemed like an eternity," said Mark Guzman of El Dorado Hills, as he and his partner of 14 years, J. Scott Coatsworth, celebrated in the Capitol rotunda after the voting.

Assemblymembers Tom Umberg of Anaheim, Gloria Negrete-McLeod of Chino and Simon Salinas of Salinas provided the key votes. Assemblymember Mervyn Dymally (D-Compton), who had missed the Assembly floor vote in June, also helped the bill prevail.

Assemblyman Jerome Horton, (D-Inglewood), one of the lawmakers who abstained in June when Leno's bill failed 37-36, withheld his vote again Tuesday. Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia (R-Imperial City) abstained after having voted "no" in June. Assemblyman Joe Baca, Jr. (D-Rialto) also abstained Tuesday.

Two of the lawmakers who switched their votes from abstain to "aye" said in floor speeches that they were glad for another chance.

Umberg elicited applause and whoops in the otherwise hushed chamber when he described why he had changed his mind. He said he had been "cajoled, been harassed, been harangued and been threatened" by friends over the issue.

"This is one of those time when history looks upon us to see where we are," said Umberg. "Ten years from now, there are a handful of issues that history will record where we stood and this is one of those issues."

"History will record whether we pushed a bit, took the lead to encourage tolerance, to encourage equality to encourage fairness," he said.

"The constituency I'm concerned about is a very small one," said Umberg, "and that's the constituency of my three children, should they decide to look back on my record ... and reflect on where I was when we could make a difference."

Negrete-McLeod similarly said she regretted abstaining in June.

The fight over same-sex marriage will now shift to the governor's office -- and to the courts and perhaps the ballot box. A case testing the legality of gay marriage is moving toward the state Supreme Court, and opponents of same-sex marriage are trying to qualify two different initiatives to ban gay marriage for the ballot next year.

Leno characterized gay marriage as the most important civil rights issue of the 21st century. He enlisted Dolores Huerta, co-founder of the United Farm Workers of America, and Alice Huffman, California president of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People, to help him lobby undecided lawmakers.

Huerta said she spoke to Salinas last week and "went back to our old culture, the Latino culture."

"Respecting other people's rights is peace," she said. "Respecting other people's rights to marry who they want is a constitutional right, it's a human right and it's a privacy right. I said to Simon, 'You've got to be a leader . . . .You've got to have courage.' "

Opponents of same-sex marriage call Leno's bill unconstitutional, saying that it overturns what voters put into law five years ago when they passed Proposition 22 by 61%. That initiative stated that only marriage between a man and a woman is valid and recognized in California.

"The only word I can see here is prostitution," said Randy Thomasson, president of the nonprofit Campaign for Children and Families. "Instead of obeying the votes and the constitution, the Democratic politicians have prostituted themselves to the homosexual marriage agenda. It's not gay, it's bad."

After Leno's bill fell three votes short of passing the Assembly in June, he inserted the gay marriage legislation into a bill about marine research that was pending in the Senate. That bill, AB 849, cleared the Senate on Thursday, also with the minimum number of votes necessary.

Some Republicans, none of whom voted for Leno's bill, downplayed the historic significance of the vote and said gay marriage is not an issue of civil rights.

Others criticized Leno for reviving the bill after the June defeat and called homosexual marriage immoral.

"The institution of marriage transcends political fads," said Assemblyman Ray Haynes (R-Murrieta). "We are talking about an institution that has been defined for thousands of years . . . and we are being asked to engage in a great social experiment."

Leno said he optimistic that Schwarzenegger has an open mind on his bill, which the governor has until Oct. 9 to veto or sign. He noted that public opinion on gay marriage is evenly split, 46% to 46%, in California based on a recent poll by the Public Policy Institute of California.

DOJ_NMG_0003274

"I believe this is a governor who at his core is a libertarian on issues of social matters," said Leno, "and that he is very fair -- minded."

"I think he also takes the longer, rather than shorter, view of history," he said.

After the Assembly vote, Schwarzenegger spokeswoman Margita Thompson said, "The people spoke when they passed Proposition 22.

"The issue subsequently went to the courts. The governor believes the courts are the correct venue for this decision to be made, " Thompson said. "He will uphold whatever decision the court renders."

'Marriage' Bill OK'd, Goes To Arnold (WT/AP)

By Steve Lawrence, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

SACRAMENTO, Calif. -- The California Legislature yesterday became the first legislative body in the country to approve same-sex "marriage," as homosexual rights advocates overcame two earlier defeats in the Assembly.

The 41-35 vote sends the bill to Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who had no comment on the bill when it cleared the Senate last week, in what was widely seen as a symbolic vote at the time because of lower house's earlier rejections.

His office did not immediately respond late last night to a call seeking comment.

Although Mr. Schwarzenegger generally favors homosexual rights and domestic partnerships, he said in a 2003 interview with radio talk-show host Sean Hannity: "I think ... marriage is something that should be between a man and a woman."

He also criticized the San Francisco mayor's issuance of marriage licenses to same-sex couples in February 2004, saying they "fail to meet legal standards." California voters approved a ballot referendum defining marriage as the union of a man and a woman.

The bill's supporters compared the legislation to such earlier campaigns as women's suffrage and the eradication of slavery.

"Do what we know is in our hearts," said the bill's sponsor, San Francisco Democrat Mark Leno, who is homosexual. "Make sure all California families will have the same protection under the law."

Mr. Leno's bill had failed in the Assembly by four votes in June, but he was confident he could get it through on a second try after the Senate approved a same-sex "marriage" bill last week.

Democratic Assemblyman Paul Koretz called the opposite-sex definition of marriage "the last frontier of bigotry and discrimination, and it's time we put an end to it."

Assemblyman Tom Umberg, a Democrat who abstained when another homosexual "marriage" bill fell four votes short in June, said he was concerned about what his three children would think of him if he didn't join those "who sought to take a leadership role in terms of tolerance, equality and fairness."

But opponents repeatedly cited the public's vote five years ago to approve Proposition 22, an initiative to keep California from recognizing same-sex "marriages" performed in other states or countries.

"History will record that you betrayed your constituents and their moral and ethical values," Republican Assemblyman Jay La Suer said.

The vote was hailed by homosexual advocates, including Geoff Kors, executive director of Equality California, a backer of the bill.

"As the debate today shows, love conquers fear, principle conquers politics and equality conquers injustice, and the governor can now secure his legacy as a true leader by signing this bill," Mr. Kors said.

California already gives same-sex couples many of the rights and duties of marriage if they register with the state as domestic partners.

Massachusetts' highest court ruled in November 2003 that the state constitution guarantees same-sex couples the right to "marry." The nation's first state-sanctioned, same-sex "weddings" began taking place in May 2004.

Vermont began offering civil unions in 2000, after a ruling by the state's Supreme Court. Earlier this year, Connecticut became the first state to approve civil unions without being forced by the courts.

DOJ_NMG_0003275

Regardless of what the governor does, California's debate over homosexual "marriage" will continue on several fronts.

A state appeals court is considering challenges to a lower court ruling that overturned California laws defining marriage as the union of a man and a woman. Opponents of same-sex "marriage" are trying to qualify initiatives for the 2006 ballot that would amend the state Constitution.

Calif. Lawmakers Pass Gay Marriage Bill (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

Filed at 12:28 a.m. ET

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) -- The California Legislature on Tuesday became the first legislative body in the country to approve a bill allowing same-sex marriages, but the measure faces an uncertain future with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger.

There were loud cheers by gay-rights activists in the Assembly gallery as lawmakers voted 41-35 to approve the bill and send it to the governor. The Assembly had twice defeated similar legislation.

A spokeswoman for the Republican governor said Schwarzenegger believes the issue should be decided by the courts, not by his signature on legislation. A state appellate court is considering appeals of a lower court ruling that overturned California laws banning recognition of gay marriages.

"He will uphold whatever the court decides," Schwarzenegger spokeswoman Margita Thompson said.

Gay-marriage supporters nonetheless rejoiced the victory. They compared the legislation to earlier civil rights campaigns to eradicate slavery and give women the right to vote.

"As the debate today shows, love conquers fear, principle conquers politics and equality conquers injustice, and the governor can now secure his legacy as a true leader by signing this bill," said Geoff Kors, executive director of Equality California, a backer of the bill.

The bill, sponsored by San Francisco Democrat Mark Leno, had failed in the Assembly by four votes in June, but Leno was confident he could get it through on a second try after the Senate approved a same-sex marriage bill last week.

"Do what we know is in our hearts," Leno said. "Make sure all California families will have the same protection under the law."

Assemblyman Tom Umberg, a Democrat who abstained in the vote in June, said he was concerned about what his three children would think of him if he didn't join those "who sought to take a leadership role in terms of tolerance, equality and fairness."

But opponents repeatedly cited the public's vote five years ago to approve Proposition 22, an initiative put on the ballot by gay marriage opponents to keep California from recognizing same-sex marriages performed in other states or countries.

"History will record that you betrayed your constituents and their moral and ethical values," said Republican Assemblyman Jay La Suer.

Randy Thomasson, president of the Campaign for Children and Families, a conservative group opposed to the bill, said Schwarzenegger should announce immediately that he would veto the legislation.

"Schwarzenegger can't afford to sign the gay marriage license bill," he said. "He'll actually become a hero to the majority of Californians when he vetoes it."

California already gives same-sex couples many of the rights and duties of marriage if they register with the state as domestic partners.

Massachusetts' highest court ruled in November 2003 that the state constitution guarantees same-sex couples the right to marry. The nation's first state-sanctioned, same-sex weddings began taking place in May 2004.

Vermont began offering civil unions in 2000, after a ruling by the state's Supreme Court. Earlier this year, Connecticut became the first state to approve civil unions without being forced by the courts.

Regardless of what action the governor takes, California's debate over gay marriage will continue on several fronts.

DOJ_NMG_0003276

A state appeals court is considering challenges to a lower court ruling that overturned California laws banning recognition of gay marriages. And opponents of same-sex marriage are trying to qualify initiatives for the 2006 ballot that would amend the state Constitution to ban same-sex marriages.

Democrats And Labor Get Redistricting Vote On Ohio Ballot (NYT)

By Dean E. Murphy

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

The Ohio secretary of state announced yesterday that a series of election-related constitutional amendments had qualified for the November ballot, including one intended to strip Republican elected officials of their control over drawing legislative districts.

The amendments are sponsored by Reform Ohio Now, a coalition dominated by Democrats, unions and watchdog groups. It celebrated the announcement and said a statewide campaign to win approval in November had begun.

"It's not like we're posting yard signs yet, but we're close to that," the campaign manager of Reform Ohio Now, Scarlett Bauder, said. "Right now the time is ripe for reform."

The State Supreme Court rejected last month a Republican-backed move to disqualify the measures, but a second suit by a former Republican state senator is to be heard tomorrow in an appeals court in Columbus.

The former senator, Richard H. Finan, wants the amendments declared invalid because Secretary of State J. Kenneth Blackwell allowed Reform Ohio Now to use out-of-state signature gatherers.

Mr. Finan has said the redistricting measure, if approved, could cost Republicans in Ohio 6 of their 12 seats in Congress and would probably inspire similar Democratic-backed efforts in other states dominated by Republicans.

A spokesman for the Ohio First Education Fund, a group founded by Mr. Finan, said Republicans were moving forward with fund-raising in case they lost the court battle.

The spokesman, David L. Hopcraft, said the campaign was drawing money from outside the state because of Ohio's significance as a swing state in presidential elections, though he did not give specific dollar amounts.

"If the issues make it to the ballot," Mr. Hopcraft said, "we will have a vigorous campaign that speaks to the ballot-box power of every Ohioan, which we think is clearly threatened under these amendments."

"These issues," he added, "are being backed by people who did not like the results of the last election and want to nullify Ohio's vote."

Ms. Bauder said Reform Ohio Now, which has raised $1.2 million, had enemies on both sides of the aisle.

"To me, that says it is true reform, because people in both parties don't like it," she said.

Mr. Blackwell, a Republican, has said that the signature gatherers acted legally, but that Attorney General Jim Petro, also a Republican, had sided with Mr. Finan in the court case.

"Ohio law clearly says the right to petition our state government in this manner belongs solely to the citizens of Ohio," Mr. Petro said in filing court papers last week.

The secretary of state's office said Reform Ohio Now had collected 353,094 valid signatures, 30,000 more than required. A spokesman, Carlo LoParo, said the amendments were submitted as a package but would appear as four separate ballot measures.

The redistricting amendment calls for an independent commission that would replace state lawmakers in determining the boundaries of legislative districts. The other amendments would lower some campaign contribution limits, extend early voting to all voters and transfer oversight of elections to an appointed election master from the secretary of state's office.

ANTITRUST:

Unipol Gets Antitrust OK For BNL Bank (BOS)

The Boston Globe, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003277

MILAN, Italy --Unipol Assicurazioni SpA said Tuesday it had received the necessary antitrust regulator authorization for its $6.12 billion bid to take over Banca Nazionale del Lavoro SpA.

The bid is pending approval by insurance regulator Isvap and the Bank of Italy.

Italy's market watchdog Consob approved Unipol's prospectus last week but asked the insurer for further information regarding the nature of the agreements with Deutsche Bank.

The German bank has a call option on nearly 5 percent of BNL but is not a member of the shareholder pact led by Unipol that is launching the takeover bid for the Rome-based bank.

Unipol filed the final version of a 400-page document with conditions for its BNL bid to Consob on Friday.

Unipol's all-cash offer to acquire the 59 percent of BNL that it doesn't already own has torpedoed a rival all-share offer from Spain's Banco Bilbao Vizcaya Argentaria SA which ended unsuccessfully in July.

Endesa Rejects Gas Natural's Bid (WSJ)

By Keith Johnson and Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

Spanish power utility Endesa SA rejected the unsolicited bid of €22.55 billion ($28.27 billion) from Gas Natural SDG SA, a smaller natural-gas company, setting the stage for a hard-fought takeover battle as the European energy industry undergoes a bout of frantic consolidation.

After huddling for most of the day in Madrid, Endesa's board advised its shareholders against accepting the Gas Natural offer, calling it "hostile" and saying the price "does not reflect the real value of the company."

The Endesa board appointed three investment banks -- J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., Deutsche Bank AG and Citigroup Inc. -- to help it craft its takeover defense, according to people familiar with the matter.

"It was in the script," Gas Natural Chief Executive Rafael Villaseca said in an interview, shrugging off Endesa's negative response to the bid. "In any event, it will be up to the shareholders to decide, and business logic will end up prevailing."

Based on Monday's prices, Gas Natural's cash-and-stock offer values Endesa at €21.30 ($26.70) a share. Endesa's American depositary receipts were up $2.46, or 11%, at $25.75 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading. In Madrid, Gas Natural shares fell 2.2% to close at €24.24.

A flurry of deal making is taking place in the European energy sector. Last month, France's Suez SA moved to acquire the 49.9% of Belgian power utility Electrabel SA it doesn't own. On Monday, Germany's E.On AG said it was considering a takeover bid for ScottishPower PLC, the United Kingdom's fifth-largest power producer. And France is preparing to sell shares in its former power monopoly, Electricité de France SA, to public investors this fall, following the initial public offering of natural-gas provider Gaz de France SA this summer. (See related article.)

The intense activity is being spurred by both the European Union-mandated liberalization of the continent's energy markets and volatile commodity prices, industry executives and analysts said.

Until recently, most European energy utilities enjoyed dominant positions in their home countries and captive clients. Sheltered from market vagaries, they could pass on higher production prices to their consumers.

But the EU has begun opening its power and gas markets to competition in staggered phases, first to corporate and then to residential clients. EU members must fully open their power markets to competition by July 2007 and their natural-gas markets by the end of 2008. As these deadlines approach, European energy utilities are seeking more size, a pan-European presence and a more balanced energy-generation portfolio.

In the past year, they also have had to contend with a volatile market for oil and natural gas, which have reached record prices, driving up their costs of producing electricity.

The combination of these factors has pushed some companies to seek vertical integration by controlling their own supply of raw materials -- a main rationale behind Gas Natural's bid. Gas Natural hopes to use its plentiful supply of natural gas to power Endesa's gas-fired turbines, which produce cheaper and environmentally cleaner electricity than older coal-fired plants.

DOJ_NMG_0003278

"Some utilities that have been squeezed by commodity prices on the one hand and by consumers and regulators at the other end are beginning to think they should move upstream, to capture a greater share of the energy value-chain margin," said Vittorio Perona, head of the power and natural-resources corporate-finance division at Dresdner Kleinwort Wasserstein.

Gas Natural, based in Barcelona, Spain, outlined details of its offer yesterday, arguing that it would spur competition to the benefit of consumers in Spain, while creating a strong "national champion" able to compete with other European energy titans when the continent's power markets are fully liberalized.

"The only possible solution" to growing energy demand in Europe is "more gas-fired plants," Mr. Villaseca said. "And that means utilities have to have a flexible and available supply of natural gas."

Rival Spanish utility Union Fenosa SA is following a similar strategy by teaming up with Italian oil-and-gas titan ENI SpA to build liquefication and regassification plants that will bring natural gas from Egypt to Spain by ship to power its turbines at a competitive price. In Germany, E.On relies on its E.On Ruhrgas unit to supply it with natural gas to power its turbines.

In the near term, the strategy carries financial risks. Credit concern Standard & Poor's Ratings Group placed Gas Natural and Endesa on review with a negative outlook yesterday, citing the increased debt load that the combined company would carry if the deal were successful. Gas Natural also must convince Spanish regulators that a merged company wouldn't have too dominant a position in Spain.

Gas Natural said it expects the deal to pass muster thanks to a pre-agreed selloff of some of Endesa's generation assets to a Spanish rival, Iberdrola, under a deal reached with Iberdrola.

The takeover offer sparked a rally in the shares of European utilities yesterday. The DJ Stoxx utilities index rose 1.5%.

Endesa's advisers are trying to determine whether other utilities could emerge as counterbidders. Any foreign bidder, though, risks entering a highly political dogfight.

Court Cases Don't Scare Music File Swappers Away (USAT)

By Jefferson Graham

USA Today, September 7, 2005

Despite two huge court losses for file-sharing firms, unauthorized online song and movie swapping is at an all-time peak, says Internet measurement company BigChampagne.

“File sharing has never been more popular than it is now,” says BigChampagne CEO Eric Garland. “People have heard all the legal threats and admonitions, but that's not enough. They don't believe it.”

He says about 9.6 million people were logged onto sharing networks at any one time in August, up from 6.8 million the year before.

The recording industry has filed 14,000 copyright infringement lawsuits against song swappers in the last two years, at a time when more than 1 billion songs have been offered for trading each month on services such as Kazaa and eDonkey. The industry has also looked to the courts for relief.

On Monday, an Australian federal court judge ruled that Sharman Networks, Kazaa's parent firm, must install filters to prevent its software from being used for unauthorized sharing.

The ruling followed a U.S. Supreme Court decision in June that said software firms Grokster and StreamCast Networks, which operates the Morpheus service, could be held liable for their users' actions.

The Supreme Court decision hasn't curbed online swapping, and neither will the Australian court ruling, says Phil Leigh, an analyst at research firm Inside Digital Media. “A lot of college students still don't feel vulnerable at all,” Leigh says.

The Australian decision is only enforceable there. Kazaa, meanwhile, is a global product whose popularity already had faded.

Once the most-used sharing software, it has been in steady decline. According to Internet research firm CacheLogic, Kazaa's market share tumbled to 9% in July from 24% a year earlier. Currently, eDonkey is the most popular sharing software, with a 50% market share, CacheLogic says.

Kazaa is bloated with too much backdoor, spyware-type advertising, Garland says. “People went elsewhere. A judgment might have been more meaningful a few years ago, when Kazaa was more popular.”

DOJ_NMG_0003279

Recording Industry Association of America CEO Mitch Bainwol said he is pleased with the Kazaa decision, which "reflects a growing, international chorus: Those who promote theft can be held accountable no matter how they may attempt to escape responsibility."

Garland says the industry should spend less time fighting the online pirates and more time turning them into paying customers.

Legitimate online music stores have taken off since Apple's popular iTunes site made its debut. But Garland says Apple and competitors Napster, RealNetworks and others could sell even more if they made their songs compatible with each other's systems.

Songs purchased at iTunes can't be transferred to non-Apple digital music players without some workarounds, and vice versa with songs from Napster. "The incompatibility is a nightmare for consumers," Garland says.

Refiners' Merger Good For Business, Not Consumers (WP)

Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

Last week, as supply shortages sent the price of a gallon of gasoline as high as $6 in some markets, federal officials charged with protecting consumers quietly approved yet another oil industry merger, this one creating the nation's largest oil refiner.

Because of the rush of Katrina news, the merger earned hardly a mention in the general press. And yet by giving its blessing to Valero's $8 billion purchase of Premcor, the Federal Trade Commission not only reinforced its reputation as a patsy for the energy industry but demonstrated a stunning lack of political sensitivity.

Although the FTC and its staff never seem to make the link between industry consolidation, rising energy prices and record profits, Wall Street investors surely can. Over the past year, shares in Valero are up 226 percent, which, as the Financial Times pointed out last week, makes Google (only 186 percent) look like a laggard.

Listen to what Valero's chief executive, Bill Greehey, had to say Thursday in announcing that the deal had closed: "We are in a new era for refining where I believe you will continue to see higher highs and higher lows for both product margins and sour crude discounts. And now, with 18 refineries, no one is better positioned to benefit from this than Valero."

Translation: This deal will do nothing for consumers, but it's a home run for investors.

Here's the situation, as far as I can make it out. Refineries in the United States produce about 18 million barrels of refined product a day for an economy that consumes about 21 million. A completely new refinery hasn't been built in this country in nearly 40 years. And although Valero and others have spent $47 billion over the past decade to expand existing capacity by 13 percent, demand has grown even faster.

The reason that supply has not kept up in this industry, as in others, is simple: The industry makes more money that way. And one way the industry is better able to enforce this gentleman's agreement against investing too heavily in new capacity is by reducing the number of players and making entry into the industry even more difficult than it is already.

The FTC uses a different analysis. Its staff finds no evidence that this merger -- or any of the dozens of others they have approved -- gives the acquiring companies the power to raise prices. After all, even with this latest refinery deal, no company controls more than 13 percent of the national market nor more than 20 percent in any region.

But that analysis misses the point. As long as the industry can coordinate its investments, keep supplies tight and free-ride on OPEC price fixing, there is no need to unilaterally raise prices. In the mismatch of supply and demand, the "free" market does it for them.

The industry likes to explain away the lack of adequate refining capacity by arguing that government regulation makes building a refinery virtually impossible. The last time we heard the "government regulation" excuse, it was from Vice President Cheney during the California energy crisis. It turned out our energy-maven vice president didn't know what he was talking about, and that the real reason for skyrocketing prices was that Enron and the others were secretly manipulating the market by strategically withholding supply.

DOJ_NMG_0003280

In the case of oil refineries, there's no doubt that, given voters' natural antipathy to having a refinery in the neighborhood, finding a new site requires much time, money and patience. But when President Bush floated the idea last year of speeding site approval by locating new refineries on inactive military bases, Valero's chief operating officer declared he wasn't interested. When you look at industry rates of return, he told The Post's Justin Blum, it's just not worth it.

This is the oil industry's other Big Lie. Every year, Fortune Magazine, in its Fortune 500 issue, calculates the rate of return on shareholder equity for each major industry. Last year, when oil prices were a lot lower than they are now, the average return for both independent refiners and integrated majors was 23.9 percent. This year, it's been even higher. And over the past decade, according to Fortune, the return on equity in the sector has averaged 16 percent, well above the investment hurdle rates in most other sectors of the economy.

Valero is a great company and a real success story. Since 1997, it has bought up lots of lousy refineries, fixed them up and run them right -- in the process adding the equivalent of two refineries' worth of new capacity. Essentially, it has put the lie to the self-serving complaint from the integrated majors that there was no money to be made from refining and from other downstream operations.

But what the country needs isn't a bigger Valero -- it's more Valeros, challenging the majors, investing heavily in new capacity and competing for market share. By approving the merger with Premcor, the FTC has reduced the chance of having that kind of full-throttle competition in an industry that desperately needs it.

Steven Pearlstein will host a web discussion at 11 a.m. today athttp://washingtonpost.com. He can be reached atpearlsteins@washpost.com.

ENVIRONMENT:

E.P.A. To Bar Data From Pesticide Studies Involving Children And Pregnant Women (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - Researchers will no longer be allowed to include children and pregnant women in studies examining the effects of pesticides to help set federal standards, according to the first regulations for human testing of pesticides that the Environmental Protection Agency plans to propose.

The regulations, to be proposed on Wednesday, would also establish an independent oversight panel to ensure that all studies submitted to the agency were conducted ethically and followed internationally accepted protocols for human testing.

Agency officials discussed the new regulations with reporters on Tuesday. They declined to make copies of the proposal available, leading at least one major critic of the agency, Senator Barbara Boxer, Democrat of California, to suggest that a close examination of the regulations might reveal weaknesses identified in an earlier version. Agency officials said those weaknesses were removed from a draft sent to the Office of Management and Budget last month.

In a statement, Senator Boxer said of the proposal: "One thing is clear. It must be changed dramatically from the version E.P.A. forwarded to O.M.B. just a few weeks ago. If not, it will be a direct attack on our most vulnerable citizens."

The proposed regulations, which would take effect in January after a public comment period, came several months after Congress put restrictions on human pesticide tests as part of an appropriations bill. Congressional concern grew after reports that parents in Florida would be paid to participate in a program, known as Cheers, by allowing their children to be tested to measure household exposure to pesticides.

"This proposed rule contains some of the strongest protections for human subjects ever proposed by the federal government," Jim Jones, director of pesticide programs for the agency, said Tuesday in a conference call with reporters.

Mr. Jones said the agency was so alarmed by public anger over pesticide testing involving humans that the new protocols would bar the agency from considering any tests that include pregnant women and children.

He also said the proposed regulations would apply to the 22 toxicity tests involving humans that are now before the agency. Two of them included children, though none involved pregnant women, Mr. Jones said.

Environmental groups expressed worry that the agency might blur the lines between past and future tests.

DOJ_NMG_0003281

"This is a huge problem if they are going to accept studies already done," said Erik D. Olson, a senior lawyer with the Natural Resources Defense Council. "Dozens of past unethical studies are now before the E.P.A. If they accept them, the new rules are plainly inadequate."

The leading trade organization for pesticide manufacturers, CropLife America, defended its testing practices, saying its members have always worked to ensure the safety of participants.

At the same time, the group's president, Jay Vroom, welcomed the new E.P.A. regulations, saying they "have the potential to establish ethical and scientific safeguards and uniform standards to protect research subjects and improve the risk assessment process."

Mr. Vroom also said future tests would "only involve healthy adult volunteers and exclude pregnant women."

In most cases, the tests are conducted by chemical manufacturers and the results submitted to the E.P.A. as part of a chemical's approval process. But critics in recent years have questioned the effectiveness of a system in which the companies have an enormous financial interest in winning approval.

Mr. Jones said an oversight panel to review tests involving pesticides would include medical ethicists and experts in chemical tests and would exclude anyone with connections to the agency or chemical companies.

National Parks Grapple With Surge Of Illegal Off-road Vehicles (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, September 7, 2005

The Big Cypress National Preserve in Florida is crisscrossed with so many illegal swamp-buggy ruts - more than 23,000 miles of them - that park officials in August began limiting off-road vehicles to 400 miles of trails in order to protect the Florida panther and the preserve.

In Yosemite National Park, off-road vehicles are involved in "numerous" violations, according to a staffer's memo.

And each day of a long summer weekend like Labor Day, as many as 2,200 motorized vehicles hit the beaches of Cape Hatteras National Seashore in North Carolina. "Not one of those is there legally," says Don Barger, southeastern regional director of the National Parks Conservation Association, a watchdog group.

In all, unauthorized off-road vehicles are buzzing through nearly one-third of America's national parks, according to a recently released internal National Park Service (NPS) survey. In one-fifth of the parks, they have damaged natural environments that by law must be preserved for future generations. Preservation vs. recreation

The survey highlights a conundrum for the park service. It has gone to bat for broader access for motorized off-road vehicles - including snowmobiles in Yellowstone National Park. At least 29 of its parks have allowed illegal off-road vehicles. On the other hand, in some cases, the parks are prohibited from doing so by their authorizing legislation; in other cases, they haven't conducted required environmental impact evaluations of the vehicles, according to a legal analysis by Bluewater Network, an environmental group in San Francisco.

In March, the NPS convened a workshop of rangers and other park officials to develop a "national strategy" for dealing with the problem, according to a senior park official.

NPS officials downplay the challenge.

"Some of the illegal use is very infrequent. Some of it is crossing boundaries that may not be well marked," says Jerry Case, the service's regulations program manager. "We're certainly working on it. [But] there are probably just a handful [of parks] that have significant illegal use causing significant environmental damage."

The Cape Hatteras seashore is one facility that until recently had not conducted the required legal reviews to allow off-road vehicles, though it is doing so now.

"We certainly recognize that some [facilities] need to get back in line with the executive order and regulations, but for the most part I think we're doing all right," Mr. Case says. Tracking illegal vehicles

Other branches of the Department of Interior, however, say illegal motorized vehicles are a serious national problem. The chief of the National Forest Service, for instance, has called it one of his top four management problems.

DOJ_NMG_0003282

An Interior Department spokesman told Congress in July that 43 of the nation's federal "park units" allow snowmobiles, 25 allow off-road vehicles, and nine allow personal watercraft.

But he made no mention of any problem with the illegal vehicles highlighted by the internal survey.

Critics say the problem is acute and growing, even if not yet felt uniformly. "The pressure to increase these kinds of uses in national parks is constantly increasing," Mr. Barger says. "Our park lands are becoming more and more like isolated islands, with the demands for their use from everybody."

At least 113 of the nation's 388 park units report illegal off-road vehicles, the internal survey showed, and 85 of those report that the vehicles have caused environmental or other damage. Striking as those results are, they may understate the scope of the problem, says Sean Smith, public lands director for Bluewater Network. Only 273 of the 388 park units had responded to the survey. Parks like Yellowstone, Acadia, and Shenandoah National Parks had not responded. Trampling on protected lands

There are signs of movement. Sections of Cape Hatteras were closed this summer to limit damage to nesting piping plover. The tiny shorebird's chicks are often trapped in the ruts left on the beach by off-road vehicles and run over.

But in the survey, many parks reported they lacked the staff or funding needed to chase down the illegal vehicles, says Bluewater's counsel Robert Rosenbaum of the law firm Arnold & Porter in Washington.

"Operators are rarely caught due to staffing limitations," wrote a park official in the survey from Arches National Park and Canyon lands National Park in Utah, cited in a June letter by Blue water to the Park Service. "There are a number of locations where off-road travel has destroyed microbiotic soil crust, destroyed desert vegetations, crushed animal burrows ... impacts that may last for years."

Although Yellowstone National Park was not part of the survey results, a now infamous example occurred in 2003 when two men on off-road vehicles damaged Lone Star Geyser by driving around its cone and in surrounding meadows, according to park reports. Just last year, other illegal drivers cornered a herd of bison in a stand of trees at the park.

"To allow that kind of thing just because a set of recreational users want to take snowmobiles and whatever else into Yellowstone is crazy," says Bill Wade, a former superintendent of Shenandoah National Park, now a spokesman for the Coalition of National Park Service Retirees, a watchdog group based in Tucson, Ariz.

"It's like me saying that because I like skeet-shooting, I should be able to do that in the Sistine Chapel," he says. "There are some places with such high degree of reverence [vehicles] just should not be allowed."

Bonilla Bill Targets Eminent Domain (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, September 7, 2005

Any local or state government that employs the right of eminent domain to transfer property from one private owner to another would be denied funding for all federal programs under legislation written by Rep. Henry Bonilla (R-Texas).

Agriculture Committee Chairman Bob Goodlatte (R-Va.) characterized the legislation as the strongest response yet to the Supreme Court's June ruling in Kelo v. City of New London, Conn., which affirmed governments' rights to seize property from landowners for private development deemed by elected officials to be in the community interest. The Agriculture Committee, which will hold a hearing on the Bonilla bill today, has been given primary jurisdiction on the issue.

The Supreme Court's decision has generated a backlash from conservatives and liberals alike. Bonilla boasts several Democratic co-sponsors, including Rep. Stephanie Herseth (S.D.) and Agriculture Committee ranking member Collin Peterson (Minn.).

The House Judiciary Committee plans action on less sweeping legislation.

Let Nature Help (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

The catastrophe that devastated New Orleans has been centuries in the making. Since its founding in 1718, the city has lain uneasily between two watery and potentially lethal boundaries: Lake Pontchartrain to the north and the Mississippi River to the south.

DOJ_NMG_0003283

Engineers have protected the city over the years by fortifying the earthen barriers between high water and low land. New Orleans' efforts to keep dry also sank it lower — a process called subsidence, caused when groundwater is pumped regularly out of silty soil. At the same time, the levees and canals around New Orleans diverted the flow of river sediment, dumping it in the Gulf of Mexico instead of allowing it to spread to the protective marshes and islands at the river's mouth.

In 1965, Hurricane Betsy brought a heavy hint of the dangers when a surge of storm water caused Lake Pontchartrain to overflow the levees, flooding large parts of the city. But that flood pales in comparison to the devastation of Hurricane Katrina's water surge, which caused a series of levee breaks that allowed the lake water to fill the bowl that is greater New Orleans.

For the next several weeks, and possibly months, the Army Corps of Engineers will pump the water out. Meanwhile the Corps, Congress and the Bush administration need to figure out how to avoid a repeat of last week's disaster. Clearly, if they plant the 1.3 million residents back in the bowl, after billions of dollars spent on cleanup and rebuilding, they'll need to devise better protection.

After Hurricane Betsy, Congress authorized a $732-million effort to raise the levees around the city to 16 feet. After a flood in 1995 claimed six lives, lawmakers authorized an equally ambitious venture to refortify the city's slowly sinking defenses. Finishing these projects took a back seat during the last few years to war and homeland security. Even if they are now fast-tracked to completion, they aren't enough to guarantee New Orleans protection against another Katrina-strength storm. Other nations — most notably the Netherlands — have engineered stronger, smarter levees and other coastal defenses, such as floodgates and raised shelters.

Devastating hurricanes are more likely in coming years. Warmer ocean surface temperatures, no matter what their cause, fuel more violent hurricanes, which derive their power from the water's heat.

One of the most effective shore defenses has been not only ignored but undermined. Barrier islands and the marshes of the Mississippi River Delta used to present hurricanes with a formidable land barrier to cross before reaching New Orleans. But the very levees and canals that protect New Orleans and provide navigation divert replenishing sediment. Louisiana loses about 24 square miles of this land barrier each year.

A plan backed by environmentalists, industry and the Corps of Engineers would spend $2 billion to dredge sediment from the Gulf to be used in rebuilding the land, and divert some river sediment toward the marshland. Congress should not only approve that project but should start giving serious consideration to the rest of a $14-billion coastal restoration project supported by 11 state and federal agencies.

Funding environmental projects isn't just a luxury that makes tree-huggers happy. It's a natural way to protect people and a bargain compared with the economic and human toll exacted by Katrina.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Medical Marijuana No Influence On Teen Use (UPI)

By TODD ZWILLICH

United Press International, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 (UPI) -- Teens in the handful of states allowing medical marijuana are no more likely to use the drug than those in other states, according to a study released Tuesday.

The study shows widespread reductions in marijuana use have occurred generally at the same rate among all the states, including those allowing medical use.

The study was funded and released by the Marijuana Policy Project, a group backing medical-marijuana efforts nationwide. The group said its findings belie Bush administration claims that medical-marijuana laws send youth a mixed message that helps to encourage drug use.

Ten states currently allow patients with certain medical conditions to use marijuana under the supervision of a physician.

Overall, the United States has seen a decrease in marijuana's popularity among teenagers since 2000, after a prolonged increase in use during the 1990s. For example, compared with 1996, about 43 percent fewer 8th graders and 9 percent fewer 12th graders reported they had used the drug in the past 30 days in 2003.

California became the first state to permit medical-marijuana use in 1996.

At the same time, past-month use dropped by half among the state's 9th graders and by one-quarter among 11th graders, according to the report, which analyzed federal and state statistics. Approximately one-fifth of California's high school juniors now acknowledge using marijuana within the last month.

Other states with medical-marijuana laws also saw varying reductions in youth marijuana use. Past-month use by 12th graders in Washington state was down 32 percent since a medical-marijuana law was enacted in 1998, though rates dropped only 12 percent among Maine's high school seniors since a similar law was passed there in 1999.

Alaska, Colorado, Hawaii, Nevada and Oregon also allow some medical marijuana, and all showed some reductions in youth use since the laws were passed. Montana and Vermont have enacted similar laws, but they did so too recently to detect any trends, the researchers said.

Several other states are considering measures allowing the use of marijuana by patients, backed by some evidence the drug can ease a variety of health problems, including pain, nausea and weight loss caused by cancer, as well as AIDS and glaucoma.

Bush administration drug officials have consistently fought the laws, stressing that such measures undermine efforts to persuade youth that marijuana is a dangerous drug.

"Contrary to the fears expressed by opponents of medical-marijuana laws, there is no evidence that the enactment of 10 state medical-marijuana laws has produced an increase in adolescent marijuana use in those states or nationwide," the MPP study concluded. "Opponents of medical marijuana laws should cease making such unsubstantiated claims."

Mitch Earleywine, one of the study's investigators, told United Press International the results show medical-marijuana laws have not stopped or slowed progress against illegal drug use in the eight states studied.

"Use is clearly decreasing regardless of medical marijuana laws," said Earleywine, an associate professor of psychology at the State University of New York at Albany.

Tom Riley, a spokesman for the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said in a statement that youth drug use has fallen largely because of increased perception among teens that drugs are dangerous.

"Misleading messages that harmful substances are somehow 'good for them' send teens exactly the wrong message," Riley said. His statement did not directly address the study's state-by-state findings.

Earlier this year the U.S. Supreme Court ruled federal anti-drug agencies have the right to enforce nationwide bans on marijuana, even in states that allow medical use. The ruling was seen as a victory for the Bush administration, but it did not prevent states from enacting new medical-marijuana measures.

Pot Use Down Where Medical Use OK (LAT)

By Eric Bailey, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

SACRAMENTO — Bucking dire predictions by anti-drug warriors, the 10 states that approved medical marijuana laws over the last decade have experienced sharp declines in cannabis use among teenagers, according to a new study by a marijuana advocacy group.

California has seen usage among ninth-graders drop 47% since 1996, the year the state became the nation's first to legalize medical marijuana. Over the same period, the nation as a whole experienced a 43% decline among eighth-graders.

The study, released today, is based on data from national and state surveys, which show a drop in marijuana use by teens.

Although debate over medical marijuana is often shaded by concerns about increasing drug abuse among young people, the report suggested the opposite has been true.

The study's authors were Mitch Earleywine, a State University of New York psychology professor, and Karen O'Keefe, a legislative analyst with Marijuana Policy Project, the organization that commissioned the research based on state and federal data.

DOJ_NMG_0003285

That data "strongly suggests" that approval of medical marijuana has not increased recreational use of cannabis among adolescents, Earleywine and O'Keefe concluded. And the decline in many of the states with medical marijuana laws is "slightly more favorable" than trends nationwide, they said.

California, Washington and Colorado have all experienced greater drops in marijuana usage than have occurred nationwide. Only three states with medical marijuana laws — Maine, Oregon and Nevada — have lagged behind the national drop in teen marijuana use, the report said.

"If medical marijuana laws send the wrong message to children," the authors said, widespread attention to the debate "would be expected to produce a nationwide increase in marijuana use, the largest increase in those states enacting medical marijuana laws. But just the opposite has occurred."

Tom Riley, of the president's Office of National Drug Control Policy, said the drop in teen drug use across the nation is attributable to the federal anti-drug advertising campaign in recent years, including $125 million spent during the federal fiscal year that ends Oct. 1.

Medical marijuana has only clouded that pitch, he said.

"It's foolish to give kids a message that marijuana can be helpful to them," Riley said, adding that all Americans "should be glad that teen drug use is going down. If the drug legalizers are recognizing that, too, I think that says something."

But the researchers sketched a different hypothesis: that medical marijuana shifted the perception among some teens about pot.

"Perhaps medical marijuana laws send a very different message," they wrote. Teens may increasingly consider pot "a treatment for serious illness, not a toy, and requires cautious and careful handling."

The most extensive available data was in California, where a survey of about 6,000 students every two years showed that pot use among teens was climbing before passage of the 1996 medical marijuana law. For all grades, marijuana use dropped significantly between early 1996 and 2004, with the biggest downward shift among ninth-graders.

Between 1996 and 2004, the number of high school freshmen in the state who reported using pot in the last 30 days dropped 47%, while the number of freshmen who had tried cannabis at least once dropped 35%.

Jury's Still Out On Narcotic's Effects (BOSH)

By Dave Wedge

Boston Herald, September 7, 2005

Seen by many as a miracle cure for heroin addiction, the jury is still out on whether methadone can itself impair users or create a long-term dependency.

``There still appears to be some controversy about it," said Jim Ross, a counselor at Taunton's Community Partnerships, which specializes in helping heroin addicts. ``Although it is supposedly not addictive, we've seen firsthand some people do not use it as a stepping stone (toward recovery) and they end up being dependent on methadone their whole life. And that could be a good or a bad thing."

The White House Drug Policy Information Clearinghouse supports methadone programs, saying the drug ``does not impair cognitive functions" and ``is not sedating or intoxicating." The federal clearinghouse also says the drug does not ``interfere with ordinary activities such as driving a car or operating machinery."

Originally created by German pharmaceutical companies during World War II, methadone was first marketed as ``dolophine" and was used as a painkiller. Today, it is prescribed by doctors and usually dispensed at clinics at levels that are supposed to quash heroin cravings but not impair or intoxicate.

But studies by scientists in New Zealand have found that methadone's effects can include pain relief, feeling of well being, nausea, vomiting, dilated pupils, body temperature drops and slowing pulse and blood pressure. Some European scientists claim methadone can affect motor skills, while doctors in Amsterdam have found it can be addictive, just like heroin, and can cause dangerous respiratory problems, constipation, sedation and vertigo.

In addition to possible side effects, Ross said addicts sometimes stockpile methadone to sell.

DOJ_NMG_0003286

``Methadone has been a great saving grace for many heroin addicts," he said. ``We need to be as supportive as we can to help addicts, but sometimes we need to ask questions to assure we're taking care of public safety as well."

Truck Driver Pleads Guilty To Trafficking (LUFNEWS)

By ASHLEY COOK, The Lufkin Daily News

Lufkin (TX) Daily News, September 7, 2005

A tractor-trailer driver pleaded guilty Friday in federal court to trafficking close to $3 million in drug money through Nacogdoches County, according to plea papers filed in court.

Juan A. Castanon, 34, of Mission, Texas, could face up to five years in federal prison on the charge. Details of his plea agreement with the U.S. Attorney's Office remained sealed in court documents.

Texas Department of Public Safety Trooper Ryan Koonce found the stash of cocaine-tainted cash during a Feb. 8 traffic stop. The money was hidden in a secret compartment in Castanon's trailer.

A drug-sniffing dog alerted Koonce to the bundled and wrapped money, which later tested positive for traces of cocaine.

Koonce became suspicious of Castanon when his log book didn't match his story. He'd driven the trailer, rented from Guiterrez Trucking in Donna, Texas, from Atlanta toward Mission.

The cash was forfeited to the government by court order. By law, the government must run an advertisement in the local newspaper, The (Nacogdoches) Daily Sentinel, giving the public an opportunity to file any claims to the money.

Mexico's Fox To Border Drug Lords: Who's Tougher? (REU)

Reuters, September 7, 2005

ZACATECAS, Mexico, Sept 6 (Reuters) - Mexican President Vicente Fox challenged drug barons on Tuesday to take on security forces in a notorious city on the U.S. border where troops and police are locked in a war with traffickers.

Fox said in an interview that federal forces were in control of Nuevo Laredo, across from Laredo, Texas, despite more than 100 drug-related murders there this year.

"We are going to win this battle. We'll see who is tougher, we'll see who is more stubborn," he told Reuters during a visit to the central state of Zacatecas.

The explosion of violence among drug gangs vying for control of a cocaine, heroin and marijuana smuggling route into the United States has drawn an influx of Mexican troops to Nuevo Laredo and strained relations with Washington.

The murder rate has soared with killings practically every day, and residential neighborhoods have seen shootouts with heavy weaponry, at one point prompting the U.S. Embassy to close a consulate in Nuevo Laredo.

But Fox said his government has taken control of the sweltering city, which also is a hub for legitimate trade.

"Nuevo Laredo now has much less criminal activity from these kingpins than it did two months ago," he said. "I can tell you that we have the city under control and from there we will put things in order."

But as the death toll rises, with 15 police officers among those killed by gunmen this year, residents and local activists are skeptical about authorities' ability to stem the tide of violence. Critics say very few cartel henchmen have been put behind bars and there is no evidence the tighter security will curb the flow of drugs across the border.

Nuevo Laredo is the most urgent front in the fight against drug gangs, but Fox said his government also has stepped up law enforcement in the Pacific state of Guerrero and in Tijuana, Ciudad Juarez and Sinaloa state near the U.S. border, places where drug-related violence also seems to be rising.

His proposed spending plan for next year, which was sent to Congress late on Monday, calls for a 20 percent increase in federal funding to fight organized crime, he said.

U.S. officials also have sought to crackdown on drug smugglers. Texas recently allocated $5 million to improve law enforcement communication in border communities.

But the violence has caused diplomatic fallout. Washington has repeatedly warned U.S. citizens against traveling in the region and urged Mexico to restore order. Mexico has told U.S. officials to keep out of its affairs.

Spain Tops Table Of Cocaine Use (GUARDIAN)

DOJ_NMG_0003287

By Giles Tremlett

Guardian (UK), September 7, 2005

Spaniards are the most prolific users of cocaine in the world, according to a report from state prosecutors obtained by El País newspaper yesterday.

Spain has overtaken the US and left Britain and Ireland behind, with the proportion of people who use the drug rising to more than one in 40. "Spain occupies the top place in the world," the report said, citing United Nations figures on cocaine use around the globe.

Article continues

The reason for such a high rate in Spain is that much of Europe's cocaine is unloaded on to Spanish beaches.

Last year 33 tonnes of it were seized by Spanish police, much of it being handled by the smuggling clans in the north-western region of Galicia who turned to the lucrative cocaine trade more than 10 years ago. The smugglers offer their services to traffickers from around the world who want to get the drug into Europe.

Often cocaine is unloaded from merchant ships into trawlers and then, once near the Spanish coast and under the cover of darkness, into speedboats that land it on Galicia's rugged beaches. The Galician smugglers store it then hand it back to the traffickers. They take a cut of the cocaine as payment.

More than 50% of cocaine found by police in Europe is discovered by Spanish officers, who arrested about 600 suspected traffickers from Colombia last year, and 150 from Britain.

Spanish police were also reported yesterday to have been behind the discovery of 4.6 tonnes of cocaine unloaded in Rotterdam at the weekend.

TAX:

U.S. Expects To Indict At Least 12 More Over KPMG Shelters (WSJ)

By Jonathan Weil and Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

NEW YORK -- The lead prosecutor in the KPMG LLP tax-shelter investigation said the government expects to seek indictments against at least 12 more individuals in the coming weeks, on top of the nine people who were arraigned yesterday in a federal court in Manhattan.

The additional defendants will be named as part of a superseding indictment and could include additional charges against the nine people whose bond requirements were set yesterday by U.S. District Judge Lewis A. Kaplan. The government's lead prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Justin Weddle, said the additional charges in the superseding indictment likely would include obstruction of justice, as well as tax evasion, in addition to the existing conspiracy count that the government unsealed last week.

Prosecutors didn't identify who the additional defendants might be. Possibilities include additional former KPMG partners, as well as others outside the firm who were involved in the sale or use of four shelters that KPMG sold to hundreds of wealthy Americans from 1996 to 2002. The shelters went by the names Blips, Flip, Opis and Short Option Strategy.

At yesterday's arraignment hearing, Mr. Weddle said the government believed that some of the nine defendants already named in the case used allegedly fraudulent KPMG shelters to shave their own personal tax bills.

He also said tax-evasion charges would be sought against some defendants who allegedly helped KPMG clients evade taxes by creating and marketing the shelters.

Prosecutors asked for three months to seek the superseding indictment, citing Justice Department procedures for tax-fraud prosecutions. In denying the government's request, Judge Kaplan said, "You're going to have to move a lot faster. It's not clear to me why you can't." He added, "Multibillion-dollar takeovers get litigated in that time. You can do it." The judge set an Oct. 17 deadline for the government to file its superseding indictment and scheduled trial proceedings to begin May 1, 2006.

Prosecutors estimated that a trial of the nine people arraigned yesterday could take three months.

DOJ_NMG_0003288

At the same time, Judge Kaplan said that the "chances of having a single trial" for more than 20 defendants "are not too great." Some of the defense lawyers at yesterday's hearing, including a lawyer for former KPMG Deputy Chairman Jeffrey Stein, said they believed the case should be broken up into different groups of defendants for multiple trials.

Of the nine defendants arraigned yesterday, eight are former KPMG tax professionals, including Mr. Stein. Other defendants include former KPMG Vice Chairmen Richard Smith and John Lanning, and Raymond J. Ruble, a former New York partner at the law firm Sidley Austin Brown & Wood LLP.

Under the terms of a $456 million settlement last month, KPMG admitted criminal wrongdoing in connection with past shelter sales, but it will not be criminally prosecuted so long as it complies with certain requirements, including continued cooperation with prosecutors.

The nine defendants were released yesterday on their personal recognizance and have two weeks to meet additional bond requirements. Judge Kaplan set Mr. Stein's bond at $3.5 million, the highest among the nine defendants.

Prosecutors described Mr. Stein as one of the leaders of the alleged conspiracy at KPMG to sell fraudulent tax shelters to wealthy Americans, and they had asked that his bond be set at $5 million. Among other things, prosecutors cited a severance payment of more than $9 million that they said Mr. Stein received from KPMG last year, after he had been notified that he was under criminal investigation. Mr. Stein's attorney said that KPMG, under pressure from the government, reduced the severance package; he declined to offer details.

Five of the defendants' bonds were set at $1 million each, while two others' bonds were set at $300,000 and $500,000, respectively. Mr. Smith's bond was set at $1.5 million; his bond must be co-signed by his wife and secured by their home and any real estate his wife owns. All nine defendants must surrender their passports.

In setting the May 1, 2006, trial date, Judge Kaplan warned Mr. Weddle about his three-month trial estimate. "You're going to put the jury to sleep and lose them completely," he said. "The name of the game is to boil this down and move it."

US Sees More Defendants In KPMG Tax Case (REU)

By Martha Graybow

Reuters, September 7, 2005

NEW YORK (Reuters) - Eight former executives of accounting firm KPMG LLP and an outside tax lawyer pleaded not guilty in a tax shelter case on Tuesday, while a U.S. prosecutor said he expects charges to be brought against 12 or more additional defendants.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Justin Weddle also told Manhattan federal judge Lewis Kaplan at an arraignment hearing for the nine defendants currently in the case that additional counts were expected against some of them. Weddle said those charges, contained in a so-called superseding indictment, likely would relate to alleged tax evasion stemming from tax shelter transactions.

Weddle did not elaborate on the new defendants expected to be named in a revised indictment.

The nine current defendants, including former KPMG deputy chairman Jeffrey Stein, were indicted last week on charges of conspiring to defraud the government in connection with tax shelters KPMG sold to wealthy individuals. A conviction on the conspiracy charge carries a maximum prison term of five years for each defendant.

The defendants were released on personal recognizance bonds on Tuesday and agreed to travel restrictions.

The arraignments took place a week after KPMG agreed to pay $456 million to settle a three-year-long federal investigation of its sales of tax shelters, avoiding a criminal indictment that might have crippled the audit firm.

KPMG declined comment on Tuesday.

At the hearing, Weddle called Stein and former KPMG vice chairman Richard Smith "leaders of the fraud" and asked the judge to impose higher bail amounts on them as a condition of their release.

The judge ordered Stein to be released on a $3.5 million bond, while Smith was ordered to post a $1.5 million bond. The other defendants were released on bonds ranging from $300,000 to $1 million.

Prosecutors said they expect an updated indictment with new charges to be ready in about three months, but Judge Kaplan urged them to issue any new charges by October 17. He set a May 1, 2006 trial date.

The U.S. government said last week that KPMG made $115 million in fees in a conspiracy that spanned from 1996 to 2003. The accounting firm generated at least $11 billion in fraudulent tax losses for wealthy individuals and prevented the government from collecting $2.5 billion in tax receipts, the Justice Department said.

U.S. To Widen Inquiry Of KPMG Tax Shelters (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

Federal prosecutors said yesterday that they planned to file new charges and name as many as a dozen new defendants in their investigation of questionable tax shelters sold by the accounting firm KPMG.

Prosecutors described the widening criminal investigation yesterday at the arraignment of nine former executives who were charged last month with conspiracy to devise and sell fraudulent tax shelters. The additional charges against the nine could include tax evasion and obstruction of justice for hindering aspects of the government's investigation of the tax shelters, prosecutors said.

The nine defendants, a former lawyer at Sidley Austin Brown & Wood and eight former partners at KPMG, pleaded not guilty.

The prosecutors' statements are a sign of the depth and breadth of the criminal investigation into the tax shelters, which were sold to about 350 people from 1996 to 2002 and cost the government at least $1.4 billion in unpaid taxes, according to Senate investigators. The investigators found that KPMG earned fees of $124 million on those sales; other financial institutions, including banks and law firms, had a role in the transactions.

KPMG reached a settlement agreement with the government late last month, acknowledging wrongdoing, agreeing to pay a $456 million penalty and accepting limits on the scope of its tax practice, among other restrictions.

"This is an ongoing investigation," Justin S. Weddle, an assistant United States attorney, told the presiding judge, Lewis A. Kaplan, in Federal District Court in Manhattan yesterday.

Lawyers for the nine defendants wrangled with prosecutors over their access to documents collected in the course of the government's investigation. Mr. Weddle told defense lawyers that prosecutors had gathered about 300 boxes from different firms, including Deutsche Bank, that were involved in the shelters. A spokeswoman for Deutsche Bank declined to comment on the investigation.

Prosecutors said they also had about 1,300 boxes of documents from the Internal Revenue Service, some gathered in the course of the agency's audit of KPMG itself and others in the course of investigating individual taxpayers who bought the questionable shelters, Mr. Weddle said.

For a moment the discussion of what evidence the government would provide to the defense lawyers appeared to verge on acrimony, leading Judge Kaplan to intervene.

"Everybody chill out," he advised the courtroom.

Lawyers also discussed the timing of the case, which Judge Kaplan scheduled for trial beginning May 1, 2006. Prosecutors initially told the judge that a new, or superseding, indictment, which would require approval from the tax division of the Justice Department in Washington, could require three months. The judge advised prosecutors to have the indictment ready instead by Oct. 17, and he told defense lawyers to file motions relating to the current indictment by Nov. 14. One lawyer said he planned to object to the entire charge; another said he planned to try to sever his client's case from the other defendants'.

The proceedings yesterday offered a hint of how unwieldy the case against the nine executives, let alone against as many as 21 possible defendants, could be. Defense lawyers had to take chairs from the spectators' gallery of the courtroom, and the defendants were directed to seats normally reserved for members of a jury. Judge Kaplan's clerk asked only once how each defendant pleaded, guilty or not guilty, and each defendant's lawyer stood to respond. The arraignment took more than an hour.

Judge Kaplan also showed a hint of testiness about the pace of the government's case, commenting that if prosecutors could spend a year and a half investigating before bringing one criminal charge, they should not need another three months to add any new charges or new defendants. He also warned prosecutors against lengthy proceedings. Prosecutors said they anticipated a three-month trial.

A complex case would confuse jurors and make it harder for them to convict, Judge Kaplan said. "The idea of a three- or four-month tax trial, well, it's a daunting prospect" for potential jurors, he added.

The judge also advised lawyers for both sides to prepare as clear a presentation for jurors as possible, using video presentations, for instance, and avoiding cumbersome binders full of copies of exhibits.

The individual defendants were released after the arraignment yesterday. The court required each to provide a bond of $300,000 to $3.5 million.

David Spears, a lawyer representing Jeffrey Stein, one of the former KPMG partners, filed a request with the court seeking bail in a "reasonable amount."

The filing also offered a preview of the arguments that Mr. Spears will probably make on Mr. Stein's behalf at the trial. The document states, "Mr. Stein relied on the hard work and advice of the tax experts who approved the strategies at issue and continues to have no reason to doubt the validity of the tax advice he ultimately provided."

The Squeezing Of Lawyer-Client Privilege (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

In its agreement with the government that headed off an indictment, the accounting firm KPMG promised not to try to use "any claim of privilege" to keep information from prosecutors.

The pledge did not get much attention, perhaps because waiving the privilege that protects communications between a lawyer and client is now commonplace for corporate defendants.

But the privilege has been weakened in other ways, too, as more individual defendants try to argue that their actions were blessed by a lawyer and that, as a result, they did not know they were doing anything wrong.

Some lawyers say they are worried that weakening the privilege will mean that clients will be less candid, making legal advice less reliable. Other lawyers counter that anyone advising a company, an executive or an individual will give better advice because of the possibility that the advice may someday become public. But all agree that the privilege today is much more negotiable than in years past.

"It's clear that there's this chill out there, that the privilege is vulnerable," said R. William Ide III, a lawyer at McKenna Long & Aldridge in Atlanta and also chairman of an American Bar Association committee on lawyer-client privilege. "We don't think it should be in play."

But powerful forces have put in play the privilege protecting communications, as well as the so-called work product privilege covering documents and other work by a lawyer in anticipation of litigation. Examples abound in recent years of lawyers providing evidence - in cases involving HealthSouth, Tyco, Credit Suisse First Boston, Enron and others. A recent bar association report notes that while it is difficult to determine how frequently companies are asked by regulators and prosecutors to waive the privilege, those interviewed by the committee said "these requests, backed by an express or implied threat of harsh treatment for refusing, have become increasingly common."

KPMG provides a case study. Former partners there who have been indicted on charges of tax shelter conspiracy want to tell jurors that they could have had no improper intent because they cleared all their actions with their lawyers. Lawyers will also be useful sources of evidence because of their involvement in the transactions - an increasingly common fact of life, as transactions become ever more complicated and lawyers become essential guides.

"This is something where lawyers were all over it," Stanley Arkin, who is defending Jeffrey Eischeid, one of the former KPMG partners facing a criminal charge, said in an interview last week. If lawyers approved the tax shelter transactions at issue in the KPMG investigation, he said, then people like his client did not know they were doing anything wrong, which would mean they did not break the law. Mr. Arkin said he expected to call the lawyers who approved the shelters to testify.

"Even if in retrospect these shelters are something that was inappropriate, did someone at the time they were doing this think they were engaging in some kind of crime?" he asked.

Michael Ramsey, who represents Kenneth L. Lay, the former chief executive of Enron, said he expected testimony from former Enron lawyers to figure prominently in his client's trial, expected to begin early next year.

DOJ_NMG_0003291

"With the complexity of litigation growing more and more dense, if you will, we are seeing, and we will continue to see, executives who think they are doing the right thing because they consulted with counsel," Mr. Ramsey said.

KPMG had good reason to agree to waive its privilege to placate prosecutors weighing whether to indict the firm. In making the decision whether to indict, prosecutors consider whether a company has cooperated, and the government defines cooperation to include sharing information that may otherwise be protected by privilege. Under the terms of its agreement with the government, KPMG has also turned over documents and other information to investigators and made a strong statement acknowledging past wrongdoing.

Prosecutors say that they usually do not seek to learn what advice a lawyer provides to a client, but are trying only to learn the facts. In an interview in 2003, James B. Comey, a former United States attorney, said, "They are just seeking the facts, including factual attorney work product." Lawyers for former KPMG partners have already excoriated the firm's cooperation and, in particular, its acknowledgment of wrongdoing, contending that the firm did not undertake a thorough internal investigation to justify such a statement. (The statement is unlikely to be admitted in evidence in the criminal case against the former partners, though, lawyers said, and, in any event, it does not identify specific wrongdoers.)

Robert S. Bennett, whose firm, Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom, helped persuade prosecutors not to indict KPMG, responded that KPMG could have been destroyed if it had been indicted, and that would have hurt far more people than the eight former partners named in the indictment.

"When you are saving a company, you are saving more than just bricks and mortar," Mr. Bennett said, adding that the firm was comfortable with the acknowledgment that it made. Mr. Bennett is familiar with such brinkmanship after advising the boards at HealthSouth and Enron; both waived privilege, to satisfy prosecutors that they were cooperating. Mr. Bennett declined to comment on any of those specific instances, but he said that corporate defendants generally waive the privilege in more cases, for more reasons and more often now than in the past.

"It's very hard being a defense lawyer these days," Mr. Bennett said. "In today's climate, in order for a company to avoid an indictment, it must cooperate with the government. And today, cooperation, under the Thompson guidelines, as a practical matter often requires companies to waive the attorney-client privilege and cooperate in other ways."

The so-called Thompson memorandum, drafted in 2003 by the deputy attorney general, Larry Thompson, in the wake of a wave of corporate fraud, laid out guidelines on prosecutions of corporations. The guidelines state that "one factor the prosecutor may weigh in assessing the adequacy of a corporation's cooperation is the completeness of its disclosure including, if necessary, a waiver of the attorney-client and work product protections, both with respect to its internal investigation and with respect to communications between specific officers, directors and employees and counsel."

But Mr. Ide, the chairman of the bar association's task force, and other lawyers say they worry that when prosecutors insist on a waiver, they are essentially making corporations an offer they cannot refuse.

That may have serious consequences. For example, companies may have difficulty conducting internal inquiries if employees do not talk because they know their statements may end up being handed over to the government; executives may decide not to consult lawyers before making critical business decisions; and lawyers may temper their advice if they know it may one day be exposed.

"One concern is that this will chill corporate officials' willingness to get good legal advice," said Michael Young, a lawyer at Willkie Farr & Gallagher. "The result ironically would be less access to sound legal counsel."

Not everyone is worried about weakening the privilege for corporations, though. John R. Kroger, a law professor at Lewis & Clark Law School and a former federal prosecutor, said that knowing what lawyers told executives is crucial to learning what happened at a company

"It's really in the public's interest to get out on the table whether there's any possibility executives engaged in wrongdoing were really following legal advice or not," Mr. Kroger said.

Many Families Miss Tuition Tax Breaks (USAT)

By Mary Beth Marklein

USA Today, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003292

Nearly 10 million Americans claimed a federal higher-education tax break in 2002, more than double the number who did in 1998.

But hundreds of thousands of families who may be eligible for such breaks aren't taking advantage of them, a federal report says.

Meanwhile, with Congress under pressure to reduce the federal deficit, the legislators responsible for student loans have been given a Sept. 16 deadline to detail how they will trim about $13 billion from mandatory programs in their jurisdiction.

The tax-related report, released last week by the Government Accountability Office, found that filers of 27% of the 1.8 million returns it analyzed appeared eligible but did not claim either a tuition deduction or tax credit.

The report said those filers could have reduced their tax liability by $169 on average; 10% of them could have cut their liability by more than $500.

A major reason people did not take advantage of it may be that the tax provisions are "difficult for families to understand and use correctly," the report said.

It called on the Department of Education to sponsor research on the effectiveness of tools to assist students and families — not only with tax breaks but also student aid programs, through which more than 8.4 Americans received grants or loans in 2002.

In 2004, about $14 billion in grants and $56 billion in loans were made available through federal programs while post-secondary tax breaks amounted to $10 billion, the report said.

Now, with Congress looking to trim budgets, higher education groups expect cuts to federal loan programs of between $7 billion and $10 billion over five years, says Terry Hartle of the American Council on Education, an umbrella group for colleges and universities.

And as Congress prepares to consider a package of bills aimed at making college more accessible, critics of a student aid provision wending its way through the legislative process argue that the measure would raise the cost of loans for some borrowers.

That provision, passed by a key House committee in July, would offer new options for students and greater flexibility for loan repayment, says Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, chairman of the Education and the Workforce Committee.

That committee is a key architect of the Higher Education Act, which is renewed every five years.

But a coalition of public interest groups, including the United States Student Association and the State Public Interest Research Groups, say the costs far outweigh the bill's benefits.

They say new loan fees, higher interest rates and the elimination of certain borrower benefits would hike loan costs by as much as $5,800.

Meanwhile, an 85-member coalition of loan providers is urging a Senate committee to oppose "excessive cuts" as members look for ways to save money.

Significant cuts, the coalition says, "could destabilize the loan program and create more barriers to higher education for the neediest students."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush: List For Second Vacancy 'Wide Open' (CO)

By Jesse J. Holland

The Charlotte Observer, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON - President Bush said the list of possibilities for his second Supreme Court nomination was "wide open" Tuesday as Senate Republicans urged him to consider a woman and Democrats pressed him to consult with them before making his next pick.

The president said the Senate should concentrate on confirming U.S. Appeals Judge John Roberts to replace the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist before worrying about any other choices.

"I want the Senate to focus not on who the next nominee is going to be, but the nominee I got up there now," Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0003293

Roberts' confirmation hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee will begin next Monday, one week after Bush named him to replace the justice he worked for as a Supreme Court law clerk. Roberts was originally slated to be Sandra Day O'Connor's replacement, but Bush formally withdrew that nomination Tuesday and made the 50-year-old judge the chief justice nominee.

O'Connor has agreed to stay on until her successor is in place, Bush noted, ensuring there will be a nine-member court if Roberts is confirmed before the new term begins on Oct. 3.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and Judiciary chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said they expected to be finished with Roberts before then.

Specter and Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas - who will be the Senate's No. 3 Republican next year - said Bush should choose a woman since O'Connor's retirement would leave only one woman on the court, Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

"Two women, I think, are a minimum," Specter said.

Several senators suggested the president should wait before making any new selection public, given that the Senate is working on relief for the hurricane-stricken Gulf Coast as well as Roberts' nomination. "We've got more than a full plate right now," said John Cornyn, R-Texas.

"I think you should do one nomination at a time, even though it would be nice to know who the president is thinking of," added Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

Democrats urged Bush to talk with them before replacing O'Connor, who sometimes has sided with more liberal justices.

"The list is wide open, which should create some good speculation here in Washington," Bush said, playfully glancing at Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who has been mentioned as a possible nominee. If named, Gonzales would become the first Hispanic justice on the Supreme Court.

Bush Pledges Wide Search For Court Seat (WP)

By Peter Baker And Jo Becker

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

President Bush vowed yesterday to "take a good, long look" at a "wide open" list of candidates before deciding whom to nominate for a second open seat on the Supreme Court, as both sides girded for twin confirmation battles and recalibrated strategies after the dizzying events of recent days.

The casket of the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist was laid in repose in the Great Hall of the Supreme Court, borne by a cast of pallbearers that included his former clerk and would-be successor, John G. Roberts Jr. Some influential Democrats signaled that Roberts's ascension increased their eagerness to press him on his record -- particularly on civil rights, which they said has taken on new salience in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

"What the American people have seen is this incredible disparity in which those people who had cars and money got out and those people who were impoverished died," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said in an interview . The question for Roberts, he said, is whether he stands for "a fairer, more just nation" or for "narrow, stingy interpretations of the law to frustrate progress."

Bush, who tapped Roberts on Monday to replace Rehnquist, suggested that he will take his time finding a new candidate for the seat of retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, which was originally supposed to go to the appellate judge. Aides said they expect no announcement this week as Washington focuses on the damage wrought by Hurricane Kristina.

At the same time, Bush playfully hinted he could choose his friend Alberto R. Gonzales, a prospect that reignited consternation among conservative groups skeptical of the attorney general's politics.

"The list is wide open, which should create some good speculation here in Washington," Bush told reporters after a Cabinet meeting, generating laughter. With a sly look, he added: "And make sure you notice when I said that, I looked right at Al Gonzales, who can really create speculation."

Whether or not the president actually intends to nominate Gonzales, who would be the first Hispanic on the court, that lighthearted remark crystallized the renewed battle within the Bush camp over the selection of an associate justice -- a virtual replay of the fight that preceded Roberts's original nomination in July, pitting the Republican right against the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0003294

At the same time, having already chosen a white man for the high court, Bush came under pressure from within his party to make diversity a priority. Republican Sens. Arlen Specter (Pa.), Kay Bailey Hutchison (Tex.) and John Cornyn (Tex.) all advised the president to consider a woman or a member of a minority. O'Connor and first lady Laura Bush have both previously stated a preference for a second woman on the bench as well, while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice smiled broadly yesterday when Bush was asked whether he would name a female nominee.

With O'Connor's pending departure, the court would be left with one woman, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and one minority, Clarence Thomas. "Two women are, I think, a minimum," Specter said, though he added he does not favor a quota.

Complicating the picture is the political aftermath of Katrina, which analysts say has left Bush weakened amid recriminations over a slow, ineffectual initial response. Some analysts speculated that Bush might avoid a provocative conservative in favor of a less ideologically pure nominee, possibly Gonzales. But White House advisers scoffed at the notion, suggesting that fundamentally misunderstands Bush's nature.

Conservatives lobbied against shifting course because of Katrina. "The court is a long-term thing," said William Kristol, the influential editor of the Weekly Standard. "It's crazy to mess up your long-term legacy to possibly help him with a short-term PR problem. I think Gonzales would be a disaster."

Some Republican strategists reason that the hurricane may actually work in their favor in that the public has no appetite for a fiery, partisan battle over the Supreme Court. "People are in no mood for a circus," said a senior administration official who spoke anonymously because of the sensitivity of the situation. "The country is dealing with a terrible tragedy. The American people want a dignified process."

Specter, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, yesterday rescheduled hearings originally slated for today until Monday. Preparing for a showdown, some Democrats mapped plans to link Roberts's past opposition to affirmative action and other civil rights measures to the unfolding scenes of mostly poor African Americans hit hardest by the hurricane.

Democrats will make that argument in part through their witness list, which includes Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), a leader in the 1960s civil rights movement who plans to note that courts historically have led the way in guaranteeing rights for the disenfranchised. "New Orleans is just a symbol," he said in an interview. "We are still a nation divided by race and class, and I don't see [Roberts] being an advocate for those who were left out and left behind."

Democrats used the delay in the Roberts hearings to renew their request for documents related to his service as principal deputy solicitor general under President George H.W. Bush, but Specter rejected the appeal. The government has released tens of thousands of pages of memos and papers from Roberts's early service in the Reagan administration while refusing to turn over those from the solicitor general's office on the grounds of preserving confidential deliberations.

On other matters, Democrats sent mixed messages as party leaders seemed to search for a consensus strategy. Some said Roberts should be held to a higher scrutiny because of the influence of a chief justice. "Look at [Earl] Warren and Rehnquist," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), referring to two long-serving chiefs credited with moving the court to the left and right, respectively.

But other Democrats said the switch of Roberts to replace Rehnquist rather than O'Connor actually made his confirmation less significant because now it would be trading one conservative for another. Unlike Rehnquist, O'Connor was a decisive vote in many cases. "She has been the swing vote on so many of the freedoms" important to Americans, said Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.).

In a similar vein, Democrats also split on whether Bush should signal his choice for O'Connor's seat before the Senate votes on Roberts. Shortly after Bush picked Roberts for chief, Kennedy said the president should disclose his proposed replacement for O'Connor expeditiously. But Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) urged Bush not to rush. "It would seem to me the White House may want to take it a little more slowly," Reid told reporters.

Bush appeared in no rush. "I'll take a good, long look at who should replace Justice O'Connor," he said. Bush noted that he spoke with O'Connor on Monday to inform her that Roberts would be submitted for Rehnquist's seat instead of hers and to remind her that she had agreed to remain on the court until her successor is confirmed. "Her first reaction was that she better get back to doing her homework," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0003295

Having gone through a selection process just two months ago, Bush has a good sense of the universe of candidates, who besides Gonzales appear to include former deputy attorney general Larry D. Thompson and a plethora of appeals court judges, including J. Michael Luttig, Edith Hollan Jones and Priscilla R. Owen. Bush has not scheduled any more candidate interviews, nor is he holding any regular meetings with aides, instead discussing the choice on a more ad hoc basis by calling advisers when he has a thought or question, officials said.

"He's got his mind organized around a short, decent list of people," said one senior official close to the process who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the confidentiality of the process. "But he's not close-minded about this at this point."

As much as anything, timing may be the open question. Bush is unlikely to announce the next nomination in the midst of next week's hearings on Roberts, but the president's advisers are debating whether it would be better to go ahead after the hearings or to wait until after a final floor vote, now scheduled for the week of Sept. 26.

Even if O'Connor is sitting on the court when its next term opens Oct. 3, her presence may not matter much. If she is not still there when decisions are written and issued months later, her vote would not count. In instances when that would leave a 4 to 4 tie, the cases might have to be reargued for her successor's benefit.

"The president ought to act expeditiously simply to fill the slot as quickly as possible," said Todd F. Gaziano, a scholar at the Heritage Foundation and former Jones clerk.

Others argue that even with two appointments, Bush needs another to effect lasting change. "While this weekend was filled with dramatic events, they won't transform the court in the way people on both sides hope or fear," said M. Edward Whelan III, president of the Ethics and Public Policy Center and a former clerk to Justice Antonin Scalia. "Real transformation requires replacing someone on the left with a proponent of judicial restraint."

Bush Hints At Gonzales For Court Opening (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

President Bush yesterday reignited speculation that he would nominate Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to the Supreme Court, saying the list of potential candidates to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor is "wide open."

Mr. Bush made his comments at a Cabinet meeting, adding that his words "should create some good speculation here in Washington."

"And make sure you notice when I said that I looked right at Al Gonzales, who can really create speculation."

Although the remark drew chuckles from Cabinet members and journalists, Bush aides said he is seriously considering Mr. Gonzales. That prompted a fresh round of grumbling from conservatives, who fear that Mr. Gonzales would not vote to overturn Roe v. Wade, the 1973 high court ruling that legalized abortion.

"He's obviously not pro-life," said Mark Crutcher, president of Life Dynamics.

Stephen Peroutka, chairman of National Pro-Life Action Center, pointed out that Mr. Gonzales voted to allow a girl have an abortion without telling her parents in 2000 when he was on the Texas Supreme Court.

Mr. Bush emphasized that he is casting a wide net for his second Supreme Court nominee in two months. His first nominee, Judge John G. Roberts Jr., was chosen in July and will appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee next week for confirmation hearings.

"I was deliberate in my process last time; I'll be deliberative this time," Mr. Bush said.

The president said he does not expect to name a replacement until Judge Roberts is seated on the bench as a replacement for Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday. Mr. Roberts was initially tapped to replace Justice O'Connor, but was renominated to become chief justice after Chief Justice's Rehnquist's death.

"I want the Senate to focus not on who the next nominee is going to be, but the nominee I've got up there now," Mr. Bush said.

Meanwhile, Justice O'Connor has agreed to stay on the court until her replacement is found.

"She'll be there when the court is seated with a new chief justice," the president said.

DOJ_NMG_0003296

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid said he expects to be consulted on the new nominee and urged the president not to nominate a staunch conservative.

"I look forward to consulting with the president on the O'Connor seat," the Nevada Democrat said on the Senate floor. "Justice O'Connor has been a voice of moderation and reason on the court and should be replaced by someone who, like her, embodies the fundamental American values of fairness, liberty and equality."

In July, Mr. Reid said Mr. Gonzales is "qualified" to sit on the Supreme Court, which made some conservatives even more suspicious of the potential nominee's credentials. But it also suggested that Mr. Gonzales, if nominated, would garner at least some Democratic votes in the Senate.

ABC News political editor Mark Halperin yesterday wondered whether "the White House will secretly welcome the opposition of a few conservative groups, making Gonzales seem more moderate."

Gonzales Is Mentioned In Supreme Court Remarks (NYT)

By Richard W. Stevenson And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - President Bush said Tuesday that his list of candidates to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was "wide open," and he jokingly but pointedly singled out Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

Mr. Bush's mention of Mr. Gonzales as a possibility, in comments to reporters at the end of a cabinet meeting, fueled concern among conservatives, who were already mobilizing against the attorney general. Conservatives say that Mr. Gonzales has not shown himself to be sufficiently opposed to abortion rights and that nominating him would miss an opportunity to move the court fundamentally to the right.

Mr. Bush said that he had yet to make up his mind and that he would "take a good, long look at who should replace Justice O'Connor." But he mentioned only one name, that of Mr. Gonzales, a longtime friend and aide who, if nominated and confirmed, would be the first Hispanic on the court.

"The list is wide open, which should create some good speculation here in Washington," Mr. Bush said to laughter in the Cabinet Room, with the attorney general sitting directly across from him. "And make sure you notice when I said that, I looked right at Al Gonzales, who can really create speculation."

The president's remark came as the Senate delayed until next week confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr., who had been nominated to fill Justice O'Connor's seat but who was selected by Mr. Bush on Monday as his nominee for chief justice after William H. Rehnquist died on Saturday. The hearings on Judge Roberts's nomination to Justice O'Connor's seat had been scheduled to begin Tuesday.

The White House has already signaled that Mr. Bush will not announce a selection of a new replacement for Justice O'Connor this week. The president went further on Tuesday, suggesting that he would hold off on a selection at least until Judge Roberts's nomination reached the Senate floor, if not until he was confirmed.

"I want the Senate to focus not on who the next nominee is going to be, but the nominee I've got up there now," Mr. Bush said.

It has never been clear how seriously Mr. Bush has considered Mr. Gonzales for the Supreme Court, and it was hard to tell if the president's remarks were calculated to send a signal or were simply a reflection of his sense of humor and his disdain for Washington guessing games.

Mr. Bush, as governor of Texas, named Mr. Gonzales to the State Supreme Court in 1999 after employing him as one of his top aides, and then brought him to Washington as White House counsel in 2001. He became attorney general this year.

A senior administration official, speaking on the condition of anonymity to provide his interpretation of Mr. Bush's remarks on Tuesday, said that the president was "giving a jab to a good friend" and that both men are "immune to speculation and rumors."

But by mentioning Mr. Gonzales, however lightheartedly, Mr. Bush increased the likelihood that conservative groups would reprise and perhaps intensify their largely behind-the-scenes effort earlier this summer to convince the White House that selecting Mr. Gonzales for Justice O'Connor's seat would be a betrayal of his most ardent supporters.

DOJ_NMG_0003297

"Would any of his aides have the nerve to tell him that as Supreme Court jurists go, Gonzales would be mediocre - and not a solid bet to move the court in a constitutionalist direction?" William Kristol, editor of The Weekly Standard, wrote in an article posted Tuesday afternoon on that conservative magazine's Web site. "Would any of them have the nerve to explain to the president that a Gonzales nomination would utterly demoralize many of his supporters, who are sticking with him and his party, through troubles in Iraq and screw-ups with Hurricane Katrina, precisely because they want a few important things out of a Bush presidency - and one of these is a more conservative court?"

Conservatives have been hoping for years to replace Justice O'Connor, a swing vote on abortion, immigration, religion and other divisive social issues, with a conservative who could fundamentally alter the balance on the court. They have been pressing Mr. Bush to choose someone like Judge J. Michael Luttig of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, in Virginia, a strong opponent of abortion rights.

Confirmation hearings for Judge Roberts, a former Rehnquist clerk, had been scheduled to begin Tuesday when lawmakers returned from a monthlong recess. Now the hearings on his nomination as chief justice will begin Monday, giving liberal groups more time to develop their case against him.

Democrats have called on Mr. Bush to ask Justice O'Connor to stay on for a full year, saying such a move would bring stability to the court and avoid a divisive confirmation process in the devastating aftermath of the hurricane.

"If he wants to be a hero," said Senator Barbara Boxer, Democrat of California, referring to the president, "he can pick up the phone and call Sandra Day O'Connor."

Republicans said that as a replacement they were looking for someone like Judge Roberts, a conservative whose impressive legal résumé has made him difficult for Democrats to challenge.

"I'd be pleased if you could clone John Roberts," said Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama.

Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, said, "I don't know whether John Roberts has a twin, perhaps a sister or, uh, someone with a Hispanic last name."

Mr. Bush's remark about Mr. Gonzales left many conservative allies of the White House guessing. Some took it as just an off-the-cuff comment, intended to tweak a good friend.

Others wondered if Mr. Bush was "testing the waters," in the words of Marion Edwyn Harrison, president of the Free Congress Foundation, a conservative group whose chairman, Paul Weyrich, has expressed serious reservations about putting Mr. Gonzales on the court.

Should Mr. Bush nominate Mr. Gonzales, he would also arouse the ire of some liberals, who have been critical of Mr. Gonzales's role in setting administration policy regarding torture and the treatment of prisoners seized in what the White House calls the global war on terrorism.

But he is seen by some Democrats in Congress as a relatively moderate option who could steer clear of an ideological showdown.

"I think what most Americans are looking for is someone in the image of Sandra Day O'Connor," Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said, "and while we don't know a lot of details about Attorney General Gonzales, at first blush he would seem to be in that image."

Pressure Rises With Roberts Hearings Set For Next Week (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — Senate leaders said Tuesday that the Judiciary Committee would begin hearings Monday on President Bush's nomination of John G. Roberts Jr. to be chief justice, and the president said he would take his time selecting a candidate from a "wide open" field to fill the Supreme Court's second vacancy.

At midday, Bush formally sent Roberts' name to the Senate to succeed Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday, and withdrew the earlier nomination of Roberts to fill the seat of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who is retiring.

"I want the Senate to focus not on who the next nominee is going to be, but the nominee I got up there now," Bush said. "In the meantime, the country can be assured that I'll take a good, long look at who should replace Justice O'Connor."

DOJ_NMG_0003298

Democrats urged the president to move quickly to fill the vacancy, saying it would be easier for them to support Roberts' nomination if they knew the name of the second nominee.

Senators on Tuesday spent their first full day on the job after their summer recess adjusting to a new reality: two Supreme Court vacancies that will need to be addressed against the backdrop of the national emergency caused by the devastation of Hurricane Katrina.

Even though the hearings on Roberts' nomination will start six days later than first planned as a result of Rehnquist's death, Senate leaders were optimistic that a vote on Roberts would take place before the Supreme Court term begins Oct. 3.

"Judge Roberts does have the skill, he does have the mind, he does have the intellect and the temperament to lead the Supreme Court for decades to come," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.

Bush's decision Monday to nominate Roberts as chief justice forced both parties to recalibrate their political compasses.

Democrats, worried about the balance of conservatives and liberals on the court, started pressuring Bush to quickly announce a nominee to replace O'Connor. She has been a swing vote between the court's liberal and conservative wings.

"If we had an idea of who might fill the other vacancy, it would help put (Roberts' nomination) in perspective," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin, D-Ill., a member of the Judiciary Committee. "This court is very closely divided, and if the president's next nominee is too extreme, it will worry us that the court is going to change for generations to come."

Republicans, apparently recognizing that delaying a second nomination might give the president more options, deferred to the White House. Over the weekend, Bush aides suggested the president would choose another nominee quickly. After a Cabinet meeting Tuesday morning, the president suggested a more measured pace.

"I was deliberate in my process last time. I will be deliberative this time," Bush said.

Democrats, who had indicated they were unlikely to try to block Roberts' confirmation, said the proposal to make him chief justice raised the stakes.

"At his age, we could see him for 25 or 30 years," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, D-Vt., the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee.Roberts is 50 years old.

Sen. Russell D. Feingold, D-Wis., said it was now more important for the White House to release 16 case files from Roberts' service in George H.W. Bush's administration that the current White House has withheld.

Democrats worry that the president could use a second nomination to name a conservative ideologue to placate the Republican Party's right wing, which privately has expressed concerns that Roberts might not be as reliable a conservative vote as they would like. Democrats express the opposite fear, that Roberts will be rigidly conservative.

"It really falls on us to ask important questions about who he really is and to require the administration to produce enough evidence about who he is and what he believes that we can make a reasonable judgment," Durbin said.

There is considerable speculation in both parties that Bush will try to name a woman or a member of an ethnic minority to promote more diversity among the justices.

"It is desirable to have balance on the court, and two women, I think, are a minimum," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the committee chairman. "But I don't think you can have a quota system either for women or a minority as an absolute determinant."

Senators said that the aftermath of Katrina had created an unusual backdrop for the Roberts hearings, but that it was important to move forward after the weeklong delay to mourn Rehnquist and the hurricane victims.

"All three branches of government are critical (even in) those Southeastern states that are suffering so terribly," said Sen Orrin G. Hatch, R-Utah, a member of the judiciary panel. "But this is one of the most important responsibilities the Senate has, and we need to exercise that responsibility."

The Right Wants A Woman (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 7, 2005

Key Republicans and conservatives are pressing President Bush to nominate a woman to replace retiring Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

DOJ_NMG_0003299

This is despite welcoming the nomination seven weeks ago of Judge John Roberts, a white man and a member of Washington's elite, who was elevated Monday as the nominee to replace the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

It may suggest that, with the president faltering in opinion polls, the right believes it needs the sop of liberal identity politics to get a second conservative justice confirmed.

Priscilla Owen, Edith Jones and Edith Brown Clement, all three from the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, and Janice Rogers Brown, of the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, are considered by conservatives to lead the list of potential female nominees.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) yesterday signaled that he would like Bush to nominate a woman.

"It is desirable to have a balance on the court," he said when asked about Bush's next nominee. "Two women, I think, are a minimum."

In the same breath, however, Specter added that the Supreme Court should not have a quota system for nominees.

Many conservative activists are talking behind the scenes about the desirability of a female nominee to replace O'Connor.

Paul Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation and a longtime leader of the conservative movement, told The Hill, "I've heard from any number of people who think that way." He said, however, that he didn't think the seat should be reserved for a woman.

Owen's name has arisen more frequently this week than it did when O'Connor announced her retirement in June.

The Senate confirmed Owen, a former Texas Supreme Court justice, at the end of May by a vote of 55-43 after Democrats had blocked her nomination for nearly four years.

Another activist said that "conservatives would embrace" Owen, Jones, Clement and Brown.

Clement was on the president's shortlist to replace O'Connor two months ago, but her stock is believed to have declined among conservatives since then.

Manuel Miranda, a former strategist to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) on judicial nominations, said there is pressure on Bush to appoint a woman or a member of a racial minority now that that he has selected Roberts to lead the court.

Referring to the pressure, he said, "I think it's greater to appoint a woman but also [there's pressure to name] a Hispanic."

Two Republican Judiciary Committee members, Sens. Orrin Hatch (Utah) and Tom Coburn (Okla.), said Bush should not let sex considerations drive his choice.

"I don't think it should be a question of a woman or a Hispanic or a Caucasian," said Hatch, who nevertheless added: "There are some outstanding women in the law whom the president is considering."

Democrats say they would like the president to announce his next nominee before they cast a final vote on Roberts's confirmation. Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), a member of the Judiciary panel, said it would be helpful.

Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.), another member of the committee, said he did not perceive "the point of waiting," when asked whether the president should make the announcement before Roberts has passed through the Senate.

Feingold also raised the possibility that Roberts may not be able to be confirmed within the three-week timeline Republicans set yesterday. Even before the delay of Roberts's hearing, he said, confirmation by October was uncertain.

Sen. Dick Durbin (Ill.), the Democratic whip, said that Democrats were committed to beginning Roberts's confirmation hearings this Monday but that it was too early to predict whether they would allow a final vote on Roberts to take place if Bush has not named O'Connor's successor.

Several liberal and conservative strategists said that linking Roberts and O'Connor's replacement would help Democrats portray Bush as trying to alter the makeup of the court dramatically by appointing two very conservative nominees at the same time.

Frist, Specter, Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Judiciary Committee ranking Democrat Patrick Leahy (Vt.) announced yesterday a new schedule for Roberts's confirmation hearings.

Frist said the schedule would allow lawmakers to complete action on Roberts's nomination by Oct. 3, the start of the Supreme Court's new term. But Reid countered that Democrats had made no commitment to holding a final vote by the start of the new term.

"You never know what is going to happen," Reid said.

Schumer indicated that Democrats reserve their power to extend the confirmation process as long as possible.

During interparty negotiations, Schumer insisted that Democrats not commit to a deadline for a final vote on Roberts or to limited rounds of questioning of the nominee.

Roberts's hearing will begin at noon Monday with a round of opening statements, followed by two days of questioning and a day of outside witness testimony.

Specter and Leahy have tentatively agreed to a committee vote on Roberts on Sept. 20. Specter acknowledged that Democrats could invoke Senate rules to delay the committee vote until the following week but said he hoped "no one will exercise the right to carry it over a week." Specter added that committee Democrats had assured their Republican colleagues that they want to move without unnecessary delay.

Leahy, who met with his committee colleagues over the Labor Day weekend, said that "substantive questions will be asked" but that Democrats would not create procedural delays.

Specter said that if lawmakers could not agree unanimously to a vote during the week of Sept. 20, the following Monday, Sept. 26, would be the fallback date for the committee vote, enabling Frist to schedule a final floor on one of the last four days of the month.

NJ Judge Mentioned As Possible Supreme Court Nominee (AP)

By DONNA DE LA CRUZ, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON (AP) -- A second opening on the U.S. Supreme Court is bringing renewed interest in Samuel A. Alito Jr., a federal judge from New Jersey who used to serve as the state's federal prosecutor.

Alito, who sits on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers the Garden State, is among several people mentioned by court observers as being on a "short list" of candidates for associate justice to succeed Sandra Day O'Connor. She is retiring but remaining on the bench until her replacement is confirmed. President Bush's original choice for that position, John Roberts, has been nominated to become chief justice following the death Saturday of William H. Rehnquist.

The other possible nominees include U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, former U.S. Solicitor General Theodore Olson, and former deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson.

Alito, 55, has been dubbed "Scalito" or "Scalia-lite" by some lawyers and political pundits because of a reputation as a strong, conservative jurist that often brings comparisons to conservative Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia. But Alito, 55, also has a reputation as being scholarly and quiet, rarely asking questions during oral arguments.

Alito's New Jersey ties run deep. Alito was born in Trenton, as was Scalia, although Scalia moved with his family to Queens, N.Y., when he was 5. Both Alito and Scalia are Italian-Americans.

Alito's deceased father, Samuel Alito Sr., was the director of the New Jersey's Office of Legislative Services from 1952 to 1984. Alito's sister, Rosemary Alito, is a partner with the law firm of Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham in Newark, and is regarded as one of New Jersey's top employment lawyers.

Alito earned his undergraduate degree from Princeton University in 1972 and graduated from Yale Law School in 1975. He served as a law clerk from 1976-1977 for Leonard Garth, a judge on the 3rd U.S. Circuit in Philadelphia. He returned to New Jersey in 1977 to work as an assistant U.S. attorney.

From 1981 to 1987, Alito worked in Washington, first as an assistant to the U.S. solicitor general and a deputy assistant U.S. attorney general. Alito returned to New Jersey in 1987, where he served as the U.S. Attorney for the District of New Jersey until 1990, when the first President Bush nominated him to the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Among Alito's noteworthy opinions was his sole dissent in the 1991 case that struck down a Pennsylvania law requiring women seeking abortions to tell their husbands. The Supreme Court later struck down the spousal notification.

But in 2000, Alito joined the majority in ruling that a New Jersey law banning late-term abortions was unconstitutional.

In a 1997 ruling, Alito said that Jersey City officials did not violate the Constitution with a holiday display that included a creche, a menorah and other secular symbols.

DOJ_NMG_0003301

Alito and his wife, Martha, live in West Caldwell. They have two children, a college-age son Philip and a younger daughter, Laura. His interests include tennis, music and the Philadelphia Phillies.

Target Date Is Set For Committee Vote On Roberts (WSJ/DJN)

By Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Senate leaders said the Judiciary Committee will vote no later than Sept. 26 on the nomination of Appeals Court Judge John Roberts to become the next U.S. chief justice.

Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) said yesterday that the committee will begin confirmation hearings on Monday. The hearings are expected to run a week. Although Republican and Democratic leaders said they are working together to move Mr. Roberts's nomination quickly, the full Senate might not hold a final vote on Judge Roberts until just before the high court convenes for its new term on Oct. 3.

"We have tried to work through all of the issues," Mr. Specter said. "I'm optimistic we will be able to dispense the duties of the committee and the full Senate."

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) said Democrats plan to work with Republicans to move ahead on the hearings. But he said his party remains largely uncommitted on how it will vote. Mr. Reid said he has "some concerns" about Mr. Roberts's writings on civil rights and women's issues from when he worked for Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

Following the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist on Saturday, President Bush named Judge Roberts to fill the top job. He was originally nominated to fill the seat of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who announced her retirement July 1.

Rehnquist's Casket Lies in Supreme Court

Meanwhile, Chief Justice Rehnquist's casket was carried up the steps of the Supreme Court Tuesday by former clerks including John Roberts, the man nominated to succeed him as chief justice. Official Washington began paying its last respects at the court to the nation's 16th chief justice.

Judge Roberts -- currently a member of the federal appeals court in Washington, D.C. -- and the seven other pallbearers bore the flag-draped casket up some 40 steps of the high court to the Great Hall, where busts of the former chief justices are displayed in niches and on marble pedestals along the walls.

The doors to the court chamber, where Chief Justice Rehnquist had served for 33 years, were open at the east end of the hall. His casket was placed on the Lincoln Catafalque, the structure on which President Lincoln's coffin rested in the Rotunda of the Capitol a century and a half earlier.

Lining the steps to greet the casket were six justices, including Sandra Day O'Connor, who was in tears as the casket passed by. She announced her plans to retire in July, resulting in President Bush's nomination of Judge Roberts to replace her. Mr. Bush said Monday he would nominate Judge Roberts to be chief justice instead. Senate leaders said his confirmation hearings are set to begin Monday, after being delayed.

Absent from Tuesday's ceremonies were Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and David Souter.

The Rev. George Evans Jr., the Rehnquist family pastor at the Lutheran Church of the Redeemer in Virginia, offered a prayer as the justices, former clerks, court staff and family surrounded the casket. Two sprays of flowers and a large portrait of the chief justice were on display.

After the brief ceremony, a long line of people formed outside the court and people began walking inside past the coffin of the chief justice, who died Saturday night.

Public viewing was to take place until 10 p.m. Eastern Time on Tuesday and from 10 a.m. until noon Wednesday. On Wednesday, funeral services will be at 2 p.m. at St. Matthew's Cathedral in Washington, open to friends and family.

Burial at Arlington National Cemetery will be private. The bodies of Chief Justice Rehnquist's two immediate predecessors, Warren E. Burger and Earl Warren, also are buried at Arlington. Chief Justices Burger and Warren lay in repose in the Supreme Court Building before their services.

DOJ_NMG_0003302

Given his office, Chief Justice Rehnquist is entitled to a state-sponsored official funeral, a ceremony that includes a 19-gun salute, four ruffles and flourishes from drums and bugles, and the last 32 bars of the John Philip Sousa march "Stars and Stripes Forever" among other military honors.

Hearings Set For Monday (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, September 7, 2005

The Senate Judiciary Committee will kick-start hearings on Judge John Roberts' nomination to be chief justice of the United States on Monday, a six-day delay allowing for the funeral and burial services this week for the late William Rehnquist.

The delay, however, still leaves plenty of time for the committee to hold a week's worth of hearings, as originally scheduled, and send the nominee to the full Senate for a vote by the final week of September — the timetable originally laid out by Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

"Assurances have been made that everybody wants to get it concluded," Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said, although Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) stipulated that those were general assurances of cooperation and not an iron-clad guarantee that Democrats wouldn't attempt to slow the process.

Regardless, without any new revelations that require the hearings to extend well into the month, Specter said they would conclude on Sept. 16. In order to send the nomination to the full Senate with a recommendation, the committee will then reconvene one of three days: Sept. 20 or Sept. 22, but Sept. 26 at the latest.

That gives the Senate almost three full weeks to take up other legislation, particularly any related to fallout from Katrina's devastation, and then handle the Roberts nomination beginning Sept. 26 and continuing through the rest of that week.

Specter said he expected President Bush would fairly quickly make a new appointment to fill the vacancy created by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement earlier this summer. "My instinct is the White House will be ready for an appointment reasonably soon," he said.

But that announcement is not likely to interrupt the Roberts proceedings in any way, although Specter said the early phases of the new nomination battle could get under way while the Senate is still handling Roberts.

"We can pat our head and rub our stomach at the same time," he said.

Senate Sets Date For Roberts Confirmation Hearings (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

Senate leaders agreed to begin confirmation hearings for federal Judge John G. Roberts Jr. on Monday, giving Congress this week to mourn the death of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist.

"The schedule allows us both to pause to pay appropriate respect to Chief Justice Rehnquist and to complete floor action on the nomination of Judge Roberts as chief justice by October 3, the start of the Supreme Court's new term," Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, said yesterday.

The schedule allows for a Judiciary Committee vote on Judge Roberts' nomination by Sept. 22, followed by at least a week of debate on the floor of the Senate, according to committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican.

"You can never know for sure about a completion date because we conclude when the last senator stops talking, and that's always hard to predict," said Mr. Specter, who is becoming known for keeping loquacious senators under control during his committee's proceedings.

Republicans had been under pressure to postpone the Roberts hearings, first for Hurricane Katrina and then for the death of Justice Rehnquist.

Even the mayor of New Orleans, C. Ray Nagin, took time out of his frantic efforts to salvage his city to call Mr. Specter over the weekend and ask that the Roberts hearings be delayed.

"Events overtook us with the passing of Chief Justice Rehnquist and concern for the sentiments for the Rehnquist family," Mr. Specter said. "And then events overtook us again with the naming by the president of Judge Roberts to be chief justice, if confirmed."

DOJ_NMG_0003303

Despite the postponement, Mr. Specter and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and ranking minority member on the committee, agreed that the hearings should commence without too much partisan delay. At times during a joint briefing yesterday, the two men were cordial -- even jovial -- with one another

"Senator Leahy and I have talked at great, great length about how we're proceeding and it is significantly on the basis of good faith that I am optimistic," Mr. Specter said.

Mr. Leahy said he would work with Mr. Specter, "as I have all the way through this, to keep things in line to make sure there's not procedural delays." He added that "substantive questions will be asked."

Some Democrats have said that since Judge Roberts' nomination has been elevated to chief justice, more documents should be handed over, including the solicitor general reports that the White House says are protected under attorney-client privilege.

Mr. Specter dismissed the idea, saying the more than 70,000 pages of documents provided thus far have shed plenty of light on the nominee's record.

"Judge Roberts has a very, very extensive paper trail," Mr. Specter said. "He has commented, I think, on all the issues which are of concern."

Specter Asks; Roberts Answers, For The Most Part (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

There are advantages to being Senate Judiciary Committee chairman, and Arlen Specter used them yesterday to sit down with the man nominated to be chief justice of the United States and to quiz him about abortion, consensus-building and other topics.

Specter (R-Pa.) invited John G. Roberts Jr. to his Senate office shortly after Roberts helped carry William H. Rehnquist's coffin into the Supreme Court, where the late chief justice lay in repose. In an interview, Specter said he asked Roberts, an appeals court judge, a range of questions, including, "How are you going to handle guys like Scalia? He's a lot older than you."

Justice Antonin Scalia, once considered a contender for chief justice, is 69. Roberts, 50, replied somewhat indirectly, according to Specter, by saying he considers it "a dialogue among equals" when lawyers argue cases before the Supreme Court.

"I'm intrigued by his concept of a dialogue among equals," Specter said, because it suggests Roberts will bring a needed tone of humility to court interactions. "I think for Judge Roberts to approach the court that way shows a lot of confidence," Specter said.

Specter said he also raised concerns about recent court rulings that he considers confusing and inexplicable. They include two 5 to 4 decisions regarding public displays of the Ten Commandments that in some ways seemed contradictory. Justice Stephen G. Breyer was the crucial swing vote in both cases, but "there's no explanation" of his reasoning, Specter said.

"I talked to him about consensus-building," the senator said. "He said that was something that he thought was important" and will be a priority if he is confirmed.

Specter said he also told Roberts that the 1973 landmark abortion rights case Roe v. Wade has been followed by 38 Supreme Court rulings meant to refine or clarify its guidelines, and he asked, "Is Roe a super-precedent?"

And the nominee's reply? "He didn't say," Specter said. Even a committee chairmanship, it seems, has its limits.

Roberts Confirmation Hearing Set For Monday (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, September 7, 2005

U.S. Chief Justice nominee John Roberts' confirmation hearing will begin on Monday, Senate leaders said, with Democrats vowing to take as long as needed to question the 50-year-old conservative who could lead the Supreme Court for decades.

At the White House, President George W. Bush said the field was "wide open" for his other pick for the nation's highest court but that the pending nominee was unlikely to be in place by the time the court begins its new term on October 3.

DOJ_NMG_0003304

Bush also dampened Democratic hopes they would know who the second nominee was before they vote on Roberts, a federal appeals court judge the past two years who appears to have broad support to become the nation's 17th chief justice.

"I want the Senate to focus not on who the next nominee is going to be but the nominee I've got up there now," Bush said.

Bush originally nominated Roberts in July to fill the lifetime post of retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate conservative who had been a swing vote on the sharply divided court.

But on Monday, Bush switched and nominated Roberts to replace Chief Justice William Rehnquist, a leading conservative who died on Saturday at the age of 80 of cancer.

Roberts' hearing was to have begun on Tuesday. But it was delayed until next week in the wake of Rehnquist's death and Bush's nomination of Roberts as the new chief justice.

"It would have been unseemly to go forward with a hearing on his successor this week," said Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee that will hold the hearing.

In announcing the rescheduled hearing to begin at noon EDT September 12, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist expressed confidence Roberts would win Senate confirmation by the time the high court begins its new term.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, a Nevada Democrat, promised bipartisan cooperation, but said there was no guarantee on when a Senate vote would take place.

"There are no commitments of a date certain to vote on the nomination, so everyone should understand that," said Reid, flanked by fellow Senate leaders.

At the White House Bush noted O'Connor, who will not step down until her replacement is confirmed, would still be on the nine-member court when the session begins.

"The list is wide open, which should create some good speculation here in Washington," Bush said of her pending new replacement. "And make sure you notice when I said that I looked right at Al Gonzales."

Gonzales, the attorney general, has been among those considered potential picks for the Supreme Court even though some of Bush's fellow conservatives complain his longtime friend may not be not be conservative enough.

The Judiciary Committee will spend four or five days on the nomination of Roberts, which has drawn the support of conservative groups and opposition from liberal organizations.

"While we mourn the chief's passing, we look forward with confidence at the president's new nominee for chief justice," said Frist, a Tennessee Republican.

Several Senate Democrats have spoken glowingly of Roberts, who served in two Republican administrations and received the American Bar Association's highest rating for a seat on the Supreme Court.

But a number of Democrats and other groups have questioned his record on civil rights and women's rights, based largely on a review of tens of thousands of pages of documents from his work as a lawyer in the Reagan administration two decades ago.

Democrats have said they will withhold final judgment until after what promises to be a bruising confirmation hearing.

"I'm very happy that (in) my Democratic caucus -- no one has made a commitment how they're going to vote," Reid said. "And I think that's appropriate because these hearings, as far as I'm concerned, are very important."

(Additional reporting by Tabassum Zakaria)

Katrina Thrusts Government's Role To The Fore In Confirmation Battle (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON - By opening questions about poverty, race and government policies, Hurricane Katrina has made landfall on Washington's deliberations over vacancies on the U.S. Supreme Court and threatens to make John Roberts' confirmation hearings for chief justice a contentious test of conservative thought.

Democrats and liberal groups say Roberts' past opposition to expanded affirmative action and voting rights laws should get extra scrutiny, especially in light of the disproportionate suffering by poor black residents of New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0003305

Democrats have long advocated a more activist government, while conservatives have pressed for a smaller federal bureaucracy that gives more power to the states. Democrats believe that Katrina has focused attention on a broader function of the federal government - not only in rescue, relief and rebuilding but also in setting policies that protect the most vulnerable.

In that vein, the questions Roberts will face will be part of a larger Democratic strategy designed to confront conservative orthodoxy head on.

"The events of the past week have only underscored that we need Supreme Court justices who value the role of the courts in protecting individuals' rights and freedoms, who understand the nature of discrimination and its continuing impact on our country, and who will uphold the role of the federal government in preserving those rights and acting to protect the common good," said Ralph Neas, president of the liberal People for the American Way.

Roberts was to face hearings Tuesday before the Senate Judiciary Committee as the nominee to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. But on Monday, President Bush nominated Roberts to replace Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who died Saturday. The Judiciary Committee planned to delay the start of Roberts' hearings to later this week or next week.

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, a member of the Judiciary Committee, said he believed using Katrina to question Roberts on civil rights was "a stretch."

He said Roberts' legal conservatism makes him much more like Rehnquist than O'Connor, who is considered more moderate. "A Roberts for a Rehnquist ought to be less controversial than a Roberts for an O'Connor," he said.

But Sen. Edward Kennedy, who already was prepared before Katrina hit to spend his hearing time questioning Roberts about civil rights, was expected to emphasize the racial disparities revealed by Katrina's destruction.

Kennedy, D-Mass., is expected to zero in on Roberts' internal memoranda while he was a young lawyer in the Reagan administration, when he advised the White House to fight efforts to expand the reach of anti-discrimination laws and the Voting Rights Act.

"Roberts wants to restrict the role of government," said Jenny Backus, a Democratic consultant. "His early writings ... have really raised question about what he will perceive as the appropriate role for strong centralized government. You will see more questions about that, especially with him as chief."

Despite the stepped up scrutiny, Roberts' confirmation still appears likely.

Chief justices are considered first among equals, but have significant authority in assigning court opinions when they are in the majority, a power that can determine whether a ruling will have broad legal implications or narrow applications.

When Rehnquist was elevated to chief justice in 1986, Democrats criticized his record on civil rights and accused him of working to intimidate black and Hispanic voters as a Republican poll watcher in Arizona in the early 1960s. In the end, Rehnquist got 33 "no" votes, more than any other chief justice in history.

Will Roberts Choose Candor Or Silence Before Senate? (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Law.com, September 7, 2005

By today, Supreme Court nominee John Roberts Jr. was supposed to be answering the questions of Senate Judiciary Committee members as part of his confirmation hearing to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Instead, because of the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist on Saturday, and the swift decision by President George W. Bush to put Roberts in the chief justice's spot instead, the Roberts hearing has been put off until Monday.

But when the hearing finally gets underway, the questions will likely be the same, and the dilemma for Roberts will be the same, though possibly more urgent: how candid should he be about his views on the law? It's a crucial decision for Roberts to make. Senate Democrats will be insisting on as much candor as possible, while Republicans hope and expect Roberts will stay out of trouble by invoking a previously unheard of doctrine called the "Ginsburg precedent."

In anticipation of a reticent Roberts, conservatives offered evidence of what the Federalist Society said was the "vast number" of times Clinton nominee Ruth Bader Ginsburg declined to answer substantive questions during her 1993 confirmation hearing. Liberal groups including the American Constitution Society fired back, documenting all the moments when Ginsburg actually answered questions "candidly and at length."

DOJ_NMG_0003306

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-NY, gave a speech last week debunking the conservative version of the Ginsburg precedent, warning that if Roberts invokes it, it will sound more like taking the Fifth. On the other side, former Republican Attorneys General Edwin Meese III, Dick Thornburgh and William Barr, among others, wrote to the Judiciary Committee reminding members that Ginsburg said during her hearing that she would give "no hints, no forecast, no previews" of how she might vote on future cases.

But Ginsburg is far from the only nominee who said little -- or a lot, depending on which version you believe -- to the assembled senators reviewing a Supreme Court nomination.

During the 1986 cakewalk enjoyed by Justice Antonin Scalia, the late Sen. Strom Thurmond asked him a softball question about the meaning of Marbury v. Madison, the 1803 decision that declared the Court's power to review acts of Congress. "I do not think I should answer questions regarding any specific Supreme Court opinion, even one as fundamental as Marbury v. Madison," Scalia said coyly.

More famously, nominee Clarence Thomas in his 1991 hearing denied ever having discussed Roe v. Wade as a law student. Few believed him, but it may have been a safer answer than if he had been more candid.

All recent nominees, in fact, have declined to answer questions that they or their handlers thought would get them in trouble. But they also have yielded just enough information to give the media something to chew on and give senators a feeling of accomplishment.

Nominee David Souter in 1990 probably gave Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., more than he expected when he asked Souter an unusual question: How he thought his predecessor, William Brennan, Jr. would be remembered. Souter replied that Brennan would be remembered as "one of the most fearless, principled guardians of the American Constitution that it has ever had and ever will have." In retrospect, Souter's fervor in praising the liberal lion might have been an early signal that Souter was not the conservative that Republicans hoped he would be.

If Roberts wants to be more candid next week than some past nominees, he would have ample precedent from both ends of the spectrum.

In 2002 Scalia -- the same justice who would not discuss Marbury v. Madison -- took a more expansive view in his ruling in Republican Party of Minnesota v. White. That decision dealt with what judicial candidates can and cannot say during a judicial election, but Scalia's words resonate in the context of appointed candidates.

"A judge's lack of predisposition regarding the relevant legal issues in a case has never been thought a necessary component of equal justice, and with good reason," wrote Scalia. "For one thing, it is virtually impossible to find a judge who does not have preconceptions about the law."

Indeed, Scalia added, "even if it were possible to select judges who did not have preconceived views on legal issues, it would hardly be desirable to do so," since it would indicate that the judge had not thought much about the law.

A more recent example of judicial candor came just last month from the more liberal Justice John Paul Stevens. In a speech before the Clark County Bar Association in Las Vegas Aug. 18, Stevens reviewed Supreme Court decisions from last term that produced "results that I consider unwise." They were also, he added, decisions he either wrote or joined.

Two of the cases he mentioned were ones he actually wrote: Kelo v. City of New London and Gonzales v. Raich.

In the controversial Kelo case, Stevens upheld the power of the town of New London, Conn., to take private property by eminent domain for private development by others, a result he said was "entirely divorced from my judgment concerning the wisdom of the program."

Likewise in Raich, Stevens said he agreed with "the policy choice made by millions of voters" in California to legalize the medical use of marijuana. Yet he wrote an opinion favoring the federal anti-drug laws that supersede the California initiative.

As a result of his speech, the public now knows what Stevens personally believes about eminent domain and medical marijuana. Yet if those issues come to the Court again, would anyone suggest that Stevens could not rule impartially?

By the same token, what would happen if Roberts were just as candid and told the Senate Judiciary Committee what he really thinks about issues large and small? Then the question would be whether he, like Stevens, could set aside those views as a Supreme Court justice. And that may be the most important and difficult question of all.

Inside Politics (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0003307

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

Minutemen go north

Former Yonkers, N.Y., Mayor John Spencer is joining with the Minutemen to bring the all-volunteer patrol to America's northern borders.

The Minutemen have concentrated their efforts in the Southwest to discourage illegal immigration from Mexico. What about New York, Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont?

Mr. Spencer will meet with the Minutemen on Saturday at an American Legion Hall in Babylon, N.Y. He is intent on organizing and training volunteers to patrol the northern border in those four states.

"Those immigrating are not the enemy; the drug dealers, the criminals and the potential terrorists hiding among them are the enemy," Mr. Spencer said yesterday calling the Minutemen "force multipliers."

Mr. Spencer is a candidate for the Republican nomination to challenge New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton in 2006.

One judge to another

Robert H. Bork, the Reagan-era Supreme Court nominee rejected by the Senate after his 1987 confirmation hearings devolved into public spectacle, says he wants Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to be confirmed as the next chief justice.

Speaking at the National Press Club yesterday, Mr. Bork suggested it's unlikely Supreme Court confirmation hearings ever again will resemble "any dignified process."

"Today's confirmations are political struggles, political circuses, and there may be no going back," said Mr. Bork, a former federal judge.

"Mr. Bork offered Judge Roberts, and any other upcoming nominee, advice for a Senate hearing:

"Don't write or say anything about the Constitution. Judge Roberts has already satisfied that requirement. The second: Don't commit your vote at the hearings on any issues. If you are drawn into a commitment to how you will vote, you'll only be ratifying the corruption of the confirmation process. And third, don't make it obvious that you think some of the senators' questions reveal that they haven't a clue about the Constitution or its interpretations."

Dad to the rescue

Former President George Bush is fed up with unreasonable attacks on his son, President Bush.

"The media has a fascination with the blame game," the senior Mr. Bush told CNN. "There was one particularly vicious comment that the president didn't care, was insensitive on ethnicity, insensitive about race. That one hurt, because I know this president, and I know he does care."

Mr. Bush continued: "Huge numbers of dollars have been appropriated or signed off on for the Congress, both Senate and the House, and he had to push forward. He cannot listen to every critic from the editorial page of the New York Times."

The former president also questioned certain media reports.

"I talked to Haley Barbour, the governor of Mississippi, yesterday because some people were saying, 'Well, if you hadn't sent your National Guard to Iraq, we here in Mississippi would be better off.' He told me 'I've been out in the field every single day, hour, for four days and no one, not one single mention of the word 'Iraq.'

"Where does that come from?" Mr. Bush asked. "Where does that story come from if the governor is not picking up one word about it?"

17, 5 and 2

"The New York Times today seemed so excited to see former President Bill Clinton involved in hurricane relief that it practically ignored his partner in this pursuit, former President [George] Bush," the Media Research Center noted yesterday.

According to one analysis, one Times story cited "Mr. Clinton by name at least 17 times, his wife five times, while the former President Bush is actually only named twice. From this, one would think that he's such an afterthought that this effort should be called the Clinton-Clinton Katrina Fund," the watchdog noted.

Celeb update

The trail of Hollywood hand-wringers grows in the wake of Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0003308

Among the stars who have either sounded off about -- or arrived in -- New Orleans for better or worse: Oprah Winfrey, the gray-bearded ex-James Bond Pierce Brosnan, Halle Berry, John Travolta and Sean Penn, who sank in his own ill-fated rescue boat.

Some showbiz types take action, though. Talk-radio host Rush Limbaugh has announced he will stage a benefit performance for hurricane victims in Manhattan. "Rush On Broadway" will have a single show Oct. 18 at New York's New Amsterdam Theater.

The event also will feature a special introduction by Fox News and talk-radio host Sean Hannity.

An insoluble woe?

Former Attorney General John Ashcroft yesterday said that U.S. problems with immigration along its porous border might be insoluble, reports Shaun Waterman of United Press International.

Speaking on efforts to address what he called government's "biggest challenge" -- the country's immigration policy and border-control regime -- Mr. Ashcroft said: "We're a long way from home there, and I don't know if we'll ever get that solved."

He spoke during a conference organized by the New America Foundation on terrorism and U.S. security.

Mr. Ashcroft said that the border's intractability mostly stems from conflicting goals, and also the sheer scale of the issue.

"We've got to try and find a way to welcome people and facilitate people who are bringing productivity and industry into the country," he said, "while at the same time we're careful about welcoming people who would bring devastation into the country."

"The real big problem is we've got 550 million border crossings a year," he said. "Think about that."

Question of attitude

Scripps Howard columnist Star Parker yesterday denounced statements by the Congressional Black Caucus, the Rev. Jesse Jackson and others that imply rescue efforts in New Orleans were impeded by racism.

"It is grossly irresponsible to imply that racism is at work here," said Miss Parker, founder of the Los Angeles-based Coalition on Urban Renewal and Education.

"The relevant question to ask is: 'Why, after these many years, does our African American population remain disproportionately poor?' " she said. "Those who assert that rescue efforts were impeded because of racism also assert that black poverty persists because of racism. It is this attitude, the welfare-state mentality, that has contributed in no small part to the tragedy we have witnessed."

For Chief Justice, A Final Session With His Court (WP)

By Susan Levine And Charles Lane

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

The flag-draped wooden coffin of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist was carried with slow, halting steps yesterday, up the long marble sweep of the institution where he presided for nearly two decades, between two silent lines of colleagues, staff and former law clerks, into a columned corridor where the mighty and humble alike began paying respects.

It was a journey that lasted only minutes, yet few gathered in the morning crowd outside the Supreme Court missed the most telling moments: when John G. Roberts Jr., the man nominated to succeed Rehnquist, walked solemnly with the other pallbearers toward the hearse bearing his body, and when an emotional Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, on the eve of her own planned farewell, wiped away tears as the plain white pine coffin passed and entered the building's Great Hall.

There, it was placed on the historic Lincoln Catafalque, which was covered in black velvet. Busts of Rehnquist's 15 predecessors as chief justice line the room where O'Connor and five other justices joined with his children and grandchildren in a short prayer service.

"Rest here now, child of God, William Hubbs Rehnquist," intoned the Rev. George W. Evans Jr., pastor of Lutheran Church of the Holy Redeemer in McLean, which Rehnquist attended for many years. "Rest here in the halls you know so well."

In those usually calm, reasoned halls -- where Rehnquist had been known simply as "the Chief" since President Ronald Reagan elevated him to the post in 1986 -- feelings flowed freely. Roberts, one of those former clerks, seemed to struggle to keep his composure. Justice Antonin Scalia brushed a tear from his eye.

DOJ_NMG_0003309

And O'Connor, a tough westerner raised amid cattlemen and rattlesnakes, sobbed openly; her friendship with Rehnquist dated more than a half-century to their law school days at Stanford University.

Outside, flags flew at half staff as a steady procession of visitors waited for admittance through the court's massive bronze doors. President Bush and the first lady arrived just before 4 p.m. and were escorted in through another, secured entrance. They stood before the coffin briefly, then walked over to view the formal painting of Rehnquist in his black judicial robes, on display for the first time.

Official Washington was joined throughout the day by tourists, teachers, bankers, ministers. Even when disagreeing with Rehnquist's unwaveringly conservative legal views, they said they appreciated his consistency, his leadership, the brilliance of his reasoning.

"He served this country well for a very long time," said sociology professor Roger Nemeth of Holland, Mich., drawing nods from those around him.

Representing Rehnquist's native state was Shirley S. Abrahamson, chief justice of the Wisconsin Supreme Court, whose take on his legacy is far more honed than most. So, too, is her personal connection: Rehnquist swore her into her position nearly a decade ago.

"You have someone who is widely praised as an administrator and chief, who's been fair and equitable with all the justices and managed to win their respect and regard" -- despite often sharp differences of opinion, Abrahamson reflected. "He stood up for administrative issues and judicial independence."

At 9:40 p.m., 20 minutes before the viewing was to end, more than 200 people still waited. They formed a line that stretched for 1 1/2 blocks, even after some were told by police that they probably would not make it inside the building.

At least 70 people remained as 10 p.m. came -- and went. The door remained open, and all those in line were allowed to pay their respects.

The public viewing continues from 10 a.m. to noon today. The 80-year-old Rehnquist, who died Saturday at his home in Arlington after battling thyroid cancer, will be buried at Arlington National Cemetery after a funeral service at 2 p.m. today at St. Matthew's Cathedral in Northwest Washington.

Evans and two other ministers from Holy Redeemer will conduct the service. Bush and O'Connor are expected to offer eulogies, as are two of the chief justice's children, James Rehnquist and Nancy Spears, and granddaughter Natalie Lynch.

Court officials said all eight justices will attend. Justice Anthony M. Kennedy was unable to make it back yesterday from travels in China, and Justice David H. Souter also was out of town.

Roberts, Rehnquist Compel Comparisons (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — For a quarter-century, William Rehnquist was a mentor to John Roberts, the federal appeals court judge now nominated to succeed the late chief justice.

Roberts was a law clerk to Rehnquist in 1980-81, and like Rehnquist, he became a lawyer for a conservative White House. When he wrote policy memos for President Reagan and legal briefs for the first President Bush, Roberts occasionally cited the work of Rehnquist, who died Saturday of thyroid cancer at age 80.

The close relationship between the two Midwesterners was evident Tuesday, when Roberts, 50, was one of eight pallbearers who carried Rehnquist's casket up the marble steps to the Supreme Court's Great Hall. The moment seemed to symbolize a transition of sorts, and with Roberts facing confirmation hearings in the Senate on Monday it was a reminder of a question that will be part of the backdrop to the hearings: how Roberts' style and brand of conservatism compares with that of the man he would succeed.

“It's hard to imagine a choice more similar to Chief Justice Rehnquist than John Roberts,” says Walter Dellinger, a former U.S. solicitor general. “They both love the law and they both are among a handful of the most intellectually accomplished legal minds.”

DOJ_NMG_0003310

Although Roberts' brief record in his work for the government and his 2½ years as a federal judge makes it difficult to predict precisely how he would view the law as chief justice, Dellinger believes that Roberts' views "would be closer to Rehnquist's than any other justice on the court."

Rehnquist, who was on the high court for 33 years — 19 of them as chief — sought a limited role for federal judges in American life and had a narrow view of individual rights. He voted against the court's decision in Roe v. Wade, the 1973 ruling that made abortion legal nationwide. He opposed affirmative action and policies intended to help racial minorities rebound after years of segregation. He also endorsed a low wall of separation between church and state.

Overall, Rehnquist believed that the nation's social dilemmas should be resolved by legislators, not judges. When he was appointed to the court in 1972 by President Nixon, Rehnquist's views often made him a lone dissenter on what was then a liberal court. But as Republican presidents continued to make appointments and Rehnquist was elevated to chief justice in 1986 by President Reagan, Rehnquist gained a majority on many fronts. (Abortion is an exception; six justices on the current court — including the retiring Sandra Day O'Connor — have backed abortion rights.)

Ted Cruz, a Texas solicitor general who is another former law clerk to Rehnquist, says he believes Roberts shares Rehnquist's support of judicial restraint. "Both believe it is principally the role of the democratically elected officials to make policy," says Cruz, who is here for Rehnquist's funeral today.

Much remains unknown about Roberts' current views, however. Thousands of pages of memos from his years in the Reagan and first Bush administrations indicate that he was a loyal foot soldier for conservative agendas. But it's not clear how he might vote today on divisive issues such as abortion rights, affirmative action and the separation of church and state.

Some Democratic senators, including Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Charles Schumer of New York, say they are troubled by Roberts' writings on civil rights and women's issues.

When he was a lawyer in the Reagan White House in the 1980s, Roberts sometimes was dismissive about women's claims of job and pay discrimination. He also sought to curtail the use of affirmative action in government and to limit judicial orders for school busing. He criticized a 1985 Supreme Court ruling that struck down an Alabama law requiring a "moment of silence" in schools, and he praised Rehnquist's stance in dissent of the ruling.

And yet, since President Bush originally nominated Roberts in mid-July to succeed O'Connor, Roberts' nomination generally has been well-received by senators.

Now that Bush has switched gears and nominated Roberts for the Rehnquist opening, Roberts is poised to make history: A few former Supreme Court law clerks have gone on to be justices — including Rehnquist, who worked for Justice Robert Jackson in the 1952-53 term — but Roberts would be the first court appointee to take the seat of his former boss.

Friends and colleagues of Rehnquist and Roberts use phrases such as "down to earth" and "amiable" to describe the personalities of Rehnquist, a Wisconsin native, and Roberts, who was born in Buffalo and grew up in Indiana. "There's a lot of personal warmth there," says Chuck Cooper, who like Roberts was a law clerk to Rehnquist and then worked in the Reagan administration. Cooper also says that Roberts and Rehnquist have compatible views of the law.

Their somewhat similar styles — along with the fact that Roberts argued 39 cases before the high court as a lawyer in government and private practice — could make it easier for Roberts to suddenly become the senior member of the bench and run the justices' private conferences.

"It will be an extraordinary moment in the first confidential conference when a legendary figure like William Rehnquist is replaced at the head of the table by someone so junior," says Dellinger, who was a law clerk to the late Justice Hugo Black. "But John Roberts is one of the few people who would be up to that challenge."

There are differences between the two men. Being 30 years younger than Rehnquist, Roberts might ultimately reveal a different worldview on contemporary issues such as gay rights. Rehnquist consistently voted against gay rights. Roberts, when he was in private practice, helped a team of lawyers that successfully urged the high court to strike down a Colorado law that barred cities from protecting lesbians and gay men from discrimination.

During court sessions, Rehnquist also had a no-nonsense devotion to punctuality that Roberts would be hard-pressed to match. The late chief justice insisted that lawyers at the lectern stop talking as soon as a red light in the court illuminated, signaling their time was up. When lawyers made their arguments, Rehnquist often would cut them off in midsentence.

DOJ_NMG_0003311

"When that light went on, if you didn't notice it, he certainly did," Cooper says. "I would be surprised if John is as abrupt and severe as the boss."

Former Aide Roberts Helps Bear Rehnquist's Coffin (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — The man who hopes to succeed William Rehnquist as chief justice helped carry the late jurist's plain pine coffin Tuesday up the marble steps of the Supreme Court, where friends, family and the public filed by all day to pay last respects.

John Roberts was one of eight ex-Rehnquist aides who served as pallbearers. President Bush later paid a solemn visit to the court, a day after nominating the federal appeals court judge to become the nation's 17th chief justice.

Rehnquist died of cancer Saturday at age 80. Bush will be one of the speakers today at a service at St. Matthew's Cathedral. Rehnquist will be buried at Arlington National Cemetery after the state funeral.

After a brief ceremony at the Supreme Court, Roberts crossed the street for a meeting with Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter. The Pennsylvania Republican will preside over Roberts' confirmation hearings beginning Monday. Specter predicted a "thorough and piercing" confirmation process for Roberts, who could influence the court for decades. Roberts, 50, would be the youngest chief justice since 1801, when John Adams appointed 45-year-old John Marshall.

Democrats say that will mean even closer scrutiny for Roberts, originally tapped to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Bush switched Roberts to the chief justice job after Rehnquist's death.

"I have some concerns with his writings a number of years ago concerning the rights of women and civil rights," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Some of the memos that have been released from Roberts' years as a lawyer for the Reagan White House show him arguing to limit the reach of federal laws designed to protect the rights of minorities and women.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., is pushing for a Senate vote on Roberts by the last week of the month, which would allow the judge to take his seat on the high court when it opens its next session Oct. 3. Reid said he's making no promises on the date for a confirmation vote. However, he and Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, top-ranking Judiciary Committee Democrat, indicated any slowdown would be due to substantive questions, not parliamentary maneuvering.

"I will work with Sen. Specter to make sure there are no procedural delays," Leahy said.

Leahy and Specter said they would like to see Bush nominate a woman to O'Connor's seat. "The two women are, I think, a minimum," said Specter, referring to O'Connor and Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg. However, he added, "I don't believe anybody ought to tie the president's hands."

O'Connor, who has agreed to stay on until the Senate confirms her successor, was standing on the steps with five of her fellow justices Monday. She wept as Rehnquist's flag-draped coffin passed.

Inside the court, the coffin was set onto a black catafalque first constructed in 1865 for President Lincoln. Since then, it has been used as a bier for a number of American leaders, most recently for former president Ronald Reagan.

A portrait of Rehnquist stood at the head of the room. Two bouquets of red roses, white snapdragons and blue bellflowers stood at either end of the coffin.

Mourners ranged from 12-year-old Sarah Strickland, visiting with her parents from Enterprise, Ala., and hoping for a glimpse of history, to Lloyd Roberts, a retired Supreme Court policeman who occasionally served as a driver for Rehnquist and called him "a real intellectual." Roberts is no relation to the Supreme Court nominee.

Bo Rutledge, a former law clerk for Justice Clarence Thomas, said Rehnquist was "very approachable" and liked to lunch with clerks. "He always took an interest in the people around him," said Rutledge, who teaches at Catholic University law school.

Chief Justice's Death Hits O'Connor Hard (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003312

WASHINGTON — As Chief Justice William Rehnquist's flag-draped casket was carried up the Supreme Court steps Tuesday morning, one of the most compelling images was the distraught, tear-streaked face of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Her public sadness was a reminder of all that Rehnquist and the nation's first female justice had been through together. They met in law school at Stanford University in the late 1940s. The World War II veteran was nearly six years her senior, but they developed a bond that endured through the years. They dated briefly, but then married other college sweethearts. Their families became close as Rehnquist and O'Connor walked remarkably similar paths.

In the 1960s, they lived in Phoenix and practiced law. They were active in Republican politics and became acolytes of conservative Arizona Sen. Barry Goldwater.

Rehnquist was an assistant U.S. attorney general on Oct. 21, 1971, when President Nixon nominated him to the Supreme Court. O'Connor, then a state senator in Arizona, sprung into action on Rehnquist's behalf. On the floor of the Arizona Senate the next day, she called her friend "one of the most brilliant legal minds in the country" and said that because he was only 47, he might one day be elevated to chief.

When Rehnquist was sworn in as an associate justice on Jan. 7, 1972, O'Connor was in the courtroom. She joined him on the bench in 1981, tapped by President Reagan in a historic appointment. Five years later, Reagan made Rehnquist chief justice when Warren Burger retired.

On June 27 of this year, their last day together in the courtroom, O'Connor helped Rehnquist down from the bench. Suffering from thyroid cancer, he looked frail.

As Rehnquist was expected to retire, it came as a surprise that week when O'Connor, 75, said she was stepping down to take care of her ailing husband, John. President Bush chose federal judge John Roberts to replace O'Connor, who said she would stay on the court until she was replaced. But after Rehnquist's death Saturday, Bush made Roberts the nominee for chief. So now, with her friend gone, O'Connor remains.

Bush And First Lady Visit Rehnquist's Coffin At Court (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - President Bush and his wife, Laura, made an unscheduled visit on Tuesday to the Supreme Court to pay their respects to Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, whose flag-draped coffin lay in the "great hall" that leads to the courtroom.

Hours earlier, Judge John G. Roberts Jr., whom the president has nominated to succeed the chief justice, had helped to carry the coffin into the court building and place it on the historic Lincoln Catafalque, on which President Lincoln's coffin once lay.

All day, members of official Washington as well as private citizens and tourists filed by the coffin. An oil portrait of the chief justice, who died Saturday at the age of 80, was placed nearby. Painted in 1994 by Thomas Loepp, it shows the four gold stripes with which the chief justice decorated each sleeve of his judicial robe and depicts him with a slightly bemused expression.

During their brief midafternoon visit, the president and first lady walked together to the coffin, and then examined the portrait in the company of Justice Antonin Scalia and Sally Rider, the chief justice's administrative assistant.

Chief Justice Rehnquist will be buried at Arlington National Cemetery on Wednesday after a funeral at St. Matthew's Cathedral here. Reporters will be permitted to attend the Mass, although no still or television cameras will be allowed. The press will be barred from the burial. The grandson of Swedish immigrants, Chief Justice Rehnquist was Lutheran, not Roman Catholic.

His pastor, the Rev. George W. Evans Jr., of the Lutheran Church of the Redeemer in McLean, Va., told reporters that with 350 seats, that church was too small. He said the Roman Catholic Archdiocese had offered the 2,000-seat cathedral, familiar to many of the justices for its annual Red Mass, a worship service that honors the judiciary.

Judge Roberts, a clerk for then-Associate Justice Rehnquist 25 years ago, was one of eight pallbearers. The others were a former administrative assistant to the chief justice, James Duff, and six other former law clerks: David G. Leitch, Frederick W. Lambert, Ronald J. Tenpas, Kerri Martin Bartlett, Gregory G. Garre and John C. Englander.

DOJ_NMG_0003313

Dozens of other clerks who served the chief justice during his 33-year tenure also joined family members and six of the current justices in paying respects, standing by the white-pine coffin at a brief prayer service that Mr. Evans led before the court was opened to the public.

Along with Justice Scalia, Justices John Paul Stevens, Sandra Day O'Connor, Clarence Thomas, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer were present for the service. Justice Anthony M. Kennedy was returning from China, and Justice David H. Souter from New Hampshire. All the justices will be at the funeral.

After the service, the chief justices' former law clerks took turns standing guard in pairs by the coffin. The building, while closed for official business all day, remained open to the public for viewing the coffin until 10 p.m. and will be open again on Wednesday morning.

Court employees, from the most senior officers to the most junior workers, also attended the brief private service. For most, Chief Justice Rehnquist had been a presence during their working lives at the court.

Among members of the public, the first in line was Martha Hamilton, a graduate student at Regent University in Virginia Beach, who arrived at 4 a.m. She had deferred her return to school after the Labor Day weekend because, she said, "I felt like this was a historic opportunity to participate in honoring the chief justice and the position of chief justice."

Others in the line, which stretched the length of the court steps and down the block, included David and T. J. Voell, 35-year-old twins from Wilmington, Del., both bankers who had taken time off to come to Washington and attend the confirmation hearing for Judge Roberts that had been scheduled to begin Tuesday. The hearing has been postponed until next Monday.

Rehnquist's 'Strong Legacy' Hailed (WT)

By Stephanie Mansfield

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

Solemn and respectful they stood, single file, and at times the line snaked around the block in the September sunshine: congressional staffers, college kids in baseball caps, tourists, Capitol Hill groundskeepers, many on their lunch break.

Few had met Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who was lying in a plain wooden coffin draped with an American flag inside the Supreme Court building yesterday, but all expressed the same sentiment: They were there to pay their respects.

"I met him once when I was a White House fellow," said Army Lt. Col. Barrye Price, wearing his dark green uniform and black beret. "I respect his service to our nation. You felt his sense of power and his sense of humility."

In attendance were Chief Justice Rehnquist's colleagues, including a tearful Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was once his Stanford Law School classmate.

The nation's 16th chief justice will be buried today at Arlington National Cemetery.

One veteran came from Fort Belvoir, Va., to pay his respects.

"He leaves a strong legacy for the country," said Steve Clark, 38, who lost his right arm in a road explosion in Iraq two years ago.

As they waited, the mourners discussed Chief Justice Rehnquist's long tenure on the nation's highest court.

"Courts in general have gotten too active," said contractor David Paine, 51. "I think he was a good man, and I supported his ideas. Like him, I think less should be more."

Marlin Britton, 38, who works at the Library of Congress, wasn't interested in the chief justice's politics or beliefs. "Let history tell how well he did the job. This is of historical interest. You respect someone of his stature."

Barbara Mack, 81, was visiting from Chicago. "We respected Justice Rehnquist greatly. We wanted to pay our respects," she said.

Once inside the Great Hall, up the long white marble steps, mourners walked slowly past the coffin. It was carried up the step yesterday morning, borne by Chief Justice Rehnquist's seven former law clerks, including Judge John G. Roberts Jr. Judge Roberts has been picked to replace his former boss, and his Senate confirmation hearings will begin next week.

Flanked by two tall freestanding floral arrangements of blood-red full-blown roses and white and purple delphinium, the coffin rested on the Lincoln catafalque, the bier where President Lincoln's body was placed after his assassination in 1865.

DOJ_NMG_0003314

Resting on an easel was a 1994 oil portrait by Thomas Loepp, showing the chief justice in his court robes, next to a globe that was a gift from his law clerks.

The morning began with a prayer service attended by his colleagues, children and grandchildren, and former staffers. Many had tears in their eyes.

Chief Justice Rehnquist, 80, died of thyroid cancer at his Arlington home Saturday. He was a member of the Redeemer Lutheran Church in McLean, where he will be remembered more for his familial than judicial duties.

"I was more impressed by him as a father and grandfather, as well as chief justice," said fellow church member Chuck Clopton, who was standing in line yesterday to pay his respects. "I loved his sense of humor. He was a very kind man, and not impressed with himself."

Mr. Clopton said he is planning to attend Chief Justice Rehnquist's funeral today at 2 p.m. at St. Matthew's Cathedral in Northwest Washington. The World War II veteran will be interred in a private burial service at Arlington, where his predecessors as chief justice, Warren E. Burger and Earl Warren, are buried -- as is his wife, Natalie, who died in 1991.

"He was really a great leader and upheld many decisions that were controversial," said 21-year-old Katherine Litras, a student at American University who came yesterday with two friends. "I hope they find someone as great to replace him."

Rehnquist's Legacy (USAT)

USA Today, September 7, 2005

Chief Justice William Rehnquist was that rarity among public officials: one who worked to make his office less powerful. From his days as a Supreme Court clerk a half-century ago until his death Saturday after 33 years on the court, Rehnquist argued for leaving important decisions to state legislatures or, if necessary, Congress — not the courts. The result was a career that foreshadowed much of today's political debate, and one that helps to focus it.

In his early years on the court, Rehnquist, an intensely conservative member of what was then a very liberal court, was so isolated that he was sometimes called the "Lone Ranger." As the nation as a whole grew more conservative, the court moved in his direction. States gained more latitude, producing restrictions on abortion, and blurring the line between church and state. Congressional power increasingly came under challenge. Affirmative action was restricted.

In most cases, Rehnquist led that charge, reflecting a judicial philosophy formed much earlier, one that not only favored state power over federal but also over the individual.

While clerking for Justice Robert Jackson during the 1951 and '53 terms, Rehnquist objected to "ivory tower jurisprudence" — hearing appeals from criminals claiming to have been wrongly convicted in state courts or brutalized by the police. He derided justices with qualms about the death penalty as "like a bunch of old women." He rejected calls for civil rights laws as unnecessary and wrote a memo for his boss, from which he later tried to distance himself, defending the constitutionality of racial segregation.

Such attitudes were not uncommon at the time. But Rehnquist remained at odds with the direction the court would take during the 1950s and 1960s as it overturned the national stain of racial segregation, extended protections to criminal suspects and defendants and, for a time, outlawed the death penalty.

After joining the court in 1972 (he was elevated to chief justice in 1986), Rehnquist regularly objected to broad interpretations of the Constitution on social issues such as abortion and on routinely allowing federal mandates on the states.

How Rehnquist's record is viewed will depend on where the viewer resides on the political spectrum. Over the years in this space, we've both favored and opposed positions Rehnquist joined, but we've regularly expressed concern about intrusions on personal rights — from privacy, to a woman's right to choose, to religious freedom, to issues of race.

We'd argue now that for the nation's minorities and women, for defendants railroaded by a flawed system of justice and for others who have turned to the courts for redress, it's fortunate that Rehnquist's views on those subjects have not prevailed.

But that does not detract from the man's significance, or his integrity, or his devotion to the law — all of which are substantial and not fully recognized by the public. His aggressive questioning of lawyers in oral arguments, and his blunt refusal to consider allowing cameras in the courtroom, as well as the political intensity his views provoked, created a gruff image at odds with the one described by those who knew him best.

DOJ_NMG_0003315

Rehnquist's conduct of the televised Senate impeachment trial of President Clinton introduced the chief justice to many Americans as a calm and fair-minded administrator, a trait that drew praise over the years even from the justices who disagreed with him most often on the law. The personal fondness he inspired was on view Tuesday as mourners passed by his casket at the Supreme Court before today's funeral service.

In the pulling and hauling of public debate, it is important that articulate voices such as Rehnquist's be heard, particularly when they are in the minority. That is even more important on the court, where judges isolated from much of society benefit from a diversity of thought and experience. The downside of a legal philosophy that limits the power of the court is that it also limits the protection of individual rights and liberties.

Ironies Abound As Rehnquist Leaves Us (USAT)

By Tony Mauro

USA Today, September 7, 2005

Death knows no timetable, so it is sad but unsurprising that Chief Justice William Rehnquist's death came at a most inopportune time, full of ironies.

Many of the ironies of his death were personal. But it also was remarkable that Rehnquist died at a moment when the nation was completely distracted by a crisis that relates significantly to his judicial legacy. The finger-pointing between state and federal officials over the handling of Hurricane Katrina's awful devastation is a debate that Rehnquist would have found familiar.

At the personal level, it is sad that this determined and devoted man did not live long enough to see his friend and former clerk John Roberts Jr. become a colleague on the court. Rehnquist had toughed out his battle with thyroid cancer and seemed fixated on working until he could work no more. Perhaps he was inspired to stay to the bitter end by Robert Jackson, the justice for whom he had clerked more than 50 years earlier. Jackson rose from his sick bed to join the court's landmark Brown v. Board of Education decision in 1954 and died a few months later. Ironically, until Rehnquist, Jackson was the last Supreme Court justice to die in office.

It would have been a first for Rehnquist to serve alongside one of his own former law clerks, and it would have made Rehnquist very proud. Roberts had been appointed in July to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor; instead, with Rehnquist's passing on Saturday, President Bush shuffled things around and appointed Roberts on Monday to replace Rehnquist. Another irony: Roberts regards Rehnquist as his mentor, and now is about to replace him.

Roberts and Rehnquist have many similarities, not only in their conservative perspectives but also in their sharp intellect and keen sense of humor. When Rehnquist, an unassuming man, told a funny story, he would start giggling before he finished his sentence. Years ago, when I asked Roberts why he lost a case before the court 9-0, his deadpan answer was, "Because there are only nine justices."

State vs. federal role

If Hurricane Katrina had not wreaked havoc on the Gulf Coast, we would have been reading more about Rehnquist and his legacy. But the hurricane's aftermath actually turns out to be a teachable moment about Rehnquist.

Much of the nationwide anger has been over the delay in the federal response to the hurricane's awful onslaught. Federal officials, for their part, have suggested that states and localities have primary responsibility in such matters, and did not move quickly enough either.

The balance of power between state and federal government is a perennial debate, and Rehnquist spent much of his career on the Supreme Court trying to readjust that balance in favor of states. Following what he believed to be the intent of the Constitution's framers, Rehnquist tried mightily to rein in Congress and keep it and federal agencies from turning states into unimportant subsidiaries that must depend on the federal government to act. The Bush administration is filled with adherents to Rehnquist's doctrine; Michael Leavitt, the secretary of Health and Human Services who has become a familiar figure since the hurricane, first gained national attention as a Utah governor who pushed hard against federal domination of the states.

So at a policy level, it probably should have been no surprise that the Bush administration hung back too long before federalizing the relief effort. In a broad context, there are valid arguments to be made against excessive federal power. If you think about it, it should be difficult to send U.S. soldiers into the streets of the USA for essentially law enforcement duties; it is in our national genes not to want federal troops used against our own citizens.

DOJ_NMG_0003316

That said, though, there has to be a way to overcome this reluctance more quickly when troops are needed domestically for humanitarian reasons. And the hurricane aftermath proves the seemingly obvious point that there are times when a swift and strong federal response must pre-empt competing or confused state and local interests. The terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, also showed the need for a strong national government; states and localities are not equipped to chase after Osama bin Laden.

A shift on the court

In fact, it seems that since 9/11, some of the steam went out of Chief Justice Rehnquist's conservative, pro-states juggernaut. And it's not just because a strong federal government comes in handy sometimes; it's also because some states are doing some pretty liberal things, legalizing everything from medical marijuana to same-sex marriages. A few months before he died, Rehnquist voted in favor of California's medical marijuana law on states' rights grounds, but he was on the losing side. Even Justice Antonin Scalia, a usual ally in protecting state power, suddenly embraced federal preeminence in the area of drug laws. Progressives, observing the Republican-dominated federal government, are turning to the states to fight their battles.

Usually, the tension between state and federal power is discussed at the eye-glazing level of theory and abstraction. Hurricane Katrina has laid the debate before us in dramatic, real-life terms: When should states take care of themselves, and when should the federal government take over?

Continuing that debate and drawing clearer lines of authority would be a more fitting way to honor the memory of Rehnquist than banner headlines about his death. He never much liked being in the spotlight anyway.

A Defender Of Independent Courts (NYT)

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

Today's funeral service for Chief Justice William Rehnquist and the imminent start of hearings in the Senate on Judge John Roberts Jr., the nominee to succeed him on the Supreme Court, provide a moment to honor one of the vital but less celebrated hallmarks of Chief Justice Rehnquist's 33-year service on the court: his proud record of defending the independence of the federal judiciary against attacks by politicians.

Those attacks, as Chief Justice Rehnquist noted last January in his 19th and final report on the state of the federal courts, have taken a troubling new turn in recent years. Without singling out individual members of Congress by name, he made clear his disapproval of some conservative Republicans, like the House majority leader, Tom DeLay, and others. He disapproved of their moving beyond the normal criticism of judicial decisions to try to bully and intimidate individual judges, strip federal courts of jurisdiction to decide certain constitutional challenges, and otherwise undermine the constitutional separation of powers and checks and balances.

One glaring example proving the validity of the chief justice's concerns followed his final report: the meddling by Florida officials and Congress in the case of Terri Schiavo, and the way some Republican lawmakers later denounced the string of federal judges who had rightly upheld earlier state court rulings and rejected ghoulish Congressional meddling in her death.

"A judge's judicial acts may not serve as a basis for impeachment," the chief justice wrote in answer to rising threats to impeach judges labeled by some Republican politicians as "activists" and worse because of their views of the Constitution.

"Any other rule would destroy judicial independence," he explained. "Instead of trying to apply the law fairly, regardless of public opinion, judges would be concerned about inflaming any group that might be able to muster the votes in Congress to impeach and convict them."

Chief Justice Rehnquist was also duly critical of hastily enacted limitations on judicial sentencing decisions, and the potential damage that compiling information on the sentencing habits of individual judges could do to fair and impartial justice. Chief Justice Rehnquist plainly saw his role as defender in chief of the nation's independent court system, which he famously called "one of the crown jewels of our system of government."

When confirmation hearings begin on Monday, we would like to hear Mr. Roberts use at least part of his opening statement to make it clear that he intends to continue this legacy, even at the risk of offending some fellow conservatives. On issues like these, that never stopped Chief Justice Rehnquist.

DOJ_NMG_0003317

Newsview: White House Falls Out Of Step (NSDY/AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON -- The Bush White House is known for its ability to remain in control of its message and image, sliding out of crises with barely a scratch. Not this time.

Despite day after day of appearances by President Bush aimed at undoing the political damage from a poor response to Hurricane Katrina, the White House has not been able to regain its footing, already shaken by the war in Iraq and a death toll exceeding 1,880.

The administration on Tuesday struggled to deflect calls for an accounting of who was responsible for a hurricane response that even Bush acknowledged was inadequate. There were increasing calls for the resignation or firing of Michael Brown, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"I think it's clear we're in damage control now," said Norman Ornstein, political analyst at the American Enterprise Institute think tank.

It's a troubling position for Bush, already suffering the lowest approval ratings of his presidency.

The mistakes have come one upon the other.

Even as Katrina was bearing down on the Gulf Coast that Sunday night and early Monday, Aug. 28-29, and the National Hurricane Center was warning of growing danger, the White House didn't alter the president's plans to fly from his Texas ranch to the West to promote a new Medicare prescription drug benefit.

By the time Bush landed in Arizona that Monday, the storm was unleashing its fury on Louisiana and Mississippi. The president inserted into his speech only a brief promise of prayers and federal help.

He continued his schedule in California, and he didn't decide until the next day that he should return to Washington. But it took him another day to get there, as he flew back to Texas to spend another night at his home before leaving for the White House.

Once the president was in Washington, the criticism only intensified.

While a drowned New Orleans descended into lawless misery, Bush delivered remarks from the Rose Garden that were seen as flat and corporate. It was a sharp contrast to the commanding, empathetic president the public rallied around in the days after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

In a television interview, Bush said -- mistakenly -- that nobody anticipated the breach of the levees in a serious storm.

Even Monday's trip to the region was a redo, hurriedly arranged by the White House over the weekend after lukewarm response to Bush's first in-person visit to the Gulf Coast last Friday.

Bush had raised eyebrows on his first trip by, among other things, picking Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss. -- instead of the thousands of mostly poor and black storm victims -- as an example of loss. "Out of the rubbles of Trent Lott's house -- he's lost his entire house -- there's going to be a fantastic house. And I'm looking forward to sitting on the porch," Bush said with a laugh from an airplane hangar in Mobile, Ala.

In the same remarks, Bush gave FEMA chief Brown -- the face for many of the inadequate federal response -- a hearty endorsement. "Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job," Bush said.

Later in Biloxi, Miss., Bush tried to comfort two stunned women wandering their neighborhood clutching Hefty bags, looking in vain for something to salvage from the rubble of their home. He kept insisting they could find help at a Salvation Army center down the street, even after another bystander had informed him it had been destroyed.

And at his last stop that day, at the airport outside of New Orleans, Bush lauded the increasingly desperate city as a great town because he used go there and "enjoy myself -- occasionally too much."

Unlike his galvanizing appearance in the rubble of the World Trade Center just days after the 2001 attacks, Bush has stayed far from the epicenter of New Orleans' suffering. His only foray into the city was to its edges to watch crews plugging one of the breached levees on Friday.

On Monday, he skipped the hardest-hit coastal areas entirely, choosing instead to visit Baton Rouge, the state capital about 80 miles northwest of New Orleans, which sustained no damage. He also went to Poplarville, Miss., to walk the streets of a middle-class neighborhood that seemed to suffer little more than snapped trees, a couple off-kilter carport roofs and a downed power line or two.

DOJ_NMG_0003318

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said the president avoided New Orleans to stay out of the way of search-and-rescue operations.

"It's going to be almost impossible to overcome the perception about the president that he didn't show compassion and didn't get control of the policy failures," American University political scientist James Thurber said. "The vivid images that are coming across the television are really destroying his image as a leader."

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said the president and his aides are unconcerned for now about the unrelenting criticism.

"Emotions are running high. People are tired," Bartlett said. "If we focused more of our attention on decisions that have already been made, rather than on those before us, there's potential for making far greater mistakes. ... We really don't have time to play the political game right now."

*__

EDITOR'S NOTE: Jennifer Loven has reported from Washington since 1993 and covers the White House for The Associated Press.

Bush Resists Immediate Probe Into Katrina Response (REU)

By Steve Holland

Reuters, September 7, 2005

President George W. Bush pledged on Tuesday to review what went wrong in the initial response to Hurricane Katrina but resisted any immediate probe and lawmakers launched an investigation of their own.

Partisan tempers flared, the projected cost of Katrina recovery efforts mushroomed and Pentagon leaders denied there was any delay in the military response to the relief effort last week.

After a Cabinet meeting on the myriad challenges posed by his biggest crisis since the attacks of September 11, 2001, Bush said he would lead an investigation into what went wrong. But he said he first wanted to save lives and solve problems before assessing blame.

"I think one of the things that people want us to do is to play a blame game," Bush said of critics of the initial administration response. "We've got to solve problems. There will be ample time for people to figure out what went right, and what went wrong."

He added: "I'm going to find out over time what went right and what went wrong."

Key senators launched an oversight review to determine how federal, state and local authorities bungled the relief effort in the first days after the hurricane struck.

"It is difficult to understand the lack of preparedness and the ineffective initial response to a disaster that had been predicted for years and for which specific dire warnings had been given for days," said Sen. Susan Collins (news, bio, voting record), the Maine Republican who chairs the Senate homeland security committee.

Tempers flared in the driveway of the White House after congressional leaders emerged from a meeting with Bush to brief reporters.

House of Representatives Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, backing up Bush's position, agreed on the need for an investigation, but only after the recovery is well under way.

"There's going to be a lot of time to point fingers after we get through there," he said.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California quickly approached the microphone.

"Let me just say because my colleague said I was pointing fingers too soon: You're darned right, you're darned right. We're a week behind where we should be in terms of responding to Katrina."

Pelosi said Michael Brown, the head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, "should not continue in that job unless we want a continuation of the shortcomings that we have had in the response."

With $10.5 billion already set aside, Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada predicted the recovery effort could end up costing $150 billion -- a figure that could put pressure on Bush to give up some tax cuts he wants to extend.

DOJ_NMG_0003319

Reid said he expected the White House budget director, Josh Bolten, to make a new emergency spending request in 24 hours that could be $40 billion to $50 billion.

The No. 2 House Republican, Tom DeLay of Texas, scolded Reid. "People that just throw numbers out, not knowing what they're talking about, I think it's pretty irresponsible," DeLay said.

With some critics pointing to the fact that insufficient troops at the outset slowed the relief effort, top Pentagon officials denied there had been any delay.

But Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said he had ordered an internal Pentagon study of "lessons learned" from the disaster.

"You know, you can never be perfect in a tragedy like this," said Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "You'd like to be perfect and be there the moment someone needs help. But as hard as these people tried and the states tried, it's just not possible."

Much anger from Democrats and Republicans alike has been directed at Bush for a slow federal response to a catastrophe that may have killed thousands in New Orleans and along the Gulf coast.

Bush said he was dispatching Vice President Dick Cheney to the disaster zone on Thursday to try to remove any "bureaucratic obstacles that may be preventing us from achieving our goals."

With calls for an independent commission to investigate the disaster, the White House was cautious.

Asked where the buck stops in the Bush administration, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said: "The president." But he said to launch a probe now could divert people involved in the recovery effort from doing their jobs.

(Additional reporting by Patricia Wilson, Tabassum Zakaria, Will Dunham and Donna Smith)

For Bush, A Deepening Divide (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

When terrorists struck on Sept. 11, 2001, Americans came together in grief and resolve, rallying behind President Bush in an extraordinary show of national unity. But when Hurricane Katrina hit last week, the opposite occurred, with Americans dividing along sharply partisan lines in their judgment of the president's and the federal government's response.

The starkly different verdicts on Bush's stewardship of the two biggest crises of his presidency underscore the deepening polarization of the electorate that has occurred on his watch. This gaping divide has left the president with no reservoir of good will among his political opponents at a critical moment of national need and has touched off a fresh debate about whether he could have done anything to prevent it.

To his critics, Bush is now reaping what he has sown. Their case against him goes as follows: Facing a divided nation, the president has eschewed unity in both his governing strategy and his political blueprint. These opponents argue that he has favored confrontation over conciliation with the Democrats while favoring a set of policies aimed at deepening support among his conservative base at the expense of ideas that might produce bipartisan consensus and broader approval among the voters. His allies and advisers, while acknowledging that polarization has worsened during the past five years, say the opposition party bears the brunt of responsibility. Democrats, by this reckoning, have rebuffed Bush's efforts at bipartisanship, put up a wall to ideas that once enjoyed some support on their side, and, even in the current crisis along the Gulf Coast, are seeking to score political points rather than joining hands with the president to speed the recovery and relief to the victims.

Wherever reality lies between these mutual recriminations, the path from post-9/11 unity to the rancor and finger-pointing in the aftermath of Katrina's fury charts a clear deterioration in political consensus in the United States and a growing willingness to interpret events through a partisan prism. It is a problem that now appears destined to follow Bush through the final years of his presidency -- a clear failure of his 2000 campaign promise to be a "uniter, not a divider."

A Washington Post-ABC News poll taken last Friday illustrates the point vividly. Just 17 percent of Democrats said they approved of the way Bush was handling the Katrina crisis while 74 percent of Republicans said they approved. About two in three Republicans rated the federal government's response as good or excellent, while two in three Democrats rated it not so good or poor.

DOJ_NMG_0003320

"Bush is the most partisan president in modern American history," said William Galston, a professor at the University of Maryland and previously a top domestic adviser to former President Bill Clinton. "As a result, voters in both parties are focusing on him, rather than on the specifics of the policies."

In Galston's view, Bush bears principal responsibility for that condition, saying that on three occasions he passed up opportunities to govern from the center and work more constructively with the Democrats and instead chose a path designed to mobilize conservatives. The first came after the disputed election of 2000, in the early days of Bush's new administration. The second came after the Sept. 11 attacks, when Bush's approval rating rose to 90 percent. The third came after the hard-fought and polarizing election last year.

"While White House aides can provide familiar talking points on gestures of cooperation across party lines, the fact of the matter is on all three occasions, the principal thrust of Bush's policies was toward polarization rather than conciliation," Galston said. "We are now living in the shadow of nearly five years in which that has been the dominant political message coming out of the White House."

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman offered a vigorous rebuttal to that criticism yesterday. "They've got a one-way street of unity," he said. "It's 'Do what we want, or you're not a unifier.' "

Mehlman said Bush has produced an unprecedented record of bipartisan accomplishment, citing the passage of the No Child Left Behind education act, prescription drug benefits for Medicare recipients, the USA Patriot Act and the creation of the Department of Homeland Security, which he said was advanced initially by Democratic Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.) and eventually embraced by Bush. (Democrats say Bush embraced the department only when public opinion showed it to be extremely popular.) Mehlman also said Democrats are now attempting to take advantage of the politics of Katrina and pointed specifically at Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who yesterday introduced legislation calling for the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) to be reconstituted as an independent, Cabinet-level agency, rather than a unit in the new Homeland Security Department. "You tell me who's taking what should be a moment of national unity and trying to score politically," he said. William Mayer, a political scientist at Northeastern University, said the public divide over Bush's handling of the natural disaster bears considerable resemblance to divisions over Clinton's handling of the standoff with the Branch Davidian followers of David Koresh in Waco early in his presidency, which ended in a fire that killed more than 80 people. Democrats supported Clinton did the best he could "dealing with a crazy man," Mayer said, while Republicans "said this was a massively bungled affair."

Mayer and Nolan McCarty, a professor of politics and public affairs at Princeton said that while polarization has worsened under Bush, the president bears only some of the responsibility. McCarty said Bush could try to rise above the current criticism but noted that partisans now have jumped in. "It will polarize things worse," he said.

Mark McKinnon, Bush's campaign media adviser, said Bush is still dealing with divisions that came out of the election 2000 but said the current crisis presents an opportunity for the administration "to show leadership and coordination and response and compassion of a nature that could affect the political dynamics of the country."

Galston agreed that is possible, but he said he doubted even a well-judged performance will fundamentally change Bush's ability to work across party lines on controversial issues. The hurricane may have washed away much of the Gulf Coast, but political polarization has proved resistant to its forces.

Bush Pledges To Stay On Top Of Relief Effort, Says It's Improving (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto

USA Today, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush spent Tuesday in a series of meetings aimed at making sure the resources of the federal government are focused on the Hurricane Katrina recovery effort.

He met with his Cabinet, education officials, congressional leaders and the heads of charities involved in the recovery. Afterward, he said the relief effort is improving, more supplies are en route, schooling is being arranged for thousands of displaced children and that he will make sure the recovery continues.

“Bureaucracy is not going to stand in the way of getting the job done for the people,” Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0003321

Bush and his administration continue to be criticized for what many see as a slow and inadequate federal response to the storm that ravaged three states and flooded the city of New Orleans.

"We're a week behind where we should be in responding to Katrina," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said after meeting with Bush at the White House.

Tuesday's meetings came the day after Bush's Labor Day visit to the disaster region, his second visit in four days. Bush said he will send Vice President Cheney and first lady Laura Bush to the region Thursday.

Bush acknowledged last week that the initial federal response was "unacceptable."

Bush will ask Congress as soon as today for more money for Katrina relief, on top of the $10.5 billon in emergency funds appropriated by Congress last week.

Additional money will be requested as the needs are further assessed, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Bush's new request will be as much as $50 billion, and he said the overall cost could top $150 billion.

Bush said he will personally lead an investigation into what went wrong with the early federal response to Katrina.

After their meeting with the president, congressional leaders said they would conduct a bipartisan investigation.

Reid also called for a probe by an independent commission "comparable to the 9/11 Commission," which looked into why the federal government wasn't able to stop the 2001 terrorist attacks on New York City and Washington.

Bush said that while critics want "to play a blame game," he and his administration have "got to solve problems. … There will be ample time for people to figure out what went right and what went wrong. What I'm interested in is helping save lives."

The president praised the work of community and faith-based organizations aiding hurricane victims and urged Americans to send them cash donations to support their efforts.

He also pledged to speed Social Security, unemployment and other federal benefit checks to those in affected areas.

Bush Counters Criticism Of Federal Relief Effort (LAT)

By Scott Gold And Lianne Hart

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — As the recovery effort persisted and the floodwaters continued to recede in this shattered city, President Bush sought to short-circuit congressional criticism by declaring that he will investigate the federal relief effort.

Bush has made two trips through the Gulf Coast and has visited relief agencies in Washington as part of his effort to persuade people that his administration cares about the disaster and will use all means to help the region recover, and in particular the hard-hit city of New Orleans.

Local officials have been fiercely critical of the federal government, saying that basic necessities were delayed, costing lives. With Congress returning today to Washington, the anger has been growing as some legislators launched their own investigation and promised hearings to determine who is at fault.

In an effort to get ahead of the issue, Bush said he will lead his own probe.

"What I intend to do is to lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong," he said.

"It's very important for us to understand the relationship between the federal government, the state government and the local government when it comes to a major catastrophe. And the reason it's important is, is that we still live in an unsettled world. We want to make sure that we can respond properly if there's a WMD attack or another major storm. And so I'm going to find out over time what went right and what went wrong," the president said.

Katrina dealt New Orleans a glancing blow, but it was severe enough to break two levees that turned the city in a disease-ridden cesspool whose inhabitants had to be evacuated. Tens of thousands of people went days without food and water before transportation arrived to carry them to safety.

With 250,000 people evacuated to Texas and hundreds of thousands more from Southern Louisiana voluntarily fleeing, the city has turned into a watery ghost town.

Even though the reconstruction will take weeks and months, there was a sense of optimism as waters continued to ebb and the bulk of the evacuations has been completed.

DOJ_NMG_0003322

"We now have the resources to get the job done," Mayor C. Ray Nagin told reporters today. "I want to thank the governor and the president and I want to thank that John Wayne dude."

The mayor was referring to Lt. Gen. Russel Honore, who is leading the forces that entered the city last week, restored order and ended the looting so that large-scale relief efforts could take place.

More than 32,000 people have been rescued in Louisiana since Katrina hit last week, according to David Passey, a spokesman for the Federal Emergency Management Agency. To date, FEMA has allocated $2.8 billion to provide emergency assistance to Louisiana, he said.

In addition, 315,568 households have registered for federal and state assistance, officials said.

Nagin said the mandatory evacuation remains in effect and that the city will begin moving emergency people out of the area to Las Vegas and Atlanta so they can recharge.

"Las Vegas is a party town," he said, fending off criticism. "New Orleans is a party town. Get over it."

Nagin said that the city is now 60% underwater — still in a debilitated state, but much improved from the weekend, when the saturation reached 80%. Several pumps are now sending water gushing over the levee system into Lake Pontchartrain, and the city is trying to get Pump Station 6 — a critical facility that Nagin called "the big daddy" — operating as soon as possible.

"Even in places where the water was up to the rooftops, we are now starting to see part of the buildings," Nagin said after his daily helicopter ride over the city.

Nagin said a power plant on Carrollton Street could be operating soon. Officials had attempted to construct a dam around the plant to rid that portion of the city of water but the dam did not hold. So the city is bringing in portable pumps to suck the water out continuously.

Water service could begin flowing into the city within 24 hours, Nagin said, but he cautioned that officials were wary of how clean the water would be. The water supply is off — and the water flowing through pipes once they are fixed is so full of pollution and bacteria it cannot be drunk even after it is boiled, Nagin said.

"We have to flush the system," he said.

Officials continue to find people who are alive and awaiting rescue from houses, attics and rooftops, he said. Many are elderly, delirious or severely dehydrated.

Nagin also said reports that authorities had withheld food and water from some neighborhoods in an effort to flush out stragglers who don't want to leave are "absolutely false."

He said he told his officers and other authorities: "Do not harm anyone. Do not allow anyone to starve. Do not allow anyone to go without water."

On Monday, the Army Corps of Engineers plugged one of the broken levees and officials continued their efforts today to pump water out of the city. Water pumps are slowly being restarted as the water recedes and workers can dry and repair them. It will take 24 days to drain eastern Orleans Parish, and as much as 80 days to remove the water from Chalmette, said Dan Hitchings, a spokesman for the Corps.

As the waters recede, more bodies are expected to be found.

Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said that disease is going to be "big, big problem" in New Orleans.

"We certainly don't want disease outbreaks. That is our next big worry, and can be the next big tragedy," she said. "We have a massive clean-up operation, and that's why we're asking citizens to be patient and not try to get in there because we don't know what we're going to find. We have to let the medical experts get in and test."

In the face of ongoing criticism about the speed and effectiveness of the hurricane relief effort, the nation's top health officials today defended federal efforts to provide health services in Katrina's aftermath.

"We are one week out, and so far so good," said Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt during a news conference by telephone.

Leavitt said that security risks and chaotic conditions delayed health services for evacuees crowded into the New Orleans Convention Center and the Superdome.

Leavitt and Dr. Julie Gerberding, director of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, emphasized that disaster preparations had been based on the smaller-scale disasters seen after previous hurricanes.

DOJ_NMG_0003323

Leavitt, who toured the disaster area over the Labor Day weekend, said federal health officers are present in all major shelters for evacuees, and are working with local medical professionals to provide services despite the primitive conditions.

"The response was massive, led in large measure by local communities. I would judge it to have been strong and high quality, but predictably imperfect. It drained resources from local service providers. They have responded in a remarkable way," Leavitt said. "We walked through medical shelters that were staffed by the heads of departments to major hospitals working alongside medical students. The quality of service they were [delivering] was amazingly high."

The Louisiana governor was also more upbeat than in recent days.

"The resources are strengthening as we speak. Those of us in the decision-making chairs are feeling better about the coordinated effort. The supply chain has improved the morale, and I think it will continue to get better," she said.

With police getting a break, the Pentagon began sending paratroopers from the Army's 82nd Airborne Division to New Orleans to use small boats, including inflatable Zodiac craft, to launch a new search-and-rescue effort.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, division commander, said about 5,000 paratroopers would be in place by today.

Fires, some started by candles used to replace broken electric lights, have also been a problem. Several blazes were burning, pouring thick smoke into the air.

Officials announced in Baton Rouge that they have begun testing the quality of the air. Scientists are also sampling the brackish floodwater in New Orleans as well as the water in Lake Pontchartrain, said Mike McDaniel, secretary of the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality.

"It is simply infeasible" to pump the floodwater anywhere but the lake, he said. "We have to get the water out of the city or the nightmare gets worse. We will deal with the issues of the water, but right now the priority is to save lives," he said.

"There's lots of discussion about toxic soup, a witch's brew, but I've seen no data that backs up that kind of statement," McDaniel said.

He said there will obviously be bacteria in the water.

"After all, we have humans with no waste treatment facilities, we have backed up facilities. They're showing a large number of fecal indicators," he said.

McDaniel said he also believes gas, fuel, and traces of toxic materials like pesticides and heavy metals will be found. Test results will be known in about two days, he said.

With 2,200 facilities with underground storage tanks; 140,000 to 160,000 flooded homes that will have to be condemned; 25 major sewage treatment facilities offline, as well as 505 medium to small sewage treatment plants out, McDaniel said there's good reason for concern.

"It is almost unimaginable the things we are going to have to plan for and deal with," he said.

The impact of the storm on the Louisiana coast is enormous, he said. "The aerials we see are complete devastation. It will take a while to reestablish."

About 68,000 barrels of oil spilled into the Mississippi River, near Venice, La., and is now being blown into the gulf. Another 10,000 barrels of oil has spilled into a flooded neighborhood in Chalmette.

"Everywhere we look there are spills. It all adds up to an almost solid sheen over the area now," McDaniel said.

Earlier, Bush called congressional leaders to the White House for their first meeting since Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29 and rampaged through more than four Southern states. The death toll is estimated at perhaps 10,000 and the cost of the damage is put at more than $25 billion in insurance claims alone, with tens of billions more to rebuild.

"Government at all levels failed," Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) said at a Capitol news conference, where she announced that the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee would hold hearings.

"It is difficult to understand the lack of preparedness and the ineffective initial response to a disaster that had been predicted for years, and for which specific, dire warnings had been given for days," she said.

During his Cabinet session, Bush rejected playing "a blame game. We've got to solve problems. We're problem-solvers. There will be ample time for people to figure out what went right and what went wrong.

"This administration is not going to rest until every life can be saved, until families are reconnected, until this recovery is complete," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0003324

Even though security has improved, a New Orleans man was arrested and faces federal charges for allegedly firing shots at a military helicopter, according to U.S. Atty. Jim Letten. Wendell Bailey, 20, was charged with attempting to damage and destroy an aircraft, which carries a sentence of up to 20 years, and with illegal possession of firearms, which can be punished with 10 years in prison.

Bush Promises To Seek Answers To Failures Of Hurricane Relief (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - Under relentless political fire over the federal response to Hurricane Katrina, President Bush on Tuesday tried to steer the public debate toward progress in the region, promising to investigate earlier stumbles, as anxious lawmakers returned to the Capitol pledging inquiries of their own and aid money for the storm victims.

Mr. Bush, in a flurry of meetings at the White House, said he would dispatch Vice President Dick Cheney to the Gulf Coast this week to cut through any bureaucratic obstacles slowing recovery efforts. Members of Congress demanded answers and awaited a new emergency spending measure from the White House, calculating the growing cost of the recovery at $50 billion, if not more than twice that.

Fresh from their summer recess, lawmakers questioned the effectiveness of the Federal Emergency Management Agency and pledged to hold hearings and possibly enact legislation to address the failures in the response system.

"It is difficult to understand the lack of preparedness and the ineffective initial response to a disaster that had been predicted for years and for which specific dire warnings had been given for days," said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine and chairwoman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which will conduct one of the main inquiries.

There will be at least two sets of Congressional hearings, leaders said, beginning as early as next week, to examine issues like failures in the command and control structure, shortcomings in the evacuation plan for New Orleans, and any organizational problems that may have contributed to the slow response.

The hearings will also address whether the government missed critical opportunities to shore up the levees in New Orleans and whether planning for future disasters is sufficient.

Lawmakers, at least in the Senate, said it would be too early to consider whether Mr. Bush would be called to testify.

For the first time since the hurricane hit, Mr. Bush met with leaders from both parties, capping a day of constant political attention to a crisis that has exposed fault lines within the Republican Party and threatens to overtake the entire Congressional agenda. Mr. Bush promised to lead an investigation into what went wrong, although a White House spokesman quickly qualified the statement, saying the inquiry would come later to avoid diverting resources from the recovery efforts.

Mr. Bush also resisted renewed calls to fire Michael D. Brown, the director of FEMA, who became a lightning rod for attacks last week when he said he was unaware of a crisis at the New Orleans convention center, news of which had been televised for days. Instead, Mr. Bush accused critics of playing the "blame game" and said he would remain focused on the immediate crisis as evacuees fanned out across the country.

"We've got to solve problems; we're problem-solvers," he said. "There will be ample time for people to figure out what went right and what went wrong. What I'm interested in is helping save lives."

At issue in the immediate future is the amount of money the government will allocate for the recovery and reconstruction efforts. Mr. Bush signed a $10.5 billion spending measure last Friday, and Congressional leaders said they expected to receive a $40 billion to $50 billion supplemental spending request this week. Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said the total bill could reach $150 billion, further squeezing a budget constrained by the nearly $5 billion spent each month on the Iraq war and the $333 billion federal deficit.

The $150 billion projection was quickly disputed by Representative Tom DeLay of Texas, the Republican leader, who suggested that Mr. Reid was "playing politics" by giving that figure when no official projections were available. But White House officials have not disputed estimates in the tens of billions of dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0003325

Senior administration officials rejected accusations that the federal government had been slow to respond, detailing progress on the military, education and social services fronts. Mr. Bush, after meeting with Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, said the administration was reviewing ways to help states like Texas absorb the costs of accommodating thousands of children of evacuees in their public school systems.

At the Pentagon, senior officials pointed to the arrival of forces in the Gulf Coast in recent days, with more than 41,000 National Guardsmen and about 17,000 active-duty personnel committed to the mission. Gen. Richard B. Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, praised what he described as a more than adequate military response.

"Not only was there no delay, I think we anticipated, in most cases - not in all cases - but in most cases, the support that was required," General Myers said at a news briefing. "And we were pushing support before we were formally asked for it."

Even so, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said he had ordered the military to conduct a "lessons learned" study on the armed forces' response to the hurricane to determine whether it could have been more timely.

And Mr. Bush, in the first of several hurricane-related events throughout the day, made an unexpected pledge to personally lead an inquiry into earlier failures.

"What I intend to do is lead a - to lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong," Mr. Bush, after meeting with his cabinet, said in response to a question about who would be held accountable.

"And I'll tell you why," he continued. "It's very important for us to understand the relationship between the federal government, the state government and the local government when it comes to a major catastrophe. And the reason it's important is, is that we still live in an unsettled world."

Pressed for details about the investigation, Scott McClellan, the White House spokesman, said it would not begin until the immediate crisis had passed.

Describing it as an "analysis," not an investigation, Mr. McClellan would not say whether the emergency failures would be examined by an independent commission, as the Sept. 11 attacks were, or even when the president wanted the process to start.

"There will be a time to do a thorough analysis," Mr. McClellan said. "Now is not the time to do that."

Instead, Congress appeared poised to take the lead.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, said she was introducing legislation to create an independent commission.

Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia and chairman of the Government Reform Committee, said his panel would begin hearings on the government response, a move that came after Senate leaders had announced their own plans for hearings and that appeared to catch House leaders off guard.

"We are going to look at Mr. Davis's hearing," said Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois. "What we don't want to have happen is that the people who are on the ground in the Gulf States have to come up here and talk to 13 or 14 different groups."

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, a Connecticut Democrat who will help lead the Senate investigation with Ms. Collins, said the federal response to Hurricane Katrina had shaken the public's confidence in the ability of the government to protect them .

"Hurricane Katrina was in one sense the most significant test of the new national emergency preparedness and response system that was created after 9/11, and it obviously did not pass that test," Mr. Lieberman said.

Some Republican lawmakers said they had tried to impress upon their party's leaders what they believe are the political risks involved in the disaster response, fearing that Republicans have exposed themselves to significant political risk in next year's elections by having appeared not to take the hurricane and its aftermath seriously at first.

Already, the hurricane has upended the fall legislative agenda. Leaders of both the House and the Senate have said their chief mission in the coming weeks would be to provide relief to storm victims and begin rebuilding devastated communities.

Under pressure from Democrats, the Senate postponed a vote on a proposal to eliminate the estate tax, while House officials said they expected to delay a budget bill that would require cuts in health care and education.

Bush To Probe Storm Response (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Michael A. Fletcher

DOJ_NMG_0003326

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

Stung by criticism of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina, President Bush yesterday promised to investigate his own administration's emergency management, then readied a request for tens of billions of dollars for relief and cleanup.

From the Pentagon to Capitol Hill, official Washington spent yesterday grappling with a hurricane recovery effort that, according to some estimates, will cost more than $100 billion and influence a broad range of federal policy, from emergency response to coastal development, from expanded domestic oil exploration to the future of the estate tax.

Bush vowed to "find out what went right and what went wrong." Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said that the military already has begun a "lessons-learned" assessment of its coordination with state and local governments. Nine Cabinet members briefed Senate and House leaders last night on the federal response, and key senators pushed for changes that would allow Third World relief efforts to be emulated in the United States.

"Nothing will be the same again," said Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), whose Pascagoula home was destroyed.

Just days after Congress approved a $10.5 billion emergency relief package, Bush informed congressional leaders of a request of as much as $40 billion, making Katrina the federal government's most expensive domestic emergency ever. The package could be passed as early as today, aides said.

But with the Federal Emergency Management Agency spending more than $500 million a day, lawmakers from both parties said the cost will climb much higher. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) suggested the total could exceed $150 billion, with $100 billion for FEMA alone. Lott said the cost will be "well in excess of $100 billion," and few were disagreeing.

Beyond money, congressional leaders ordered committee chairmen to draft any legislation that could remedy the problems revealed by the hurricane and its aftermath. And after nearly a week of recriminations, Washington slipped into an extraordinary bout of self-reflection.

"It is fair to say the overall response to this emergency could have and should have been better," House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) said.

Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.) called for FEMA Director Michael D. Brown to leave and be replaced by "an experienced, professional emergency manager."

Speaking to reporters after a Cabinet meeting , Bush said: "It's very important for us to understand the relationship between the federal government, the state government and the local government when it comes to a major catastrophe. . . . We want to make sure that we can respond properly if there's a WMD [weapons of mass destruction] attack or another major storm."

Bush, who has called the response to the hurricane unacceptable only to amend that to say the results were not acceptable, offered no specifics on his planned investigation. Still, the call for an investigation was unusual coming from a president who rarely admits mistakes.

House Republican leaders suggested that Congress launch one comprehensive examination of the disaster response, possibly a joint House-Senate investigation. But Senate committees were already moving forward. The Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee has scheduled hearings next week to examine the federal disaster response.

Sen. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.), chairman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, promised his own examination of Gulf Coast infrastructure, water projects and coastal erosion. Next week, the panel will look into Katrina's impact on energy supplies, a subject examined yesterday by the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee and set to be examined today by the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

At the Senate Energy Committee hearing, Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) said Congress must accept politically difficult measures that lawmakers have repeated rejected, such as raising car and truck fuel efficiency standards.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) castigated the Cabinet's performance as two hours of "self-congratulatory" talk. "This administration does not live in reality," Pelosi said. "To hear them talk, everything went right. . . . They have very low standards, and no performance, and no accountability."

DeLay said the GOP leadership was working to bring legislation to the floor, possibly this week, that would loosen rules that govern federal assistance programs. He chastised Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) for seeking to open hearings next week on the response.

DOJ_NMG_0003327

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) proposed retooling a resettlement program for foreign refugees to help Americans displaced by Katrina.

But there was little immediate agreement on how to proceed and many notes of discord.

House and Senate lawmakers said they will proceed with a package of $70 billion in tax cuts and $35 billion in entitlement spending cuts, including as much as $10 billion out of a Medicaid program they simultaneously were suggesting expanding.

Before Katrina struck, the House and Senate were at loggerheads over an energy and water spending plan for the fiscal year that begins in October, with the Senate hoping to spend $700 million more than the House on water projects, including $27 million more on flood control in southeastern Louisiana and $20 million more on Louisiana coastal protection. House Appropriations Committee spokesman John Scofield said the committee has received no instructions to budge: "We are committed to living within our budget."

With federal resources stretched, Grassley questioned a rush to temporarily lift the tax on airline fuel, and he lambasted proposals to offer more tax incentives to oil companies for domestic oil exploration. "With $60 [a barrel] oil, you don't need more incentives," he said. "What we need is for the oil companies to take some of their profits and lower the cost of gasoline."

DeLay had a similar response to suggestions that the federal gasoline tax be suspended: "Now more than ever you're going to need . . . those highway trust funds, to rebuild the bridges that were destroyed, rebuild the railroads that were destroyed."

At the Pentagon, Rumsfeld said the involvement of troops in hurricane relief efforts will not diminish the military's ability to sustain operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

He noted that more than 300,000 Army National Guard and Air National Guard troops remain available to help. He sharply rejected the suggestion that the commitment of large numbers of troops to Iraq -- including National Guard soldiers from Louisiana and Mississippi -- had delayed the military's response. About 41,000 Guard troops are in assisting the region.

"Not only was there no delay," said Gen. Richard B. Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "I think we anticipated in most cases -- not in all cases, but in most cases -- the support that was required."

GOP Begins Damage Control (WT)

By Joseph Curl And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

Republicans tried to limit the political damage from the botched federal response to Hurricane Katrina -- with President Bush, members of Congress and military leaders yesterday all promising to look into the failures.

"What I intend to do is lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong," the president said after meeting with Cabinet members at the White House.

Republicans said they have received the message that there is frustration over the federal response.

"Have I got an earful? You betcha," said Sen. Norm Coleman, Minnesota Republican, who said he heard about it from voters at Minnesota's state fair this weekend.

But even as Republicans promised investigations, they made it clear that the first failure was at the state and local levels, where governments are charged with preparation and the first response to disasters.

"I'm a former mayor," Mr. Coleman said. "The leadership starts at the local level. I didn't see the local mayor. I didn't hear from the mayor."

His focus on state and local officials was echoed by Mr. Bush, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and top congressional Republicans, who said the federal response fell short because, in Mr. Coleman's words, "the federal officials didn't do a good enough job of filling that void fast enough."

The senator from Minnesota said that the federal government must now turn its immediate failure into an opportunity to show it is in control.

Now, both Congress and the president are rushing to fill that void with money.

Mr. Bush was expected to send Congress a reported $40 billion emergency spending package last night, five days after a $10.5 billion emergency bill passed.

DOJ_NMG_0003328

The top Democrat in the Senate said the final cost could be $150 billion -- the first long-term cost estimate placed on the storm by a high official.

"Through my conversations with officials on the ground and in consultation with Senator Mary Landrieu [of Louisiana], I believe that the recovery and relief operations will cost up to and could exceed $150 billion," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat.

At the Pentagon yesterday, the nation's two top military leaders rejected criticism that they were too slow in deploying troops to storm-ravaged Gulf states, saying they are in the middle of the largest domestic disaster relief effort in U.S. history.

Mr. Rumsfeld and Gen. Richard B. Myers, Joint Chiefs chairman, said Pentagon planners made contingencies once Katrina strengthened in the Gulf of Mexico and ordered thousands of troops and relief supplies once the request was made.

Mr. Rumsfeld ordered a mandatory "lessons learned" on what the armed forces had done right and wrong in the week-old disaster that likely killed thousands in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

He added that the military's involvement will not affect the U.S. effort in Iraq.

"We have the forces, the capabilities and the intention to fully prosecute the global war on terror while responding to this unprecedented humanitarian crisis here at home," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

At the White House, Mr. Bush said a thorough review is necessary to prepare for the next catastrophe.

"We still live in an unsettled world. We want to make sure that we can respond properly if there's a WMD attack or another major storm," he said.

Even as the president was trying to put out fires, he might have created more ill will at an afternoon meeting with congressional leaders.

During the meeting, Mr. Reid and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, tried to learn the size of the new spending request, but Office of Management and Budget Director Joshua B. Bolten said he did not have a figure, Mr. Reid's spokesman said.

As the leaders left the meeting, they found out from press reports that someone had told the Associated Press the total would be $40 billion.

Meanwhile, there was disagreement among Republicans over how quickly to proceed on the investigations.

The Republicans who run the House and Senate oversight committees both said they will begin next week, even though House leaders and Sen. Trent Lott, a Mississippi Republican whose home was destroyed by the storm, asked them not to distract from the relief effort.

Hearings called by House Government Reform Committee Chairman Thomas M. Davis III seemed to catch House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert off guard yesterday when a reporter asked about it at a press conference.

"What we don't want to have happen is the people who are on the ground in the Gulf states have to come up here to talk to 13 or 14 different groups," said Mr. Hastert, Illinois Republican.

Rep. Mark Foley said particular blame lies at the feet of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and, by extension, Congress, which put FEMA under the Department of Homeland Security.

The Florida Republican said the agency had flaws in responding to the hurricanes in Florida last year.

"There'll be a lot of blame to go around, and we can all reasonably take a share of it," he said, though he also said political blame will recede with time. "It gets worse for a while and finally people see the light at the end of the tunnel."

Storm Upheaves Bush's Second-term Agenda (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — Eight months into President Bush's first term, the nation was rocked and his agenda overtaken by terrorist attacks on New York and Washington.

Now, at nearly the same point in his second term, a natural disaster that has struck New Orleans and the Gulf Coast has revived questions about the government's preparedness to protect its citizens and reshuffled the priorities the president faces in coming months.

DOJ_NMG_0003329

His plan to overhaul Social Security? Forget it. Repeal the estate tax? Postponed. Make the 2001 tax cuts permanent? Tougher to finance. Stay the course in Iraq? Questions about the deployment of U.S. resources and National Guard troops for the war have been sharpened.

"This is a shot to the solar plexus of George Bush's agenda," says William Galston, a professor of public policy at the University of Maryland and a White House adviser to President Clinton in his first term. "The ripples go out in so many different directions, to so many different areas of policy, domestic and foreign. It's second only to 9/11 in its impact on the course of the presidency."

"The aftermath of Katrina poses a threat to his entire second term," the lead editorial in the Bush-friendly Wall Street Journal declared Tuesday.

The perils may be even greater for Bush than they were in 2001.

His resolute leadership in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks rallied the nation to his side, but the lack of urgency he conveyed in the first days after the hurricane and his administration's fumbling response to desperate human needs have brought scathing bipartisan criticism. He has sought to recover in recent days, traveling to the region twice to comfort victims and clearing his schedule to focus on the crisis.

But after five years in charge, Bush is being called to account for shortcomings in the administration in a way he wasn't when he was new to office. There is little sense, as there was after 9/11, that criticizing the president is unpatriotic. "A lot of the strong part of his image is now at least temporarily tarnished — the notion of the can-do guy," says Fred Greenstein, a presidential scholar at Princeton University.

The investigations into what went wrong — including the decision to downgrade the Federal Emergency Management Agency's status and the performance of the new Department of Homeland Security — are starting long before all the water has been pumped from New Orleans' streets. The Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs convenes its first briefing on the issue today.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist joined his Democratic counterpart, Harry Reid, in criticizing the pace of relief efforts. "We are going to take a hard, hard look at our disaster response," Frist said.

Reid blasted those who have blamed state officials. "This is a huge federal issue," he said. "The buck stops at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue."

In the short run, the confirmation of two Supreme Court justices and the need to deal with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina will dominate the White House and Congress. To the dismay of some anti-tax conservatives, the Senate indefinitely postponed its scheduled vote this week on repealing the estate tax. "Ridiculous," fumes Mallory Factor, chairman of the Free Enterprise Fund. He called the delay unwise and an attempt to be "politically correct."

In the long run, Bush's agenda has been upended.

•Adding individual investment accounts to Social Security was, Bush has said, the top domestic priority of his second term. With Democrats united against it and some Republicans wary of embracing it, the odds of passing fundamental changes to the nation's most popular social safety net already were distant. Now, they seem impossible.

"Our members, like Congress and the American people, are rightly preoccupied with doing their part to assist in hurricane relief, recover and rebuilding, (and) I think the timing of much of the congressional agenda may have to be put on hold for a time," says Derrick Max, director of the Alliance for Worker Retirement Security, a leading business-backed group supporting Bush's plan. "But as soon as Congress returns to its other legislative priorities, we would expect work to continue on Social Security reform."

•Revising the tax code has been another Bush priority. A blue-ribbon panel he appointed is supposed to report back by the end of the month with a plan to simplify the tax code, ameliorate the impact of the alternative minimum tax on middle-income families and make permanent the tax cuts passed in 2001.

Now those proposals will have to compete with demands to increase federal spending on relief and infrastructure repair. The $10.5 billion aid package passed last week was only a down payment.

Former senator Connie Mack, co-chairman of the panel, says the hurricane's aftermath may delay but won't derail consideration of the proposal, which is supposed to be revenue-neutral. "I always saw this as a 2006 issue," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0003330

•Maintaining U.S. troop levels in Iraq until a constitution has been approved and a democratic government installed is an even higher priority for Bush, but now there are demands for active-duty troops and National Guard units, already strained by tours of duty in Iraq, to maintain order and provide hurricane relief at home.

About 8,500 active-duty troops are being dispatched to the Gulf Coast, probably for months, the Pentagon says. About 2,800 soldiers from the Louisiana National Guard are being allowed to return from Iraq immediately, a month or two earlier than scheduled. Most will join relief efforts.

•Reaching out to African-American voters, the Democrats' most loyal supporters, has been a concerted effort this year by Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, Bush's campaign manager in 2004. But the TV footage of hurricane victims showed mostly minorities and poor people. "I don't think the outreach was working all that well, but this destroys it," says political scientist Ronald Walters, author of Freedom is Not Enough: Black Voters, Black Candidates, and American Presidential Politics. "The perception is that he didn't move quickly enough because a lot of the people involved were black. Whether that's true or not, that is the perception in our community."

Presidential terms are often shaped by the unexpected — wars, crises and scandals that never surfaced during the campaign. George H.W. Bush's presidency was shaped by Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. Jimmy Carter faced oil shocks and a hostage crisis in Iran. Franklin Roosevelt, elected to deal with the Depression, led the nation into World War II. He told Americans: "Dr. New Deal has become Dr. Win-the-War."

"That's why pragmatism is such a central ingredient of an effective presidency," says historian Robert Dallek, the author of books on FDR, John Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson. "If you're not pragmatic, not responsive to changing realities, then you don't succeed."

But Stanley Renshon, a political scientist at City University of New York, argues that Bush's resilience is underestimated. "As control is re-established and help is coming in, Bush will be seen as somebody who rallied in the same way he did with 9/11 and mastered the circumstance," he predicts.

Americans are divided in rating Bush's response. In a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken Monday and Tuesday, 42% said Bush had done a bad or terrible job in responding to the hurricane and the subsequent flooding; 35% said he had done a good or great job. The survey of 609 adults has a margin of error of +/-4 percentage points.

Whatever happens to his standing, the issues on Bush's plate have changed. "There are other priorities that we remain committed to," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said Tuesday. "Right now our highest priority is on the response and recovery to Hurricane Katrina."

When Congress returned to work Tuesday, the agenda drafted when they left a month ago — immigration changes, Social Security and tax cuts — had been sidelined. Congressional leaders who met with Bush at the White House discussed how to rebuild the Gulf Coast, reopen the crucial Port of New Orleans, provide federal benefits for victims and protect other American cities that rely on aging earthen levees. And high gas prices are "the No. 1 issue on people's minds," Frist says.

The most fundamental issue ahead may be this: Four years after the Sept. 11 attacks, despite the president's unrelenting focus and the expenditure of billions of dollars for homeland security, the government seemed unable to respond to a crisis that had been forecast days before it happened.

Hurricane's Toll Is Likely To Reshape Bush's Economic Agenda (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - Hurricane Katrina is about to blow a hole in the federal budget, and it is already jeopardizing President Bush's agenda for cutting taxes and reducing the deficit.

Administration officials told Republican lawmakers on Tuesday that relief efforts were running close to $700 million a day, and that the total federal cost could reach as high as $100 billion.

That would be many times the cost of any other natural disaster or even the $21 billion that was allocated for New York City after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0003331

The expenses would come just as Mr. Bush and Republican leaders are trying to push through spending cuts for programs like Medicaid and student loans, extend about $70 billion in expiring tax cuts, and reduce the federal budget deficit.

"There is no question but that the costs of this are going to exceed the costs of New York City after 9/11 by a significant multiple," said Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire and chairman of the Senate Budget Committee.

White House officials are planning to ask Congress as early as Wednesday for a second round of emergency financing, perhaps as much as $40 billion, but they said even that would be a "stopgap" measure while they assessed the full costs.

Though it is still too early for accurate estimates, the costs are all but certain to wreak havoc with Mr. Bush's plans to reduce the federal deficit and possibly his plans to extend tax cuts.

On Monday, the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, postponed plans to push for a vote on repealing the estate tax, a move that would benefit the wealthiest 1 percent of households, costing more than $70 billion a year once fully put in effect.

House and Senate leaders are also grappling with their pre-hurricane plan to propose $35 billion in spending cuts over the next five years for entitlement programs like Medicaid, student loans, food stamps and welfare payments.

Those cuts could suddenly prove politically unpalatable to Mr. Bush and Republican lawmakers, who are trying to rebuff criticism that the federal government shortchanged the hurricane's poorest victims.

Congressional Democrats are already using the hurricane as a reason to block Republican tax and spending plans.

"Democrats think this is the worst possible time to be cutting taxes for those at the very top and cutting the social safety net of those at the very bottom, and adding $35 billion," said Thomas S. Kahn, staff director for Democrats on the House Budget Committee.

Budget analysts said the magnitude and unique characteristics of the hurricane made it unlike any previous natural disaster, resulting in a variety of extraordinary costs:

¶Shelter for as many as a million people for months.

¶A potentially high share of uninsured property losses that stem from flooding, which is not covered by private insurers.

¶Education and health care for hundreds of thousands forced to live outside their home states.

"Katrina could easily become a milestone in the history of the federal budget," said Stanley Collender, a longtime budget analyst here. "Policies that never would have been considered before could now become standard."

Indeed, there were signs on Tuesday that Republicans and Democrats had already begun to compete with each other over who might be willing to spend more.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Senate Democratic leader, predicted on Tuesday that costs could total $150 billion. Top Republican lawmakers, meanwhile, have begun to call for "stimulus" measures to buck up the overall economy.

White House officials contend that costs attributable to the hurricane are separate from Mr. Bush's underlying budget goals, which include cutting the deficit in half over the next four years and permanently extending most of the tax cuts passed in 2001 and 2003.

Budget analysts also note that natural disasters are essentially one-time costs that do not affect the government's long-run fiscal health.

"We can afford $100 billion - one time," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, director of the Congressional Budget Office. "What we cannot afford is $100 billion in additional spending year after year."

The problem is that, even without the hurricane, the federal government's underlying fiscal health is in poor shape. In July, the White House predicted that surging tax revenues would reduce the deficit this year to $333 billion from $412 billion in 2004.

But many analysts believe that the tax surge was largely a one-time event and that overall government spending is still poised to climb rapidly as a result of the war in Iraq, the Medicare prescription drug benefit and the growing number of baby boomers who will soon reach retirement age.

Before the hurricane, House and Senate Republicans were preparing to work out $35 billion in spending cuts over the next five years that would trim Medicaid payments by $10 billion and make smaller cuts in student loan programs, farm programs, food stamps, housing and cash assistance to poor families.

Under the budget resolution that Congress passed this spring, Congressional committees are supposed to spell out the proposed cuts by Sept. 16. House and Senate leaders had been planning to pass the cuts within a week or so after that.

DOJ_NMG_0003332

Bush Praises Americans' Aid To Hurricane Victims (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

President Bush yesterday urged Americans to continue to donate to private charitable organizations and faith-based groups in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

"We've got people who represent thousands of volunteers who are in the midst of helping save lives," the president said as he praised charity leaders at the White House. "If you want to help, support the Red Cross or the Salvation Army or your church or the United Way."

Mr. Bush met in the White House with faith-based and community groups, including representatives from the African Methodist Episcopal Church, the Southern Baptist Convention, the Salvation Army, the American Red Cross, the United Way of America, the YMCA, Catholic Charities USA and several others.

Private donations to U.S. charities giving meals, water and shelter to victims of Hurricane Katrina had topped $300 million by Monday. The American Red Cross, which accounts for the bulk of private donations, said it had received $196.9 million so far, including roughly $85 million from corporate donors.

Still, more money is needed. American Red Cross spokeswoman Sarah Marchetti said her group did not have a specific target figure for donations, but that she knew the relief efforts would cost far more than the $130 million spent after the four hurricanes that hit the United States last year.

Mr. Bush has appointed his father, former President George Bush, and former President Bill Clinton to lead fundraising efforts in the United States, as they did for the Dec. 26, 2004, tsunami in Asia.

Radio and television stations across the country have set a goal of raising at least $100 million, and the National Association of Broadcasters has designated Friday as a day for stations to hold telethons and other fundraising events.

During brief comments after his White House meeting, Mr. Bush took issue with the use of the word "refugees" to describe those displaced from New Orleans.

"There's a debate here about refugees. Let me tell you my attitude and the attitude of people around this table: The people we're talking about are not refugees. They are Americans, and they need the help and love and compassion of our fellow citizens. And the people at this table are providing that help and compassion and love," the president said.

Mr. Bush also assured Americans that displaced people will continue to receive their Social Security checks, their veteran's benefits checks and unemployment checks.

The Rev. Larry Snyder, president of Catholic Charities USA, which consists of more than 1,300 local agencies and institutions nationwide, was among those at the White House.

"Catholic Charities USA is firmly committed to helping people rebuild their lives," Mr. Snyder said.

Mr. Bush assured the religious leaders that their efforts are having an effect.

"Out of the darkness will come some light," he said.

Bush Taps Cheney To Assess Recovery Effort (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Mary Curtius

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush said today he was dispatching Vice President Dick Cheney to the region to assess the recovery efforts after Hurricane Katrina struck the Gulf Coast, amid growing unhappiness in Congress with the government's response.

The Senate Government Affairs Committee announced it would begin an investigation of the government's performance, and Bush said he, too, would look into his administration's response to the storm and the disaster that followed.

The president made the announcement at the end of a Cabinet meeting at which department heads reported on their agencies' work in the week since the storm.

Pledging to press ahead with the effort to meet the demands posed by the catastrophe, the president said: "This administration is not going to rest until every life can be saved, until families are reconnected, until this recovery is complete."

DOJ_NMG_0003333

The meeting was the first of several the president has scheduled for today, after running into sharp criticism throughout last week that his administration had been slow to recognize the scope of the disaster and to begin federal assistance to the stricken Gulf Coast.

Later in the morning he met with representatives of national voluntary organizations for what his spokesman, Scott McClellan, presented as a report on what charitable organizations were doing in the region.

Bush also called congressional leaders to the White House for their first meeting since Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29 and rampaged through more than four Southern states.

The death toll is estimated at perhaps 10,000 and the cost of the damage is put at more than $25 billion in insurance claims alone, with tens of billions more to rebuild.

"Government at all levels failed," Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) said at a Capitol news conference, where she announced that the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee would hold hearings.

"It is difficult to understand the lack of preparedness and the ineffective initial response to a disaster that had been predicted for years, and for which specific, dire warnings had been given for days," she said.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, the senior Democrat on the committee, said "governmental failures in preparing for, and responding to, Hurricane Katrina allowed much more human suffering and property destruction to occur than should have."

He said the storm was "the most significant test of our national emergency preparedness and response system" since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The system, he said, "obviously did not pass the test."

On Monday, during his second trip to the region in a week, Bush heard one of the storm's victims complain about the use of the term "refugees." At the end of the meeting in the White House Roosevelt Room, Bush addressed that issue.

"Let me tell you my attitude and the attitude of people around this table: The people we're talking about are not refugees. They are Americans, and they need the help and love and compassion of our fellow citizens.

He also promised, as he did during the Cabinet meeting, that Social Security checks and other government benefit payments would be dispatched.

At the Cabinet meeting, Bush said that the vice president's mission would be to determine whether the government was meeting its most pressing goals, including searching for victims, restoring essential services, draining the flooded region, removing debris, and protecting health and safety.

He also said Cheney would focus on whether bureaucratic obstacles were interfering with the delivery of aid.

"Bureaucracy is not going to stand in the way of getting the job done for the people," the president said.

Over the weekend, would-be rescuers working for state and local agencies, and others, lambasted the Federal Emergency Management Agency for imposing bureaucratic roadblocks to their work.

Bush and McClellan refused to respond directly to questions about whether any senior officials would be fired as a result of their performance.

The president said he intended "to lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong."

"We want to make sure that we can respond properly if there's a WMD attack or another major storm," Bush said.

The focus of any investigation becomes a contentious issue.

Urging the Senate committee to keep the focus on what needed to be done in the immediate aftermath of the storm, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said he asked Collins to "please don't have a hearing tying up people who need to make decisions."

The top priority, he said, should not be affixing blame, but on figuring out "how to fix things fast."

Some Democrats called for the formation of a commission similar to the independent panel that studied the Sept. 11 attacks to determine whether there had been an intelligence failure and to look at the government's response.

Some Republicans, including Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who pushed for creation of the 9/11 commission, said a similar inquiry may yet be required. But McCain and others said they first wanted to see Congress exercise its oversight role.

However, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) said no such commission was necessary. DeLay said he hoped that Congress would mount its own bipartisan, bicameral investigation into what went wrong. But he said the immediate focus should be on what needs to be done to aid victims.

DeLay said the House was likely to pass a second aid bill before week's end that would try to cut through bureaucratic red tape and get unemployment benefits to evacuees. The Congress passed, and Bush signed, a $10.5 billion aid bill last week.

DeLay refused to say how much additional funding might be included for hurricane relief. He accused Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) of "playing politics" by putting out a statement estimating that "an initial investment of $150 billion will be needed" for immediate relief efforts. DeLay said no one knows how much money would be needed.

'Rays Of Light' In New Orleans (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, September 7, 2005

The draining of New Orleans quickened Tuesday as huge pumps made headway in lowering floodwaters in a city that braced for how many victims of Hurricane Katrina the dropping waterline may reveal.

Meanwhile, President Bush was readying a request for as much as $50 billion for the Gulf Coast region, which equals $625 for every household in America. And he announced plans to look into the government response.

"What I intend to do is lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong," he said.

Already, a $10.5 billion check approved last week is "being used at an increasingly rapid pace," said Scott Milburn, an Office of Management and Budget spokesman. "We're readying a second installment now."

Senate Democratic Minority Leader Harry Reid said after Bush met with congressional leaders that the president planned to ask for $50 billion more.

Relief and recovery needs will be the "No. 1 priority for the foreseeable future," said House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas.

A USA TODAY poll of 609 people Tuesday asked who was to blame the most for problems after the hurricane. Twenty-five percent said state and local officials; 18% said the federal government, 13% blamed Bush. But the majority, 38%, said no one is to blame.

In New Orleans, major flood wall breaks were at last plugged with rocks and sandbags. The Army Corps of Engineers reported its pumping efforts had reduced the scope of flooding to 60% of the low-lying city, down from 80% at the high-water mark. Mayor Ray Nagin said it offered the first "rays of light" for a city that overnight turned from tourist attraction to disaster site. But he was worried about the human toll.

"It's going to be awful, and it's going to wake the nation up again," said Nagin, renewing warnings that the bodies of thousands of victims of the flooding left by Katrina could soon surface.

The Pentagon beefed up its presence, dispatching 4,000 paratroopers from the 82nd Airborne Division to finish evacuating the city. Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said "in most cases" the military had contributed the troops needed to help with the recovery effort.

The military was returning from Iraq about 2,800 members of a Louisiana combat brigade a month ahead of schedule, and some Mississippi National Guard members were also being sent home early.

The death count grew slowly. The number of confirmed dead was 294, including 83 in Louisiana and 196 in Mississippi. Effort intensified to reunite thousands of survivors with their loved ones. That is being led by groups such as the American Red Cross, television networks and Internet bulletin boards.

Sniper fire and looting have declined dramatically since the arrival days ago of National Guard troops, police Lt. Troy Savage said. But big fires hampered search-and-rescue efforts, including fires at antebellum homes in the fashionable Garden District.

Bush Will Rebound From Katrina Missteps (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, September 7, 2005

Normally, disasters such as floods, hurricanes, tornadoes and such are chances for the president to gain popularity and for his administration to shine. It was the unique and inexplicable inability of the Bush people to understand the magnitude of what they confronted and to respond to it quickly that managed to transform this chance for a big political gain into a monstrous liability.

DOJ_NMG_0003335

Americans will want to know why the trucks didn't start rolling when the winds started blowing. And when they quieted, where were the airlifts and evacuations that could have fed and watered thousands and prevented many deaths and much psychic and physical harm?

But make no mistake about it: Every day for the next year, voters will see nonstop scenes of federal relief, rebuilding, renovation and reconstruction along with the empathy, sympathy and compassion these efforts imply in the heart of George W. Bush. He may have had a terrible first week, but he will rebound big time in the months to come.

The aid an administration gives in the aftermath of a momentous disaster will be covered continuously by the media. Every relief convoy will get a wide slice of publicity. As the pumps run and the city and the gulf region drain, the nation will feel a surge of heady optimism at our ability to bounce back from disaster. Happy visuals will replace tragic ones, and interviews with homeowners joyously moving back in will run instead of the tearful stories of refugees.

After Sept. 11, Bush was heavily criticized too. Remember the slowly ticking minutes in Michael Moore's film "Fahrenheit 9/11" during which Bush continued to read to a class of children even after hearing about the Trade Center attack? (Bush was absolutely right not to bolt from the room and traumatize the kids and the nation even more.) It was not until his bullhorn speech several days later that the president got ahead of the story. Soon his response to Sept. 11 was the mainstay of his popularity and of his claim for a second term on the job.

The recovery from Katrina may well follow a similar trajectory. While the air in Washington will be filled with recriminations about why the levee wasn't reinforced and why the aid was so slow in coming after the storm hit, the airwaves around the nation will be filled with evidence of the administration's response, just as they were in the months after Sept. 11.

All this is not to take away from our justifiable anger at the human pain, loss of life and needless suffering that FEMA's inability to get off the dime fast caused. To watch those pictures of Americans crowded into what was increasingly called the Sewerdome is to simmer in rage at the dunderheads in Washington who stood on ceremony, budgetary considerations, bureaucratic constraints and chain of command rather than rushing to help those in need before a weather disaster became a human one.

It is also not to take away from the need for a thorough examination, preferably through a Sept. 11-style commission, of why the levee was not strengthened after the warnings of Hurricane Ivan a year before and of why relief was so slow in coming.

But let the Democrats hold their rejoicing. In a year, Katrina and the relief and rebuilding efforts that are about to follow will be seen as having imparted a new and crucial momentum to an administration that was obviously increasingly running out of ideas, out of steam, and — like its nation — out of gas.

Katrina has the capacity to shape the second Bush term in the same way Sept. 11 shaped his first term — not only in rebuilding New Orleans but in taking preventative steps around the nation to bolster our defenses against natural and manmade disasters and terror strikes. Responding to disasters is a source of presidential strength and popularity, and Bush is about to show how it is done.

Morris is the author of Rewriting History, a rebuttal of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's (D-N.Y.) memoir, Living History.

A Swamped Nation-builder (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 7, 2005

NOW WE KNOW HE'S SERIOUS: President Bush has taken the most important issue facing his administration, the Katrina relief mission, and kicked it upstairs to the vice president's office. Bush announced Tuesday that he is deploying Dick Cheney to the Gulf Coast region on Thursday, and Cheney will join the thousands of troops who have poured in to impose order on the relief effort. After its initial halting response, the federal government is bringing the full force of its power to bear on the crisis. The Coast Guard, FEMA, the National Guard, active military units and even the Border Patrol have been coordinating the rescue of tens of thousands of Gulf Coast residents. The evacuation of survivors has become far more orderly. On Tuesday, the Army Corps of Engineers plugged one of New Orleans' broken levees, and pumping water out of the city quickened.

DOJ_NMG_0003336

Still, the overriding fact on the ground — both in Washington and along the Gulf — is this: Too many people died needlessly because their governments were too concerned about the threat of terrorism to pay attention to the threat posed by Mother Nature.

There will be plenty of time for politicians to play the blame game and to embrace facile, inside-the-Beltway solutions to the botched rescue. (A Cabinet seat for FEMA! Repeal the Posse Comitatus Act!) And some of the investigations now being called for — the president himself has graciously offered to lead one of them — may yield some useful information.

But the human tragedy will haunt the remainder of the Bush presidency. Bush was dismissive of nation-building in 2000; now his presidency will be judged largely by his performance as a nation-builder — both in Iraq and at home.

Setting aside the government's overall performance, the president himself, already reeling from extraordinarily low approval ratings, has not been sure-footed in responding to Katrina. He embarrassed himself on TV last Thursday when he said that he didn't think "anybody anticipated the breach of the levees." On Tuesday, sounding more like someone who'd just wandered into the Oval Office than like the commander in chief who saw us through 9/11, Bush said: "It's very important for us to understand the relationship between the federal government, the state government and the local government when it comes to a major catastrophe."

Get it together, Mr. President.

A CEO's Weaknesses (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

There were two levee breaks last week: The natural disaster of Katrina ravaged New Orleans and left behind thousands of victims, but there was also a political catastrophe that breached the Bush administration's containment walls and exposed fundamental weaknesses in how this White House makes decisions.

The political damage may be harder to repair than the flooded infrastructure. The management flaws that have been so obvious over the past week go to the heart of how President Bush runs the government.

Early in his first term, it was popular to speak of how this Harvard Business School graduate was operating an "MBA Presidency." He insisted that everyone be on time to meetings; he wanted his aides to be properly dressed; he favored delegation of power, crisp meetings, early bedtimes. But these chief executive officer habits disguised a deeper reality: that Bush's management style was often haphazard and reactive. Like Isaiah Berlin's famous hedgehog, he came to focus on one big thing -- the war against terrorism -- and let many lesser things slide. Loyalty counted for more for this CEO than performance -- an attitude that is deadly in managing any enterprise.

The most pointed criticism of Bush's management I've read over the past week comes from the conservative columnist William Kristol. "Almost every Republican I have spoken with is disappointed" by the administration's response to Katrina, Kristol told The Post's Jim VandeHei. "He is a strong president . . . but he has never really focused on the importance of good execution. I think that is true in many parts of his presidency."

The part of this administration I know best is foreign policy. While I respect some of Bush's decisions, I see an underlying weakness in decision making that is very similar to the post-Katrina fiasco. This White House doesn't move effectively to fix broken bureaucracies, such as the Central Intelligence Agency or the Department of Homeland Security; it doesn't use interagency meetings to force clear decisions and then implement them, as has been clear in continuing policy confusion on Iraq, North Korea and Iran; and it doesn't mobilize the government well to deal with crisis warnings, as the Sept. 11 commission reported.

What accounts for this management failure? Experts cite a number of factors. First, this White House lacks a strong, substantive chief of staff who could act as a kind of deputy president, riding herd on the Cabinet agencies. Bush's chief, Andrew Card, is good at organizing the president's schedule, but he hasn't played the broader, make-the-trains-run role of many of his predecessors. Another problem is Bush's own style: As a key adviser once told me, this president isn't interested in hitting singles and doubles; he wants home runs. This approach almost guarantees that the administration won't do well at crisis prevention -- which succeeds best when nothing dramatic happens at all, thanks to good planning.

DOJ_NMG_0003337

Even on the issues Bush has identified as his priorities, there has been a surprising reactive quality. Take the war on terrorism: The two bureaucracies that are crucial for protecting Americans -- the Department of Homeland Security and the intelligence community -- have been in obvious disarray over the past two years. Yet Bush has not seized the initiative in either case and has let others set the agenda for reorganization. The disorientation today at those two mission-critical bureaucracies is genuinely dangerous for the country.

Iraq, too, has been a policy disconnect. The president insists (admirably, in my view) that America must stay the course, but as the situation there has deteriorated, he has failed to explain clearly what that course is. That's not a new problem: From the beginning, the administration has had difficulty framing a single Iraq strategy and mobilizing all the resources necessary for it to succeed. There hasn't been one Iraq policy but several competing versions.

Managing the government isn't as glamorous as politics, and on the political side it must be said that Bush has been very skillful. His top political adviser, Karl Rove, is one of the most gifted, if also ruthless, people ever to play that role. And this White House is good at reaction and damage control -- at mobilizing the apparatus of government after initial mistakes, as we're finally seeing on the Gulf Coast.

What this White House needs most is the tonic of honest accountability, as illustrated by an anecdote from presidential scholar Fred Greenstein. He recalls a moment in the 1950s when an aide walked out of the Oval Office, congratulating himself for telling President Dwight D. Eisenhower "what he wanted to hear." Ike's national security adviser, Gen. Andrew Goodpaster, overheard the aide and angrily sent him back to tell the president the truth, no matter how unpleasant.

The 'Stuff Happens' Presidency (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

We're not number one. We're not even close.

By which measures, precisely, do we lead the world? Caring for our countrymen? You jest. A first-class physical infrastructure? Tell that to New Orleans. Throwing so much money at the rich that we've got nothing left over to promote the general welfare? Now you're talking.

The problem goes beyond the fact that we can't count on our government to be there for us in catastrophes. It's that a can't-do spirit, a shouldn't-do spirit, guides the men who run the nation. Consider the congressional testimony of Joe Allbaugh, George W. Bush's 2000 campaign manager, who assumed the top position at FEMA in 2001. He characterized the organization as "an oversized entitlement program," and counseled states and cities to rely instead on "faith-based organizations . . . like the Salvation Army and the Mennonite Disaster Service."

Is it any surprise, then, that the administration's response to the devastation in New Orleans is of a piece with its response to the sacking of Baghdad once our troops arrived? "Stuff happens" was the way Don Rumsfeld described the destruction of Baghdad's hospitals, universities and museums while American soldiers stood around. Now stuff has happened in New Orleans, too, even as FEMA was turning away offers of assistance. This is the stuff-happens administration. And it's willing, apparently, to sacrifice any claim America may have to national greatness rather than inconvenience the rich by taxing them to build a more secure nation.

As a matter of social policy, the catastrophic lack of response in New Orleans is exceptional only in its scale and immediacy. When it comes to caring for our fellow countrymen, we all know that America has never ranked very high. We are, of course, the only democracy in the developed world that doesn't offer health care to its citizens as a matter of right. We rank 34th among nations in infant mortality rates, behind such rival superpowers as Cyprus, Andorra and Brunei.

But these are chronic conditions, and even many of us who argue for universal health coverage have grown inured to that distinctly American indifference to the common good, to our radical lack of solidarity with our fellow citizens. Besides, the poor generally have the decency to die discreetly, and discretely -- not conspicuously, not in droves. Come rain or come shine, we leave millions of beleaguered Americans to fend for themselves on a daily basis. It's just a lot more noticeable in a horrific rain, and when the ordinary lack of access to medical care is augmented by an extraordinary lack of access to emergency services.

DOJ_NMG_0003338

Even if we'll never win the national-greatness sweepstakes for solidarity, though, we've long been the model of the world in matters infrastructural, in roads, bridges and dams and the like. But the America in which Eisenhower the Good decreed the construction of the interstate highway system now seems a far-off land in which even conservatives believed in public expenditures for the public good. The radical-capitalist conservatives of the past quarter-century not only haven't supported the public expenditures, they don't even believe there is such a thing as the public good. Let the Dutch build their dikes through some socialistic scheme of taxing and spending; that isn't the American way. Here, the business of government is to let the private sector create wealth -- even if that wealth doesn't circulate where it's most needed. So George W. Bush threw trillions of dollars in tax cuts to the wealthiest Americans, and what did they do with it? Did the Walton family up in Bentonville raise the levees in New Orleans? Did the Bass family over in Texas write a tax-deductible check to the Mennonites for the billions of dollars they would need to rescue the elderly from inundated nursing homes?

Even now, with bedraggled rescuers pulling decomposed bodies from the muck of New Orleans, Bill Frist, the moral cretin who runs the U.S. Senate, wanted its first order of business this week to be the permanent repeal of the estate tax, until the public outcry persuaded him to change course. The Republicans profess belief in trickle-down, but what they've given us is the Flood.

The world looks on in stunned amazement, unable to understand how a once great nation has grown so indifferent not just to its poor and its blacks but even to the most rudimentary self-preservation. Some of it is institutional racism, but the primary culprit is the economic libertarianism that the president still espouses whenever he sells his Social Security snake oil. It's that libertarianism, more than anything else, that has transformed a great city into an immense morgue.

But, hey -- stuff happens.

Osama And Katrina (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

On the day after 9/11, I was in Jerusalem and was interviewed by Israeli TV. The reporter asked me, "Do you think the Bush administration is up to responding to this attack?" As best I can recall, I answered: "Absolutely. One thing I can assure you about these guys is that they know how to pull the trigger."

It was just a gut reaction that George Bush and Dick Cheney were the right guys to deal with Osama. I was not alone in that feeling, and as a result, Mr. Bush got a mandate, almost a blank check, to rule from 9/11 that he never really earned at the polls. Unfortunately, he used that mandate not simply to confront the terrorists but to take a radically uncompassionate conservative agenda - on taxes, stem cells, the environment and foreign treaties - that was going nowhere before 9/11, and drive it into a post-9/11 world. In that sense, 9/11 distorted our politics and society.

Well, if 9/11 is one bookend of the Bush administration, Katrina may be the other. If 9/11 put the wind at President Bush's back, Katrina's put the wind in his face. If the Bush-Cheney team seemed to be the right guys to deal with Osama, they seem exactly the wrong guys to deal with Katrina - and all the rot and misplaced priorities it's exposed here at home.

These are people so much better at inflicting pain than feeling it, so much better at taking things apart than putting them together, so much better at defending "intelligent design" as a theology than practicing it as a policy.

For instance, it's unavoidably obvious that we need a real policy of energy conservation. But President Bush can barely choke out the word "conservation." And can you imagine Mr. Cheney, who has already denounced conservation as a "personal virtue" irrelevant to national policy, now leading such a campaign or confronting oil companies for price gouging?

And then there are the president's standard lines: "It's not the government's money; it's your money," and, "One of the last things that we need to do to this economy is to take money out of your pocket and fuel government." Maybe Mr. Bush will now also tell us: "It's not the government's hurricane - it's your hurricane."

An administration whose tax policy has been dominated by the toweringly selfish Grover Norquist - who has been quoted as saying: "I don't want to abolish government. I simply want to reduce it to the size where I can drag it into the bathroom and drown it in the bathtub" - doesn't have the instincts for this moment. Mr. Norquist is the only person about whom I would say this: I hope he owns property around the New Orleans levee that was never properly finished because of a lack of tax dollars. I hope his basement got flooded. And I hope that he was busy drowning government in his bathtub when the levee broke and that he had to wait for a U.S. Army helicopter to get out of town.

DOJ_NMG_0003339

The Bush team has engaged in a tax giveaway since 9/11 that has had one underlying assumption: There will never be another rainy day. Just spend money. You knew that sooner or later there would be a rainy day, but Karl Rove has assumed it wouldn't happen on Mr. Bush's watch - that someone else would have to clean it up. Well, it did happen on his watch.

Besides ripping away the roofs of New Orleans, Katrina ripped away the argument that we can cut taxes, properly educate our kids, compete with India and China, succeed in Iraq, keep improving the U.S. infrastructure, and take care of a catastrophic emergency - without putting ourselves totally into the debt of Beijing.

So many of the things the Bush team has ignored or distorted under the guise of fighting Osama were exposed by Katrina: its refusal to impose a gasoline tax after 9/11, which would have begun to shift our economy much sooner to more fuel-efficient cars, helped raise money for a rainy day and eased our dependence on the world's worst regimes for energy; its refusal to develop some form of national health care to cover the 40 million uninsured; and its insistence on cutting more taxes, even when that has contributed to incomplete levees and too small an Army to deal with Katrina, Osama and Saddam at the same time.

As my Democratic entrepreneur friend Joel Hyatt once remarked, the Bush team's philosophy since 9/11 has been: "We're at war. Let's party."

Well, the party is over. If Mr. Bush learns the lessons of Katrina, he has a chance to replace his 9/11 mandate with something new and relevant. If that happens, Katrina will have destroyed New Orleans, but helped to restore America. If Mr. Bush goes back to his politics as usual, he'll be thwarted at every turn. Katrina will have destroyed a city and a presidency.

Haunted By Hesitation (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON

It took a while, but the president finally figured out a response to the destruction of New Orleans.

Later this week (no point rushing things) W. is dispatching Dick Cheney to the rancid lake that was a romantic city. The vice president has at long last lumbered back from a Wyoming vacation, and, reportedly, from shopping for a $2.9 million waterfront estate in St. Michael's, a retreat in the Chesapeake Bay where Rummy has a weekend home, where "Wedding Crashers" was filmed and where rich lobbyists hunt.

Maybe Mr. Cheney is going down to New Orleans to hunt looters. Or to make sure that Halliburton's lucrative contract to rebuild the city is watertight. Or maybe, since former Senator John Breaux of Louisiana described the shattered parish as "Baghdad under water," the vice president plans to take his pal Ahmad Chalabi along for a consultation on destroying minority rights.

The water that breached the New Orleans levees and left a million people homeless and jobless has also breached the White House defenses. Reality has come flooding in. Since 9/11, the Bush administration has been remarkably successful at blowing off "the reality-based community," as it derisively calls the press.

But now, when W., Mr. Cheney, Laura, Rummy, Gen. Richard Myers, Michael Chertoff and the rest of the gang tell us everything's under control, our cities are safe, stay the course - who believes them?

This time we can actually see the bodies.

As the water recedes, more and more decaying bodies will testify to the callous and stumblebum administration response to Katrina's rout of 90,000 square miles of the South.

The Bush administration bungled the Iraq occupation, arrogantly throwing away State Department occupation plans and C.I.A. insurgency warnings. But the human toll of those mistakes has not been as viscerally evident because the White House pulled a curtain over the bodies: the president has avoided the funerals of soldiers, and the Pentagon has censored the coffins of the dead coming home and never acknowledges the number of Iraqi civilians killed.

DOJ_NMG_0003340

But this time, the bodies of those who might have been saved between Monday and Friday, when the president failed to rush the necessary resources to a disaster that his own general describes as "biblical," or even send in the 82nd Airborne, are floating up in front of our eyes.

New Orleans's literary lore and tourist lure was its fascination with the dead and undead, its lavish annual Halloween party, its famous above-ground cemeteries, its love of vampires and voodoo and zombies. But now that the city is decimated, reeking with unnecessary death and destruction, the restless spirits of New Orleans will haunt the White House.

The administration's foreign policy is entirely constructed around American self-love - the idea that the U.S. is superior, that we are the model everyone looks up to, that everyone in the world wants what we have.

But when people around the world look at Iraq, they don't see freedom. They see chaos and sectarian hatred. And when they look at New Orleans, they see glaring incompetence and racial injustice, where the rich white people were saved and the poor black people were left to die hideous deaths. They see some conservatives blaming the poor for not saving themselves. So much for W.'s "culture of life."

The president won re-election because he said that the war in Iraq and the Homeland Security Department would make us safer. Hogwash.

W.'s 2004 convention was staged like "The Magnificent Seven" with the Republicans' swaggering tough guys - from Rudy Giuliani to Arnold Schwarzenegger to John McCain - riding in to save an embattled town.

These were the steely-eyed gunslingers we needed to protect us, they said, not those sissified girlie-men Democrats. But now it turns out that W. can't save the town, not even from hurricane damage that everyone has been predicting for years, much less from unpredictable terrorists.

His campaigns presented the arc of his life story as that of a man who stumbled around until he was 40, then found himself and developed a laserlike focus.

But now that the people of New Orleans need an ark, we have to question the president's arc. He's stumbling in Iraq and he's stumbling on Katrina.

Let's play the blame game: the man who benefited more than anyone in history from safety nets set up by family did not bother to provide one for those who lost their families.

Katrina's Global Lessons (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

MOSCOW -- Hurricane Katrina has raked a vivid scar across America's image abroad -- and left its marks on President Bush's ambitious foreign policy agenda as well. Overcoming these setbacks will require a demonstration that the United States under Bush is not an irrevocably weakened and divided nation about to turn inward on its own problems.

The stories and images of lawlessness, refugees dying of deprivation or mayhem, and the desperation of befouled human sanctuaries in New Orleans have at times resembled dispatches from Darfur or Afghanistan. The initial shock abroad comes not from the sights of such human misery but from the fact that it occurred in the United States, which has always been quick both to help and to lecture those swept up in natural and man-made disasters in foreign lands.

The feet of clay of a nation that has regularly vaunted its standing as the world's only remaining superpower have been in plain view in recent days.

Here in the Russian capital and elsewhere abroad, the focus is shifting quickly to take in political consequences as well as relief efforts. European embassies in Washington are already reporting back to their capitals on how the disaster may further impair Bush's effectiveness as he slips toward lame-duck status. Diplomatic cables raise the key question of which America will emerge from this harrowing test of national resolve and compassion.

Will post-Katrina America be humbler, more cooperative and more understanding of other nations' problems and failures? Or will the United States let its active engagement in the world's human and political crises become another casualty of Katrina's winds and floodwaters -- and of the political turmoil they have triggered?

DOJ_NMG_0003341

"I look at this and cannot believe my eyes," Russian President Vladimir Putin said when I asked him Monday evening about Katrina's damage. "It tells us however strong and powerful we think we are, we are nothing in the eyes of nature and of God Almighty. . . . We are all vulnerable and must cooperate to help each other."

Putin reeled off details of the emergency aid that Russia has offered to airlift to Louisiana. But remarks by Putin and others at the annual Valdai conference, which brings together Europeans, Russians, Asians and Americans for discussions on Russia, seemed to reflect an expectation of a fairly quick return to the world stage by Bush, to whom Putin referred at one point simply as "George." The two leaders are due to meet in New York and then in Washington next week.

But the Russian will find that Bush has his hands full at home as he tries to cope with the angry complaints of residents of Louisiana and Mississippi who feel they have received little or no immediate help, while the victims of Asia's tsunami were lavishly aided and taxpayer money was flowing to Iraq.

The anger over their deplorable conditions and the incompetent reactions by federal and local authorities that contributed to those conditions is more than justified. And no one can doubt that there will be some lessening of U.S. capacity to alleviate suffering abroad when there is so much of it at home.

But the kind of deprivation and peril that Americans have witnessed in New Orleans in recent days is roughly what people in much of the Third World experience every day of their lives -- with no hope of a National Guard ever arriving, or an escape route being opened, unless there is significant outside help, especially from the United States.

Our own needs should not drive Americans farther away from other peoples in distress or cause us to abandon them to their own fate. To the contrary. This crisis -- like those in Darfur and elsewhere -- underlines the common humanity and the common destiny that all nations share.

Bush will go to New York next week to address the U.N. General Assembly, the symbol of "the international community" that his administration has regularly derided. This is the moment for the president to show the humility he once promised to bring to America's world leadership, but which he largely abandoned once in office.

For all its horror, Katrina could yet hold a political silver lining if the disaster reminds both Bush and his harshest critics that America's role in the world is not defined just by the personalities and policies of the current occupants of the White House. America is big enough in heart, resources and intelligence to recover at home and be active abroad -- if it shows national unity in the face of national disaster.

First Estimates On Katrina Costs For Washington Hit $200 Billion (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon, David Rogers and Dionne Searcey

The Wall Street Journal, September 7, 2005

The federal government could spend as much as $150 billion to $200 billion caring for the victims of Hurricane Katrina and rebuilding from its devastation, according to early congressional estimates -- a total bill that would far surpass the initial costs of recovering from the 9/11 terror attacks and could put Katrina on track to become the most expensive natural disaster in American history.

The early estimates are rough, but they are so high that some in Congress already are talking of creating a new government entity simply to manage the costs, similar to the effort by then-Commerce Secretary Herbert Hoover after floods in the same regions in the 1920s. All told, the process of paying for relief and repair is likely to be a "three-to-four-year exercise," said Sen. Judd Gregg, the New Hampshire Republican who heads the Budget Committee.

Even as levee breaches were being repaired in New Orleans and oil spills and fires were posing new problems, a torrent of federal relief spending was under way. The Federal Emergency Management Agency is committing funds at a rate close to $1 billion to $2 billion a day, officials estimated.

President Bush meets with cabinet members and says, "This administration is not going to rest until every life can be saved." Plus, U.S. Labor Secretary Elaine Chao discusses the federal programs in place for Hurricane Katrina victims.

Lawmakers said the $10.5 billion already allocated to relief efforts in an emergency measure late last week was likely to be gone in a matter of days. As a result, they expect the White House to ask shortly for an additional $40 billion. That alone will drive the cost of Katrina to more than three times the federal cost of the four big hurricanes that struck Florida last year. Approval is virtually certain: Louisiana is a politically important swing state coveted by both Republicans and Democrats, and neither party will want to be seen as shortchanging the effort.

DOJ_NMG_0003342

But that will be only a down payment on a federal tab that all now agree is going to reach more eye-popping levels. The width of the storm's impact adds to costs. Among other things, the federal aid will include not only immediate relief but also major payments under the national flood-insurance program, and new appropriations to subsidize small-business disaster loans. What makes this disaster's costs extraordinary, however, is the fact that so many people face such a lengthy displacement and will now need housing and individual income and health assistance under a government safety net that didn't exist when the famous floods of the 1920s hit the same region.

In many cases, such as Medicaid or welfare-related payments, states typically share in the costs. But the federal government will be asked to carry more of the burden, both because the affected states such as Louisiana have been so devastated financially, and because relief workers want to create the maximum flexibility to allow families to resettle around the country.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada was the first to go public, predicting a government commitment of $150 billion. Top Republicans bridled initially, saying any such estimates at this time translated into playing "political games."

But Mr. Gregg subsequently used an even higher $200 billion estimate, and defended Mr. Reid's figure. "I don't find that crazy at all," Mr. Gregg said. "That's a reasonable estimate from what we know so far."

Mr. Gregg said the requests for additional money will be coming regularly. "I think we'll be doing them every week or bi-weekly for a while," he said. "They are pulling down huge numbers right now."

The spending will surpass the federal costs of recovering from the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on New York and Washington. After those attacks, the federal government allocated $20 billion to rebuild Lower Manhattan. Overall, the forecasting firm Economy.com estimates that Sept. 11-related aid by all levels of government totaled about $67.3 billion in current dollars.

Some of the ideas being discussed on Capitol Hill involved relief far beyond the disaster area. For example, Sen. Charles Grassley, the Iowa Republican, said he wants loan relief for farmers whose crops might not reach market on schedule due to disruption at the New Orleans port. Sen. Ted Stevens, the Alaska Republican, said he favors tax relief for airlines hit by higher fuel costs. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, the Texas Republican, said she envisions broad-based aid to local governments for the added costs of schooling, housing and providing health care to evacuees, even temporarily. "There are many costs for the states like Texas that are taking these people in need in," she said.

Cecil Picard, Louisiana's superintendent of education, said he was hoping for federal help for some of the myriad issues schools will be facing as 187,000 students from storm-affected areas have been displaced. He wants federal money to make up the pay difference for teachers forced into substitute teaching jobs in outlying areas.

The large outlays overall will have many ripple effects. For one, Mr. Gregg said there is little question that the spending will drive up the 2006 deficit above the $333 billion forecast for the current fiscal year ending Sept. 30.

In addition, the sums now being discussed could add to anger over the fact that New Orleans, at least, wasn't better protected, and accelerate demands for investigations. In response to a question, President Bush said he himself would direct one probe.

"What I intend to do is lead...an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong," Mr. Bush said yesterday at a cabinet meeting. He offered no further details. But signaling that federal officials probably would point to state and local officials as a source of the problems, the president added, "It's very important for us to understand the relationship between the federal government, the state government and the local government when it comes to a major catastrophe.... We still live in an unsettled world. We want to make sure that we can respond. "

As Washington grappled with the costs, developments in the hurricane-struck region illustrated the kinds of after-effects that will make recovery and rebuilding so expensive. Officials toting up the damage in New Orleans said the storm generated as much as 90 million tons of solid waste and rendered 140,000 to 160,000 homes unusable. Environmental workers are worrying about everything from radioactive waste to wood infested with the ravenous Formosan termites that infest many Southern states.

DOJ_NMG_0003343

Clean-up was getting under way at two major oil spills that unleashed 78,000 barrels of oil; the larger spill was moving out to the Gulf of Mexico. Nearly all of Louisiana's 530 sewage treatment facilities in the storm-ravaged region were damaged, with some barely visible under the floodwater.

Fires were burning yesterday in several places -- one in a staging area for Mardi Gras floats and some where gas lines were broken. Contributing to the mess: flooded homes where pesticides or old batteries were stored; overturned cars and boats where gas is leaking; submerged rail cars possibly carrying hazardous materials; termite-infested wood; and numerous animal carcasses.

"Everywhere we look there's spills," said Mike McDaniel, secretary of the Louisiana State Department of Environmental Quality. "It all adds up to almost a solid sheen over the area right now, but we expect over time that will take care of itself."

There's nowhere for the contaminated floodwater in the city to go but into Lake Pontchartrain, he said, though that will create environmental problems down the road. "We have to get the water out of the city or the nightmare gets only worse," he said. "We'll have to deal with the issues in the lake. The priority is on saving lives."

As a result, it could be years before drinking water is restored to everyone, he said: "It is almost unimaginable the things we're going to have to plan for and deal with."

The Army Corps of Engineers said yesterday that progress continued, albeit fitfully, on efforts to repair damaged levees and position pumps to drain floodwaters from New Orleans. Officials said about 60% of the city remains under water, and they stood by earlier estimates that it could take one to three months to complete the pumping.

In a conference call yesterday afternoon with reporters, the officials estimated that about 10 of roughly 40 pumping stations in the New Orleans vicinity are operating. One major pump located along Interstate 10 near the 17th Street Canal is running and is sending water into the canal, where it drains into Lake Pontchartrain. But a second pump, known as Pump Station Six, at the head of the canal near the lake, had to be shut down shortly after it was started Monday. It overheated because of trash in the water clogging it.

"Various pump stations are starting up," said engineer Walter Baumy. "It's a very small number but at least it's progress."

The New Orleans flooding was caused by what officials now describe as three "major" breaches, and several smaller ones, in the system of protective barriers protecting New Orleans and surrounding areas. As officials begin to gain access to heavily flooded areas south and southeast of the city, they are finding additional levee damage.

Administration officials said yesterday that the levees that failed were all completed projects. Despite complaints of cuts to the Army Corps of Engineers budget and charges that the cuts may have blocked projects to bolster the levees, no improvements to those facilities were in the pipeline, they said.

Aides to Mr. Reid, the Senate Democratic leader, said their overall estimate of $150 billion in federal relief costs included not just relief efforts, but about $50 billion of public works to rebuild the area's infrastructure. As the picture of the damage and costs came into clearer focus, some Republicans were talking of managing the outlays now needed by using an entity modeled after the Lower Manhattan Development Corp., created to help rebuild following the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

For his part, Mr. Gregg, the Budget Committee chairman, says his model of what should be the efforts by the future President Herbert Hoover, after floods in the same region in the 1920s. "You've got to have some central management entity that's on the ground, in the region, headed up by somebody of substance whom people respect," he said.

Mr. Gregg said Congress can still meet its commitment to wring some savings from federal benefit programs over five years as promised in a budget resolution passed last spring. Medicaid, the federal-state health-care program for the poor, is one of the areas targeted for multiyear savings. But he also said that in the short term, Washington may have to increase its commitment to maintain health coverage for families whose homes were destroyed by the storm and have been forced to relocate out of state.

Despite the looming bills, Mr. Gregg said he saw no reason to retreat on the level of tax cuts assumed in the budget. And Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, an Iowa Republican, said the greater impetus after Katrina is to do more to bring "additional tax policy into place to help investment."

Mr. Grassley was cautious about promising any added tax relief for airlines, which are being hurt badly by rising fuel costs in Katrina's wake, saying that a pending pension bill had already been shaped to help the industry by stretching out its payment obligations. But Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens, an Alaska Republican, said the finance panel should consider a suspension of federal fuel taxes for airlines.

DOJ_NMG_0003344

Leaders Push To Make Sure Blacks Given Fair Share Of Rebuilding Jobs (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand And Melanie Eversley

USA Today, September 7, 2005

BATON ROUGE — After accusations that many New Orleans hurricane victims were not evacuated or rescued because they were black and poor, civil rights advocates Tuesday shifted their focus to making sure poor blacks aren't left out of the city's rebuilding.

Jesse Jackson, at the Louisiana state emergency center in Baton Rouge, said Hurricane Katrina is an opportunity for the federal government to lift a community out of poverty.

New Orleans' impoverished black residents "should be first in line to get the jobs to clean up their own neighborhoods," he said.

Rep. Mel Watt, D-N.C., head of the Congressional Black Caucus, said the caucus would support any effort to make sure New Orleans residents were part of rebuilding.

Blacks make up 67% of New Orleans' population of about 450,000. A quarter of the city's blacks are considered poor. By federal standards, a family of four earning less than $19,307 a year is poor.

Poverty rates in neighboring Gulf states Mississippi and Alabama, which also were hit by the hurricane, are higher than the national average of 13.1%. Mississippi is the USA's poorest state with 21.6% below the poverty line; Alabama is among the top 10 with 16.1% below poverty.

Many blacks in New Orleans were marooned for days after levees broke and the city flooded. Thousands were stranded in their homes or waiting in the Superdome and at the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, where conditions deteriorated rapidly. There was a shortage of food, water and medicine.

Black leaders have been angry at the response.

"We cannot allow it to be said by history that the difference between those who lived and those who died in the great storm and flood of 2005 was nothing more than poverty, age or skin color," said Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, D-Md., past chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, at a news conference last week.

At a concert fundraiser for victims, rapper Kanye West lashed out at the president: "George Bush doesn't care about black people."

Now that most stranded residents have been moved to shelters across the country, Jackson is calling for a Marshall Plan for the region, referring to the massive U.S. aid plan that helped rebuild Western Europe after World War II.

Jackson said evacuees should be kept close to home so that families are not separated. He's also advocating a moratorium on foreclosures for affected homeowners and business owners.

Jackson is urging that blacks from New Orleans be given temporary housing on Louisiana military bases rather than being dispersed to other states.

In-state resettlement increases chances they will get first crack at rebuilding jobs — and lessens the risk they'll wear out their welcome in cities outside Louisiana that have offered to take them in, Jackson said.

"Race and class is an issue when the land is dry," he said.

New Orleans resident Karl Spain, 26, a black day laborer who made it to Baton Rouge after a three-day odyssey, said he'd be first in line for a rebuilding job in his home city but would take work wherever he could find it.

Spain said he escaped the floodwaters in New Orleans by carrying his 11-month-old daughter through waist-high water. He and his family made it to a roadside and got a ride to Baton Rouge, where a church shelter took him in.

"Right now, we don't have nothing at all," Spain said. "We're just trying to survive."

New Orleans Mayor Orders Forced Evacuation (AJC/AP)

By Cain Burdeau, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 7, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003345

NEW ORLEANS — As flood waters receded inch by inch Tuesday, New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin authorized law enforcement officers and the U.S. military to force the evacuation of all residents who refuse to heed orders to leave the dark, dangerous city.

Nagin's emergency declaration released late Tuesday targets those still in the city unless they have been designated by government officials as helping with the relief effort.

The move comes after some citizens bluntly told authorities who had come to deliver them from the flooded metropolis that they would not leave their homes and property. An estimated 10,000 residents are believed to still be in New Orleans, and some have been holed up in their homes for more than a week.

While acknowledging the emergency declaration, police Capt. Marlon Defillo said late Tuesday that forced removal of citizens had not yet begun. He said that officers who were visiting homes were still reminding people that police may not be able to rescue them if they stay.

"That would be a P.R. nightmare for us," Defillo said of any forced evacuations. "That's an absolute last resort."

Repeated telephone calls to Nagin's spokeswoman, Tami Frazier, seeking comment were not returned.

Meanwhile, engineers struggled to drain the saucer of a city of billions of gallons of water, a Herculean task that could take weeks — if they are lucky.

The Army Corps of Engineers said the timetable ranges from three weeks to nearly three months, depending on a string of variables, including rainfall, the still-unknown condition of the pumps abandoned to Hurricane Katrina, and whether the system can withstand the flotsam of broken buildings, trees, trash and corpses.

Work has also been impeded by sporadic gunfire coming from "criminals with guns," said Col. Richard Wagenaar, the Corps' chief district engineer.

The contractors are "getting used to it and that's pretty scary," Wagenaar said.

Despite complications, "we have to get the water out of the city or the nightmare will continue," said Louisiana Environmental Secretary Mike McDaniel. He said the water will be pumped into Lake Pontchartrain even though it is fouled with sewage, heavy metals, gasoline and other dangerous substances.

The pumping began after the Corps used hundreds of sandbags and rocks over the Labor Day weekend to close a 200-foot gap in the 17th Street Canal levee that burst in the aftermath of the storm and swamped 80 percent of this below sea-level city.

Following an aerial tour Tuesday, Nagin said the water was dropping ever so slightly, and he estimated that it covered only 60 percent of the city.

"Even in areas where the water was as high as the rooftops, I started to see parts of the buildings," he said, adding, "I'm starting to see rays of light."

But he also warned of the horrors that could be revealed when the waters recede. "It's going to be awful and it's going to wake the nation up again," said Nagin, who a day earlier upped his estimate of the death toll in his city to as much as 10,000.

The job to rid the city of water got off to a woefully slow start.

Once all of the city's pumping stations are running, they can move water at a rate of 29 billion gallons a day and lower the water level a half-inch per hour, or about a foot per day. But by late Tuesday afternoon, Corps officials said only three of New Orleans' normal contingent of 148 drainage pumps were operating.

With the water dropping, military and police turned their attention to evacuating the streets. Among those refusing to leave was 69-year-old John Ebanks, who waved off would-be rescuers from a porch stocked with food, mosquito spray and other supplies.

"You've got to protect your property, that's the main thing," Ebanks said. "This is all I've got. I'm pretty damn old to start over."

In St. Bernard Parish, 38-year-old Dennis Rizzuto took a break from a Monopoly game with his family to emerge from the second-floor window of his home.

He said he had plenty of water, food to last a month and a generator powering his home. "They're going to have to drag me" out, Rizzuto said.

DOJ_NMG_0003346

In a plea to holdouts who might be listening to portable radios in the powerless city, Nagin warned that the fetid water could carry disease and that natural gas was leaking all over town.

"This is not a safe environment," Nagin said. "I understand the spirit that's basically, `I don't want to abandon my city.' It's OK. Leave for a little while. Let us get you to a better place. Let us clean the city up."

To that end, the Pentagon began sending 5,000 paratroopers from the Army's storied 82nd Airborne Division to use small boats, including inflatable Zodiac craft, to launch a new search-and-rescue effort in flooded sections of the city.

Some National Guardsmen and helicopters were diverted from their search missions Tuesday to fight fires, an emerging threat in a city that is still at least a day and a half away from restoring the first running water since the storm.

A candle was blamed for starting one major blaze in the lower Garden District — a historic neighborhood of mostly wooden homes. The flames started in an abandoned brick building and spread to a neighboring apartment house. The blazes burned for hours before Chinook helicopters with water pouches were brought in to fight the blaze.

New Orleans Police Superintendent Eddie Compass said lawlessness in the city "has subsided tremendously," and officers warned that those caught looting in an area where the governor has declared an emergency can get up to 15 years in prison. About 124 prisoners filled a downtown jail set up at the city's train and bus terminal.

"We continue to get better day by day," Compass said.

The signs of hope came against increasingly angry rhetoric over the federal response as too little too late. In Washington, congressional leaders planned hearings into the aftermath of the storm.

"We need to rebuild the confidence of the American people ... in our government's ability to protect them from attack, whether it comes from nature or from terrorists," said Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn. "The government simply did not act quickly and effectively enough."

Jefferson Parish president Aaron Broussard was even more blunt.

"Bureaucracy has murdered people in the greater New Orleans area," he said on CBS' "Early Show." "Take whatever idiot they have at the top of whatever agency and give me a better idiot. Give me a caring idiot. Give me a sensitive idiot. Just don't give me the same idiot."

Five of the 13 sub-basins in New Orleans were still seriously flooded, and barges and crews were getting into place to fix levee breaches at two other spots — the London Avenue canal and the Industrial canal. The London Avenue canal is in the northwestern section of the city, the Industrial canal in the east.

The Corps is concentrating on the London Avenue canal, where workers will spend at least two weeks filling a 45-foot hole with rocks and sandbags, Wagenaar said. Once that drainage canal is fixed, then more pumps can start running.

Before work can even begin on the Industrial canal two barges pushed onto a bridge by Katrina and a sunken barge need to be removed. The Coast Guard has said 110 barges, ships and boats sank or ran aground during the storm — 67 of them in the Mississippi River, and another 43 along the coast.

The levees were deliberately breached in some spots to let the water flow back out into Lake Pontchartrain, where the water level had dropped below that inside the city.

How long it takes to drain the city could depend on the condition of the pumps — especially whether they were submerged and damaged, the Corps said. Also, the water is full of debris, and while there are screens on the pumps, it may be necessary to stop and clean them from time to time.

"We're working every avenue to do whatever we can to get things back in order," said Walter Baumy, Corps manager for the project. "We're going to accomplish the mission of getting the water out of the city."

New Orleans Levees Patched, Army Starts Pumping Water (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Heather Burke

Bloomberg, September 7, 2005

Sept. 6 (Bloomberg) -- Engineers repaired a ruptured levee in New Orleans and began pumping water from the flooded city as workers intensified the search for survivors and those killed in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0003347

Rescuers are combing through in the areas hit hardest by Katrina ``to see if we missed anybody and to gather bodies missed previously," said Brigadier General Gary Jones of the Louisiana National Guard. Officials estimated that some 10,000 people still need rescuing in the city.

``We are starting to see some significant progress," New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said today in a televised news conference. ``The individuals we are pulling out are in pretty bad shape," Nagin said. ``Most of them are delirious, they're dehydrated."

Rescuers are confronted with a community awash in filth, as fires broke out around the city, including the historic Garden District. The water in New Orleans is fouled by pesticides, gasoline, metals and fecal waste, said Mike McDaniel, secretary of the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality.

As many as 160,000 homes are submerged, McDaniel said. Oil leaking from underground fuel tanks, submerged vehicles and other equipment have made the area a vast toxic waste site, McDaniel said. ``It adds up to a solid sheen over the area," he said.

Thousands Presumed Dead

Thousands are presumed dead in what officials called the worst natural disaster in U.S. history. Katrina ripped into the north coast of the Gulf of Mexico on Aug. 29, breaching levees that protected New Orleans. About 80 percent of the city, which lies below sea level, was under water as deep as 20 feet. The storm left a $100 billion trail of destruction, according to Risk Management Solutions Inc., an insurance-industry consultant.

The hurricane may be the deadliest U.S. storm since one that swept through Galveston, Texas, in 1900, killing an estimated 8,000 to 12,000. The 1906 San Francisco earthquake and fire killed 5,000 to 6,000.

Louisiana has recorded 71 dead so far, said Bob Johannessen, a spokesman for the state Health and Hospitals Department. Mississippi officials estimate that 161 were killed in the state.

Temporary Morgue

Louisiana set up a temporary morgue in St. Gabriel Parish, about 50 miles north of New Orleans, which can hold about 1,000 bodies and can be expanded, Johannessen said.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency has allocated more than $2.87 billion in aid, including purchases of relief supplies, construction of camps and military evacuations, said spokesman David Passey.

As of 1 p.m. Washington time today, 32,000 people had been rescued and 182,000 people were housed in 559 shelters, the Department of Homeland Security said.

The department said 15,000 active-duty military, 43,000 National Guard members, 4,000 Coast Guard personnel and 7,000 FEMA responders were on the ground in the hurricane-stricken areas.

Two thousand people have been evacuated to hospitals, U.S. Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt said today.

While many people are being lifted by helicopter from damaged homes and off rooftops, some residents have refused to leave, doubting they'll be allowed back.

Coaxing People to Leave

Louisiana Governor Kathleen Blanco said state officials are bringing in chaplains and other people to persuade people to leave their homes.

``Some of them are in shock, they're scared," Blanco told reporters today.

About 356 U.S. Public Health Service workers and 340 disease trackers from the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention will be working in shelters, U.S. officials said in a press conference in Baton Rouge, Louisiana.

Health officials are investigating outbreaks of diarrhea at Texas shelters for people displaced by the storm, CDC Director Julie Gerberding said. They are also concerned about possible outbreaks of typhoid and respiratory diseases, she said.

Engineers are pumping water from the flooded areas of New Orleans back into Lake Pontchartrain after patching the levee at the city's 17th Street Canal yesterday, said Jason Binet, a civil engineer with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. Today, the repaired breach will be fortified with layers of stone and asphalt, Binet said.

DOJ_NMG_0003348

About 60 percent of the city is still under water, Corps of Engineers officials said today at a press conference. They estimate it will take 24 to 80 days to drain the city.

Closing Ruptures

Two ruptures remain at the London Avenue Canal. Engineers are building a dike out of rocks at the head of canal to stop the water flowing, then will use steel sheets to fix the breaches, officials said.

Troops are using portable pumps to remove the water, Binet said. The permanent pumps need to be fixed because portable ones can't reach the city's center, he said. Some pump stations are under water, and their electrical machinery has to dry out, he said.

The city of almost 500,000 depends on pumps and levees to keep dry. The walls shield New Orleans from the Mississippi River to the south and the Lake Pontchartrain to the north.

Open the Port

The Port of New Orleans, the biggest U.S. port by tonnage handled, opened to Hurricane Katrina relief ships today and commercial shipments may resume in two weeks.

BellSouth Corp. is working to restore telephone lines as it also contends with 6,500 employees who live in the areas along the Gulf coast. The company has set up tent cities in Baton Rogue and Kenner, Louisiana, and Gulfport, Mississippi, to provid e workers with food, beds, and a staging area for those working to restore lines.

About 810,000 lines in Mississippi, Louisiana and Alabama were knocked out, and 19 central offices were shut by the storm, Atlanta-based BellSouth said in a statement today. The company said it may have to pay as much as $600 million to fix its network.

About 946,000 people remained without power in the Gulf region today, according to figures released by Entergy Corp., Southern Co., Cleco Corp. and the Energy Department.

New Orleans began rotating police officers, firefighters and emergency-medical workers on five-day rest periods. About 315 firefighters from New York are in New Orleans, said Captain John Hellmers of the New Orleans Fire Department. The New Yorkers are manning 12 New Orleans fire trucks. Firefighters have handled eight fires in the city today, Hellmers said.

Failing to Report

The police department said as many as 500 of its 1,600 officers have failed to report for work. Many may be searching for family members after losing their homes, New Orleans Police Deputy Chief Warren Riley said during a televised press conference.

In Washington, lawmakers from both parties criticized the government, saying officials failed to send emergency aid fast enough. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid joined Senator Hillary Clinton to ask President George W. Bush to create a special commission to investigate.

Bush said he will call for a probe into how the federal government responded to the disaster.

``We want to make sure we can respond properly," Bush said after a meeting with his Cabinet today at the White House. ``If things went wrong, we'll correct" them.

Help From Cheney

Bush said he will send Vice President Dick Cheney to the area later this week to ``help me determine" whether the government is meeting its goals in the search for survivors and in restoring public services.

The Senate will begin public hearings as early as next week into the ``failures of all levels of government" in the response to Hurricane Katrina, said Susan Collins, a Maine Republican and chairwoman of the Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee.

The U.S. Federal Reserve should hold off on increasing interest rates later this month to allay any consumer doubts about the nation's economic health, said Senator Charles Grassley, an Iowa Republican and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

``It would probably bring some confidence to people that are concerned about the overall economy and not hurt our fight against inflation," Grassley said.

DOJ_NMG_0003349

Scenes of the city's devastation, played out on cable news channels, Web sites and in newspapers, led Americans to donate at least $500 million toward Katrina relief, according to the Chronicle of Philanthropy.

Days of Chaos

The first days following the storm were marred by chaos and lawlessness, as police focused on saving people. Military officials say crime is now under control. Curfews are in effect in several parishes, said Lieutenant Kevin Cowan of the Louisiana emergency preparedness office. Federal agents arrested a 20-year- old man for firing a handgun at a military rescue helicopter in New Orleans, said U.S. Attorney Jim Letten. The man was arraigned in Baton Rouge today, charged with the first federal crime related to Katrina, Letten said.

The storm ravaged energy production in the Gulf of Mexico, source of about a third of the oil consumed in the U.S. and about one-fifth of the natural gas.

Katrina shut 870,374 barrels of daily oil output, or 58 percent of normal Gulf production, according to a report from the U.S. Minerals Management Service in Washington. Daily oil output rose 173,307 barrels from yesterday.

The average U.S. pump price for regular gasoline fell to $3.041 a gallon today from a record $3.057 a gallon yesterday, according to the American Automobile Association. Prices range from $3.35 a gallon in Washington, D.C., to $2.74 in Louisiana, according to the AAA.

Storms Brewing

In the Atlantic Ocean, other storms are brewing. Hurricane Maria, with maximum sustained winds of about 100 mph (160 kph) was 545 miles (875 kilometers) east-northeast of Bermuda as of 11 a.m. New York time, the National Hurricane Center said. Maria, which was weakening, is forecast to remain at sea.

Tropical storm Nate was about 275 miles (440 km) south- southwest of Bermuda and showing little movement, the hurricane center said. It has top winds of about 60 mph.

Tropical-storm warnings were issued along Florida's eastern coast for yet another storm, as yet unnamed, that and may strengthen tomorrow, the hurricane center said. It was about 180 miles (290 km) southeast of Cape Canaveral, Florida, and likely to move slowly north-northwest, the center said.

Huge Pumps Start Draining Toxic Floodwater From City Runoff Flowing Into Pontchartrain May Threaten Lake's Health (USAT)

By Peter Eisler, Tom Kenworthy And Traci Watson

USA Today, September 7, 2005

Engineers fired up a few of New Orleans' giant pump stations Tuesday to drain flood water into Lake Pontchartrain, a task that will pour millions of gallons of toxic runoff into the lake in the coming weeks.

Officials from the Army Corps of Engineers said it should take from 24 to 80 days to drain the bowl-shaped city completely. They said about 60% of New Orleans remains under water, down from 80% that was submerged after flood walls around the city gave way last week in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

“We're getting access to areas we could not get to, and that's going to help us greatly,” said Walter Baumy, chief engineer for the corps' New Orleans district. Crews have sealed off the biggest breaches in the city's flood walls. They started up four major pump stations and a few smaller ones — about a quarter of the 40 or so pumps. “It's not a large (pumping) capacity at this point … but at least it's progress.”

The corps still could not say how long it would be until the city is dry enough to allow people to return to their homes and begin reconstruction. There's simply too much water on the ground to do a credible damage assessment.

“We can't even get in there to have a chance to look at that and see the condition of the infrastructure,” said Al Naomi, another corps engineer.

New Orleans sits largely below sea level. The city is ringed by Lake Pontchartrain, the Mississippi River and the marshes of the Gulf of Mexico, so floodwater can't flow out on its own. A 350-mile system of levees and flood walls protects the city, but Katrina caused three major breaches and several smaller ones. The massive pumps that normally push rain and floodwaters out to the lake were overwhelmed.

DOJ_NMG_0003350

Engineers from the corps and the state and local agencies that help maintain the levee and drainage systems now face an unprecedented challenge. Because the floodwaters are filled with debris, it's hard to predict how efficiently the pumps will be able to empty the city. Also, the water is filled with sewage overflows, petrochemicals from ruptured fuel tanks and other toxic wastes. So no one knows how much damage Lake Pontchartrain will suffer when millions of gallons of that fetid water are pumped into the lake.

State and federal environmental teams are assessing contamination levels. They will monitor water quality in the lake as the city is drained, said Donna Myers, chief of national water quality assessment at the U.S. Geological Survey (USGS). Until the results are in, she added, it's tough to gauge the impact. “It's a large volume of water, and there are many contaminant sources,” Myers said, and “we're not sure how this all moves together. We don't know if there are very high (contamination) levels.”

Myers and Jeff Williams, another USGS scientist, noted that the lake already is polluted. Still, it is a critical estuary that supports important fisheries and wildlife habitat. “Clearly, there is cause for concern” about the impact of the floodwaters, Williams said. “How much of a negative impact … we are not in a position to say.”

Harold Zeliger, a chemical toxicology consultant in Saratoga, N.Y., predicted “a huge environmental impact” and offered a “best-guess estimate” that it would take the lake three to five years to recover.

The more immediate concern was draining the city. To that end, the federal Environmental Protection Agency and its state counterpart have issued the corps temporary permits to immediately pump floodwater into Pontchartrain. Environmental groups, such as the local Sierra Club branch, said they did not object.

Engineers punched holes in several levees in parts of the city where flood levels were higher than the water in drainage canals leading to Pontchartrain. That allowed water to flow out of those neighborhoods; some saw floodwaters drop by 5 feet, Baumy said. Now, engineers are closing those holes and sealing off other canals where damaged flood walls allowed the lake's waters to flow into the city.

Engineers also are evaluating pumping stations. One major station, where a breached flood wall on the 17th Street Canal allowed flooding, was shut down due to debris, Baumy said. That pump and others are expected to be on line later this week.

The intentional breaches bring “a more dramatic and appreciable lowering of the water,” said Don Basham, the corps' construction chief. Now that water levels inside and outside the levees have equalized, the rest of the flooding will have to be pumped out, he added, so the drawdown from now on will be “less dramatic.”

Flooding Recedes In New Orleans; U.S. Inquiry Is Set (NYT)

By Jere Longman And Sewell Chan

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 6 - The floodwaters began to drain fitfully from this crippled city on Tuesday as a handful of pumps came back into operation. But with growing concerns about gas leaks, fires, toxic water and diseases spread by mosquitoes, Mayor C. Ray Nagin said he wanted to ratchet up pressure on the estimated 5,000 to 10,000 remaining citizens to leave.

Mr. Nagin said he was reissuing a mandatory evacuation order and urged stragglers to leave immediately, saying he did not want possible explosions and disease to increase a death toll that, Lt. David Benelli, president of the Police Association of New Orleans, said could reach 2,000 to 20,000.

In Washington, President Bush promised an investigation into what went wrong in the response to Hurricane Katrina and planned to dispatch Vice President Dick Cheney to the Gulf Coast to cut through any bureaucratic obstacles slowing the recovery. [Page A17.]

The Senate and the House also announced their own investigation into the government's response, with Senator Susan Collins of Maine, a leading Republican, calling the response "woefully inadequate."

"If our system did such a poor job when there was no enemy," said Ms. Collins, chairwoman of the Homeland Security Committee, "how would the federal, state and local governments have coped with a terrorist attack that provided no advance warning and that was intent on causing as much death and destruction as possible?"

The committee is preparing for public hearings next week on response to the storm.

DOJ_NMG_0003351

Officials said about 60 percent of New Orleans was still under water, but that was down from a peak of about 80 percent. Most of the gain came because the Army Corps of Engineers began opening gaps in the city's levees after the water level in surrounding bodies of water fell. The holes ensured that the levees - designed to keep water out of the below-sea-level city - would not hold it in.

Four of the approximately 40 pumping stations in the New Orleans area were running on Tuesday at least at partial capacity, officials said, but haltingly; a fifth giant one, at the 17th Street Canal, site of a major levee breach, started but had to be shut off again because the pumps sucked in debris.

Officials said it would take 24 days to pump the water from an eastern section of New Orleans and 80 days to clear the flooding from Chalmette, the nearby seat of St. Bernard Parish.

The receding waters were expected to reveal ever more bodies, to be identified by a team of forensic pathologists, medical examiners, coroners and morticians from local funeral homes.

"We are going to take one deceased victim at a time and count one at a time," said Robert Johannessen, a spokesman for Louisiana's Department of Health and Hospitals. Of the process of identifying the bodies, Mr. Johannessen said, "It could take days, it could take years, it could take lifetimes."

The official death toll in Louisiana stood at 83, but state officials said the counting had only begun. In Mississippi, Gov. Haley Barbour announced Tuesday evening that the state's "unofficial but credible estimate" of the death toll was at 196, but that it was still rising. Mr. Barbour said that more than a quarter of the deaths had been reported in inland counties, not along the coast.

Evacuees continued to come back into Jefferson Parish to check on their homes, overwhelming roads and bridges. Interstate 10, which connects Baton Rouge and New Orleans, was backed up for about five miles.

Louisiana officials offered a first glimpse at the environmental wreckage. The state secretary of environmental quality, Michael D. McDaniel, said that wildlife habitats along hundreds of miles of coastline had been destroyed and that the hurricane exacerbated the slow coastal erosion that had already made the coast more vulnerable to hurricanes.

Mr. McDaniel said that there was no alternative to pumping billions of gallons of brackish water back into Lake Pontchartrain, but that it was too early to determine the harmfulness of the toxins and pollutants that were being slowly sifted out of New Orleans.

"I know there's been a lot of discussion about 'toxic soup' and 'witch's brew,' " he said. "I've seen no data to date that backs up that kind of statement. We do know and would expect that there are a lot of bacteriological contaminants in the water."

In New Orleans, four major fires had broken out by Tuesday morning and gas leaks were numerous, Mayor Nagin said.

"I don't want make any statement that suggests I'm giving up on New Orleans," he said at a news conference. "But it's a very volatile situation in the city right now. There's lots of oil on the water and there's gas leaks where it's bubbling up, and there's fire on top of that. If those two unite, God bless us. I don't know what's going to happen."

Mr. Nagin said in an interview that a new evacuation order would eliminate exemptions that had allowed people to stay in hotels and hospitals. Essentially, the city will be closed to everyone but law enforcement, military, and public safety and health officials while it is drained of water and utilities are restored. The 82nd Airborne Division closed a Hyatt hotel to civilians on Tuesday afternoon.

The new evacuation order has been drafted and will be issued shortly, Mr. Nagin said, even though Louisiana state officials question his authority to issue such a command. "I don't care, I'm doing it," he said. "We have to get people out."

That meant people were once again bound to the city's convention center, where 25,000 people or more had huddled in desperate conditions for days. At St. Charles and Louisiana Avenues, about two dozen people were patted down by federal customs officials and placed on a bus for the convention center, where they were to be airlifted out of town.

Told that some people were waiting as long as three hours at the convention center before being flown out, Mr. Nagin said that was a considerable improvement over the five days that it took some people to be evacuated last week.

Lucas Russ, 65, a retired school district employee, said, "It's getting nasty and really smelly," as he prepared to board a bus with a bag of his belongings.

DOJ_NMG_0003352

Mr. Russ said that National Guard troops had told him he had to leave and that he would receive no more food and water. Guard officials denied that, and Mr. Nagin said that many evacuees were delirious, severely dehydrated, missing their medication and in need of immediate medical attention.

The mayor said that the National Guard had asked him whether handing out sustenance provisions would encourage people to stay, but that his response was, "Do not harm anyone, do not allow anyone to starve, do not allow anyone to go without water and always treat everyone with respect."

That left officials with the question of how to strongly encourage holdouts to leave. No one is being forced to leave yet, but officials said that could change.

"We may have to force people out to save their lives, if we get to that point," said P. Edwin Compass III, superintendent of police. "I'm using this as a tactic to scare people into leaving."

Brig. Gen. Michael P. Fleming, an Army National Guard commander said of a forced evacuation: "It's a tough decision. Between the mayor and governor, if they decide that's what's to be done, the New Orleans Police Department, the state police and National Guard would be part of it. We would help them implement it if we're called on to do so."

With assistance from 4,000 National Guard troops and another 4,000 troops from the 82nd Airborne, New Orleans was now secure and "locked down," with looting reduced to minimal levels, said Warren J. Riley, the deputy superintendent of the New Orleans police.

Mr. Nagin said, "I think we're turning the corner."

Still, parts of the city, like the Ninth Ward and New Orleans East, along with Chalmette in neighboring St. Bernard Parish, remain inundated, and it could take two months to get electricity fully restored to the hardest-hit areas, officials said. Police officers and firefighters have been inoculated against hepatitis, cholera, typhoid, tetanus and diphtheria.

The spine of St. Charles Avenue, with its broken canopy of oak trees and its streetcar tracks laced with downed power lines, provided a look at the successes and failures of New Orleans's recovery effort on Tuesday. Near St. Charles and Josephine Street, a fire consumed two city blocks, officials from the Oklahoma National Guard said.

At Lee Circle, Victor Mejia, 58, a janitor, stood in the shade and said he had no intention of leaving. "I live here," he said. "Where am I going to go?"

With attention turning to what had gone wrong, Mr. Nagin said he wanted an independent assessment of the missteps, saying he believed the matter was beyond the ability of politicians to solve. He blamed a lack of coordination, a rescue plan that was slow to be carried out and what he called a "two-step" danced by federal and state officials to determine who was in charge.

The mayor said he welcomed any effort to criticize his own handling of the crisis.

"My big question to anybody who's trying to shift the blame is, 'Where were you?' " Mr. Nagin said. "I was here. I know what happened. I walked among the people in the Superdome and in the convention center. I saw babies dying. I saw old people so tired, they said, 'Just let me lay down and die.' They can talk that, but bring it on. I'm ready for it."

No Photographing the Dead

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 6 (Reuters) - The Federal Emergency Management Agency said on Tuesday that it did not want news photographers to take pictures of the dead as they were recovered in New Orleans.

FEMA rejected requests from journalists to accompany rescue boats.

An agency spokeswoman said that "the recovery of the victims is being treated with dignity and the utmost respect."

FEMA Director Faces His Own Storm Of Controversy (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — In his online résumé, Michael Brown touts his experience dealing with hurricanes and wildfires. He talks of being a state legislative committee director and an assistant city manager. He doesn't mention the decade he spent as chief rules enforcer for the Arabian Horse Association.

The horse job, which he left in 2000, is now fodder for critics who say Brown, head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), has botched the Katrina relief operation. Those critics include Republicans, Democrats and newspapers.

DOJ_NMG_0003353

President Bush appointed a FEMA director who had “absolutely no credentials” for the job, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said Tuesday.

“The more one learns about him,” Republican commentator William Kristol said on Fox News Sunday, “one is surprised that he's in that job in the first place.”

Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, however, said FEMA had a disaster plan in place, but Louisiana leaders did not implement it. “Brown is getting a bad rap,” he said.

More not-so-bad news for Brown: Only 29% in a new USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll said that any top federal officials handling relief efforts should be fired.

Brown, 50, an Oklahoma native, was active in Republican politics and ran unsuccessfully for Congress in 1988. He practiced law in Oklahoma and Colorado before taking the job with the horse association.

He came to the Bush administration through Joe Allbaugh, a college friend of Brown's who was Bush's chief of staff when he was Texas governor and his campaign manager in 2000.

Allbaugh became FEMA director in 2001, when Bush took office, and hired Brown as general counsel. Brown was promoted to deputy director and by 2003 had the top job, after Allbaugh left for the private sector.

Brown says he has led the federal government's response to more than 160 disasters and emergencies. He assured the public last week that “the full force of the U.S. government” was being brought to bear in “an unprecedented response” to the disaster.

On national TV Thursday, Bush called him “Brownie” and said he was doing “a heck of a job.” Brown himself was all over TV, four networks on Friday morning alone.

But his appearances were contentious. He said people were “getting the help they need” and called New Orleans security “pretty darn good,” contradicting reports and video from the scene. He was forced to explain why, despite extensive TV coverage, he didn't know that thousands of people were stranded without food or water at the New Orleans Convention Center.

“Every official at the Federal Emergency Management Agency should be fired, Director Michael Brown especially,” the New Orleans Times-Picayune newspaper said Sunday in an “open letter” to Bush.

By then, Brown had vanished from sight, and his boss, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, had become the face of the federal response. Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said Brown briefs the media but otherwise is focused on his mission: “aiding those in need and getting about the reconstruction and rebuilding process.”

Bush and other leaders were non-committal Tuesday about Brown's future. Asked if he was going to fire anyone, Bush replied, “I'm going to find out over time what went right and what went wrong.”

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., told NBC “it's too early to judge” whether Brown should go. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., said “there needs to be some accountability” for the federal failures, but “where it starts and who it should be, I will expect the administration to handle.”

Havidn Rodrguez, director of the Disaster Research Center at the University of Delaware, said FEMA lost autonomy, money, focus and direct access to the president when it was folded into the mammoth new Department of Homeland Security in 2003. “These are issues that go well beyond one person,” he said.

Clinton introduced a bill Tuesday that would separate FEMA from Homeland Security. It would also require FEMA directors to have emergency- management experience.

Michael DeWayne Brown: Facing Blame In A Disaster (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 6 - Speaking at a Florida university last year, Michael D. Brown, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, recalled his small-town Oklahoma upbringing and offered advice he said few graduation speakers would offer.

"Everything in life is not perfect," Mr. Brown said. "Expect to make those mistakes. Expect to fall down every now and then. And expect to occasionally fail at something."

Mr. Brown may be calling on those maxims himself today, in his second week as on-the-ground manager of the largest disaster response in American history. He has faced two simultaneous challenges - coordinating 14 federal agencies with state and local counterparts under grueling conditions, and fending off criticism from those who say that FEMA has failed and put the blame squarely on him.

By all accounts, it was not experience in managing disasters that brought Mr. Brown, 50, a lawyer from Oklahoma, to FEMA in 2001 as general counsel. It was his 30-year friendship with Joe M. Allbaugh, who managed President Bush's 2000 presidential campaign and became his first director of the emergency agency..

But when pressed yet again to give his qualifications at a news conference on Monday, Mr. Brown gave a practiced answer, running through his learning curve as general counsel, then deputy director and finally, since 2003, director of FEMA.

He has overseen the response to 164 presidentially declared disasters, he said, including California wildfires, a rash of tornadoes in the Midwest several years ago and the four Florida hurricanes last year. "So, yes," he said, "I've been through a few disasters in my life."

Mr. Brown's spokeswoman, Natalie Rule, added on Tuesday that he oversaw an agency with a lot of experience in disaster management. "What you need is what he is - a leader who can manage budget, personnel and policy."

Nonetheless, Mr. Brown has been a hands-on manager, trudging through each new scene of devastation dispensing aid and encouragement. Since Hurricane Katrina, he has been a constant presence on television, rattling off statistics on people rescued and meals delivered.

But he stunned several national television interviewers last week with the admission that he did not know about the 20,000 evacuees at the convention center in New Orleans until Thursday, 24 hours after it was featured in news reports.

Senator Mary L. Landrieu offered a devastating critique on Friday in Baton Rouge. "I have been telling him from the moment he arrived about the urgency of the situation," she said. "I just have to tell you that he had a difficult time understanding the enormity of the task before us."

Since then, the news for Mr. Brown has not gotten better. The Times-Picayune, Louisiana's largest newspaper, asked Mr. Bush in an open letter to clean house at FEMA, calling "especially" for the ouster of Mr. Brown. On Monday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff placed the Coast Guard's chief of staff, Vice Admiral Thad W. Allen, in charge of the New Orleans relief effort, clearly a move to beef up management where the problems have been most severe. And on Tuesday, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, in calling for FEMA to be made a separate cabinet-level agency, said its director should have emergency management experience.

Mr. Brown's friends say they have cringed watching the criticism of a man they describe as compassionate and dedicated to difficult work.

Mary Ann Karns, who worked as city attorney in Edmond, Okla., in the 1970's when Mr. Brown was her assistant, said, "He was interested in politics not for glory and not for power, but because he wanted to make things better for people."

Michael DeWayne Brown was born on Nov. 11, 1954 in Guymon, Okla. He and his wife, Tamara, have two grown children, Jared and Amy. His friends say he is an admirer of Theodore Roosevelt, an avid hiker and fly fisherman, and a collector of antique maps of the West.

In addition to his brief experience as a city official, Mr. Brown has practiced law, worked for the Oklahoma State Senate and served as counsel to an insurance company. He lost a race for Congress in 1988. But the job he did for a decade before joining FEMA is curiously omitted from his online agency résumé.

From 1991 to 2001, as commissioner of the International Arabian Horse Association, Mr. Brown enforced the rules administered by judges at the association's 300 annual horse shows. His decisions provoked a number of lawsuits, including one from David Boggs, a trainer whom Mr. Brown accused of having cosmetic surgery performed on horses.

Mr. Brown's critics in the horse world say he was forced to resign in January 2001 because association officers were upset that he had accepted donations to a personal legal defense fund. But Andy Lester, a friend of Mr. Brown's and his lawyer, said that his departure was "negotiated" and that there was no wrongdoing.

An ethics review panel upheld the charges against Mr. Boggs and suspended him for five years.

DOJ_NMG_0003355

Mr. Lester said that Mr. Brown showed backbone in pursuing the charges despite the controversy that erupted in the horse industry.

"He did not fold under pressure," Mr. Lester said. By 2001, Mr. Brown was tired of the uproar and was ready to move on, said Tom Connelly, the president of the horse association at the time. He had often spoken of the possibility of a Washington job should Mr. Bush become president, Mr. Connelly recalled.

"What has surprised me is that he rose to the position he has now so quickly," Mr. Connelly said. "But when he started with the association, he didn't know horses. And he caught up in a hurry."

Right City, Wrong State (CNN)

CNN.com, September 7, 2005

(CNN) -- Add geography to the growing list of FEMA fumbles.

A South Carolina health official said his colleagues scrambled Tuesday when FEMA gave only a half-hour notice to prepare for the arrival of a plane carrying as many as 180 evacuees to Charleston.

But the plane, instead, landed in Charleston, West Virginia, 400 miles away.

It was not known whether arrangements have been made to care for the evacuees or transport them to the correct destination.

A call seeking comment from FEMA was not immediately returned.

"We called in all the available resources," said Dr. John Simkovich, director of public health for the South Carolina Department of Health and Environmental Control.

"They responded within 30 minutes, which is phenomenal, to meet the needs of the citizens coming in from Louisiana," he said.

Simkovich said that the agency had described some of the evacuees as needing "some minor treatment ... possibly some major treatment."

"Unfortunately, the plane did not come in," Simkovich said. "There was a mistake in the system, coming out through FEMA, that we did not receive the aircraft this afternoon. It went to Charleston, West Virginia."

A line of buses and ambulances idled behind him at Charleston International Airport as he described what happened.

"This is a 'no event' for today," Simkovich said.

Coast Guard's Chief Of Staff To Assist FEMA Head Brown (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

With Michael D. Brown, the embattled public face of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, taking harsh criticism for the slow federal response to Hurricane Katrina, the secretary of homeland security this week assigned a top Coast Guard official to help bail him out.

Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen, the Coast Guard's chief of staff, was assigned on Monday to be Brown's deputy and to take over operational control of the search-and-rescue and recovery efforts along the Gulf Coast. The unprecedented task of coordinating the massive effort was handed off to a leader and expert who was described by colleagues as unflappable, engaging and intensely organized.

Allen is also familiar with the inner workings of the Department of Homeland Security, where the Coast Guard has landed alongside FEMA as one of the designated main protectors of the United States. Allen has been one of the primary shepherds of change at the Coast Guard since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and has been praised for his ability to reach out to other agencies to develop "big-picture" approaches to homeland defense.

Retired Adm. James M. Loy, former commandant of the Coast Guard and former deputy secretary of Homeland Security, said yesterday that Allen has the experience to help steer the federal response to the Katrina catastrophe in the right direction after early shortfalls. When Loy was the Coast Guard chief of staff from 1996 to 1998, Allen was his resource director, and Loy said he "always brings a new idea per minute to the table as far as how to grapple with difficult situations."

DOJ_NMG_0003356

DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff handpicked Allen to essentially lead the federal recovery efforts in New Orleans. As Brown's deputy, Allen will work with Army Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honore -- head of the military's Joint Task Force Katrina -- to oversee, manage and lead all military and civilian recovery efforts.

Loy also praised Allen's experience, which ranges from being a sailor in the early part of his career to leading the Coast Guard's transition into the Department of Homeland Security. Allen also led the Coast Guard's maritime response to the Sept. 11 attacks, mobilizing his Atlantic forces to shut down major seaports and to control U.S. waters.

Since then, Allen has been working on transforming the Coast Guard's dominant missions of drug interdiction and migrant issues to protecting the borders from terrorism.

"If I was confronted with a multi-stakeholder nightmare, Thad Allen is the guy I would want to have put in charge of coming up with the solution that would keep the stakeholders engaged, participating and focused on the chore at hand," said Loy, who is now a senior counselor at the Cohen Group in Washington.

The task in Louisiana and Mississippi is in some ways uniquely suited for the Coast Guard, which is routinely involved in search-and-rescue, recovery, waterway reconstitution and pollution cleanup efforts. The Coast Guard has rescued thousands of people stranded last week as a result of the hurricane and subsequent flooding.

Allen, 56, is a native of Tucson, and he graduated from the U.S. Coast Guard Academy in 1971. He later went on to earn a master's degree in Public Administration from George Washington University and a master of science degree from the Sloan School of Management at MIT.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, Allen provided the Coast Guard with an oral history of the day's events, discussing the decision to block the Potomac River and secure ports in New York and Boston. He spoke of the need to "keep cool" and "not get excited about everything," according to a transcript of the interview.

"I guess what I'm saying was I wasn't overcome by the magnitude of the event where it paralyzed or impacted my thinking," Allen said in the March 2002 interview. "I was treating it like I would a major catastrophe because we get involved in those over our career a lot. This was an order of magnitude that nobody could imagine. But nonetheless you get on task and you start working."

Adm. Thomas H. Collins, the Coast Guard's commandant, said yesterday that Allen will make a great deputy principal federal official, the official title of Brown's deputy.

"The Coast Guard is blessed with many talented personnel," Collins said in a statement. "Vice Admiral Allen is a tested leader and knows how to manage a crisis. We're glad we could send one of our best to help [Brown] manage the extraordinary challenges of this rescue and recovery effort."

Cmdr. Brendan McPherson, who was Allen's public affairs officer on 9/11 and is now at Coast Guard headquarters in Washington, said Allen is an extremely effective leader, especially in crisis situations.

"He has an amazing ability to quickly recognize a situation that needs leadership, that needs action, and then to develop a plan that can be quickly implemented," McPherson said, adding he was impressed with Allen during and after the terrorist attacks. "He quickly identified that, pulled in the resources that he needed, developed a plan, and then implemented a plan to secure the maritime borders."

Allen lives with his wife, Pamela, in Potomac, and they have three grown children and two grandchildren. The couple was away for the past week and returned to learn that Allen was going to be assigned to Louisiana. Their 30th wedding anniversary is in October, and Pamela Allen is not sure he will be home to celebrate.

"We've been sitting back wanting to help, and he was given the privilege of being able to help," said Pamela Allen, who is assistant dean for academic and career services at the George Mason University School of Management.

"He's been in the Coast Guard his entire life, and one of the things he does and does well is what the Coast Guard motto is, be always prepared. He takes every new event and gets down and starts working and sees it to its end."

FEMA Chief Sent Help Only When Storm Ended (AP)

By TED BRIDIS

The AP, September 6, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0003357

WASHINGTON - The top U.S. disaster official waited hours after Hurricane Katrina struck the Gulf Coast before he proposed to his boss sending at least 1,000 Homeland Security workers into the region to support rescuers, internal documents show.

Part of the mission, according to the documents obtained by The Associated Press, was to "convey a positive image" about the government's response for victims.

Acknowledging that such a move would take two days, Michael Brown, director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, sought the approval from Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff roughly five hours after Katrina made landfall on Aug. 29.

Before then, FEMA had positioned smaller rescue and communications teams across the Gulf Coast. But officials acknowledged the first department-wide appeal for help came only as the storm raged.

Brown's memo to Chertoff described Katrina as "this near catastrophic event" but otherwise lacked any urgent language. The memo politely ended, "Thank you for your consideration in helping us to meet our responsibilities."

The initial responses of the government and Brown came under escalating criticism as the breadth of destruction and death grew. President Bush and Congress on Tuesday pledged separate investigations into the federal response to Katrina. "Governments at all levels failed," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine.

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said Brown had positioned front-line rescue teams and Coast Guard helicopters before the storm. Brown's memo on Aug. 29 aimed to assemble the necessary federal work force to support the rescues, establish communications, and coordinate with victims and community groups, Knocke said.

Instead of rescuing people or recovering bodies, these employees would focus on helping victims find the help they needed, he said.

"There will be plenty of time to assess what worked and what didn't work," Knocke said. "Clearly there will be time for blame to be assigned and to learn from some of the successful efforts."

Brown's memo told employees that among their duties, they would be expected to "convey a positive image of disaster operations to government officials, community organizations and the general public."

"FEMA response and recovery operations are a top priority of the department and as we know, one of yours," Brown wrote Chertoff. He proposed sending 1,000 Homeland Security Department employees within 48 hours and 2,000 within seven days.

Knocke said the 48-hour period indicated for the Homeland employees was to ensure they had adequate training. "They were training to help the lifesavers," Knocke said.

Employees required a supervisor's approval and at least 24 hours of disaster training in Maryland, Florida or Georgia. "You must be physically able to work in a disaster area without refrigeration for medications and have the ability to work in the outdoors all day," Brown wrote.

The same day Brown wrote Chertoff, Brown also urged local fire and rescue departments outside Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi not to send trucks or emergency workers into disaster areas without an explicit request for help from state or local governments. Brown said it was vital to coordinate fire and rescue efforts.

Sen. Barbara Mikulski, D-Md., said Tuesday that Brown should resign.

After a senators-only briefing by Chertoff and other Cabinet members, Sen. Charles Schumer said lawmakers weren't getting their questions answered.

"What people up there want to know, Democrats and Republicans, is what is the challenge ahead, how are you handling that and what did you do wrong in the past," said Schumer, D-N.Y.

Meanwhile, the airline industry said the government's request for help evacuating storm victims didn't come until late Thursday afternoon. The president of the Air Transport Association, James May, said the Homeland Security Department called then to ask whether the group could participate in an airlift for refugees.

Witt Makes Presence Known In La. (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, September 7, 2005

It didn't take long for James Lee Witt, the former head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), to throw his weight around in hurricane-ravaged Louisiana.

Witt, who headed FEMA during the Clinton administration, has been hired by Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D) to help coordinate state and federal responses to the natural disaster.

Blanco introduced Witt to President Bush on Monday, according to a source who has spoken with Witt. Bush promised Witt whatever support he needed and said that Mike Brown, FEMA's embattled director, is his man in charge.

Andrew Card, Bush's chief of staff, called Witt to give him his home phone number and reiterate Bush's support.

According to the source, Witt told Brown, "Mike, you're going to do your job, and I'm going to make you do your job. And I'm going to show you how to do your job."

Many lawmakers on both sides of the aisle are pleased that Witt, who contributed thousands of dollars to congressional Democrats last year, is involved in the disaster-relief effort.

Over the past several years, GOP lawmakers have sought Witt's counsel, including Reps. Bill Shuster (Pa.), Christopher Shays (Conn.) and Jerry Lewis (Calif.).

"James Lee Witt was an outstanding director of FEMA and is a good choice by the governor, regardless of the activities of FEMA," said former Rep. Bob Livingston (R-La.), who is now a top lobbyist.

Witt met with Shuster and Shays earlier this summer to discuss the fallout of removing FEMA's emergency-preparedness function from its mission.

As fires raged in his congressional district in 2003, Lewis — who had chaired the appropriations subcommittee that funds FEMA when Witt was FEMA's chief — became frustrated with the agency because it did not respond to the disaster as quickly as it should have, said Lewis spokesman Jim Specht.

"[Lewis's] biggest concern was that FEMA hadn't been able to come up with a plan" to prepare for a disaster, Specht added.

Lewis relied on Witt to help cajole FEMA's bureaucracy to plan for what could have become a federal disaster area. Lewis and Brown eventually toured the vicinity in a helicopter.

After a week of mixed signals and non-communication, state and federal officials began holding joint press conferences, set up a joint command structure, worked to restore cell-phone coverage to the area and prepared to restore electrical power in New Orleans by stationing an additional 1,000 firefighters in case there were fires when the power came on.

For the first 45 to 60 days, Witt is working on a pro-bono basis for the state of Louisiana. After that, a contract will be negotiated, said a spokeswoman for Witt.

The spokeswoman added, "Witt is going to be the Bush administration's knight in shining armor."

"FEMA has never been without criticism, but it was once much more nimble, as it needs to be, and now is apparently becoming a responsive afterthought," said former Rep. Ken Bentsen (D-Texas), who often dealt with FEMA when tropical storms and hurricanes flooded Houston and who credited Joe Albaugh, Bush's first FEMA director, for responding effectively to Tropical Storm Allison in 2001.

"Congress should look into this quickly and employ some management expertise to boot," Bentsen said.

Witt left the government in 2001 to start his own consulting and lobbying shop.

We Can't Afford Not To Plan For Catastrophes (USAT)

By James Lee Witt

USA Today, September 7, 2005

Hundreds of thousands of residents jammed the highways to get out of Hurricane Katrina's path, which included 145-mph wind gusts and storm surges of more than 20 feet. That was just the beginning.

Local, state and federal resources were mobilized as one of the most powerful hurricanes in history made landfall along the Gulf Coast regions of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

During my years as director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), I witnessed the incredible abilities and dedication of our nation's emergency response personnel, of which we have the best trained and best equipped possible.

Despite their skills, ability and technology, we must do more to be better prepared and protected in the case of such a catastrophe.

Our financial recovery mechanisms, which rely primarily on the private insurance market, federal assistance in the form of low-interest loans and a handful of state catastrophe funds, need to be retooled so that they are capable of meeting the immeasurable costs of a catastrophe.

Conservative estimates indicate that the costs of recovery from Hurricane Katrina will rival any natural catastrophe we've experienced in the USA. Initial predictions indicate that recovery costs could surpass the $30 billion cost of recovering from the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

A replay of any of our previous natural catastrophes would result in similarly astounding costs:

• A 1938 hurricane, the "Long Island Express," missed Manhattan by only a few miles and caused $308 million in damage. A replay of that storm today is projected to have a recovery cost of $24 billion in Suffolk County, alone.

• If the 1906 San Francisco earthquake happened in the same spot as it did a century ago, damages are estimated to exceed $400 billion.

From a financial standpoint, state and federal catastrophe funds provide a necessary backstop for families, businesses and communities in the case of extraordinary events. Florida has funds in place to deal with hurricanes; California has such funds for earthquakes. New York is considering a similar fund as well.

Policymakers in other disaster-prone states should follow their example. States can move faster than the federal government. And they should move now.

On the other hand, catastrophes are not a state-by-state problem. Hurricanes that hit North Carolina can wreak havoc on New England. Earthquakes in California can cause damage well into the Pacific Northwest.

A national solution is every bit as important as the steps being taken in the states. Steps to be taken include a national catastrophe fund that would shore up private insurers in instances when truly catastrophic events occur. Such a fund would be a financially responsible way to ensure the viability of the private market and its ability to provide coverage to families, businesses and communities.

James Lee Witt is the CEO and chairman of James Lee Witt Associates, a public safety and crisis management consulting firm. Witt served as the director of FEMA from 1993 to 2001. Witt has been hired by Louisiana to help advise the governor on hurricane recovery efforts.

FEMA Fails Its Core Mission (WT)

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) head Michael Brown confirmed the dysfunctional performance of his organization throughout the first three or four days following Hurricane Katrina's assault on New Orleans. In an interview on CNN's "Paula Zahn Now," three-and-a-half days after Katrina made landfall, Mr. Brown insisted that the federal government in general and FEMA in particular had no idea until that very day that tens of thousands of New Orleans residents and tourists had assembled at the city's convention center.

"Sir, you aren't just telling me you just learned that the folks at the convention center didn't have food and water until today [Thursday], are you?" Mrs. Zahn asked incredulously. "You had no idea they were completely cut off?"

"Paula, the federal government did not even know about the convention center people until today," Mr. Brown said, ever so matter-of-factly. With that reply, he confirmed the enormous size of the disaster that was the federal response.

How the federal government should respond to emergencies and disasters is detailed in the National Response Plan, a 426-page report issued by the Department of Homeland Security. "The National Response Plan embodies our nation's commitment to the concept of one team, one goal," Tom Ridge, the secretary of Homeland Security at the time, declared on Jan. 6, 2005, when the response plan was revealed. "This achievement is a bold step forward in bringing unity in our response to disasters and terrorist threats and attacks." The plan was overwhelmed by events in its first major test with reality.

Guiding the nation's response to emergencies and disasters, the National Response Plan "establishes a comprehensive all-hazards approach to enhance the ability of the United States to manage domestic incidents," the Department of Homeland Security asserted. "The plan incorporates best practices and procedures from incident management disciplines," including emergency management, law enforcement and public health, "and integrates them into a unified structure. It forms the basis of how the federal government coordinates with state, local and tribal governments and the private sector during incidents." Contemplating a national catastrophe comparable to Katrina, a department fact sheet states that the response plan "ensures the seamless integration of the federal government when an incident exceeds local and state capabilities." Moreover, the plan "provided the means to swiftly deliver federal support in response to catastrophic incidents."

DOJ_NMG_0003360

In the wake of the disastrous initial responses to the Katrina disaster, the self-congratulatory conclusion asserted in the preface of the response plan is particularly disturbing. "The end result is vastly improved coordination among federal, state, local and tribal organizations to help save lives and protect America's communities by increasing the speed, effectiveness and efficiency of incident management." By FEMA's own description of its mission, they failed.

It's Not A 'Blame Game' (NYT)

The New York Times, September 7, 2005

With the size and difficulty of the task of rescuing and rebuilding New Orleans and other Gulf Coast areas still unfolding, it seemed early to talk about investigating how this predicted cataclysm had been allowed to occur and why the government's response was so slow and inept. Until yesterday, that is, when President Bush blithely announced at a photo-op cabinet meeting that he, personally, was going to "find out what went right and what went wrong." We can't imagine a worse idea.

No administration could credibly investigate such an immense failure on its own watch. And we have learned through bitter experience - the Abu Ghraib nightmare is just one example - that when this administration begins an internal investigation, it means a whitewash in which no one important is held accountable and no real change occurs.

Mr. Bush signaled yesterday that we are in for more of the same when he sneered and said, "One of the things that people want us to do here is to play a blame game." This is not a game. It is critical to know what "things went wrong," as Mr. Bush put it. But we also need to know which officials failed - not to humiliate them, but to replace them with competent people.

It's obvious, for instance, that Michael Brown has met the expectations of those who warned that he would be a terrible director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. This is no time to be engaging in a wholesale change of leadership, but in Mr. Brown's case there seems to be precious little leadership to lose. He should be replaced with someone who can do the huge job that remains to be done.

But the questions go way beyond Mr. Brown - starting with why federal officials ignored predictions of a disastrous flood in New Orleans - and the answers can come only from an independent commission. We agree with the Senate minority leader, Harry Reid, Senator Hillary Clinton and others who say that such a panel should follow the successful formula of the 9/11 commission: bipartisan leadership and members chosen by the White House and both parties in Congress on the basis of real expertise. It should have subpoena power and a staff expert enough to find answers and offer remedies.

Mrs. Clinton has also proposed pulling FEMA out of the Homeland Security Department and restoring its cabinet-level status. That is premature. The current setup makes sense, at least in theory. The nation should not have to support two different bureaucracies for dealing with sudden disasters.

Before throwing the system into chaos again, an investigation should determine whether the problem lies in the structure or in execution. Yesterday, The Wall Street Journal showed how the Bush administration had systematically stripped power and money from FEMA, which had been painfully rebuilt under President Bill Clinton but had long been a target of Republican "small government" ideologues. The Journal said state officials had been warning Washington - as recently as July 27 - that the homeland secretary, Michael Chertoff, was planning further disastrous cuts.

This page supported the creation of Mr. Chertoff's department. But it was poorly run by the first secretary, Tom Ridge, with his maddening color-wheel alerts.

It is clearly in need of a hard look and perhaps serious reorganization. Senators Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, and Joseph Lieberman, Democrat of Connecticut, have plans for hearings, which is fine. But they created the department in the first place and may have more of a stake in the outcome than a panel of impartial experts.

DOJ_NMG_0003361

The panel should also look at the shortcomings of local officials and governments. It was chilling, to put it mildly, to read Mayor Ray Nagin's comment in The Journal that New Orleans's hurricane plan was "get people to higher ground and have the feds and the state airlift supplies to them."

But disasters like this are not a city or a state issue. They concern the entire nation and demand a national response - certainly a better one than the White House comments that "tremendous progress" had been made in Louisiana. We're used to that dismissive formula when questions are raised about Iraq. Americans deserve better about a disaster of this magnitude in their own country.

Convoy To Chaos (WP)

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

District officials deserve praise for their prompt response to the needs of displaced Gulf Coast residents. The rescue operation launched Friday demonstrated how communities can quickly mobilize to help each other at a time of crisis, even when the federal government falls down on the job. But the District's mission to the storm survivors encountered widespread confusion, made worse by governmental red tape and indecision. Surveying the federal response to Hurricane Katrina and observing that the Washington region itself could be subject to a disaster or terrorist attack, Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) said yesterday on WTOP Radio's "Ask the Executive" program that area officials "need to know what we can count on and not count on from FEMA." That observation is aptly borne out by the District's experience in New Orleans and other flood-ravaged communities.

The District's convoy of 10 buses filled with food, diapers, water and 30 D.C. officials set out Friday, hoping to return this week with as many as 400 evacuees. Instead, the buses are expected to return today with the mission only partially accomplished. Tons of relief supplies were, in fact, delivered, but to the Alabama Red Cross. The caravan also picked up four people in New Orleans and dropped them off at a Red Cross staging area, according to WTOP Radio. But there were no crowds of evacuees waiting in New Orleans as had been promised. Nor did the caravan find evacuees waiting for transport in Baton Rouge, La., where it was dispatched by officials from the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Fuel was given to the Louisiana National Guard, but the buses are returning with only one or two hurricane evacuees. Meanwhile, nearly 300 evacuees were airlifted to Washington yesterday and are being housed in the D.C. Armory.

City leaders and emergency preparedness workers expected to find chaotic conditions near the damaged communities, with thousands of displaced storm victims on the move and shelter space dwindling on the battered Gulf Coast. But they also expected the federal relief effort to be better organized and at least up to managing the influx of assistance pouring in from around the country. That was not the case.

There is a lesson here for the Washington region. The federal-local law enforcement partnership that worked smoothly during the sniper attacks may not reemerge in a future natural disaster. As Mr. Duncan noted, FEMA is a changed agency, buried within a huge, slow-moving federal bureaucracy. If ever there were a time for local leaders to come together to review and coordinate their emergency and relief efforts, it's now. Otherwise, we may witness another descent into chaos -- only next time it will be closer to home.

Congress Should Share A Big Part Of The Blame For Katrina Response (RC)

By Norman Ornstein

Roll Call, September 7, 2005

In four days, we will mark the fourth anniversary of the tragedy of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. It's been four years — but in terms of our preparation for the aftermath of a devastating terrorist attack, it might just as well be one day after 9/11. [IMGCAP(1)]

This is not a time to mince words. The performance of the federal government in the Hurricane Katrina disaster — the policy wing of the federal government, not the dedicated employees — has been abysmal. Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) was right: The grade should be an F. But the failures of the past several days are a symptom of the bigger fiasco, one that should leave all of us furious — and nervous. And in that fiasco, Congress stands front and center in the line of miscreants.

DOJ_NMG_0003362

On 9/11, the inability of firefighters and police in New York to work their radios contributed to the loss of many lives. At the Pentagon, the inability of emergency workers from Montgomery and Prince George's counties in Maryland and Fairfax and Arlington counties in Virginia to communicate with each other made the response there much more difficult.

Now, four years have passed. A few metropolitan areas, on their own and without adequate federal assistance, have acted to make their own radio systems interoperable. The broader problems? They're the same, in essence, as they were before and during 9/11.

On 9/11, it became obvious that the resources and training available to the nation's first responders — fire, police, emergency medical technicians, public health clinics and so on — were woefully inadequate to deal with the new threats, not to mention larger natural disasters. No capability for dealing with chemical or biological threats, not enough gas masks (or appropriate ones), no training to deal with the collapse of large buildings. Four years later, regrettably, we can say the same thing. Instead of allocating the resources necessary to deal with these problems, we have in fact cut them in many areas.

On 9/11, a new set of broad threats emerged: the international network of terrorists out to kill as many of us as it could. The threat had existed beforehand, but suddenly it took on a new magnitude. The Hart-Rudman Commission, understanding this threat, had recommended prior to 9/11 the creation of a new Department of Homeland Security to bring together agencies and bureaus with other missions to incorporate the new missions of combating the terrorist threats and responding to a disaster that terrorists could bring — disasters of a different form and magnitude than a natural catastrophe, but with many similar characteristics.

Four years after 9/11, we have a DHS, and it's much larger than the Hart-Rudman Commission had envisioned. Its bureaucracy is still reeling from the task of integrating more than 20 separate entities into one — the largest reorganization in federal government history. When Katrina struck, DHS was not the centerpiece of federal response that its outside framers had foreseen, but rather a bloated bureaucracy that was unable for days to figure out what to do, and which produced a leaderless response that only compounded the tragedy.

The idea of creating such a department was a solid one; the magnitude and form of such a department was more debatable. But it was never debated. After vehemently resisting the idea of a department for almost nine months, the president turned around virtually overnight and embraced it, unveiling a plan much more sweeping than the original, and which had been hatched in secrecy by several key administration aides working in the situation room to ensure confidentiality. The normal debate and deliberative process that would have questioned the sweep of the reorganization plan and its breakneck pace was absent. Absent, too, was the notion of starting with a new Department of Border Security and moving in increments to something grander.

When the Department of Homeland Security bill came to Congress, it ended up facing one and only one serious area of controversy and deliberation: the question of sweeping civil service changes to eliminate many of the regular protections for the 70,000 DHS employees. That issue became a political tool — a major campaign point in the 2002 elections — even as the larger and important questions of what kind of department, and how to fulfill all the real and serious government functions, was ignored.

The result was, as we now see in embarrassing fashion, a downgrading of FEMA and confusion about its mission. After the creation of the department, at least these issues could have been raised through Congressional oversight. But the Senate never established a committee with full legislative responsibilities over these areas; the House, after much footdragging, created a select committee with no legislative jurisdiction.

So these issues received virtually no serious oversight. Even after the 9/11 Commission pushed Congress to reorganize itself, there was a wholly inadequate response — a bit of lip service paid to the House committee, which still sits under the thumb of such rival powers as Judiciary and Transportation, and a Senate committee with a new title and surface jurisdiction, but not the real cachet and authority that it needs. Much of the failure to implement the changes needed over the past four years can be laid at the feet of Congress and its leaders.

It is not as if we did not know what to do; other commissions and smart individuals with serious credentials have been out shouting about the problems and what to do about them. Read Steve Flynn's book, "America the Vulnerable," and ask yourself: What has been done to deal with threats to chemical and nuclear plants, railway stations with hazardous materials coming in every day and ports?

DOJ_NMG_0003363

This is a sham and a travesty. Congress has underfunded first responders; DHS has downplayed the response to an attack while focusing the lion's share of its resources on prevention; the administration has shown no urgency about these issues of homeland security.

Are local and state officials culpable for the aftermath of Katrina? Of course. But keep this in mind: On 9/11, the tragedies that struck New York and Virginia spilled over into Connecticut, New Jersey, Maryland and the District of Columbia. It was clear that leaving the response largely to state and local officials could not work in the same way that local responses might have decades earlier. FEMA worked under the Clinton administration's James Lee Witt. It worked, if less well, under Joe Allbaugh. It does not work now, and it may be neutered further under the new DHS reorganization plan unless great care is paid to its role in every kind of disaster.

Actions have consequences. Inactions have consequences, too — in this case unspeakably tragic ones. Those responsible, including the leaders of Congress, should be made accountable, and if they are decent, they will admit their failures and make new efforts to correct them. But if the past four years is any guide, I am not sanguine.

Norman Ornstein is a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

Mayor Slams Blanco For Stalling (WT)

By James G. Lakely

The Washington Times, September 7, 2005

Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco has been critical of the Bush administration's response to the disastrous aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, but, according to the mayor of New Orleans, her indecision when President Bush offered help delayed rescue efforts and cost lives.

New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin told CNN's "American Morning" Monday that he met with Mr. Bush and Mrs. Blanco on Air Force One on Friday and implored the two to "get in sync."

"If you don't get in sync, more people are going to die," Mr. Nagin said.

Mr. Bush met privately first with Mrs. Blanco, then called Mr. Nagin in for a meeting.

"He called me in that office," Mr. Nagin said. "And he said, 'Mr. Mayor, I offered two options to the governor.' I was ready to move. The governor said she needed 24 hours to make a decision."

That decision was a request by Mr. Bush to allow the federal government to take over the evacuation of New Orleans, which had been marked by chaos for days. The Democratic governor, who has clashed behind the scenes with the Bush administration since the storm hit, refused.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan confirmed the Air Force One meeting with Mrs. Blanco and the governor's decision not to cede her authority over the Louisiana National Guard, but added that he didn't think "it helps any situation to get into all those internal discussions."

"This isn't a time when people are trying to look at who's to blame or try to shift responsibility," Mr. McClellan said. "This is a time when we're all trying to work together to get things done."

Mr. Bush, at the request of Mrs. Blanco, declared the entire state of Louisiana a disaster area 48 hours before the hurricane made landfall. He also asked Mrs. Blanco to order a mandatory evacuation of New Orleans on Aug. 27 -- two days before the hurricane hit -- but she did not make the order until Aug. 28.

Mr. Bush and federal officials have come under harsh criticism for what some see as a slow reaction to a humanitarian crisis that unfolded last week.

"Instead of unconscionably blaming others, President Bush must take charge and take responsibility, and must get it right, and that is my concern and the message that I will bring to the president," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat. "Mr. President, you should have taken charge and you should have taken responsibility."

When the levees broke Aug. 30 and flooded New Orleans, the city descended into violence, looting and confusion. Hundreds of New Orleans police officers walked off the job, and some survivors housed in the Superdome and the city's convention center described rapes, robberies and killings in and around the facilities.

DOJ_NMG_0003364

Mrs. Blanco yesterday complained on ABC's "Good Morning America" that the federal government didn't act fast enough as the crisis grew.

"We didn't have enough resources," Mrs. Blanco said. "We were begging for resources, too. We needed helicopters because of all the water, we needed helicopters that could actually do this rescue mission, and we needed boats.

"We brought in everything we had, and we were begging for more, and nothing came as quickly as we needed it," she said.

Supporters of the president, however, say Mrs. Blanco and Mr. Nagin, who left New Orleans for the safety of Baton Rouge before the storm hit, also should share some blame.

"Kathleen Blanco and Ray Nagin weren't exactly Pataki and Guiliani," said a political adviser with close ties to the White House, referring to the New York governor and mayor praised for their response to the September 11 attacks. "They'll have their own problems when this crisis abates."

Sen. David Vitter, Louisiana Republican, said, "Hindsight is 20/20," but added that Mrs. Blanco was too slow in calling out the National Guard to keep order in New Orleans and save lives.

"We needed to make this a full-scale military operation starting with the National Guard immediately," Mr. Vitter said on ABC's "Good Morning America."

Paul Simpson, a political blogger who lives in the New Orleans suburb of Metairie, La., said he and other locals are puzzled by the governor's refusal to let the federal government temporarily command the state's National Guard.

"I thought it was as standard as sunshine in California that the governor would tell the president, 'You have the Guard.' I thought that was a given," Mr. Simpson said. "She absolutely has no clue."

Critics have long derided Mrs. Blanco for her tendency to call for studies and special commissions to find solutions for the state's biggest problems.

In 2003, the Shreveport Times, in endorsing her Republican opponent for governor, Bobby Jindal, called Mrs. Blanco "indecisive" and "unprepared" for the rigors of the job.

But defenders say that this merely reflects Mrs. Blanco's deliberative temperament. Shortly after Mrs. Blanco took office, Dan Juneau, president of the Louisiana Association of Business and Industry, defended her as a woman who "likes to accumulate as much information as possible before finalizing a major decision."

"She would rather be criticized for taking her time in finding the right approach than for shooting from the hip and moving in the wrong direction," Mr. Juneau wrote.

Congress Investigates 'woeful' Response To Katrina (FT)

By Edward Alden, Christopher Swann, Guy Dinmore And Joshua Chaffin

Financial Times, September 7, 2005

President George W. Bush and members of Congress on Tuesday promised full investigations into the slow government response to Hurricane Katrina, with Mr Bush suggesting that "bureaucratic obstacles" from state and local officials were partly to blame.

Following a meeting with his cabinet on Tuesday morning, Mr Bush said: "I intend to lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong.

"It's very important for us to understand the relationship between the federal government, the state government and the local government when it comes to a major catastrophe." Mr Bush's statement came as leading members of Congress also said they would begin hearings on what they called the "woeful" effort to aid those trapped by the storm and the flooding in New Orleans.

Republican senator Susan Collins and Democrat Joe Lieberman, who head the Senate homeland security committee, said they would start immediately with closed-door sessions with officials from the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which led the response.

"The first obligation of government is to protect its citizens. In its initial response to the catastrophe of Hurricane Katrina, particularly in Louisiana, governments at all levels failed in this obligation," said Ms Collins.

DOJ_NMG_0003365

Dick Cheney, the powerful US vice-president, will travel to the region on Wednesday to assess the recovery effort. Mr Bush said Mr Cheney would "make sure that we remove any bureaucratic obstacles that may be preventing us from achieving our goals. In other words, bureaucracy's not going to stand in the way of getting the job done for people."

Much of the focus is likely to be on whether the state government sought federal help quickly enough, or put up obstacles preventing that help from being delivered.

Kathleen Blanco, the Democratic governor of Louisiana, insisted on CNN on Tuesday that "I asked for everything that we had available from the federal government...and the federal effort was just a little slow in coming. I can't understand why."

But at the same time she said that co-operation had improved dramatically in recent days. "We are parties in this effort. We are a team," she told a news conference in Baton Rouge, the state capital.

She called for a "Marshall-like plan" for reconstruction after the storm, saying the priorities for Louisiana's economic rebuilding should be tourism, energy, transportation, manufacturing and technology.

Harry Reid, the Senate Democratic leader, said that Mr Bush would seek an additional $40bn-$50bn for the relief effort, following the $10.5bn approved by Congress on Friday. Mr Reid suggested the costs for reconstruction could exceed $150bn.

In New Orleans' Jefferson parish, which has over 400,000 residents, a massive operation to restore utilities was launched. A few areas already have power.

Several of the levees breached in the storm were also repaired, and engineers began pumping water out of the flooded city. But General Myles Deering, of the joint task force assigned to Baton Rouge, was cautious about the progress. "This is going to be a long process," he said. "It's hard to celebrate the triumphs when they have such disaster."

Lawmakers Prepare Katrina Probe, Financial Aid (REU)

By Donna Smith

Reuters, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The Republican senator leading a Senate investigation into the government's response to Hurricane Katrina said on Tuesday it was "woefully inadequate" and it had raised doubts about the U.S. ability to cope with a terrorist attack.

Sen. Susan Collins, a Maine Republican, spoke as lawmakers prepared to provide a second round of emergency money to cope with the devastation on the Gulf coast expected to total around $40 billion.

Collins said her Senate Homeland Security Committee would begin its investigation this week into the relief efforts.

"If our system did such a poor job when there was no enemy, how would the federal, state and local governments have coped with a terrorist attack that provided no advance warning and that was intent on causing as much death and destruction as possible?" she told reporters.

Collins and the panel's top Democrat, Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, promised a bipartisan, wide-ranging review, which was requested by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency, part of the Homeland Security Department, has been a focus of much of the criticism, which has also targeted President George W. Bush.

"Katrina was a disaster that scientists, emergency management officials and political leaders had anticipated for years, yet the initial response was woefully inadequate," Collins said.

Lawmakers moved on several fronts to respond to Katrina's devastation. House Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis, a Virginia Republican, said his committee would hold a hearing next week on the disaster response.

MORE EMERGENCY AID

In the House of Representatives, Republican leaders said they expected a fresh Bush administration request for emergency funds for FEMA. They declined to say how much the White House wanted on top of the $10.5 billion approved last week, but Senate aides said they expected it to be about $40 billion.

House and Senate leaders met with Bush on Tuesday to discuss relief efforts and House Speaker Dennis Hastert, an Illinois Republican, said the new aid package could be approved by the end of the week.

DOJ_NMG_0003366

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said the cost of recovery and relief could exceed $150 billion. The estimate was "not unreasonable," but the numbers were not yet clear, said Jenny Manley, a spokeswoman for the Senate Appropriations Committee.

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, a Texas Republican, said other legislation would be needed to help victims of Hurricane Katrina. He noted the storm hit at the end of the month just before Social Security and other government checks were mailed to beneficiaries who no longer have a place to live.

"We have to remove the red tape so they can get these checks and start to rebuild their lives," DeLay said.

Lawmakers were also taking a hard look at FEMA and whether it should stay in the Homeland Security Department created after the September 11, 2001, attacks.

Democratic Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Barbara Mikulski of Maryland said they were introducing legislation making FEMA a separate cabinet-level agency, which it was when it was created in 1979.

"We've given billions of dollars to the Department of Homeland Security," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, a Vermont Democrat. "I voted for those billions of dollars as a member of the Appropriations Committee. We have given as many tools as they've asked for. What in heaven's name was happening?"

(Additional reporting by Richard Cowan, Joanne Kenen and Vicki Allen)

Members Of Congress Return From Recess, Call For Probes (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON — Congress returned from a five-week recess Tuesday to an agenda swept clean by Hurricane Katrina, a disaster that has sent lawmakers scrambling to aid its victims and figure out why help came to them so late.

“It is difficult to understand the lack of preparedness and the ineffective initial response to a disaster that had been predicted for years, and for which specific, dire warnings had been given for days,” said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, head of the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee.

Collins called for congressional hearings as early as next week.

Others called for a 9/11-style commission to investigate failures in responding to the disaster. “It's hard to untangle all of the causes,” said Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., who will introduce a bill that would create such a commission. She said cutbacks in funding and personnel at the Federal Emergency Management Agency, as well as unclear lines of command that appear to have bogged down the response, “have to be thoroughly investigated.”

Clinton also introduced a bill to separate FEMA, which she and others say bungled the initial response to Katrina, from the Department of Homeland Security. FEMA was an independent agency before Congress put it under the new Cabinet department.

Some Republicans agreed. Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., who lost his home in Pascagoula, said it was “a mistake” to take away FEMA's independence. But he warned against finger-pointing while hundreds of thousands of people are homeless.

“Our response has not been perfect,” he said, but he urged colleagues, “Please, let's not try to affix blame now. There'll be time” later.

Senators and representatives began working to address the crisis. Members of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee met with relief organizations in a “listening session” to determine the most critical needs of evacuees. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., released a wish list of legislation that included waiving income and residency requirements for Medicaid, mental health outreach and providing $2,500 per child to school districts that take in displaced students.

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, said he hopes to introduce legislation this week that would include reducing red tape on dispersing aid for those left jobless. Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, wants to retool a federal resettlement program for displaced people from other countries to help Americans displaced by Katrina.

“We can try to help people get back to their lives and get started again much sooner,” Grassley said.

Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, and others called for cutting taxes to encourage investment in the affected areas.

That enraged some Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0003367

"This is the height of fiscal irresponsibility," said Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill. "I can just see these poor, homeless people sitting in the Houston Astrodome saying, 'Thank God, I don't have to pay some death tax.' "

Fuming Congress Plans A Battery Of Hearings (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman And Robert Dodge

The Dallas Morning News, September 7, 2005

WASHINGTON – Congress returned from a five-week recess Tuesday hopping mad and ready to start swearing in witnesses. One committee after another announced hearings on Hurricane Katrina, and lawmakers couldn't find enough ways to express their disgust for the planning and response to the disaster.

It's a frenzy President Bush hasn't faced from a Congress controlled for most of his tenure by allies. Through terrorism, war and the occasional scandal, they have protected his administration from the sort of pointed grilling lawmakers are planning over the coming days and weeks.

"There's clearly a mood for aggressive oversight on this issue because people are demanding it. It's a national catastrophe," said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz. "I don't know if it affects the general mood of Congress on every issue, but certainly there's a strong desire ... to find out what went wrong and what went right."

House and Senate Republican leaders have rarely allowed embarrassing oversight hearings in recent years, routinely brushing aside Democratic demands on Iraq and weapons of mass destruction, and on allegations of prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo Bay. It took an outcry from victims' families to jump-start the Sept. 11 commission.

This time, GOP lawmakers have rushed to the microphones.

'On the defensive'

"If you were a president, you couldn't have asked for more than he's [historically] gotten from these [Republican leadership] guys," said Joel Aberbach, director of the Center for American Politics and Public Policy at the University of California Los Angeles and author of Keeping a Watchful Eye: The Politics of Congressional Oversight.

But the shortcomings involving Katrina have been too overt and terrible to ignore, he said, even for congressional stalwarts who have kept their troops disciplined for years.

"The Republican Party and the president in particular are tremendously on the defensive now because of how miserably the government has performed," Dr. Aberbach said.

Mr. Bush spent the day focused on disaster response. He met with volunteers, his Cabinet and congressional leaders of both parties. Congressional aides said he'll seek $40 billion more from Congress for the next phase of response and recovery. He announced that he will personally oversee an investigation into what went wrong and why, and will dispatch Vice President Cheney as his point man in Louisiana.

"Bureaucracy is not going to stand in the way of getting the job done for the people," Mr. Bush said.

But Mr. Bush is the head of the federal bureaucracy, and Democrats weren't about to let that go unnoticed. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California accused him of "unconscionably blaming others" rather than taking responsibility for his administration's failures.

Anger on the coast

Demands for congressional inquiries came most poignantly from those in the disaster zone.

"Bureaucracy has murdered people in the greater New Orleans area. And bureaucracy needs to stand trial before Congress today," Jefferson Parish president Aaron Broussard said on CBS' The Early Show. "So I'm asking Congress, please investigate this now. Take whatever idiot they have at the top of whatever agency and give me a better idiot. Give me a caring idiot. Give me a sensitive idiot. Just don't give me the same idiot."

At the Capitol, Republicans went out of their way to criticize state and local governments.

"Governments at all levels failed," said Senate homeland security committee chairwoman Susan Collins, R-Maine, announcing hearings into the disaster response. "It is difficult to understand the lack of preparedness and the ineffective initial response to a disaster that had been predicted for years and for which specific dire warnings had been given for days."

DOJ_NMG_0003368

Even Mr. Bush's staunchest defenders called hearings inevitable, though some such as Florida Sen. Mel Martinez, Mr. Bush's former housing secretary, said he'd prefer to hold off a while.

"I'm not going to be quick to be finger-pointing and looking for ways of making easy answers out of complicated problems," Mr. Martinez said. "And there's plenty of responsibility of local state and federal government that ought to be reviewed. But I don't think anybody wants to whitewash what might have gone wrong."

Democrats were harsher, demanding that President Bush fire the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, Michael Brown. And they shrugged off warnings against trying to score political points, issuing detailed suggestions for coping with the disaster.

Ms. Pelosi also asked Speaker Dennis Hastert to create a hurricane relief task force to investigate the failures of the initial response.

House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Sugar Land, didn't immediately dismiss the idea. He called for a "comprehensive congressional review," a bipartisan inquiry with a more ambitious scope than committee-by-committee hearings.

"This work will require us to ask serious and difficult questions," he said. "It is Congress' responsibility to look into what happened before the disaster and after the disaster."

Meanwhile, the hearings are already under way. A Senate panel heard testimony Tuesday on the spike in gasoline prices. The House energy committee, chaired by Rep. Joe Barton, R-Ennis, plans a similar hearing today. Other panels will focus on disaster planning and response.

House committee chairmen met Tuesday night to brainstorm legislation their panels might offer in the next weeks and months to keep the economy humming, address energy prices, ensure the flow of Midwest farm products that depended on the Mississippi, rebuilding oil platforms and, of course, helping Katrina's victims and rebuilding New Orleans and other devastated areas.

Pressure also is mounting from states for congressional relief – those reeling directly from the storm and those facing the prospect of absorbing the hundreds of thousands of evacuees.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, said it's important for the federal government to reimburse Texas cities for their costs quickly.

"We are taking 250,000 people in now for a much longer term than anyone has ever had before," she said. "We're having to add to our school systems. We're going to have to add security. There are many costs for the states like Texas that are taking these people in need."

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., said federal and state governments had made mistakes, but with the crisis ongoing, he was reluctant to be critical, even as his state seeks its share of hurricane aid.

"My mama don't raise no idiot. I ain't going to bite the hand that's trying to save me," he said.

Deconstructing Katrina (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 7, 2005

"Never did we dream that they would use our own airplanes as weapons."

-- President Bush, April 20, 2004.

"I don't think anyone anticipated the breach of the levees."

-- Bush, Sept. 1, 2005.

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) wore a burgundy suit, dangling earrings and a demure smile when she appeared in the Senate television studio yesterday. But the questions she asked were sharp and unnerving.

"If our system did such a poor job when there was no enemy, how would the federal, state and local governments have coped with a terrorist attack that provided no advance warning and that was intent on causing as much death and destruction as possible?" the chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee wondered, announcing a probe into the response to Hurricane Katrina. "How is it possible that almost four years to the day after the attacks on our country, with billions of dollars spent to improve our preparedness, that a major area of our nation was so ill prepared to respond to a catastrophe?"

DOJ_NMG_0003369

As horrendous as the death and dislocation have been in and around New Orleans, the government's "woefully inadequate" response there, as Collins put it, has left Americans far from the disaster area to assume that, if a terrorist's nuclear bomb goes off on K Street or smallpox is released in Times Square, it will be every man for himself. Bush linked the two yesterday, telling reporters, "We want to make sure that we can respond properly if there's a WMD attack or another major storm."

But there was a disconnect yesterday at opposite ends of Pennsylvania Avenue. On the Hill, outraged lawmakers launched a bipartisan investigation and demanded to know what good had come from all that homeland security spending. At the White House, the president was still operating in the conditional. "If things went wrong, we'll correct them," he said. "And when things went right, we'll duplicate them."

Collins and Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.), the ranking Democrat on the committee, had scheduled their announcement of an investigation for 11:15 yesterday morning. Bush preempted them, inviting reporters into the Cabinet Room at 11:08. "What I intend to do is to lead an investigation to find out what went right and what went wrong," the president said.

Bush was in no hurry to probe. "There will be ample time to assess," he said. Rearranging a presidential coaster on the Cabinet table, he said that to ask questions while the relief operation is underway would be "to play a blame game."

The mood was more urgent on the Hill, where a bipartisan group of lawmakers in the House was preparing legislation to separate FEMA from the Department of Homeland Security. In the Senate, the issue eclipsed the excitement over the sudden emergence of a second Supreme Court vacancy, with the death of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist.

At an otherwise subdued briefing announcing the postponement of confirmation hearings for John G. Roberts Jr., Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) erupted when asked about the hurricane response. "We've given billions of dollars to the Department of Homeland Security," he said, almost shouting. "What in heaven's name was happening?"

Collins, performing before a standing-room-only crowd, had an answer to Bush's objections. She said her committee's goal is not "to fix blame," and she promised "not to divert resources from the rescue and recovery."

But she said the questions could not wait; hearings are planned for next week. "We would be remiss," she said, "if we did not ask the hard questions needed to understand what went so wrong and what our country must do to improve our ability to respond to future crises, whether they are natural disasters or terrorist attacks."

Lieberman, too, spoke of a problem bigger than New Orleans. "Hurricane Katrina was in one sense the most significant test of the new national emergency preparedness and response system that was created after 9/11, and it obviously did not pass that test," he said. "We need to know why -- not just to fix what went wrong, but in my opinion, to rebuild the confidence of the American people."

The normally adept White House has had trouble settling on a message over the past week. Officials have condemned the "blame game" even as they point fingers at state and local authorities. They have made public assertions -- that nobody anticipated a levee breach and that Louisiana did not declare a state of emergency -- that turned out to be flat wrong. Now, Bush is in the position of promising to lead an investigation but saying it's still a question of "if things went wrong."

After a midday meeting with the president at the White House, even top GOP congressional leaders dropped the "if." House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.) called for investigations "to make sure that this doesn't happen again." And Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.), promising to "investigate aggressively," floated the idea of an independent commission or bicameral committee. "If we don't have a strong disaster response," he said, things such as a bioterrorism attack "could result in not hundreds of deaths, but thousands of deaths and indeed millions of deaths."

Storm Rages In The Wake Of Katrina (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan , Patrick O'Connor And Roxana Tiron

The Hill, September 7, 2005

The House and Senate government-oversight committees will hold hearings into the widespread criticism of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina.

The hearings are just part of Republicans' response to the public-relations fallout over the administration's admitted mishandling of the devastation in the immediate aftermath of the hurricane.

President Bush also plans to hold a separate investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0003370

The decision to hold House hearings comes after Rep. Henry Waxman (Calif.), the top-ranking Democrat on the government-reform panel, and several other Democrats wrote a letter to Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) and Transportation and Infrastructure Committee Chairman Don Young (R-Alaska) calling for "thorough oversight to examine the preparation for and response to Hurricane Katrina."

The 17-page letter, dated Sept. 6, was signed by Waxman, as well as Democratic Reps. James Oberstar (Minn.) and Bennie Thompson (Miss.), a prominent member of the Congressional Black Caucus.

Even though several GOP leaders pleaded for increased civility, Congress plunged immediately into bitter partisanship as lawmakers returned to work yesterday, with the two parties arguing over blame for the death and destruction left in Hurricane Katrina's wake.

Echoing the White House, Republican lawmakers faulted Louisiana local and state officials for bungled relief efforts in New Orleans while House Democrats distributed talking points saying Bush's administration underfunded disaster relief programs and GOP lawmakers "voted against ensuring New Orleans safety through FEMA and Army Corps of Engineer funding."

Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.) said, "Local and state officials were totally unprepared. Governor Blanco was all but AWOL. Only at President Bush's urging did she declare a state of emergency," he said.

In fact, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D) requested a declaration Aug. 26, two days before the hurricane struck her state.

The sniping did not stop after House Republican and Democratic leaders met with President Bush at the White House. At the stakeout, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) could be heard muttering as House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) spoke to reporters and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) told Bush directly that FEMA director Michael Brown should be fired.

DeLay counseled caution during the early stages of the oversight process and called for a bipartisan, bicameral review of how the government prepared for the storm and of the emergency response to the flooding.

DeLay said he was reluctant to have an independent commission review the federal government's response; Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) called earlier this week for just such a commission in the mold of the Sept. 11 commission.

"I have concerns about holding hearings," the majority leader told reporters, adding that he did not want to take local, state and federal officials away from the rebuilding effort. "My own impression is that whole system broke down."

DeLay said he opposed legislation aimed at separating the FEMA from the Department of Homeland Security (DHS), saying, "I think it's way too premature."

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and DeLay have been discussing congressional oversight but were not ready to offer specifics. DeLay said Congress would try to reduce red tape so that federal agencies could extend Social Security, student-loan and unemployment benefits to people displaced by the hurricane.

He said the House would take action this week by:

• Providing relief for Pell Grant recipients who had to withdraw from school.

• Allowing FEMA to transfer money directly to private charities and faith-based groups.

• Suspending red tape requirements for distributing unemployment benefits.

• Letting states use surplus unemployment funds to provide relief.

Asked about Reid's proposal for a $150 billion bailout package, DeLay said it was too early to put a cost on the disaster.

The flurry of legislation will probably postpone budget reconciliation by a week or more, but the House is still committed to moving bills that would reform retirement security and border security as well as to finishing the annual appropriations process.

"We can do more than one thing in this Congress," DeLay said.

In the Senate, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) directed the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee to investigate the widely criticized federal response to Hurricane Katrina and whether FEMA should be separated from DHS.

"I tend to think that FEMA should stay at DHS," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), the committee chairwoman.

She and Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), the committee's ranking Democrat, who wrote the legislation creating the DHS, will get a closed-door briefing from FEMA today before considering whether to restore FEMA's status as an independent agency.

"We have to consider every question, including our own work" and the decision to put FEMA into DHS, Lieberman said at the press conference.

Collins did not call for Brown or DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff to resign but said her panel will take a careful look at all the roles played by federal officials.

Lieberman seemed to take a more aggressive stance, saying, "What Michael Brown and Michael Chertoff did is at the center of the investigation."

The Senate appropriated almost $2.9 billion for emergency preparedness and response in the 2006 DHS budget. Congress approved an emergency $10.5 billion aid package last week and now Democrats are calling for as much as another $50 billion.

Responding to the rising gas prices, House Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (R-Texas) will hold a press conference today on price gouging and energy issues related to Katrina.

Despite the apparent widespread agreement that the response to the storm and flooding was inadequate, most lawmakers, except Pelosi, stopped short of calling for Brown's resignation.

"It's too chaotic to suggest that," said Foley, who slammed FEMA for its response to the four hurricanes that swamped Florida last year and wants the agency to be pulled out of DHS. "I am for looking at the agency function before calling for heads to roll."

Parties Divided Over Katrina Response (RC)

By By Emily Pierce, Ben Pershing And Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, September 7, 2005

Proposals to help the victims of Hurricane Katrina ran the gamut in Congress on Tuesday, with Democrats pressing for action as early as this week on a long list of social welfare bills while Republican leaders cautioned that Congress may need more than a few days to devise legislative solutions.

In the meantime, Members braced for the second spending request for the Federal Emergency Management Agency in just five days. This time, Congressional aides estimated that the Bush administration would ask for as much as $40 billion because FEMA is using up the initial $10.5 billion Congress appropriated on Friday at a faster rate than it had expected. As of press time, it was unclear whether the White House would make the request last night or today.

Beyond emergency appropriations, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and other Democrats pressed to pass legislation by the end of this week that would extend federal social programs such as Medicaid, subsidized housing and unemployment insurance to newly homeless and jobless residents of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama. Reid also estimated that the "initial investment" for Katrina relief would be upwards of $150 billion.

But the Democrats' proposals and demands for "immediate" Congressional action were received somewhat skeptically by Republicans.

Senate Republican Policy Committee Chairman Jon Kyl (Ariz.) urged Members to "take a deep breath and think carefully." Kyl suggested creating a bipartisan task force that would develop a legislative package within 30 days.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said that he will be talking with his chairmen over the next two days "to pull together their ideas for the immediate response, the midterm response, and the long-term response" to the hurricane. But he was short on specifics, saying only, "There are a lot of human practical needs that have to be addressed right now, and the federal government has a major role as we look at health and social services and housing, when you look at food and look at shelter."

Frist spokeswoman Amy Call said that the Majority Leader and other Senate GOP leaders would "have a better sense of what the [legislative] package will look like" after Frist meets with Republican committee chairmen this morning.

Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Chairman Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) said his panel would hold a hearing Thursday on legislative solutions to the crisis caused by Katrina.

"One of the worst things you can do in politics is start announcing the decisions before you listen to the people," said Enzi, who, along with ranking member Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), met with representatives from relief agencies Tuesday to find out what they can do legislatively. Enzi also asked for suggestions for what Congress can do to be submitted to the HELP Committee Web site.

DOJ_NMG_0003372

However, Kennedy, like many Democrats, offered a list of actions he believes Congress should take in the near future, including extending disaster unemployment insurance to more people, helping fund school districts that are accepting children from the storm-ravaged region, freezing student loan payments and interest for those affected by the disaster and providing mental in addition to physical health care for victims.

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), who represents a state severely affected by Katrina, appeared to take the middle ground, urging a combination of caution and haste.

"We need thoughtful things. We need innovative things, but we do need speed," said Lott, who noted that many of the things Democrats are pressing for have already been done by the agencies in charge of health care and unemployment insurance.

For example, Lott said waivers are already in place to help disaster victims secure access to Medicaid as well as for worker compensation if their jobs have been lost.

House Republicans are also taking a somewhat cautious approach to the Congressional response, hesitating to place a dollar figure on the damages. House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), for one, reacted negatively to Reid's suggestion that the reconstruction effort might cost $150 billion.

"I don't think anybody knows, and anybody trying to know is just playing political games," he said.

Still, DeLay called the Katrina effort "the House's No. 1 priority for the foreseeable future" and said he expected an initial Katrina package to be "ready for the floor later this week."

DeLay suggested Tuesday that the package would likely contain a number of small provisions designed to cut red tape and allow money to be shifted around to cover various shortfalls.

In the meantime, the Louisiana Congressional delegation has continued to craft a legislative package that could provide immediate relief to the displaced hurricane victims. Brian Richardson, spokesman for Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), said the package would likely include Democratic proposals to make sure that Medicaid, housing and unemployment benefits are available to victims in the long term.

The package may also include provisions that enable displaced children to enroll in school without having to produce former school records as well as possible changes to a bankruptcy law passed earlier this year that would make it easier for disaster victims to erase their debts, Richardson said.

"It will be a huge bill, because this is a huge national tragedy," said Richardson.

Lott said he would work with Landrieu and her Republican colleague, Sen. David Vitter (La.), but he cautioned that the Louisiana delegation bill should not "duplicate or complicate efforts" currently under way.

In the meantime, Senate Finance Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) said he was considering proposals to make Medicaid available to storm victims and is working on extending the duties of Office of Refugee Resettlements within the Health and Human Services Department to help not just displaced persons from other countries but also victims of Katrina.

With even Lott saying that relief efforts could cost as much as $100 billion, lawmakers from both parties appeared largely resigned to the fact that billions of dollars would be added to the federal deficit.

Even Senate Budget Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) acknowledged, "We're going to have to spend money to do whatever it takes to solve the problem. ... Yes, it will obviously increase the deficit significantly."

But Enzi noted that lawmakers need to carefully weigh the proposed solutions being offered, particularly the most costly ones.

"We want to do it as effectively as we can, but there are cost constraints," Enzi said of Congress' legislative contributions to the relief efforts. "We have to look at it realistically to see what kinds of things can be done."

House Democrats joined their Senate colleagues in calling for a multi-tiered response to the disaster. Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), along with other Democratic leaders, urged the government to provide immediate compensation and financial assistance to victims, to eliminate bureaucratic hurdles to those needing help and to make a long-term commitment of support to rebuild the Gulf Coast.

Pelosi did not estimate how much the recovery would cost, saying only that the $10.5 billion appropriated so far is "not enough." She also cautioned against "nickel-and-diming" the region, calling for additional funding for housing, food stamps, unemployment benefits and schools.

DOJ_NMG_0003373

Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), ranking member on the Homeland Security Committee, said: "We take the position that the government has a responsibility to fix it, and to fix it, we've got to pay for it."

Federal assistance aside, the Democratic leadership also insisted that Republican leaders hold House hearings on the federal response, and the request was granted Tuesday.

Rep. Henry Waxman (Calif.), ranking member on the Government Reform Committee, joined other ranking members by writing a letter to his committee's chairman, Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.) and Transportation Chairman Don Young (R-Alaska), outlining his reasons for the inquiry.

"We need to learn for the future what went wrong," Waxman said. "We need to know why it has happened the way it has."

Davis announced Tuesday that he would hold hearings next week.

Republican leaders have emphasized that they expect several different committees to probe the government's response to the disaster and to explore ways to improve future contingency plans.

"It's fair to say the overall response to this emergency could have and should have been better," DeLay said.

The Majority Leader dismissed the need for an investigative commission, similar to that which followed the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, saying that the legislative branch is fully capable of examining the situation itself. Some Members have suggested an independent body look into the response.

"It's Congress' responsibility to look into what happened," he said, though he emphasized that committees should be "deliberate" in scheduling oversight hearings so as not to force too many key administration officials to leave their duties to testify on the Hill all at once.

DeLay said the damage wrought by Katrina could provide the impetus for passage of another energy bill that could include "items that Democrats forced us to take out of the [last] energy bill that, frankly, we ought to have kept."

House Democrats are also pushing for legislation to remove the Federal Emergency Management Agency from the Homeland Security Department. Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.) advanced a bill Tuesday to make the agency fully independent.

As leaders from both parties contemplate their next move, the Congressional Black Caucus planned to meet last night to discuss the crisis and come up with its own plan for the coming days.

The CBC, which is concerned about the large number of blacks affected by Katrina, is trying to organize a group to visit the region, possibly as early as Friday. The members are also meeting this morning with Marty Evans, president of the Red Cross, for a briefing on the conditions and are working on ways to help the displaced.

"We're not going to sit back and wait," said one CBC staffer. "Somebody's got to step up."

Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.), a vocal critic of the government's handling of the catastrophe, is calling on the White House to declare a national day of prayer for the victims. He is also working with his Congressional colleagues and the CBC to set up a relief fund for those affected by Katrina.

"We have got to do what we can do to help," he said.

Cummings said Congress and the Bush administration first have an obligation to go "door to door" to rescue victims, and then to help the displaced reconstruct their lives. He said every Member should be furious at the recent course of events, and must come together to help the recovery efforts.

New Exit Plan: Thanksgiving (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, September 7, 2005

The aftermath of Hurricane Katrina has scrambled Congress' post-recess agenda and calendar, as leaders are frantically reordering their legislative priorities and pushing the anticipated adjournment date back weeks, and possibly more than a month.

Both the House and Senate were already resigned to missing their original departure target of Oct. 1. And with an enormous new set of challenges to tackle in the coming days, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) said Tuesday: "It's obvious that we're going to be here until Thanksgiving."

The sentiment is similar on the Senate side, where the schedule is even more crowded following the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

"Considering that we have another Supreme Court nominee to do, I think Thanksgiving is realistic [for adjournment], if not after," said a Senate GOP leadership aide.

In the House, Republican leaders spent much of Tuesday in meetings trying to determine how best to approach Katrina's aftermath. While sources said issues such as Social Security and immigration were not prominently discussed at those sessions, Members and aides are aware that the heavier workload and the new political environment created by Katrina could change how the House approaches the rest of its agenda.

"We are seriously involved in Katrina, and there has not been a lot of time to figure out where the rest of the agenda falls into place," said a House Republican leadership staffer.

Another leadership aide said that — as happens often — much of what the House decides to do will depend on what the Senate does, since that chamber's schedule is even more crowded than the House's.

